The Beatlemania production set Williams party attendance records. Within an hour after its opening, Security closed the party and turned hundreds away. For "Night Fever," Case and Beckett have consulted disco experts in New York and rented lights and special effects valued at several thousand dollars. "Case hopes to be able to obtain sponsorships for the event from "one or two" residential houses.

Williamstown power shut off

Massachusetts Electric Co. shut off Williamstown power Saturday morning from 2:00 to 3:00 a.m. in order to replace insulators at the Walley Bridge transfer station.

According to the North Adams Transcript, "suspicious damage" caused the main line at the station to trip out Friday morning; the suddenness of the trouble precluded widespread notification of students.

In memoriam

Luther Stearns Mansfield

Luther Stearns Mansfield, professor emeritus of American history and literature at Williams and a nationally recognized authority on Herman Melville, died Thursday, April 6, at the Sweetbrook Nursing Home where he had been a resident for several years.

Mansfield was a former president of the New England American Studied Association and national president of the Melville Society. He was awarded an honorary lifetime membership in that Society in 1969. He had written and edited several books and numerous reviews and articles about Melville and his writings.

Mansfield joined the Williams College English faculty in 1936, was named a professor of history and literature in 1947, and retired in 1971. During World War II he taught mathematics and theory of flight in military training programs at Williams. He was also the co-founder of the American Civilization program in 1940.

Frosh assigned future housing

According to Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad, over nine-tenths of the freshman class received their first or second choices in the upper class inclusion process; the remaining 7.3 per cent came by their third and fourth choices. No group received its fifth choice.

The increases over last year in preferences for Mission Park and the Berkshire Quad as second choice accounted for the unusually satisfactory results, explained Roosenraad. The overwhelming preference for Greylock, though, echoed past statistics.

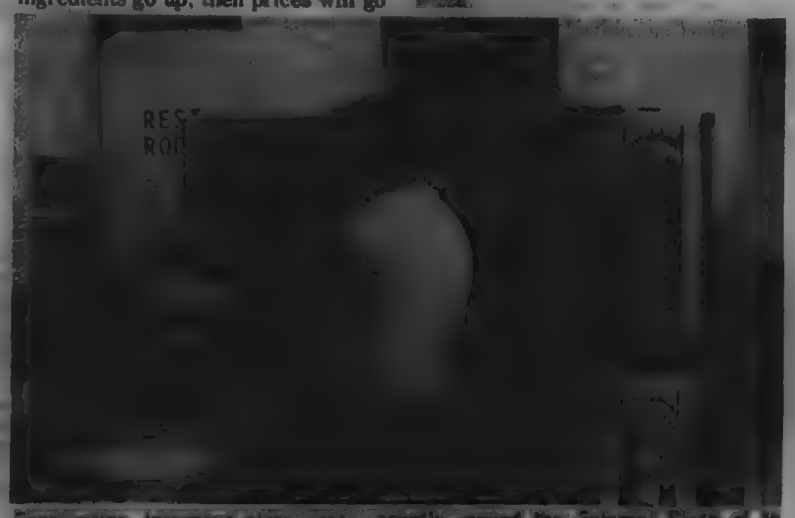
Constantine relocates Colonial

by Sharon Nelson



Colonial Pizza, the goal of many a late night hunger trek, is no longer at its familiar address of 50 Spring Street. Pizza addicts need not fear, however, for they can still sample the famed Colonial cuisine at its new location on 22 Spring Street, the former home of C&E Pizza.

Recently, the lease expired at 50 Spring Street. After being denied a five-year renewal lease, Colonial's owner, Constantine Agnanos, moved the pizza parlor to its new address.

Since Colonial is the only pizza franchise in Williamstown, some students feel that Constantine's prices are artificially high. The Greek merchant claims, however, that he will "never be a monopoly." I could charge $10 per pizza but I don't. If ingredients go up, then prices will go up," he declared.

The saga of Constantine is an intriguing one. Born 40 years ago in Greece, he resided in his homeland until graduation from high school, after which he continued his education at the University of Munich. After working several years in Germany, Constantine decided to come to the United States.

He opened his first pizza parlor in Amherst, Massachusetts almost a decade ago. Soon he opened a Colonial Pizza franchise in North Adams. Then, in 1972, he came to 50 Spring Street in Williamstown, thus adding another link to the expanding chain of Colonial pizzerias. Last year, Constantine added the 22 Spring Street location (formerly called the Pizza House) which became C&E Pizza.

Constantine, Insamovs pizza chef, recently moved the Colonial Pizza of 50 Spring Street, to 22 Spring Street, formerly C&E Pizza. He was refused a renewal lease.

Letter: no clause needed

To the editor:

The talk of the inclusion of the "sexual orientation" clause in the College's anti-discrimination policy seems to have died out or gone underground. Was the inclusion of the phrase reintroduced at the March faculty meeting, as the TNC proposed in the Record of March 3? If so, with what results?

On consideration of the implications of the clause, I've decided that its inclusion, with whatever concurrent clarifying legalisms, would be a mistake serving only to obscure the College's true policy in the admission of students. I strongly agree that students, if qualified, should indeed be admitted to the College regardless of their sexual orientation. But the purpose of a non-discrimination statement is not to insure representation in the student body of every group listed in the statement, rather it is to state unequivocally that no one will be denied admission because of sex, race, creed, or sexual orientation. Even this does not serve as an indication of who the College will admit.

There are better ways of conveying the true intention of admissions policy than adding a clause to the present policy for each group who feels its members are overlooked or discriminated against in admissions. Northwestern University is one institution which has decided to simplify policy in order to clarify its true intentions: "Northwestern University is Non-Discriminatory in its admission policy."

This statement indicates the direction I feel admissions statements must take, though it is not without obvious problems. Certainly Northwestern does not admit every applicant—it does indeed discriminate in its admissions. Discrimination is based on high school performance, personal qualities of each applicant as assessed by the admissions committee, and so on. These things will always be the true determinants in college admissions, and I doubt whether anyone will argue this point. The best admissions policy statement will be that which states the criteria actually employed by the admissions committee. These criteria must of necessity remain ambiguous. I suggest that Williams adopt the admissions statement: "Williams College discriminates only on the basis of an assessment of each candidate's personal accomplishment." This avoids the necessity of legalistic terms and the increasing complexity of the present statement, yet it expresses the essential true character of Williams College admissions.

Divestiture's Victims

To the Editor,

From a distance (and by that I mean through week-old Records) it has been difficult to measure the significance and staying power of the debate over South Africa and stock divestiture. Now that a student-faculty committee has been formed and the issue institutionalized, the debate will certainly remain before the Williams community for months to come. (Whether the issue will become deradicalized and fade from daily conversation, as most administrators hope and assume and some students fear, remains to be seen.)

The professional managers of Williams' endowment have been directed to optimize the return on College investments (by judiciously mixing high yield and security goals). Presumably, the current College portfolio will lead to the highest secure rate of return these professionals can design.

Thus, any move to artibrarily change the portfolio will have one of two results: Either there are other portfolios which will generate the same rate of return or the growth and-or income of the endowment will fall.

If the College decides that the present portfolio is socially irresponsible, it must offer its professional advisors social guidelines and, if the second above result pertains, must state the degree to which it is willing to sacrifice future endowment income for present investments in social good.

However, we should keep in mind that this sacrifice is essentially a tax on or transfer of wealth from future students and their families (who will have to make up the reduced endowment income in higher tuition or fewer services).

This is not necessarily bad. After all, the College "steals" money from future students whenever it uses endowment generated funds (as it is now doing to keep tuition from rising any faster).

Yet, I believe it is important to keep in mind that use of Williams' endowment for social good (e.g. divestiture) imposes potential costs not on the College as an institution, but on future students (and on underclassmen, for that matter). For current students to demand future students to make financial sacrifices for social good, current students are obligated to demonstrate a willingness to make similar sacrifices.

My suspicion is that most students are not willing to make such sacrifices. (Whether the College should force them to as a matter of educational policy is an interesting topic for debate.) My additional suspicion is that future students and their families will not be overly enthusiastic about future sacrifices that have been contracted for them today.

(I wonder if the College Council would be willing to guarantee to pay the College any income it loses from divestiture. Perhaps the membership of the Thursday Night Coalition will pool their resources for such a guarantee.)

I've been referring to divestiture as use of the endowment for a social good, i.e. aiding South African blacks. However, the divestiture debate is actually unclear on this point. Some divestiture proponents argue more out of a desire to keep Williams and its students from living off of tainted money—surplus value stolen from South African blacks—than with any real prospect of improving the conditions of those disenfranchised South Africans.

Such blood money arguments smack of holier-than-thou-ism. However, if one accepts the validity of the concept, surely one can derive a list of equally morally repugnant activities engaged in by firms in which Williams owns stock. Some examples: firms doing business in or with Chile, firms trading with the Soviet Union, firms which fail to abide by the convention boycott of ERA supporters, and all Japanese firms (Japan has been leading the continuing slaughter of whales and dolphins).

Is money made in South Africa more tainted than that made in Saudi Arabia (where women have fewer rights than camels), in other African countries (where discrimination involves one black tribe against another), or in the United States (where firms and citizens are not required to pay the fair costs of energy and of pollution)?

Ignoring the blood money aspects of divestiture, one is left with divestiture as a vehicle for social good. Now to that end, I've read that South Africa's is a relatively strong economy, that oil is its only major trade dependency, and that Iran supplies most of South Africa's oil. Given the Shah's record on human rights, I don't see how an economic boycott (toward which divestiture is presumably an interim step) could be successful. However, I don't know much about the self-sufficiency of the South African economy; so, let's assume that divestiture might have a positive effect.

If Williams chooses to use its endowment for social good, would divestiture represent the greatest social good for the buck, to put it crudely? As an alternative, Williams could invest funds in risky employment—generating ventures in the poverty-stricken Berkshires; it could invest in struggling minority-owned inner city firms; it could donate some of its endowment to philanthropic foundations (After all, they've been donating to Williams for years). Or, closer to home, Williams could increase its allocations for financial aid, raise the Admissions Office's budget for minority recruiting, or hire more senior women faculty.

The newly formed "endowment" committee should consider such alternatives to divestiture in debating whether and to what extent Williams' endowment should be used for anything other than optimizing future income.

The danger in this sort of debate, I have been reminded, is that it may lead to a form of quietism: We might spend so much time debating which good burden to take up that we take up none. On the other hand, having watched the rise and fall of WmPIRG, teamster lettuce, and Ox-Fam as burning campus social issues, I'd view a little moral introspection—at least as far as allocation of resources is concerned—as a good thing.

Additional questions raised by the divestiture debate also deserve further consideration by the College community:

What can and should Williams do to foster a sense of social responsibility among students (and faculty, for that matter)?

Is it possible for meaningful issues to be discussed on campus without administrators viewing students as immature, importunate creatures with very limited attention spans and without students viewing administrators as pompous, paternalistic and self-serving?

If the Court Favors Bakke

by Peter H. Stark

"Unite Against Racism! March on Washington to Overturn the Bakke Decision!" Huh? Did I miss something while on Spring Break? Reassuringly, I later found out that the Supreme Court had not released its decision—once again my power to scan the New York Times could be trusted . . .

This column is bound to offend some people, and for that, I am truly sorry. I am even violating a cardinal rule about re-hashing issues after they were thoroughly covered in the sacred pages of the Record last fall. However, this little stunt to somehow influence the Court's decision cannot be ignored—especially when it brings up that dirty word called Racism.

One could go into a long discourse about the function of the Supreme Court to be detached from public opinion and dispose of cases brought before it only on points of Constitutional Law. It is the role of Congress to convert sentiments into legislation when and where appropriate—enough on this subject. As it is, the Court in all likelihood decided the case of Bakke weeks ago, and is in the final process of writing and revising its opinion.

The Court has three options—it may affirm the California Supreme Court's decision favoring Bakke, it may overturn the judgment, or it may vacate opinion entirely, sending the case back to the state courts.

To those who I have talked to knowledgeable on planned march, organizers expect the last option to be the Court's decision—and thus, they reason, Bakke will have won. By this same logic, Affirmative Action will have been destroyed, and Racism, in one form or another, will be "legalized."

A decision favoring Bakke will indeed affect the way some social programs will be administered—that is certain, but the net effects need not be negative. The cause for Affirmative Action's main intent, that of assuring that there is equal opportunity for women and minorities to get into (for example) graduate school, will not be damaged in the slightest way. By removing quotas and double standards, there will be equal opportunities given to all applicants, regardless of race, creed, sex. If anything, the Court's Affirmation of the Bakke decision on (presumably) XIVth Amendment grounds will reinforce the provision that no person will be denied equal protection of the laws.

Yes, there is still a serious question of what to do about certain cultural disadvantages in the education of minority groups. To this, there is no simple solution—ideally, any imbalance of one's lack of educational access should have been corrected before graduate school level, so that there could be more lenience given to undergraduate programs, as far as admissions selectivity is concerned.

My stance is not racist. Rather, it is one based upon principles: certain programs designed to counteract imbalances and injustices by utilizing the same evils that were originally denounced, are inherently wrong. We are fools if we believe that three hundred years of oppression may be overcome by the impositions of legitimized discriminations.

It is claimed that not much has changed for minorities since the Civil Rights Movement. If anything, the resentment caused by reverse discrimination overbalances the good intent of Great Society edicts. The promotion of understanding is the first step necessary for the elimination of certain inequalities. Regretfully, I am not aware of any specific programs which would accomplish this goal in the near future.

The lack of any viable alternatives, however, should not be a carte blanche for plunging headlong into programs which are structurally hypocritical. Unless this next decade is to be as unproductive as the past one in promoting social well-being, the misguided aspects of Affirmative Action programs must be corrected—NOW.

Why applications decreased

by Michael Lasseck

They are burning the midnight oil this week in Mather House preparing to admit the class of '82. The next week will find almost a hundred eager "accepts" scurrying about campus trying to decide if this is "their school." The April decision date is about perfect for the Williams calendar. Spring is in the air, and thoughts can turn to plans for the future.

What is disturbing, however, is that the number of minority students on campus has decreased along with the number of Jewish students. The question is, why? Is it that Williams fails to attract applicants of a non-WASP orientation? This doesn't seem to be true. Is it that these applicants are just not up to the "Williams Standard"? Again, this does not appear to be the case. Yet, the numbers are decreasing, and unless even a small change occurs, the problem could become self-perpetuating. Look at the trouble the College has keeping female and black professors.

Perhaps the real trouble is the image that prospective students have of Williams. Maybe we give the impression of being "not such a nice place after all." If so, the problem could be larger than it appears. Applications did go down this year, after several years of setting new records. What image do we project of Williams?

When I was visiting a small college outside of New England over break, I asked the admissions director what he felt was the major difference between Williams and his school. "Morals and values," was the answer. When sexism and racism have been leading campus issues for two years in a row, is it any real wonder that we may project an image of operating in a moral vacuum? One of the deans at the sexism panel stated that it wasn't the role of the College to teach any set of moral standards. Perhaps the time has come to at least develop a consensus of what a set of "Williams' values" might be.

The class of '82 will arrive just as the concept of the freshman year changes. Morgan will be coed. Perhaps each entry will have upperclass "associates", and each freshman may participate in an interest group. Either way, next year the freshman will be a part of the total "Williams experience," rather than just the "freshman experience."

What Williams is is what each accepted candidate has to decide. So do we. For Williams to project the image of a place they will want to go to and feel a part of, it has to be a place that we want to feel a part of. Bridging the gap between upperclassmen and freshmen, restoring a sense of values and morals, and a sense of pride, can go a long way to making the class of '82 feel at home.

Houses include freshmen

Slight changes in housing may have aided in the results. Some sophomores affiliated with Dodd will live in two suites of six in Mills House (Mission Park overflow) to reduce the class imbalance in Dodd. The loss of Goodrich and Sewall to co-op housing, and a small senior class motivated the realignment.

Last night, the Housing Committee met to discuss transfer applications. Roosenraad expects the decision on their choices to be made within ten days.

Gay rights supporters to wear jeans Friday

Supporters of gay rights will be asked to participate in National Blue Jeans Day this Friday, a spokesperson for the Williams Gay Support Organization announced today. Those in favor of equal rights for Americans regardless of their sexual orientation should demonstrate their support by wearing blue jeans.

The April 14 observance at Williams will coincide with similar events at college campuses across the United States.

"We expect that students, faculty and staff will demonstrate their commitment to humanitarian goals by wearing blue jeans on Friday," said Susan Coffey '78. "Wearing blue jeans will be a visible and dramatic way of expressing your personal opinion. It will have a great impact."

Originally the WGSO had planned to ask only gay people to wear jeans. The group later decided that it was important to give all gay-rights advocates the opportunity to express their views. Some members also said they would feel uncomfortable if the wearing of jeans were limited to gay people.

Asked if she thought Blue Jeans Day would cause a run on jeans sales at the Williams Co-op, Ms. Coffey replied, "I certainly hope so." She added, "It would be great if President Chandler and Dean Berek wore jeans on Friday."

Housing committee: 'being used by the Deans'

The Housing Committee, consisting of the fifteen house presidents, two freshmen and a College Council representative, ostensibly deals with all matters of student housing. Certainly many topics come to the committee, but who actually makes the decision is not absolutely clear.

Many students on the Housing committee wonder why their group exists. "We're under the shadow of the Administration and the CUL (Committee on Undergraduate Life)," complained co-chairman Sally Coney '78. "You wonder what you're doing," added Keith Dunsmore '79 (Fitch) "and then you find out very little."

Dean Cris T. Roosenraad who, along with Director of Student Housing Charles Jankey, is an ex-officio member of the committee, maintains that the students do make important choices. They decided that seniors get first priority for off-campus living, set guidelines for co-op housing and modify transfer policy. In the first instance, the committee vote was binding, in the other two cases the Committee on Undergraduate Life acted on the committee's recommendations.

Sometimes, John Svoboda '79 (Hopkins) conceded, the group does seem to get its way, but only when Roosenraad approves. He cited the proposed transfer policy changes, of which the CUL passed only one half, the half Roosenraad endorsed. "How do we know what goes from the Housing Committee to the CUL? We rely on Roosenraad," he said without question, "he did bias it in accordance to what he thought was right for us. That's not to degrade him, that's just a problem of our relationship.

"We did a lot of work," he continued, "but we didn't have the opportunity to present a strong case to the CUL. They said they didn't have time to discuss this. They wanted to talk about the philosophic underpinnings of the JA system, but not about specific instances of student housing."

Not all problems result from hiding in the shadow of the CUL. One question is of authority. Who has the power to make decisions on student housing? "Certainly not the housing committee," lamented Chip Buckner '79 (GarWood). Peter Green '78 (Perry-Bascom) echoed "Decisions having to do with student housing are made by the Dean's office and not by the Housing Committee. I don't see how they can possibly deny that." Svoboda observed that sometimes the entire committee would vote one way and the Dean would veto the decision.

Though unfortunate, Roosenraad agreed, sometimes he and Jankey had to do so. The house presidents represent the contented majority, he said. This meant that sometimes they would have to stand against the committee to protect the minority on campus. The students hold the mistaken notion, Roosenraad said, that unless we do exactly as they recommend we are not listening. This is not the case. Student opinion is one of many factors going into housing policy. We are ultimately responsible for the housing system, we must answer to the trustees, he said, so we have to do what we think is best.

A specific example dealt with the row houses' desire to go co-ed this year. Nothing like this, Roosenraad said, has ever come up before. Certainly it is an important issue, and the committee should be consulted, but he said he did not know what the role of the group should be in making the decision.

Dunsmore was unhappy. "This is one issue where we might be doing something, but we don't have the power," he said.

"We voted to let Perry go co-ed," recalled Buckner, "but the following week Dean Roosenraad told us it wasn't our decision."

Almost nothing, the group complains, is its decision. So why meet at all? John Simon '79 (Gladden) thought he had the answer. "We only meet so that the administration can say that students have an active voice in housing policy. We provide a rubber stamp."

Correction

Due to an oversight, G. Bernard Hutchinson's viewpoint commemorating Dr. Martin Luther King which appeared in the April 7th issue of the Record mistakenly received the wrong headline. Hutchinson's article presented his reflections on the anniversary of the civil rights leader's death. The Record editorial board apologizes for this error and any inconvenience it may have caused.

Students share musical talents in various recitals

Marc Lichtman gives presentation

by Mimi David

The story of the young and inspired musician struggling with the understanding and mastery of his art—is often an unsung story here in the Purple Valley. However, this week—on Thursday and Friday afternoons—the individual Williams students will be sharing their talent with us.

Anne Shullenberger, a senior French major and a voice student will give a recital of French songs this Thursday at 4:00 in Weston Language Center. Her choice of songs represents the works of famous composers who have set well-known French poetry to music.

The first section is by Faure, a 19th century French romantic composer, who has written the musical accompaniment to poems by Hugo and Leconte de Lisle. The poems of Max Jacob have been set to music by the 20th century composer Poulenc. These are quite unusual works in that the poetry is bizarre, the music difficult,—and it is an unusual selection. The final section is somewhat popular contemporary French music. The poems by Jacques Prevert are part of the musical works by Kosma which have also been sung by Yves Montand. This French music is romantic, melodious and light—and should provide the listener with a similar experience.

For those more interested in an analytic approach to music combining the cognitive psychology of Ulric Neisser with the music of John Cage and the like—you may choose to hear Mark Lichtman's music major presentation also on Thursday afternoon at 4:15 in Currier Hall—room A. Lichtman will be lecturing as well as playing recordings of the pieces he is discussing. The talk is entitled, "Analysis by Synthesis." The title actually refers to a type of cognitive psychology which proposes a theory to explain the ways in which we analyze and incorporate specific stimuli in the world around us. It is usually applied to our visual perception, yet in his talk, Lichtman uses it to analyze problems in musical perception. He presents various musical works: John Cage's "Four minutes and thirty-three seconds," Lutoslawski's "Three poems by Henri Michaux," and "Structures" by Boulez as case studies to support his argument about psychology and music. These musical selections all pose similar problems for the listener and Lichtman employs psychology of perception to help understand why these problems arise. Though the oral report is intended for the music faculty (as an oral exam required for each music major) it should be a talk of interest to many students.

Student music continued on Friday afternoon with the Studio X recital. Studio X, one of a series of recitals by Williams College students, will be presented this Friday at 4:00 in Thompson Memorial Chapel.

Various student musicians will perform. The pianists include Julie Kosarin '80, David Moro '81, Ann Congleton, Kate Gridley '78, and Sarah Doerschuk '81, and the composers represented are Chopin, Scarlatti, Ravel, Debussy, and Haydn.

Susan Perry '81, horn, and Steven Rebarber '80, piano, will present a piano reduction of Mozart's Horn Quintet. Nancy Gray '78, mezzo-soprano, accompanied by Kate Gridley, will sing pieces by Schubert, Schumann, and J. S. Bach. Jeff Mahoney '78, will play his own composition, "Three Movements in Search of Atonality" on the clarinet.

Grants to be offered serious violin students

A total of $5,000 in music grants will be awarded to "students of serious music" in the Sixth Annual Financial Federal Savings and Loan Association Mux Musical Association." The category for competition this year is the violin. Students between 17 and 28 who have studied at an accredited music school or have had private instruction with a recognized teacher are eligible. Ten applicants will be chosen to audition before a board of three international judges on October 13 of this year. Two finalists selected at the audition will perform in the final competition, a public concert, with the 75 piece Fiana Financial Federal Showcase Symphony Orchestra on October 15. The Grand Prize winner will receive $4,000 and the second prize winner, $1,500.

Students interested in the competition should write to Joseph P. Naughton, Competition Director, Financial Federal Savings and Loan Association, 8991 S.W. 107 Avenue, Miami, Florida, 33176, by September.

Griffin concert moves successfully to Weston

Griffin Hall Concerts moved to Weston Language Center last Sunday night for a program of lieder by Robert Schumann. Pianist Victor Hill accompanied Judith Reichert soprano, in a performance of Frauenliebe und-leben and Daniel O'Connor, baritone, in the cycle Dichterliebe. The performances met with voluble approval from the audience.

Reichert gave a superb rendering of the Frauenliebe proving her mastery over her vocal range. Her firm control lent the pieces a clarity and precision difficult to achieve in most concert situations. She has a perfect lieder voice, firm yet delicate, able to instill wide ranges of emotion and feeling into the listener.

After a short intermission, O'Connor returned with Hill to perform the Dichterliebe. O'Connor gave a weaker rendition than did Reichert. His control over his voice falters a bit as reaches to the upper ranges of his register and he seems to have trouble in sustaining sound at the end of melodic lines. This is by no means a chronic situation. A majority of the separate songs in the cycle were of the highest quality, and his performance overall can only be rated as excellent.

Reichert and O'Connor returned to the stage together at the end of the concert for two encore duets by Mendelssohn. They sang these marvelous pieces beautifully, their voices interweaving easily and ingratiatingly. Together, Reichert and O'Connor can do no wrong. The only problem was that they ended so quickly. Like Oliver with his porridge, the audience could only beg for more.

Marcia Johnston captured the expression of this child in the Slippery Banana. For the month of April, a 15 piece photo exhibit by Johnston is displayed in Images Cinema across the street.

Siena kept scoreless by rugby women

The Women's rugby team opened its spring season with an 8-0 victory against perennial foe Siena College.

The match remained scoreless until the second half when Jeanne Weeks, assisted by stand-off Linda Collins, followed in her kick for the first try of the day. Wing Kim Jenkins added the next four points with a 30 yard run.

Excellent scrum work and the added efforts of new team members consistently held back Siena who defeated the ruggers in the fall. About 14 veterans of the two previous seasons are joined this spring by half a dozen enthusiastic tyros.

The women's team is a year old this spring. It was organized last year by John Greer '77 and Ginny Doherty '78. Sue Kraus and Linda Collins were elected co-captains this fall. This team hopes to better the fall record of 1-2, and if Saturday is any indication, the fast line and ever-improving scrum will carry the young team to further victories.

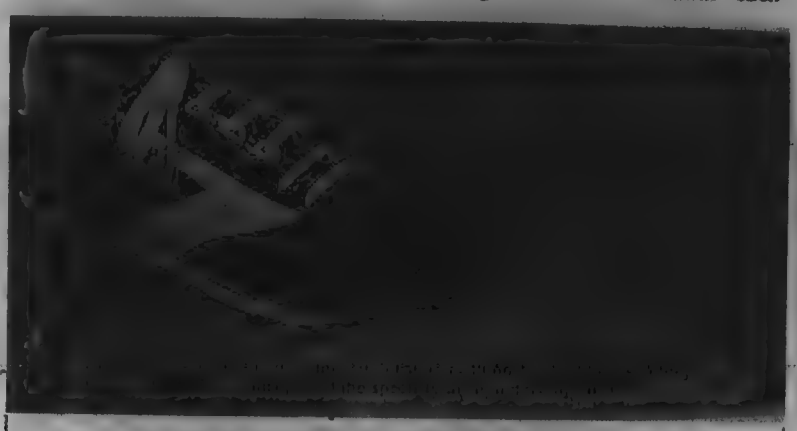
This weekend the women go to Brown University for a weekend tournament against Yale, Dartmouth, Brown, Siena, Smith and Albany Law. The following weekend the women face Albany Law at home whom they overwhelmed in the rain this fall.

Laxters split Smith scrimmages

by Mary Kate Shea

A group of eighteen lacrosse players, members of the Williams College women's varsity and J.V. teams, participated in a scrimmage day at Smith College on April 8. The squad played three abbreviated games consisting of 20-minute, instead of regulation 25-minute, halves.

Williams faced Yale in its first contest of the day and came away with a resounding 7-1 win. Everyone on attack got into the scoring act as first home Sally Kruse registered a goal and three assists and both second home Mary Fish and third home Sue Wright tallied a goal and an assist. The attack wings accounted for the majority of Williams scoring as Val Corning and Sarah Baldwin each scored twice.



In their second game, the Ephs played an impressive game tieing a strong Dartmouth squad 2-2. Kruse had another strong game as she put in both of Williams goals. Goalie Marty Taft turned in a strong performance blocking numerous shots and stopping several Dartmouth breakaways by coming out of the goal to stick check the oncoming attack player.

The final scrimmage of the afternoon saw the University of Vermont outscore a cold and somewhat tired Williams squad 4-1. The Ephs lone score came from Corning at attack wing. Despite the outcome of the contest, the Williams defense, led by two freshmen, defense wing Anne Ricketson and cover point Joy Rotch, performed admirably.

Williams' performance at the Smith scrimmage day proved that the squad is capable of competing with the best college teams in the area.

Museum shows posters

An exhibition of American war posters is on view, now through April 27, in the Rotunda of the Williams College Museum of Art. The twenty-four posters, selected from the Museum's permanent collection, represent the volunteer efforts of the nation's foremost illustrators and mural painters, including Joseph Pennell, James Montgomery Flagg, Kenyon Cox, and J. C. Leyendecker.

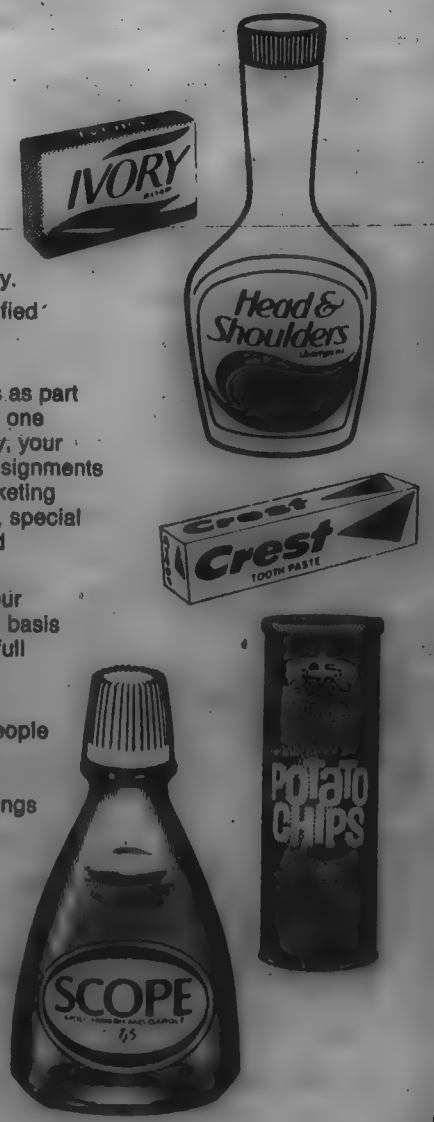
Ask Procter & Gamble what you can do with your BA degree!

You could become the advertising/marketing manager for one of these P&G products!

Although only 5 are shown here, Procter & Gamble makes more than 50 well-known, well-advertised consumer brands.

For each brand, there is a small management group, usually just 3 people, totally responsible for planning, creating and supervising everything that is done to increase consumer acceptance of their brand.

The group is headed by a Brand Manager, an important level of management in our company.



Right now, we're looking for a few highly qualified college seniors with the potential to become Brand Managers.

You would start at our Cincinnati headquarters as part of a brand group for a specific brand, perhaps one of those shown here. To help you learn quickly, your Brand Manager would give you challenging assignments of increasing responsibility in various key marketing areas such as TV advertising, package design, special promotions, budget planning and analysis, and market research.

The emphasis would be on you, your ideas, your ability to contribute. You'll be promoted on the basis of merit alone. It's not uncommon to become a full Brand Manager within 3-4 years.

Since you will begin to manage from the day you join us, we're looking for "take charge" people with outstanding records of leadership while in college. "Superior academic achievement", "innovative", "a record of being able to get things done", and "good oral and written communications skills" are some of the words we use to describe the people we want.

If this kind of work interests you and you think you qualify, please send me your resume.

Laxmen beat Springfield in disappointing play

by Wayne Eckerson

"We played sloppy," said lacrosse Coach Renzi Lamb after his team downed a gritty Springfield squad 14-7 on Saturday. "We failed to maintain the same intensity we exhibited in last Wednesday's game against C. W. Post."

Though the Williams players did not live up to Lamb's or their own expectations they were never seriously threatened by Springfield as Brian Benedict's two tallies in the first period put the Ephs ahead for good.

"We didn't execute the fundamentals," said Lamb. "We couldn't pass, catch, or pick up ground balls." Lamb then pointed out that these problems were the symptoms of a mental letdown. "We thought that because we played well against C. W. Post we could come down here and romp," he said.

The Williams laxmen did have several bright spots, most notably the twenty-save performance of goalie Bob Cowin. Cowin repeatedly thwarted numerous Springfield scoring opportunities in the first half and singlehandedly kept the contest from becoming close. "Cowin has been really hot," says Lamb. "He has covered up some offensive flaws."

The offense finally began to roll behind the one-two scoring punch of Pete Thomsen and Todd Eckerson. After the first quarter the two attackmen figured in on all but two scoring plays. Thomsen poued in five goals, and added three assists, Eckerson claimed seven assists, five of which were to Thomsen, and one goal. Midfielders Gus Nuzzolese and Brian Benedict scored three and two respectively, while Dick Goodbody, Pete Barbaresi, and John Glynn each scored once.

Goalie Cowin praised the play of his defensemen Pete Unger, Jeff Murray, and Mike Curran. "They made it a lot easier for me," he said.

In season's first

Racketmen rout Army

by Evan Bash

The men's tennis team passed their first test of the young season with flying colors Saturday, brushing off a capable Army team 9-0 in Lansing Chapman Rink.

The unsurprising victory came with unexpected ease. The Ephs deafened a sizable and enthusiastic crowd of onlookers by suppressing the anticipated close duel between the two teams as they swept the afternoon's six singles matches.

Martin Goldberg, established the tone of the match at the no. one position, using a variety of shots to keep his opponent off balance in a straight set win. Scoring the easiest victory of the day with an overwhelming performance was no. four Peter Friesen. Captain Jim Parsons gave a gutty showing at no. three, coming from behind in both sets before recording a two set triumph.

In fact, Williams often appeared to want the match more than Army, as evidenced by the Eph's trio of three set wins. Dan O'Connell fought back from the brink of defeat, winning the deciding set 6-4 after being down 4-1. Surviving a game in which his opponent was serving for the match at 5-4 in the third, no. five Allen Barnes captured the next three games to take the match. In the least suspenseful of the three setters, no. six Evan Bash won the deciding set 6-3.

As bad as things were for Army in the singles, they only got worse, for Williams disarmed the Cadets doubles teams with the loss of only one set. Goldberg and Parsons played well as the no. one team in a strong two set win, while Dean Gianakos teamed with Bash for an equally impressive display at no. three. Capping off the Ephs remarkable day was the hot duo of Alan Wall and Friesen. They took their three set match with a 6-0 shutout in the third, a fitting ending to the netmen's shutout.

Wednesday the Ephs travel to Dartmouth for what may be a pivotal match in the season.

Sports inquiry: NESCAC governs post-season play

by Nancy Rhein

Athletic programs at Williams and other small New England colleges governed by NESCAC policy seem to run along smoothly from year to year; until a team emerges as a potential candidate for NCAA post-season play.

Whether it's hockey at Bowdoin or Middlebury, or basketball at Tufts or Hamilton, the question is the same: Why isn't the talented team able to participate in tournaments beyond those sponsored by the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference (ECAC) or related organizations?

The answer for many schools lies in voluntary participation in the seven year old New England Small College Athletic Conference organization. NESCAC forbids post season play for team sports. Williams' ban however, spans the 17 years since a faculty decision in 1961 to support the unofficial Little Three agreement avoiding post season play.

The reasoning behind Williams' rule, later adopted by NESCAC, centers around "... the boomerang effect of faculty reactions to added costs, extended seasons and time away from campus, and increased recruiting pressures," according to former college president John Sawyer. The ban caused changes in the athletic programs at several schools which joined the conference in 1971. Although these schools had to revise recruiting, scouting and post season rules, Williams' policies were unaffected.

College rules on post season play date back to a five college conference, the Pentagonal, organized to discuss standards for academics and athletics at Williams, Wesleyan, Amherst, Bowdoin, and Dartmouth 30 years ago. In an effort to define the ideal athletic program within an academic setting, the presidents of the colleges adopted various regulations, already in existence at the Little Three colleges, which were more strict than national rules. With the exception of Dartmouth, which later joined the Ivy League, the schools enthusiastically supported their philosophy—with an eye toward convincing other colleges of its benefits. They hoped to create a small college conference, an idea which was unable to get off the ground for 15 years.

The philosophy was not questioned at Williams, until an outstanding Williams basketball team captured the 1961 New England regionals. It looked like a strong contender in the NCAA's then "college" division tournament. Voting to keep the post season ban, the faculty feared involvement in commercialized athletics. It expressed concern for the team pressure on an athlete to compete in tournaments, and foregoing his academics interests.

Sports editor Nancy Rhein explains some background on NESCAC philosophy and Williams' involvement in it.

During the 60's the Little Three held fast to their regulations, finally reaching an agreement with 8 other schools to form NESCAC in 1971. NESCAC philosophy and structure has since changed little, although ECAC tournament play is now permitted and Union College has withdrawn.

Occasionally an outstanding team crops up at NESCAC school and students call for revision of the post-season rule. Many object to the injustice of permitting members of individual team sports, i.e., swimming and squash, to participate in the tournaments. This participation is justified by which "lesser expense," has come under fire recently as more individuals qualify for NCAA tournaments. Individual competition on the NCAA level has become almost, if not more, as expensive as team participation.

Beyond the economics of the situation, behind the rationale permitting individuals to participate in national competition is that each person may freely weigh academic demands. Ideally, he is not pressured into an extended commitment at an NCAA tournament by team encouragement.

Although NESCAC athletic directors and college presidents recognize objections, they are unlikely to change post-season ruling, according to Williams' athletic director Bob Peck. In the unlikely event that a school withdraws from the conference to compete in post-season play, the decision to participate still rests in the hands of the faculty and administration of that school. Peck not only sees Williams' faculty members continuing to support the ban on post-season play, but he also sees no chance of Williams' leaving the conference.

"NESCAC is super for Williams College," he said, as the advantages of the organization, including attractiveness of schedules, game limitations, elimination of season overlap, and recruiting and scoring regulations have created a conference which acts in concert—resulting in a strong reputation for principled competitive athletics for the NESCAC colleges.

Ed Bousa '80, '1975 New England Junior Champion is representative of the golf team's talent.

Golf vets plan repeat of one-loss season

The awesome Williams College Golf Machine is readying itself for the upcoming season. Already the possessor of an almost unbelievable 497 wins, the team with the best winning percentage in Williams College history anticipates at least a duplication of last fall's 5-1 record.

To prepare for combat with such Division 1 powers as Dartmouth, Harvard, and Holy Cross, Coach Rudy Goff and his charges spent ten days in Sea Island, Georgia and Orlando, Florida honing their games to razor-sharp perfection. In the qualifying which took place over the last two days of the trip, most of the top positions went to seasoned veterans, with a few surprises from some illustrious names of the past.

In first position, Mike Lynch, a highly-tooted freshman performer three years ago, reemerged from the golfing dead and a semester in Rome to grab the top spot. Hopefully, Lynch's solid, methodical approach to shotmaking will eliminate the inconsistency which has plagued him for the last two years.

Bill Upton, one of the most physically gifted members of the team, used his big swing to produce the finest golf of the trip. At Island Club, Upton avoided numerous hazards and psychological self-destruction, bringing the monster to its knees with a remarkable 77.

Tying for third were Dan Katz, Ed "Big" Bousa, and Marcel Oudin. While suffering in the depths of this bewildering slump and pondering an early release from life's miseries, Katz stepped upon the twelfth hole of the Island Club. Sensing that the planets and stars were aligned in perfect configuration, Katz put a left-sided move on the ball and sent the devilish white spheroid rocketing into the cup for the first hole-in-one in the history of the trip. This moment marked the beginning of Katz's return to mental health, and in the latter part of the trip he began to show some of the consistency which has generally marked his game in the past.

Ed "Big" Bousa, the 1975 New England Junior Champion began reassembling the powerful game which made him the early season terror of the fall. Fellow Super-soph Marcel Oudin distinguished himself with a 79 at Arnold Palmer's extremely challenging Bay Hill Club.

Occupying sixth and seventh positions were Chris Holm and Young Bill Sprague. Although Holm's rocky past has been marked by grave tee-ball troubles, he seems to be hitting the ball straighter. After a hot start, Sprague, 1977 College Champion, suffered through an unfortunate malady called hitting the ball sideways but after making some adjustments, he seems ready to employ his talent for an assault on the New England golfing world.

The southern qualifying will only count if the weather does not permit a qualifier at Taconic. Even if they are left out of the first match, look for co-captain Doug "King" Chumbley, John Goodrich, Chris "Moses" Malone and John Wallace to crack the starting lineup. They will provide the depth to keep Williams atop the bevy of hungry teams hankering to knock off the perennial power.

With all of this available talent, Coach Goff hopes for the team to equal or better the 5-1 record of the fall. Through solid swing mechanics and the maintenance of mental equanimity, there is not much doubt that it can.

Batters defeat RPI, split games with Div. II powerhouse Springfield

by Frank Pergolizzi

The Williams baseball team split a doubleheader with Division II power Springfield Saturday afternoon, winning the first game 3-2 and losing the second 7-2. Early last week Williams beat R.P.I. 5-3.

In Saturday's first game, Williams broke a 1-1 tie in the 4th inning on a single by Bob Labombard. The eventual winning run scored when the ball eluded the Springfield centerfielder.

Junior righthander Tony Stall was the victor, striking out seven, while going all the way.

In the second game, Springfield got to starter Steve Maier early, scoring six runs in the first four innings. Defense spelled the difference as Williams committed four errors, while Springfield turned three doubleplays.

In Thursday's game Williams fell behind 3-0 after the third inning. Williams fought back to tie the score and went ahead in the top of the eighth. Frank Kreutz reached first on a single, then stole second and third. Bill Masse drove him home with a [illegible] hit.

Masse was the hitting star on the day, going 3-4 with a double and RBI. Kreutz knocked in two runs. Williams stole six bases, with Kreutz accounting for three of the thefts.

John Carey started for the Ephmen, but was relieved by Tom Albert in the sixth. Albert shut out the Engineers the rest of the way, striking out six.

Williams is now 2-1 on the season. The Ephmen's home opener is scheduled for Tuesday afternoon at 3 p.m. as the Trinity College Bantams invade Weston Field.

Anti-Apartheid Coalition sponsors daily silent vigil

The Williams College Anti-Apartheid Coalition, in an attempt to "raise student and administrative awareness," is currently sponsoring daily ten minute silent "memorial" demonstrations, designed to commemorate blacks who have died in the South African liberation struggle.

At 12:20 P.M. Monday through Friday, the group meets on the steps of Hopkins Hall. Some 30 to 40 students and faculty members are assembling there each day, to hold a silent procession either at Hopkins or at a more visible location, such as the Baxter Hall area.

Gordon Hardy, '78, a co-ordinator of the event, says that the memorial is intended to emphasize the coalition's feeling that financial support of corporations operating in South Africa is "more than a political issue." Hardy encourages all students who support divestiture to join in the demonstration; "People are watching, listening, and understanding that these questions are not yet closed," Hardy concluded.

The ten minute memorials will continue until the Trustees meeting at Williams on the week-end of April 21st. At that time the Anti-Apartheid Coalition hopes to re-introduce the question of divestiture that was dismissed by the Trustees at their last meeting. The group promises further demonstrations, and will announce final plans at the meeting of the Thursday Night Coalition.

Thurow, Rudolph speak on value of liberal arts

A capacity crowd crammed Room 3 of Griffin Hall Monday night to hear Lester Thurow '60 and Fred Rudolph '42 talk on the question, "The Williams Education and 'Doing Good:' What's It All Worth Anyhow?"

Mike Lissack '80 kicked off the discussion by relating a charge from an admissions officer at a small liberal arts college who said, "From what I understand about Williams, they don't have any morals or values."

Thurow, an award-winning economist at MIT, and Rudolph, chairman of the American Civilization Department, spoke on diverse topics including grades, money-making and good works in attempting to respond to this assertion.

Thurow spoke about the value of a liberal arts education. He said it gives the student an appreciation of different modes of thought. He was not sure this education would work towards "doing good," however, and he admitted he was not sure what a Williams education had done for himself. "Nobody knows whether going to Williams is going to change the amount of good you're going to do," he added.

Education is "90 per cent them and 10 per cent Williams," the economist said. He told the audience he is not convinced that college is where values are imparted. Instead, he said, college gives a student a place to ask questions and get them answered.

Rudolph cited distinguished Williams alumni, to illustrate his contention that Williams has always turned out people interested in "doing good." Each took imagination and inteHigence from Williams and as a result of their Williams education, he said, were "liberated from provincialism, ignorance and prejudice."

The ultimate test of a liberal arts education, Rudolph claimed, is the question "What would I be worth to myself if no one wants to hire me?"

Thurow and Rudolph said they felt that the student body is less naive than when they attended Williams. "We had an incredibly naive optimism," Thurow said. "We thought we could re-create the world." He said he has learned since then how hard it is to move society but warned, "it is easy to get too cynical."

Questions from the audience centered around a fear that Williams is not "real" enough. Rudolph contended that Williams sufficiently represents many minorities in its student body, and has thus come to have a closer affiliation with the relatives of modern society.

College considers new computer

The Computer Services Committee is currently evaluating five different alternatives for new computer systems. Associate Provost David Booth, who heads the committee, stated that the group is prepared to advise the purchase of a system costing up to $600,000.

The committee will choose one of the five systems at their meeting tomorrow, and will then submit their decision to Provost Neil Grabois, who will make a recommendation to the Trustees at their next meeting on April 21. Booth emphasized that "there is no guarantee that this will be funded."

"I think that Williams is quite backward in terms of the computer facilities it offers its students," said Booth. At present Williams owns two computers: a Xerox 530 and an IBM

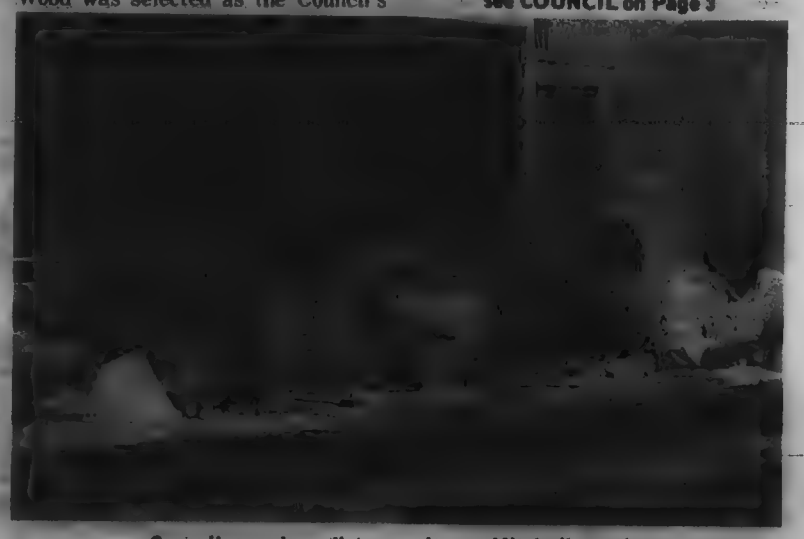
Council supports 'media' committee

Communication, or lack of it, between the College Council and the student body was a major topic at the Council meeting Wednesday night.

Matters of board plan modifications, Latin Honors developments, and the election of a Treasurer also arose for discussion.

Ted Tucci '79 of Pratt House, proposed the creation a "College Council Public Relations Staff", subsequently approved in a modified form. The Staff is intended to improve media coverage and student knowledge of Council activities. Tucci expressed dissatisfaction over Record treatment of Council meetings but emphasized that the Staff would only supplement regular media resources.



The proposal, as accepted, calls for a Staff of three Council members, including a chairman, and one person each to work with the Record and WCFM. The Staff will produce radio public service announcements and a regular "College Council News Column" reporting on meetings and issues before the Council. Staff members will work closely with Record editors and WCFM Tucci explained.

Several Council members questioned the need for such a Staff. "It is the Record's job to gather and report campus news," objected Randy Wang '80, and he added, "it is important that the Record remain autonomous."

In other business, the Council elected John Simpson '79 as its next Treasurer succeeding Harry Kelly '78. Applications for the position of Secretary to the Council are still being evaluated by the Elections Committee. Sue Laidlaw '80 of Gar-Wood was selected as the Council's representative to the newly formed Committee to Evaluate Winter Study.

The CEP will also be taking the Council's proposal to make new Latin Honors standards effective beginning with the Class of '80, rather than '79 as originally specified, to the faculty for consideration. The faculty has said it will not reconsider its decision, but Professor Gordon Winston of the CEP

Log deficit defrays under Lindsey

by Ann McCabe

Under current manager Claudia Lindsey '79, the Log has cut some costs and the former deficit. At the end of February, the difference between total expenditures and sales was $4500 less than last year at this time; Lindsey projects a total deficit of $1000-1500, a marked improvement over past years.

The Log has upped sales by 23 per cent and attendance by 8 per cent from last year. While repairs and replacements are down $2200 from '77, costs for sundries (paper and glassware) have increased by $250. Lindsey attributes this rise to the price of glassware which has "skyrocketed". "Breakage is bound to happen," she explained.

According to Lindsey, Williams students buy Miller beer in the greatest quantity, with Tuborg Gold and Michelob following in popularity. Lite beer was introduced successfully this year; and Schlitz discarded, Miller dark beer is a popular new addition.

The big screen installed in the main room has been "a crowd-pleaser", admitted Lindsey, who televises big sports events, "Saturday Night Live," and some special programs. She finds that movies do not work well as the Log lacks the "proper theatre atmosphere."

Lindsey has attempted to introduce some variation in the Log's entertainment schedule. While Wednesday is usually the night for live performances, Tuesday is "specials" night. Both house and class nights have been "very popular" this year. One innovation, "guest meal gap," has "failed to get off the ground," according to Lindsey.

Lindsey is "very glad" to have stayed in Williamstown and says, "With a sense of humor and a grain of salt, it has been a great experience." She took two introductory accounting courses at North Adams State due to her business interests. As she has had an offer from Stanford business school, she is presently weighing the benefits of the east and west coast.

Asked if she had had any major problems, Lindsey said no, though the Irish soccer team caused a minor commotion with its "singing, dancing, and exuberant international relations."

Deadline for Log manager applications extended

The deadline for Log manager applications has been extended to Wednesday, April 19. Forms are available from Claudia Lindsey at the Log, and are due at the Dean's Office by 4:00 p.m. The Log Committee wants to have a wide pool from which to choose the next

Faculty and staff prepare resolution for divestiture

The following is a resolution prepared by Williams College Faculty and Staff for Divestiture. The resolution, along with a two-page brief explaining the situation in South Africa and Williams College's role in the "pattern of corporate hypocrisy and tacit support of the white South African regime," was sent to all Williams faculty and staff last Wednesday, with an attached form requesting support. The brief condemns the college's investments in corporations doing business in South Africa. The group plans to present the posposal to the Trustees when they meet at Williams on April 21. The group has placed pertinent material in the library which it feels should be read by students.

Williams is involved in this pattern of corporate hypocrisy and tacit support of the White South African regime. Through the investments it holds in corporations doing considerable business in South Africa, Williams is making a statement to the public at large—a statement which jeopardizes the human values for which it has stood with such conviction in the past. We recognize that those who have been entrusted with the primary responsibility for the financial security of the college are under pressure to resist any change in investment policies, but their long-term and higher responsibility to Williams College is to ensure its continued integrity as an institution of free and humane learning.

As members of the faculty and staff we have been entrusted with the primary responsibility to continue this humane tradition, but the task is not ours alone. Indeed we can only undertake that responsibility effectively in an institution which through its corporate decisions acts in such a way as to support the educational ideals we espouse. Frequently, students learn more from the deliberate actions of those around them than from principles enunciated in abstract form only.

Clearly this places a particular responsibility upon those entrusted with decisions about the corporate well-being of the institution. Financial concerns have not been in the past and cannot be in the future the sole relevant concern of college and university officers, lest decisions in this realm vitiate more fundamental ideals. The privilege of a liberal education cannot be purchased by the fruits of systematic exploitation of the black people of South Africa.

Williams College has a tradition of expression of moral concern for national and international issues. During the Vietnam War, President Sawyer joined other college and university presidents in an open letter to President Nixon condemning the Cambodian invasion. The college gave official support to students, faculty, and staff engaged in projects of protest during the "moratorium" of 1970. The college appointed a delegation of students, junior and senior faculty, and trustees to visit Washington as a group lobbying against the war. During the civil rights crisis of the 1960's, the Williams administration supported those faculty and students who worked with the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and Martin Luther King, Jr., in Montgomery, Birmingham, and Selma. Williams has given its support, financial and moral, to campus groups who have been concerned with Black-white relations in the U.S.

To proceed now as if the college's financial well-being were the only concern would be to heighten and endorse a level of institutional hypocrisy inimical to the task of humane learning. Williams cannot reasonably continue to claim in the future that it stands for this tradition if it abdicates its institutional responsibility in this realm. In short, as faculty and staff it is our firm belief that Williams College will seriously compromise its educational mission as a liberal arts institution if it continues to act in tacit support of the South African regime.

It is out of our deep sense of commitment to these values that we therefore call upon the Trustees to undertake the following actions in their role as the ultimate guardians of the Williams tradition:

Resolution for Action

a. Commit Williams College to the goal of withdrawal from South Africa of those corporations in which it now owns stock, and further, make no new investments in corporations operating in South Africa.

b. Introduce shareholder proposals calling for immediate corporate withdrawal from South Africa.

c. Vote Williams' proxies in support of all shareholder proposals seeking the following corporate acts:

1. Withdrawal of current corporate operations in South Africa.
2. Prevention of further corporate expansion in South Africa.
3. Provision of information about corporate activities in South Africa.

d. Beginning with the Spring of 1978, if two consecutive shareholder proposals fail to bring about the withdrawal of a given corporation from South Africa, have Williams divest itself of all its stock in that corporation.

e. Cooperate with other groups and institutions (e.g. Interfaith Center on Corporate Responsibility) in concerted action to attain the goals stated above.

f. Make public Williams' commitments as stated above, and all steps taken to further these commitments.

NEWS BRIEFS

Roosenraad comment clarified

Contrary to an inadvertent comment made by Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad, freshman entries next year will not be structured entirely on a coeducational basis.

Roosenraad made that assertion at a Ford Hoosac House meeting on coeducation last Tuesday night. Dean of Freshman Lauren Stevens, however, speaking for the CUL, declared that this is "definitely not going to happen." The College does plan to make entries in Morgan Hall coeducational on an experimental basis, but has no plans for extending the experiment to any other buildings.

The new Junior Advisors met Wednesday night and elected Beth Geismar President and Mark Lanier vice-president for next year. The JA's also drew for rooms.

CEP will ask faculty to reconsider honors change

The Committee on Educational Policy (CEP), following the College Council's recommendation, will ask the faculty to reconsider the requirements for Latin Honors.

The council asked the CEP to resubmit its original proposal to raise the necessary grade average from 8.0 to 9.0 effective with the class of 1980. At its February meeting the faculty amended the CEP motion to make the change effective with the class of 1979.

Dean of Faculty Peter Berek was pleased with the CEP's decision. Berek said he was "especially proud" of the student members of the CEP who informed the discussion and offered opinions and suggestions to the council.

ACEC co-signs Pousette Dart Band

The Pousette Dart Band will join Pure Prairie League on stage for the Spring Weekend Concert, Thursday May 4, at 8 p.m. in Chapin Hall, according to Steve Case '80, chairman of the ACEC.

"Amnesia," "What Can I Say," and "Country Line," highlight the group's repertoire. Their fourth album, should be released close to the day of the concert, according to Case.

Tickets will cost six dollars for students, and eight dollars for others. These revenues should pay for $6,000 of the $11,000 expenses; the ACEC budget has $5,000 left to cover the remaining costs.

Witcher '80 recollects King in Washington Post

The Washington Post recently printed a front-page article written by Gregory Witcher '80. The story, which appeared in the April 4 edition of the newspaper, dealt with Witcher's personal recollections of the death of the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr.

Witcher is on leave from Williams during the 1977-78 academic year, and is presently working as a copy aide for the Post. His article relates his experiences as a youth growing up in racially tense south Washington, D.C. Witcher was 9 years old at the time of King's death. Speaking of King, Witcher declares in the final sentence of his article, "10 years after his death I share his dream and have learned to accept the anxiety that is born of opportunity. Call it opportunity cost."

WOOLF seeks leaders for September trip

The Williams Organization for Outdoor Living (WOOLF), an organization which sponsored a series of camping trips for freshmen during and after Freshman Days last fall, is currently looking for group leaders for trips next September.

Students interested in becoming leaders should attend a WOOLF organizational meeting Monday, April 17 at 7 p.m. According to program coordinator Paul Goren '80, potential leaders should have some outdoor experience, and must be willing to become certified in first aid.

Seniors who need portraits for the yearbook have one last opportunity to get them taken. The photographer will be in the WOC reading room from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday next week. This is the last chance for those who want their pictures re-done or who missed him previously.

Roadtrippers claim record

Dan Adkinson '79, Larry Mitchell '78, John Rainey '78 and Vic Zerbino '79 claim that they have made the longest road trip in Williams' history. They drove to the University of Virginia, via Goucher College, for "Easter's Weekend."

College ponders computer

1130. These systems can accommodate only two users at the same time. The machine that replaces them will have time-sharing capabilities sufficient to handle eight student terminals. The system's maximum capacity will be approximately 32 terminals, according to Booth. The Admissions, Alumni, Business, and Registrar's Offices will all be connected to the new computer.

The committee envisions two alternatives by which the College can pay for the computer. According to Booth, either some of the College's capital that would have been spent on other equipment could be used, or the system could be leased. If the latter method is chosen, the College's annual expenditures would have to rise to cover the monthly leasing fees.

The current Williams fund-raising campaign contains provisions for a computer. "Unfortunately, the money hasn't been raised yet," Booth explained.

Council sanctions new committee is working for renewed faculty discussion of the matter.

Julia Mcnamee of the Food Services Committee asked for Council reaction to a revised board plan. The plan would allow students to omit one or more meals from their eating arrangements with a commensurate lowering of board fees. Some Council members expressed concern that such an option would threaten the flexibility and relaxed nature of the present system. Mcnamee countered that the only perceptible change would be stricter scrutiny of ID cards at meals and added that students should at least be given the option to choose their meal plan. Action on the issue was postponed until next week.

Gardner faces plagiarism charge

John Gardner, the well-known scholar and novelist who taught a creative writing course at Williams last spring, has been accused of paraphrasing secondary works without references in his recent biography, The Life and Times of Chaucer (Alfred A. Knopf, 1977, [illegible]).

Reviewers, most of them from the academic world, have praised the book, but Sumner Ferris, in his review (Speculum, Oct. '77), claims that it "in no way deserves such fame or such use, for it is both inadequate and unscholarly."

Ferris points to over a dozen examples of borrowings from five of Gardner's sources that appear without footnotes.

One example is dependent upon May McKisack's England in the Fourteenth Century, 1307-1339: "Ockham ..... abandoned all such attempts at reconciliation between human understanding and the mysteries of God. Regulated thus to the sphere of the incomprehensible, God became a remote and mysterious arbiter of the destiny of creation, an absolute Will, bound by no human concepts of reason or justice." (p.580)

Gardner's version (p.147) follows the quote almost verbatim: "Ockham ..... abandoned all attempts at the reconciliation of human understanding and God's mysteries. Removed to the realm of the incomprehensible, God became a baffling Absolute Will bound by no human concepts of justice or reason."

Ferris also accuses Gardner of making innumerable "errors of fact." "The Life and Times of Chaucer is nevertheless a winningly enthusiastic book ..... on the other hand, Gardner's enthusiasm seems to have led him into writing and publishing before he was properly ready."

Gardner is not intent on deceiving his readers, Ferris admits; the unacknowledged paraphrases "seem rather the result of sloppy scholarship." But Gardner is more critical of himself. "Of course I knew what I was doing, I'm a populizer," he told Newsweek (April 10, '78). "When I write history I sit down with four or five books open before me and try to make that history live. I knew I was paraphrasing at the time. It wasn't done by mistake. Whenever I paraphrased a part where an author had made a discovery of his own, I acknowledged it. The rest of the time I did not acknowledge it."

While at Williams last spring, Gardner said in a Record interview: "I know very few magazines in America that are really worth publishing. The New Yorker story, for example, is really just trash! ..... just formula stories. But it's one of the best in the country." The Life and Times of Chaucer, while it may be good reading, discussing everything from Chaucer's sex life to his impressions of Florentine architecture, shows that Gardner, too, adheres to a popular formula.

Mountaineering #1.

FUNDAMENTALS OF MOUNTAINEERING

What is mountaineering all about? Funny you should ask. Because we just happen to have an answer. (Ah-h, life's little coincidences.) Mountaineering is a skill, a science and an art. Yet anyone with a thirst for excellence and normally developed motor skills can master it. Simply study these fundamentals and follow them faithfully

1. Step one, appropriately enough, starts by selecting the correct site. To do so, pick up a bottle of Busch Premium Beer. This is called heading for the mountains.

2. Okay, here's where the fun begins. Hold the mountain firmly in your left hand, grasp the mountain top with your right hand and twist the little fella off. There you go.

3. Now for the tricky part. Neophytes, listen up: the proper pour is straight down the center of the glass. Only in this way will the cold, invigorating taste of the mountain come to a head.

4. Once poured, pacing becomes paramount. As any seasoned mountaineer will tell you, the only way to down a mountain is slowly, smoothly and steadily – savoring every swallow of the brew that is Busch. If you're a bit awkward at first, don't be discouraged. Perfection takes practice. Soon enough, having emptied your glass and filled your soul, you too will be a mountaineer.

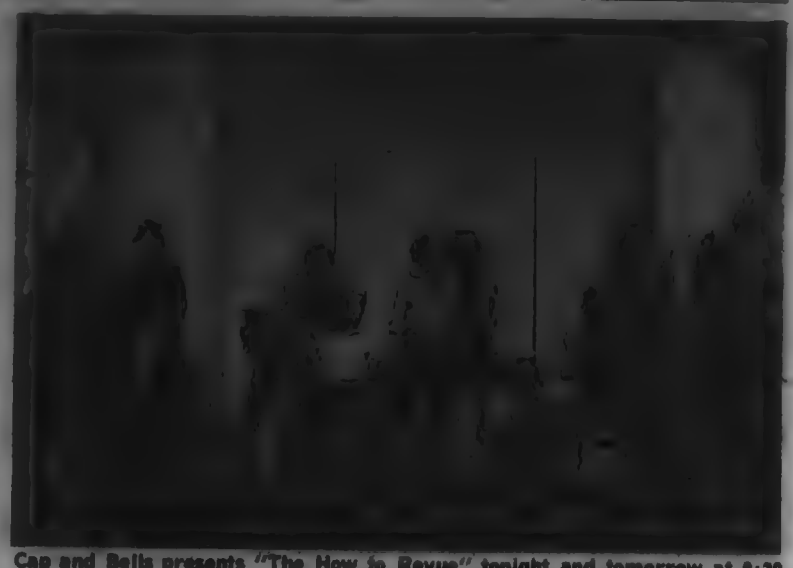
'How to' an old musical showcase

by Don Frazier



Somehow we have forgotten our great musical comedies. A once vibrant American art form has succumbed to the grim high-seriousness of the theater-as-Art establishment on one side; and the cynical commercialism of Broadway hucksters on the other. Now that the great old film musicals on the late show have been replaced by re-runs of "Kojak," the only place we can enjoy the romantic (if somewhat silly) high spirits of the form are the local high school or suburban dinner theaters.

Or in Jesup Hall, where Cap and Bells presents The How to Musical Revue tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 for admission of $1.00. Director Will Matland Weiss '72 and his production staff have assembled musical numbers from over thirty-five shows, ranging from the glossy recent past of A Little Night Music and Pippin to the vaudeville theatricality of Annie Get Your Gun, from the urbane lyrical facility of Stephen Sondheim and Cole Porter to the cloying sentimentalism of Rodgers and Hammerstein.

The How To Musical Revue, then, is a historical showcase of musical comedy. Weiss saw the need for cohesion in such an ambitious spectacle: "Even before we knew all the music, we knew we'd have to have something to tie it all together." That 'something' is the narrative thread characterized by Robert Berry, Jr. and Kate Wood. Their commentary weaves an otherwise fragmented production into a seamless whole.

The [illegible] Revue is a truely cooperative venture integrating the experience of proven artists such as musical director Peter Gloo and choreographer Beth Popik and designer Phillip Lippel with the rawer talents of enthusiastic participants outside the coterie of recurrent faces in the AMT. As such, it is one of the few extracurricular theatrical events to emerge this season. If it is more ragged for that reason, it will also be more joyous.

And that is what the music comedy is all about: a tradition of energetic pathos and schmaltz, infused by performance values as old as the stage, it hasn't yet collapsed under the weight of "serious" aesthetics that please the pedants of the lit-crit industry and stultify so much of our cultural life.

Cap and Bells presents "The How to Revue" tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 ($1.00). Director Weiss '72 has assembled songs from 35 musicals.

The Record will run classifieds at 20c per line for the first 3 lines and 15c for each additional line. Deadlines are 4:00 p.m. Wednesdays and Sundays. Total amount due must accompany this form. Mail or bring in person to Classifieds, The Williams Record, Baxter Hall, Williamstown, Mass. 01267.

African art display on view in Stetson

African Transitions: Art of the Colonial Experience, the second in a series of three art exhibitions to be presented by the Anthropology Department this year, is on view on the fifth tier of Stetson Hall. The exhibit is the result of the research collaboration of Vanessa Blowe and Alex Harnik. The exhibition will continue through April 19.

Choral society to present spring recital at Clark Tuesday

The Chamber Choir of the Williams College Choral Society, directed by Kenneth Roberts, will present a Spring recital on Tuesday, April 18, at 8:30 p.m. in the auditorium of the Clark Art Institute. The program includes two Brahms motets, a cantata by Schoenberg, three Debussy songs, and a selection of folk songs. Admission is free and open to the public.

The forty students in the Chamber Choir, all of whom took part in the Mozart Mass performance by the larger Choral Society last month, have been rehearsing since September in twice-weekly two-hour sessions. Whereas the Choral Society typically presents major works which are supported by orchestra and soloists, the smaller group, singing a cappella, must rely solely on the ensemble voices.

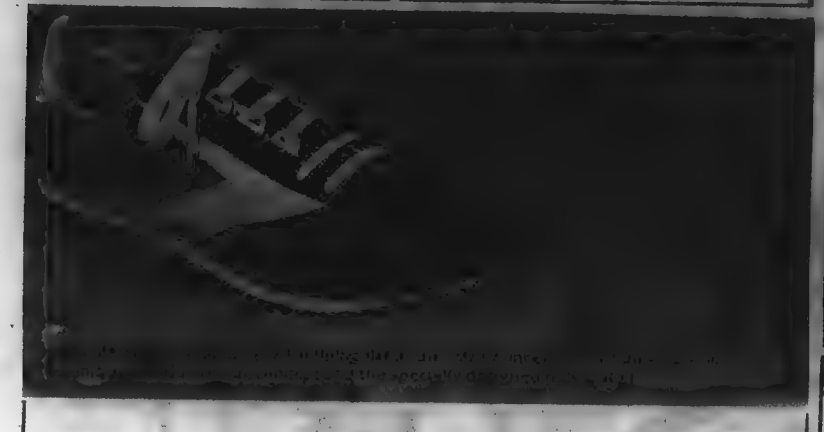
The Brahms motets, Op. 74, Nos. 1 & 2, are arranged for four parts. They will be sung in the original German text.

Schoenberg's 1907 Cantata Friede auf Erden (Peace on Earth) based on a text by C. F. Meyer is scored for an eight-part choir. The work is typical of Schoenberg's early tonal period, but it expands to near incomprehensibility as in such other Schoenberg works as "Enchanted Night."

Trios Chansons of Debussy, written in 1908, are based on the medieval texts by Charles d'Orleans. Debussy's only choral piece, the first song concerns love, the second utilizes a Spanish rhythm, and the third speaks of a cold winter.

Four folk songs complete the program. One is from Quebec, one from Newfoundland, one from England; and a spiritual, "Ride on, King Jesus," comes from the United States.

Pianist Sokol gives recital



Siri Jan Sokol, pianist, will give a free public recital sponsored by Prospect House of Williams College, at 3:30 p.m. on Sunday, April 16, in Thompson Memorial Chapel. Works on the program include Mozart's Sonata in G, K. 283, Beethoven's Sonata in A♭, Op. 110, and the Kreisleriana, Opus 16 of Schumann. Admission is free and open to the public.

A graduate of Swarthmore College, Sokol began her piano studies at the age of four, with her mother as teacher, and went on to more intensive study in the Philadelphia area, where she has made numerous appearances with community and college orchestras as well as the Philadelphia Orchestra. She is the winner of the prestigious Casadesus Assistantship, which is designed to recognize and cultivate the talents of pianists who show great promise. She is now working toward her Master's degree at S.U.N.Y. in Binghamton, New York, with Walter Ponce as her major piano teacher. The concert on Sunday will be Miss Sokol's debut solo recital.

Dance program

Dancers from Middlebury College and New York University will give a free performance Saturday April 15th at 8:30 P.M. in the wrestling room of Lasell Gym.

Track drops opener; record set by Tanner

The Williams College men's track team opened its outdoor season Tuesday with losses to Westfield State, New Haven and Southern Connecticut. Although the final team finish was a disappointment, the Ephs had a few strong individual performances and stayed fairly close to the competition, which has been outdoors for two weeks.

Larry Tanner had a superb opening day, as he tossed the hammer 181'6" for his best throw ever and a new school record. The only other winner for the Ephs was Tom Schreck, who grabbed the three mile by hanging easily with the leader until the last lap and then moving easily ahead to a 30 yard margin of victory. Williams was again generally strong in the distance events and most field events, but still lacked depth in general.

The Ephs will travel to Middlebury on Saturday, hoping to redeem themselves against a Panther team which has experienced similar problems with depth and even worse weather.

Batters comeback, stop Trinity Bantams 6-4

by Frank Pergolizzi

A fly ball double to deep left field by shortstop Scott Harrington spelled the difference yesterday as the baseball team defeated Trinity College, 6-4. Harrington's shot was the highlight of a comeback that saw Williams overtake a 4-1 deficit.

Williams opened the scoring in the bottom of the first on a double by DH Rick Walter and a single by first baseman Ken Hollingsworth.

Trinity came back with three runs in the second. Three walks by Williams starter Pete Kastrinelis loaded the bases. A suicide squeeze and a double by catcher Bill McCandless brought the runs home. The Bantams added another run in the fourth when Kastrinelis walked left fielder Roger Moreau. He stole second, went to third on a ground out and scored on a single by second baseman Jim Smith.

Williams got to Trinity pitcher Mark Spencer in the fifth. Walter tripled to deep left field and scored when the relay throw was off target. After Harrington flied out, Hollingsworth walked, stole second, and scored on a single by left fielder Frank Kreutz. This narrowed the score to 4-3.

Bob Labombard opened the sixth with a single, sending Spencer to the showers. Roger McEniry bunted Labombard to second. A bunt single by John Friborg put runners on first and third. Labombard scored the tying run on a wild pitch by reliever Mike Goss. Rick Walter walked, setting the stage for Harrington's blast to the left field bleachers.

Kastrinelis had settled down and at one point retired nine consecutive batters. When the senior righthander tired, junior Tom Albert came in and went on to pitch three innings of [illegible] relief. It was Albert's first save of the season.

Except for Trinity's one big inning, Williams controlled the game. "We got behind and didn't lose our poise," said coach Jim Briggs. He was especially pleased with his team's defensive play, especially the infield, which handled 27 chances without an error.

Williams is now 3-1 on the season. The Ephmen journey to Medford Saturday for a doubleheader against Tufts.

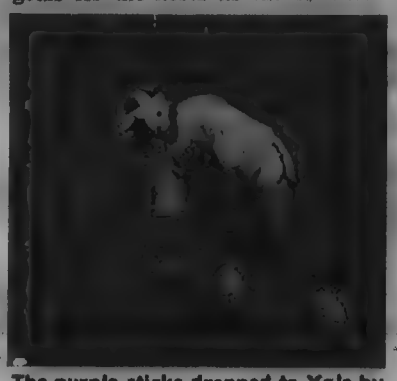
Yale slips past men's lacrosse



by Nancy Rhein

Although it is always nice to be on the winning end of a one point lead, sometimes it's just not in the stars. Despite a promising three goal third period margin, the men's lacrosse team was held scoreless in the fourth quarter, losing an 11-10 heartbreaker to Yale, Wednesday in New Haven.

The Ephmen, coming off a loss over Springfield last week were looking to get the ball rolling as they head into the meat of their schedule. Coming out strong, the Williams offense asserted itself early on, with Brian Benedict opening the scoring with an unassisted tally at :39. Williams, following a goal by Peter Thomsen and two fed from Todd Eckerson to Mark Murray outscored Yale 4-3 in the first quarter. Benedict added another in the second period, but Yale's two tallies tied it up at the half, with the Ephmen determined to take the win.

Regrouping at the half, the Williams offense came out shooting going up 10-8 after an opening goal by Tam Murray. Dick Goodbody, Gus Nuzzelese, Thomsen and Murray each added one more security goal as Williams eased ahead of Yale. The hosts, looking to preserve their superior stand over Williams in the New England lacrosse rankings switched to a zone defense in the fourth quarter and the Williams scoring machine ground to a halt. Turning their attention to Bob Cowin in goal, the Elis tied the score as the clock ran down. Yale's offensive power; Brian Matthews, had five goals for the hosts as the offensive pressure mounted. Although Williams sophomore goalie had seventeen saves and a strong game for the visitors, Yale slipped in one last goal to clinch the win, spoiling the taste of victory for the Ephmen.

Standing 1-2, Williams turns to Connecticut Saturday prior to Wednesday's highly anticipated Union match-up on Cole Field at 4 pm.

U Mass, Holyoke outmuscle Eph lightweight oarswomen

by Tannis Fox

The Williams Women's Lightweight Crew suffered their first defeat of the season at the oars of Mount Holyoke and University of Massachusetts Junior Varsity Women last weekend. The wind blew at a cross-current as the boats raced 1500 meters upstream on the Connecticut River near South Hadley, MA. These less-than-desirable racing conditions turned a six minute course into a grueling eight and a half minute one.

The hefty UMass women took the lead almost immediately after the race official uttered, "Etes-vous pret. Partez," signaling the race to begin. The UMass eight maintained a substantial lead throughout the race, winning by more than a boat length over the other two crews.

Williams and Mt. Holyoke provided the real excitement during the race as they remained within several (boat) "seats" of each other the entire race. The Williams Lightweights, stroked by veteran oarsperson Libby "The Lip" Hohman, rowed hard to maintain a lead over the Holyoke Lyons throughout the first three-quarters of the race. A strong sprint at the end gave Mt. Holyoke the edge, causing Williams' downfall.

Williams Lightweight coach Anne Eisenmenger, a former Williams oarsperson, was pleased with her team's performance commenting that they had rowed well.

As a result of limited practices, and the crew's lake being frozen, Coach George Marcus did not take his Women's Heavyweight Varsity and Novice boats to race at S. Hadley. Next week they will join the Lightweight and Men's boats in a meet against Connecticut College in New London, CT.

Tennis takes Big Green 6-3

by Evan Bash

After three easy, season opening wins at home, the men's tennis team ventured out into the world Wednesday to see if perhaps the game of tennis wasn't atrophying beyond the Purple Valley. What they found is that at least at Dartmouth tennis is perhaps too alive and too healthy, the Big Green capturing all six singles matches en route to a 6-3 victory over the Ephs. On Monday, Williams crushed Union 9-0 without losing a set. Until the encounter with Dartmouth, singles had been a Williams' strong point as they had not lost a match and only three sets total in this season's first three contests. But a combination of fine individual performances by Dartmouth's singles players and the unfamiliarity of the Laverne Field House courts prevented the racketmen from winning any more than one set overall.

Evan Bash took this only set at the no. six position, as he fought his way back into the match only to have his opponent catch on fire during the third set in a 6-3, 3-6, 6-0 loss. Martin Goldberg put on a gutty performance before falling 6-4, 6-4.

The Ephs unusedness to the field house was particularly apparent in the other singles matches, for as they just got into the action, it was over. Captain Jim Parsons, Dan O'Connell, Peter Friesen and Allen Barnes all staged second set comebacks only to fall just short in tiebreakers in that set.

The Ephs fared better in the doubles, Goldberg and Parsons having the best win in a 7-5, 2-6, 7-5 defeat of a tough team. Alan Barnes and Friesen triumphed 6-2, 7-6, and fiery Tad Roach and Barnes scored a 6-3, 6-2 victory.

Williams exciting brand of tennis returns home Saturday as the netmen face M.I.T. at 2:00 p.m.

Trustees accept two proposals but reject bank proxy of advisory committee

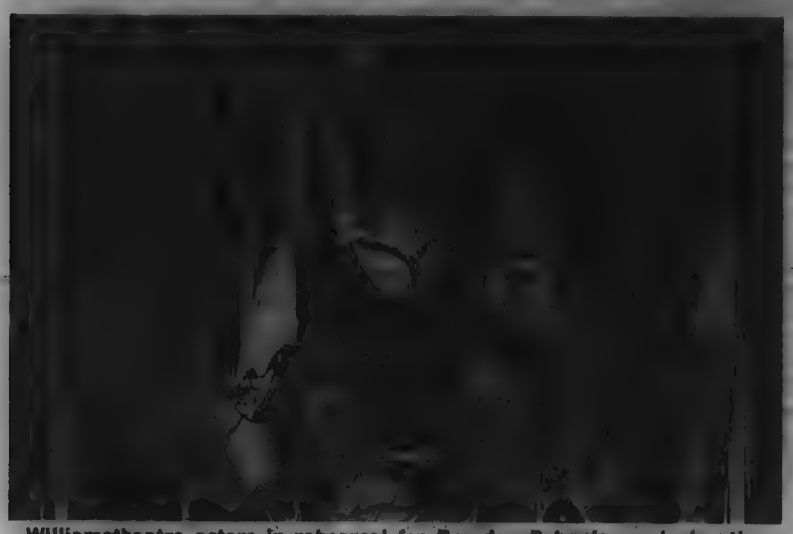
The Trustees have considered proxy vote recommendations from the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities, accepting two and rejecting one, as students again began to question the committee's validity.

The group, according to its secretary, College Treasurer Francis Dewey III, considered 36 proxies and voted in three cases to support shareholders proposals against management positions. According to committee member Marlies Carruth '80, the votes were close.

The committee recommended the College ask the First Chicago Bank to give detailed information on its loans in South Africa and "the contribution of each loan to the well-being of the black majority."

The Trustees rejected the advice, agreeing with management that divulging this would breach the confidentiality owed customers. Dewey also noted First Chicago has made no loans to "South Africa's public sector" since 1976.

The Trustees accepted their committee's recommendations to ask General Electric "to evaluate the human rights situation in any country with which a contract is being contemplated," declining "any sale to a country which does not meet [illegible] standards." Carruth said such a proposal would effectively restrict GE's international trade in arms systems.



Also accepted was a proxy calling on Union Carbide to "make no further investment nor expand its operations" in South Africa until the government there commits itself to ending apartheid. The Trustees rejected management objection that "corporate policy must follow U.S. government policy."

Student members on the advisory committee, including Carruth and Jacqueline Wilson '79, would not interpret the Trustees' actions as signalling general receptiveness or rejection of the committee. Carruth noted that she did not find the Trustees receptive to students, but that she felt the presence of Dewey and other administrators on the committee lent force to its recommendations.

Meanwhile, members of the Thursday Night Coalition and the Williams Black Student Union, which were withholding endorsement of the Advisory committee pending the reception of its first recommendations, claim that trustee rejection of the First Chicago proxy negates the force of agreement with the other two votes and destroys the credibility of the committee.

Dewey noted that the advisory committee still is authorized "to propose shareholder resolutions or even a divestment of specific stocks." Students argue that in light of the initial trustee response this authority is meaningless.

Wilson argued that the committee's self-imposed policy of not revealing its recommendations until after the Trustees have made their decisions impairs the committee's responsiveness to students and faculty and should be abandoned.

Williamstheatre actors in rehearsal for Brendan Behan's musical satire THE HOSTAGE. The final production of the current season opens Friday, April 21st at 8:30 p.m. at the Adams Memorial Theatre, with additional performances April 22nd, 27th, 28th, and 29th.

'Hostage' preview

Irish civil war goes bawdy

by James Stone

When Brendan Behan's The Hostage played on Broadway, Behan, who was in the audience every night, would jump up on stage, light a cigar, and say, "I love the stage, because it's the only place in the theatre where I can smoke." In the spirit of the late Mr. Behan, Williamstheatre presents The Hostage this weekend (Friday and Saturday nights at 8:30) and next (April 27, 28, 29) on the mainstage of the Adams Memorial Theatre.

The play is described as a "musical satire". The targets of its satire are the various participants and bystanders in the Irish civil war and the war in Northern Ireland: no Englishman or Irishman, Nationalist or Loyalist, Protestant or Chatholic is spared in the sweep of Behan's wit. And that is what is most important about The Hostage—though much of its content is political, the play's real intent is to ridicule anyone and anything inhuman, and thereby affirm and revel in humanity. An atmosphere of warm and a bit strange, but very human humans, is repeatedly violated by the intrusion of outsiders whose doctrines, dogmas, and loyalties have rendered them somewhat silly.

At the first cast meeting of the present production, Director Jean-Bernard Bucky described the play as a series or "good lines, good gags, and compelling juxtapositions." The play is structured so that every action or sentiment is immediately undercut by the next—Behan never permits his play the luxury of taking itself as seriously as some of his characters view themselves. This structure determines many of Mr. Bucky's directorial choices.

The play was intentionally rehearsed in fairly small sections, so that each scene, each bit, became its own entity at first. The first full run-thru was not until a week before opening, but whatever disjointed feeling was present at first was overcome by the actors' natural instinct to provide a consistent motive force behind their characters. Mr. Bucky's biggest challenge was to modulate the bits to make a consistent atmospheric base while preventing them from settling together and getting "sticky" and melodramatic.

The music is the most useful tool of this strategy: it works not only to intensify moods and illustrate character, but also to break the mood and the illusion of character. The songs jump outside the play, jarring the audience into objectivity. "We're on stage and glad to be here" is what they seem to say. The lyrics Behan adds to the familiar Irish folk melodies are satiric masterworks.

The Hostage, all intellectualisms aside, is a fun and bawdy play about fun and bawdy people. What makes them real and important is their struggle to stay that way in a world that often takes itself too seriously.

'Lady' plays tonight

The Williams Feminist Alliance and the English department will sponsor the feminist play, "Who's a Lady," tonight at 8:30 p.m. in the Rathskeller.

Written by Annette Miller and directed by Helaine Witkind, the play deals with topics which include romance, seduction, motherhood, marriage, courtship and sexism. The play includes songs by Paul Anka, Bertold Brecht, John Kander and Sandy Wilson with sketches on feminism by Jules Feiffer, Judith Viorst, Tennessee Williams and J. D. Salinger.

Ex-advisor to Allende attacks CIA's 'fascist' Chilean involvement

by Stu Massad

Edward Boorstein, former economic advisor to the Chilean government of Salvador Allende, attacked the CIA for allegedly formenting the 1973 military coup in Chile and warned against a similar "threat of fascism in the U.S.," when he addressed an audience of 50 people Wednesday.

The bulk of Boorstein's two-hour lecture involved the history of the Allende government, from its election in 1970 to its overthrow in 1973. He detailed covert CIA operations which have been revealed through investigations and leaks.

Boorstein charged that the CIA organized rightest opposition to Allende, inciting and funding Chilean riots and strikes, as well as the successful coup. He claimed the CIA activity was ordered by former President Nixon and then-Secretary of State Henry Kissinger.

The economist argued that U.S. policy-makers mounted "an invisible blockade" against socialist Chile on the world money market which produced chaotic inflation and shortages in the Chilean economy.

These actions, said Boorstein, thwarted the attempts of the Allende government to reform the Chilean economy and society. He claimed that the socialists retained popular support until the coup, which he said was organized by the military and "bourgeois."

Boorstein, who witnessed the last days of the Allende government, described the time as one of social chaos, marked by riots which he claimed were fomented by the CIA. When the coup came, Boorstein escaped to the Mexican Embassy's protection.

"They needed fascism in Chile, and they still need it," said the self-proclaimed Marxist-Leninist, trying to explain why U.S. officials would support the overthrow of an elected government. "That's why President Carter only fights for human rights on a superficial level," he added, noting that Carter recently met with Chilean dictator Augusto Pinochet in Washington.

Scientist explains laser fusion

by Jeff Trout

Laser-triggered nuclear fusion is available now as a fuel source for conventional fission reactors, according to Dr. M. J. Lubin, of the Laboratory of Laser Energetics at the University of Rochester, and within several years can be harnessed to generate electricity directly.

Lubin expressed enthusiasm for the "approach to harnessing the power of the sun here on earth" in his talk at Thompson Biology Center last Tuesday.

Dr. Lubin outlined staggering applications for laser fusion. With systems currently in use or under construction, nuclear waste from light-water reaftors (such as provide much of New England's electricity) can be reprocessed into fissionable fuel, thus adding 100 or 150 years to our current uranium supplies. This system totally eliminates the need for burying nuclear fission waste products because there would not be any. Moreover, fusion itself is an incredible safe technique: a chain reaction is impossible because of the very nature of nuclear fusion; thus, no explosion need be feared.

Lubin contrasted these advantages with other proposals for so-called breeder reactors which would also help get rid of radioactive waste, but are much more complex and dangerous.

The two current fusion reactors in America just about break even in terms of energy output. However, Lubin pointed out that the energy potential of each nuclear fuel pellet, a .1 millimeter sphere of deuterium, is equal to that of a barrel of oil. What that means, he explained, is that a 500:1 return of energy is possible on a fuel source as limitless as the seas of earth.

He tempered the enthusiasm generated by these predictions with a detailed description of the engineering problems still to be resolved, most of them involving increasing the power and efficiency of the laser apparatus. "Basically, it's all done with mirrors," he quipped. His conclusion was that these difficulties could be overcome, and that within thirty years, fusion reactors could be generating much of our electrical power.

Party leads to property damage

by Ann McCabe

On Saturday night, April 8, a small party in Mission Park resulted in considerable damage to a Pratt Suite's living room and the adjacent bedroom.

The damage apparently began in the living room with members of the party throwing furniture out of the window about 2:00 a.m. In order to see the results of this caper, several people went into the adjacent bedroom, which was vacant at the time. Upon returning about 3:00 a.m., he found the living room devoid of its former contents and his room in shambles. His stereo, skis, and shelves had been damaged; his typewriter in the living room had been stepped on. (The freshman moved into the suite about six weeks ago.)

About 20 students were involved. According to all Record sources, no malicious intent provoked the inebriated group who has agreed to pay for damages.

College Regulations state that "students are expected to behave responsibly in their use of alcohol." Failure to comply with regulations or to conform to "generally accepted standards of conduct" can result in probation, suspension or dismissal.

Deans Roosenraad and McIntire acted as "fact-finders" in the incident, interviewing most of those involved. (Not all members of the party were students; some were alumnae.)

Though the destruction of property is not a novel occurrence, the Mission Park episode is unique as the privacy of a third party was violated.

The extent and scope of disciplinary action is being decided.

Three Row Houses vote to remain single sex

Fort Hoosac, Perry-Bascom and Garfield Wood Houses will all maintain single sex houses within their residential units, during the 1978-79 school year. The decisions are based on votes taken in each house last week.

In order to convert to a co-educational system, a majority of both the men and the women in the four Row Houses would have had to vote their approval, in accordance with a ruling by the Committee on Undergraduate Life.

"Most of the debate stems from inequalities in the physical plant," stressed Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad, chairman of the Housing Committee. Roosenraad has advocated an enclave system, with designated sections within each building reserved for single-sex accommodations, as a possible alternative to the present system of single-sex housing.

Letters: Jeans Day, Mission Park, Rothstein

Jeans dilemma

To the editor,

Contrary to the literature of last Friday's demonstration for gay rights, blue jeans do not make a humanitarian: one also requires a conscience. Personally, I was upset by the form which the "Jeans Day" demonstration took, simply because I refused to seriously damage my conscience by squeezing it into a mold which it did not fit.

I would never deny the effectiveness or legitimacy of a demonstration such as "Jeans Day" when it is conducted within a group of people who share a strong conviction. But when such an effort is forced upon an entire college community, it becomes a manipulation: people are pushed into one of only two classifications when they may not (and in all probability do not) belong to either. This manipulation was particularly horrendous in Friday's demonstration because those responsible chose to label the jean-wearers as "humanists" who were "supportive of their friends." If I chose not to wear jeans, then what labels apply to me?

The issue of gay rights deserves more than this sort of band wagon technique. It is not a black and white problem that can be resolved by simple determination. Being aware of the delicate moral and personal conflicts involved in developing a view of this issue, I can't see how the staging of such either-or demonstrations as last Friday's can do anything but make people more uncomfortable.

Jeans' blues

To the editor,

As I reflect on last week's Jeans Day, I am forced to conclude that the event was a mistake on the part of the WGSO. But it was a mistake for a very pleasant reason.

Many members of the community may be aware that Jeans Day is not new. At a large number of campuses across the country, gay organizations have sponsored such gay support days. However, on most of the campuses, the gay rights movement has been in an early stage of development. Usually, most people have not worn jeans, to the surprise of no one. The important thing and the noticeable thing was the people who did wear jeans—those who would go out on a limb and risk ridicule to support their friends.

At Williams, however, we have come too far for that. Recently, especially within the past year, the Williams community has become sensitive to gay rights and to gays. This is not to say that we have become fully aware of, respectful of, and dedicated to human rights.

Those of us in the WGSO are immodest enough to take much of the credit for this progress. However, the thanks really has to go to all the community members who have made the effort to open their hearts and minds to overcome age-old prejudice.

Most people did wear jeans on Jeans Day. And this, paradoxically, is the problem. The people who stood out were those who would not wear jeans. Students, in particular, had to go out on a limb to express their nonsupport for gays—indeed, to express their bigotry—due to the coercive influence of the humanistic majority. Not that jeans-wearers weren't noticed. It was especially gratifying that a number of people who have been our occasional political adversaries this year, including Dean Peter Berek, did express support by wearing jeans.

Unfortunately, some of us in the WGSO were left with only bitter and sad feelings for friends who were not yet prepared to accept us. After a year of maximum effort, this really hurt. And because of that, Jeans Day left several of us more demoralized than gratified.

I would emphasize again that our disappointment with some was simply a function of the support of many. The Williams community deserves a sincere thanks for making the Jeans Day concept obsolete.

Unchecked vandals

To Cris T. Roosenraad, Dean of Housing, Walter C. O'Brien, Chief of Security, and Students of Williams College

To the editor,

For some reason, Mission Park appears to be rather susceptible.

No other building, including dormitories, is the target of such blatant disrespect for property and the labors of the B & G personnel who strive to keep it clean.

This weekend Mission Park residents once again awoke to a now familiar scene. Sunday morning arrived with the usual rubbish distributed freely throughout the corridor, posters strewn about, and the main bulletin board ripped from the wall.

This "petty" vandalism has exhibited itself frequently during the year, sometimes being anything but petty. We have seen several pinball machines damaged or replaced, Coke and candy machines smashed, and even the removal of ceilings and wall, accompanied by broken glass in doors.

We would like to know what kind of effort is being made to halt such activity, or to find the persons responsible and compel them to make reparations. It is clear that this sort of thing can only contribute to higher costs, and, quite frankly, we hate to see our funds going towards cleaning up after irresponsible, immature individual(s).

We feel confident that we speak for many of the residents of the Park in openly condemning these acts and the person(s) involved, and we strongly urge that direct steps be taken (if they have not already been initiated) to curtail the "activity". Since the appearance of Mission Park reflects on each and every one of its residents, we also feel that it is the students' obligation to cooperate with the college to discourage further incidents.

Support Rothstein

To the editor,

On Thursday, April 20, there will be a fund-raising wine and cheese party for Steve Rothstein, class of '78. Steve is running for Mass. state representative from Brookline. Defining himself as a progressive liberal, Steve is particularly interested in promoting a stronger ethics code, a graduated income tax, and more use of public facilities.

Steve has limited himself to spending $7000 on his campaign. He strongly believes that no candidate can be impartial to benefactors who contribute large sums to his campaign. Therefore he is making every effort to accept as many small contributions as possible.

Steve is one of few graduating seniors who is putting into practice that which he has learned in theory at Williams. So far the response to his invitations has been encouraging, and I urge more of his classmates and friends to back him in his enthusiastic endeavor. Steve has already received much political support from his constituents and politically active contacts in Brookline. However, he will need the financial support from such fund-raising activities as this Thursday's cocktail party in order to make his campaign a success. For information on obtaining tickets call Joe Hurley (6666) or Lauren Glass (2780).

The New Math

19m + 8w = 2m + 9w
How many m's does it take to equal one w?
Answer: 17m = w

The members of two main street row houses learned lessons in algebra and political science when they "voted" to remain single sex over the weekend. The Deans (not the Housing Committee) ruled that any change would require the concurrence of a majority of each sex. One of the goals of co-educational living was to have been to heal the factionalism felt within the Houses. Unfortunately, the very voting system emphasized separation and drove the sexes apart.

The proposals failed in both GarWood, Perry-Bascom, GarWood voted 19 men and 8 women in favor, 2 men and 9 women against. For Perry-Bascom, the figures were 13 men and 6 women in favor, 1 and 9 against. Although respectively 71 and 66 per cent of the houses favored the change, it failed.

Williams students are very concerned with the rights of the minority but sometimes lose sight of the rights of the majority. Is tyranny of the minority any less oppressive than tyranny of the majority?

At any rate, the vote has been taken. Future Action may move toward one of four possible outcomes.

I. keep all the houses single sex. If we leave things the way they are, two-thirds of each house is unsatisfied with the result. The house leadership is in the impossible position of having to enforce the minority will. (The GarWood president has refused to do so and has suspended room draw until the house reaches an agreeable result.)

II. Declare both houses co-ed. Cynics in each house feel that this is more than a vote between single sex and co-ed living. Although some of the men claim they wish to end the notoriety of being the best frat on campus and the women claim a need for "sistership", many discount this altruism. The same voices that called for the end of the fraternities in the fall now cry for "sisterhood." "House unity" has been replaced by a demand for sexual segregation. What has caused the turn around?

Whereas some of the people voting for single sex living do use that as their chief criterion, we believe that there are selfish motives, too. Very simply, the women's houses, Bascom and Wood are better places to live than Perry or Garfield. Is it merely coincidence that these are the only two places on campus where anything approaching a majority of the women wish to live in single sex buildings. We think not.

(On the other side of the coin, this phenomenon is not limited to women. In Fort Hoosac, where the men have superior living facilities, it is alleged that they vote for the status quo. If so, they are behaving as the women in Bascom and Woodbridge ... looking out for themselves above everyone else.)

III. Preserve single sex housing, somewhere. It is possible that there is a moderate-sized group of men and-or women who wish to live that way. If so, the College should provide adequate facilities. Clearly, however, there is insufficient demand to justify making two of the nicest row houses all female. Can we put these women together in one house somewhere, so that they may have their single-sex houses without forcing others to live that way? In other words, make either Bascom or Wood female, but not both.

IV. Start over. All decisions made thus far act on the assumptions that (1) men and women are adversaries and must be treated separately, and (2) since the newly included freshmen are not smart enough to decide whether they would rather live in a co-educational or a singly sexed house, the wise upperclassmen must decide for them. The former is self-fulfilling. The latter is ridiculous.

The best solution would be one last secret ballot that does not discriminate on the basis or sex, age, class or anything else. Because it is an important issue, the house may require (as does the faculty on "important issues") a consensus of 60 per cent before taking action on any change.

The present segregation has caused impossible social problems in the houses. The majorities recognize this and are trying to change. The Deans, the Housing Committee and the individual house members must decide to do what is right.

Viewpoint:

Committee a farce

This past week, the Trustees rejected a proposal made by the Trustees' Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility. The proposal wasn't extreme or radical. Williams wouldn't have made any great moral decision or threatened itself in any economic way. The proposal simply called for the college to use its First National Bank of Chicago stock proxy to ask bank management to disclose all the bank's loans to the South African government. The use of our proxy in such a manner would have been an information seeking move. In no way would the college have made a step towards divestiture, however, we would have simply chosen to know more about our indirect support of the South African regime. With such information, our decision for or against divestiture would have been better based on the realities of the situation. The college would not have been hurt by seeking for knowledge. That is, after all, what we are about.

As usual, the Trustees failed to state their reasons for the rejection of a proposal from a committee that they themselves created. I am forced to conclude that if they will not pay attention to this committee on such a mild proposal, they will not ever pay any attention to it. In all probability, the advisory committee is not being taken seriously by anybody. As first conceived, it wouldn't have had the power to recommend any policy on investment; only after threats of a large demonstration, did the administration allow the committee to study not just proxies, but also the political and moral implications of our investments. And if the Trustees won't listen to the committee's proxy suggestions, they won't respond to it at all. The committee is a sham, a farce and a joke, played at the expense of students. And if it was conceived as an attempt to appease concerned students, the committee has failed totally.

Sentiment on campus for divestiture is not being taken seriously. Students have committed themselves to working through the proper channels. We have negotiated in good faith and have received a committee that commands no respect from anyone, and has no authority over anything. What alternatives do students have when we act in the proper manner and are ignored? What would they have us do?

Two boats glide by U

Women's Crew

The women's crews made valiant, but unsuccessful efforts against Connecticut College boats on Saturday in New London, Conn. A tail wind was with them but luck was not as all three Williams boats finished within several seconds of the Connecticut crews in the 1500 meter race downstream the Thames River.

The Novice boat started off strong, but caught "crabs" early on (oars were caught in the water), slowing the boat down, throwing off their rhythm.

The varsity boat, stroked by co-captain of last year's U.S. National women's crew Sue Tuttle, came the closest to victory, losing by only one-tenth of a second. Coach George Marcus, less-than-pleased with his boat's performance, said, "We rowed terribly."

The lightweight boat, stroked by captain Lisa Capaldini, remained within several "seats" (approximately four feet) of the Connecticut junior varsity women throughout the race, but was not able to catch them despite a strong sprint at the end.

Next Saturday Williams meets Little Three rivals Wesleyan and Amherst in Middletown, Conn.

Men's Crew

by Nick Lefferts '80

The Williams varsity men's crew opened its racing season with a victory over Connecticut College on the Thames River in New London Saturday. The Purple oarsmen rowed the 2000 meter, wind-swept course in 6:12, ten seconds and open water ahead of the Connecticut College boat.

A sloppy start left the Williams eight four seats down as it settled to its racing cadence of 32 strokes per minute in the rough water. By the 600-meter mark, Williams began to move as coxswain Molly Burchall guided her oarsmen through the Conn. eight to a boat-length lead at 1000 meters. The Purple crew increased its lead the remainder of the course, winning by over a length.

The varisty eight is stroked (the stroke sets the pace and the other oarsmen follow him) by Peter "Easy" Wells. Behind Wells, in the seven seat, is Captain John Reynolds; at six is David Hitchcock; five, Cabby Tennis; four, Steve Leaf; three, Sloane Graff; two, John Farmakis; bow, Nick Lefferts.

The heavyweight frosh showed they were ready for their first race and the stormy conditions as they disposed of their Conn. opponents. The Purple Calves pulled away at 500 meters and finished with a winning margin of seven seconds. The lightweight frosh fell victim to technical problems and rough water as they lost to Conn. Junior-Varsity Lightweights.

The crews will travel to Middletown Saturday where they will row against Amherst and Wesleyan. Coach John Peinert's varsity oarsmen will try and bring home Williams' first Saratoga Oar Trophy, symbolic of Little Three rowing supremacy.

Netmen shutout MIT

by Evan Bash

Spring may be a little late in coming to the Berkshires, but by all indications the men's tennis team has definitely arrived. The Ephs swept all six singles matches for the fourth time this season as they deprogrammed M.I.T. 9-0 on Saturday. It was the third shutout of the year for the racketmen and raises their season record to 4-1.

Forced inside of Lansing-Chapman rink because of the snow, Williams nonetheless chilled M.I.T. with steadily fine play that prevented the Engineers from winning a set in the match. Coach Sean Sloane's racketmen have now accomplished this feat for the third time this year.

Williams singles play has been particularly sharp all season, with the netmen becoming equally adept at playing from either the backcourt or the net. Martin Goldberg, filling the no. one position, and no. two Dan O'Connell won by identical 6-2, 6-1 scores. Captain Jim Parsons recorded a 6-3, 6-1 victory, and no. four Peter Friesen needed a second set tiebreaker to win his match. Evan Bash triumphed 7-5, 6-4 at no. five, while Mitchell Reiss rolled to a 6-2, 6-1 victory.

M.I.T. could fare no better in the doubles as Williams won with similar ease. The hard work the Ephs have put into the doubles appears to be paying off, the racketmen having had fine doubles performances for the past week.

The Ephs hosted Harvard this afternoon.

Stickmen defeat UConn, face Union tomorrow

It was an afternoon of ups and downs for the men's lacrosse team Saturday as they came from behind to defeat a strong University of Connecticut team 9-7 at UConn.

Although Williams moved to an early lead following Conn's opening goal, the hosts capitalized on a few Eph penalties in the second period to narrow the margin to 5-4 at the half. UConn then came on full power in the third period as the Williams stickmen were lax in guarding their lead. The substantial ground ball advantage (21-9 1st period, 69-49 game) and superior first quarter shooting faded for the Ephmen as they lost command over the game. Behind 7-6 following three Conn goals, Peter Thomsen tied it up for Williams and the visitors came back to life, shutting out UConn in the fourth period after two final goals by Dick Goodbody.

Despite the midgame letdown, the Ephmen played well, defeating the tough Conn squad, possessors of a coveted win over Middlebury earlier this season. Strong stickwork and an aggressive attack enabled Williams to capture the lead, while Eph goalie Bob Cowin (15 saves) kept UConn out of the nets, and his team in the game, with several important saves. Midfielder John Glynn and face-off experts Brian Benedict and Gus Nuzzolese had especially strong games for Williams.

Leading the scoring was Thomsen with 3 goals and 2 assists. Goodbody was right behind Thomsen in the stats with three goals. Benedict, Nuzzolese, and Tam Murray each had one in the contest while Todd Eckerson continued his dominance in the assist category with another two in Saturday's match. Mark Murray also had an assist for Williams.

The team next meets Union Wednesday at 4 pm on Cole Field, looking for a repeat of last year's victory and win No. 3 on the season.

Gresham takes 5th in Relays

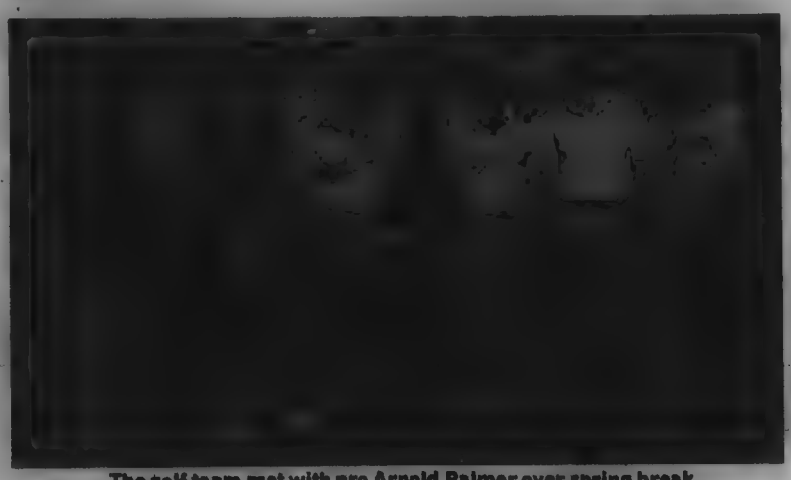
Junior distance runner Cyane Gresham was the only Ephwoman to place in an event at the UMass Relays Saturday afternoon in Amherst.

Gresham, a cross-country runner in the fall season, took fifth in the two mile run, with a college record 11:26. Winner Jan Merill of the New England Athletic Club cropped several seconds off the American women's record, finishing in 9:49.

Over twenty-five women's teams, including college squads, athletic clubs, A.A.U. teams and a few high school runners, participated in the meet, along with an equal number of men's teams.

Williams Coach Susan Hudson-Hamblin said that Gresham's run was definitely the club's best this season. She looks for Gresham in the distance events, senior Robin Pinel in sprints and hurdles, and another ex-cross country veteran, Trish Beckwith, to place well in the New England Women's Track Championships next Sunday. Beckwith, who is recovering from an ankle injury, will compete in the 440 and 880.

Batters drop double header to Tufts



The Williams baseball team, after jumping out to a 3-1 lead in both games, dropped both ends of a doubleheader to Tufts, 16-6 and 4-3.

In the first game Williams led 3-2, when in the bottom of the fourth starting pitcher Steve Maier ran into control problems. Tufts ended up scoring five runs in the fourth to go ahead 7-3. Coupled with a seven run sixth inning, the Jumbos dealt the Ephmen a convincing 16-6 loss.

A Scott Harrington homerun helped Williams jump out to another 3-1 lead in the second game. Tufts scored in the fourth to cut the lead to one. Paul Bard homered for Tufts in the bottom of the sixth to tie the score. Tufts won the game in the bottom of the seventh when center fielder John Friborg lost Bard's fly ball in the late inning darkness.

Sophomore John Carey went 6 one-third innings and picked up his first loss of the season. Maier's record now stands at 0-2.

Williams is now 3-3 on the season. The Ephmen travel to Wesleyan Tuesday afternoon for their first 1978 Little Three contest.

Two boats glide by U Conn

Women's Crew

The women's crews made valiant, but unsuccessful efforts against Connecticut College boats on Saturday in New London, Conn. A tail wind was with them but luck was not as all three Williams boats finished within several seconds of the Connecticut crews in the 1500 meter race downstream the Thames River.

The Novice boat started off strong, but caught "crabs" early on (oars were caught in the water), slowing the boat down, throwing off their rhythm.

The varsity boat, stroked by co-captain of last year's U.S. National women's crew Sue Tuttle, came the closest to victory, losing by only one-tenth of a second. Coach George Marcus, less-than-pleased with his boat's performance, said, "We rowed terribly."

The lightweight boat, stroked by captain Lisa Capaldini, remained within several "seats" (approximately four feet) of the Connecticut junior varsity women throughout the race, but was not able to catch them despite a strong sprint at the end.

Next Saturday Williams meets Little Three rivals Wesleyan and Amherst in Middletown, Conn.

Men's Crew

by Nick Lefferts '80

The Williams varsity men's crew opened its racing season with a victory over Connecticut College on the Thames River in New London Saturday. The Purple oarsmen rowed the 2000 meter, wind-swept course in 6:12, ten seconds and open water ahead of the Connecticut College boat.

A sloppy start left the Williams eight four seats down as it settled to its racing cadence of 32 strokes per minute in the rough water. By the 600-meter mark, Williams began to move as Coxswain Molly Burchell guided her oarsmen through the Conn. eight to a boat-length lead at 1000 meters. The Purple crew increased its lead the remainder of the course, winning by over a length.

The varisty eight is stroked (the stroke sets the pace and the other oarsmen follow him) by Peter "Easy" Wells. Behind Wells, in the seven seat, is Captain John Reynolds; at six is David Hitchcock; five, Cabby Tennis; four, Steve Leaf; three, Sloane Graff; two, John Farmakis; bow, Nick Lefferts.

The Peoples' Republic: Mingling Tradition

OLD CHINA; NEW

The people of post-Liberation China consider themselves in many ways to be a new people. One of the more popular books explaining China to the outside world, and long a favorite within the People's Republic, is LIU Ching, Builders of a New Life, first published just before the Cultural Revolution in 1964 and then republished in 1977 at the official end of that period of upheaval. In it, Chinese proudly speak of new organization in communities, industry, education, farming, production, and, of course, political views. The religious views associated with Taoism, Confusianism, Buddhism, Islam, and Christianity are viewed as superstitions; they are also understood by many Chinese to be linked with the oppressive tactics of previous ruling classes in China. The "persecution of the people" by Buddhism in Tibet was cited over and again to us as the reason for the takeover of that "autonomous region." Likewise, classical art, with its all too frequent connection with Taoist and Confucian aphorisms and thought, is connnected with religious superstition and with the social elitism and privilege which made such art possible.

Given millions to rebuild the Chinese navy, the last empress of China had this Marble Boat erected at her summer palace in Peking instead. Her retreat is now a public park.

A pagoda located in a park on the outskirts of the city of Wusih.

The ancestral temple of Fushan has become a museum for the people.

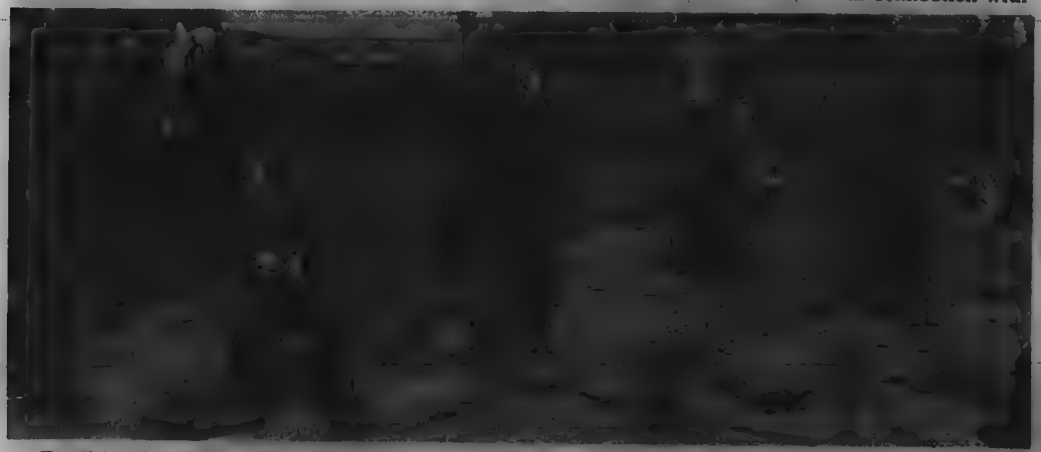
I remember particularly a lunch-time conversation at the Tali Peoples' Commune with one of our guides, Miss Yu, a graduate graduate who had taken advanced work in English language and literature and who wanted to know more about our group. We began with names and the last ones mentioned were the two Peters. Miss Yu said, "Oh, yes, I know Peter; it stands in your language for rock." My colleague Peter Frost replied slowly, "Well, you know it also stands for the first disciple of Jesus Christ," and a silence followed.

"Who?" said Miss Yu, in that quizzical, friendly way of the Chinese.

Peter, digging deep into his neglected religious past, said more: "Jesus is thought be many of our people to have come from God." Another silence. "What?" said Miss Yu. Then Peter used the word "Shang Ti", a phrase used by nineteenth century missionaries to express God or Spirit, saying that Jesus was thought to have come from Shang Ti.

Miss Yu had heard of Shang Ti, but she said, "How could a person come from Shang Ti; Shang Ti is alone or just there—and to come from?" She had not only not heard of Jesus Christ—in connection with St. Peter, or Peter Frost, or anything else—but the very idea that Christians have about an incarnation or a "coming from" she was incapable of understanding. In fact, as future conversations indicated, such thinking would indeed by superstitious and time spent on such speculation would be useless.

We inquired in Peking about a famous Roman Catholic church and an ecumenical Protestant church and discovered that there was no point in visiting these churches because services were held periodically. We were told that at the Catholic Church, the only service held this year was a small Christmas eve gathering at which a choir of Chinese singers, recruited only the day before, and "entertained the foreigners".



For Socialist culture to prosper, we must conscientiously carry out the policies of "letting a hundred flowers blossom and a hundred schools of thought contend," of "making the past serve the present and things foreign serve China," and of "weeding through the old to bring forth the new."

11th Nat'l Congress of the CCP.

All the Buddhist temples which we visited—and others which I asked about—no longer function in any way as religious institutions. The relics and statues have been removed in most instances. In Peking there is "thought to be," as our guide put it, one old Chinese Buddhist priest who still maintains a small temple—but no one has seen him recently!

However, as a student of classical Chinese religions I was more interested in what remained of Taoism and Confucianism. One day, as four of us were wandering around the riverfront section of Shanghai, we came upon a Taoist temple compound. I could tell that the buildings had been used for Taoist worship and gatherings because of the characters carved high up on the doors and on the stone of the buildings. They were also unmistakably Taoist because of the dragon carvings on the roof and a particular form of dragon symmetry used in ancient Taoist temples. Of course, they were no longer being used for traditional purposes. Instead the doors of the compound were open into the spacious inner courtyards and several signs were posted saying, "Recitation Hall for Maoist Doctrine" and "Open Space for all the People."

We noted the stress of recreational use of religious buildings everywhere. At a very famous temple, in Forshan, just outside Kwangchow, known to Chinese historians and art lovers, the courtyard is in constant use by soccer players and rope skippers. The special buildings which used to house documents and texts are now museums featuring contemporary Chinese people's Traditional martial arts are still popular as "group" activity in China. This group is part of a much larger one which gathered each morning in front of our hotel in Shanghai to perform Tai Chi. Such scenes were common every morning in Shanghai.

with the New Order

art. At Forshan there is a spectacular statue known as the "Taoist Buddha." It was at Forshan that the teaching of the Way and teaching of the Buddha co-existed for a long time in Chinese history. They produced a confluence of doctrine and religious understanding. The statue is still there, hidden in an unlighted part of the main hall, displaying the combination of the traditions for which Forshan is famous—an Indian type Buddha sitting in meditation with suggestions of lotus leaves as a cushion, but clearly a Chinese face, hair arrangement, and hand positioning. Our guide, of course, said nothing about the fascinating religious background of the statue; instead, it was described to us in terms of its height, breadth, and weight.

Nor were there any description made to us of the bronze and gold carvings in this temple which depicted, very clearly, scenes from the Analects of Confucius, displaying traditional Chinese virtues. Once again, as we rushed by them on our tour, only physical qualities were pointed out.

Perhaps the clearest break with the Confucian past is in the treatment of death. We did not see any cemeteries in China; we saw no private memorials; and we witnessed no funerals or mournings. Traditionally, according to the teachings of Confucius and also of Lao tzu mourning was a sacred duty for the members of a family. But one discussion in the small house of a commune family clarified the present situation. Our hostess was a widow and as the conversation progressed, I felt comfortable enough to ask her about the death of her husband and where he was buried and whether or not there was a ceremony. She explained that he was not buried on the commune. His body had been taken to a central crematorium in Peking where his ashes are in a small box in an elaborate drawer system.

When I asked once more about a ceremony or a memorial at the commune with family and friends, she replied, "There was no time; we had to get back to work." After Liberation, she explained, all tombstones and private memorials were ground up and the materials used for building and road construction. In fact, the University of National Minorities which we visited in Peking was actually built on a large cemetery.

REMNANTS OF THE PAST

But no culture can be as new as the Chinese proclaim themselves to be, nor can the past of a nation be completely buried. Taoism and Confucianism, especially, continue—in transmuted and redirected form—to be part of their homeland. The effort in China to combine ancient Chinese medicine with Western forms of treatment and, especially, surgery is only possible because of previous Taoist writings about "the body's internal medicine of relaxation and fluidity" and because of Taoist teachings about herbs. The points on the body used for acupuncture are those points of pressure, massage, and "consciousness" used over the centuries by Taoists and displayed in their charts. When today's Chinese speak of the value of being physical and mixing labor with the intellectual process, they are repeating an ancient Taoist stress upon participating actively in work and production—becoming dirty with the soil, immersed in the water, and bodily involved in all pursuits.

Tai chi, an ancient form of exercise stressing slow movement, stretching, and fluidity, is practiced individually and in large groups in public parks, porches, and rooftops. People do this ancient Taoist exercise before bicycling to work or catching their bus, after lunch, and oftentimes before retiring at night. Several of us joined Tai chi "classes" on the river bank in Shanghai during our mornings in that city and I wondered how many of those participating in the exercise were aware of the rootage in the Tao Te Ching, particularly chapter 76, dealing with life and suppleness: "A person is born gentle and weak . . . green plants are tender and filled with sap . . . the stiff and unbending is the disciple of death. The gentle and yielding is the disciple of life."

And there are many traces, even influences, of Confucianism among present day Chinese. The Confucian li, meaning procedure, rite, or ceremony, is exhibited in so many ways through the formalities of contemporary Chinese social custom. The Confucian concern for family, and the social unit strength that derives from a respect and honoring of members, is very pronounced—we noticed this especially in the communes. There is the pride in a neighborhood committee, a factory production schedule, a commune record, all of which point to the local "village pride" or prior Confucian days. Moreover, Confucius always cited models for those who would attempt to live according to his teaching of virtue

No longer, of course, are the ancient emperor figures of Yao and Shun cited, but rather the models of Tai chai, an exemplary commune with staggering agricultural production and Tai Ching, a model industrial oil field area which overcame unbelievable obstacles to achieve a high proficiency. And, of course, various individuals in post-Liberation China are singled out as models and written about almost incessantly. A new model, much in the media, is Chen Jing-run, known as "a dedicated mathematician" and an exemplar for all intellectuals.

We noticed the prevalence of an ancient Confucian virture known as shu or reciprocity. Giving, sharing, sacrificing were not only talked about, but were

The Commune:
Collective Security

Three "Responsible Members of the Revolutionary Committee" burst into applause as we tumble off the bus and they usher us upstairs into the reception room for our "brief introduction" to the Tali Peoples' Commune which lies on the outskirts of the city of Kwangchow.

I duly record in my notebook massive amounts of statistics; the specificity of information gleaned from this visit will only be matched at one other time during the trip when I find myself writing down the exact dimensions of each and every pier supporting the Nanking Bridge. Still, we all find ourselves marvelling at the progress which has evidently been made here in terms of agricultural production and we can't help but be impressed by the determination and fierce pride of the people who are telling us about it.

We are told that under Kuomintang direction, droughts and famine were common but now because of improved water conservation techniques, the productive capacity of the area has increased three-fold. "Over two hundred commune members here are engaged in scientific farming and we are determined to expand our mechanization. We still must bend our back in our work and we are determined to change that phase as soon as possible," Mr. Li explains.

"The standard of living in the commune is also rising. Most of the families have private savings. They have purchased wristwatches, bicycles and radio sets . . . and since 1968, the cooperative medical system has been realized . . . . . and there are television sets in the culture rooms of the production brigade."

What struck me most about the communes which we visited was the practicality of their organization given the current status of the continuing socialist revolution. The Chinese have determined that collectivization is to be a slow and gradual process. At the present stage, commune members have small plots for private use and can go in for some domestic side-line occupations. Their incomes, bank savings, houses and other means of livelihood are privately owned and protected by the state. The production team is the basic accounting unit in the commune. In other words, it organizes production and distribution of income, handles its own accounting and is responsible for its own profits or losses. As conditions gradually develop and presumably as the requisite political consciousness is attained, the current basic ownership at the production team level will switch to that at the production brigade level and then to the commune level, eventually passing over to socialist state ownership.

"We still have a lot of work to do," Mr. Li explains. "Collectivization must proceed and we want to develop a more diversified economy.

—Nancy Richman

According to the Tali Peoples' Commune, "the lifeblood of our agriculture is the efficient conservation of water." A complex irrigation system criss-crosses the arable land in China. At Tali, there is a huge aqueduct which enables water to be distributed where it is most needed. It is boasted that "droughts no longer affect us as severely as they did when the Kuomintang were in control." School children worked on the weekends to help terrace the land on this and on other communes.

In the garden just outside of the commune's pharmacy Mr. Li points out the various plants and herbs from which the home-made medicines are extracted. Modern Chinese medicine, he explains, is a mixture of Western and traditional techniques.

Vasectomies and hysterectomies were performed in this "operating room". The Chinese spoke proudly of improved birth control on a national scale.

A tractor and a horse-drawn cart pass each other on the roads of the Northeast Prosperity Commune. On the outskirts of Peking during the winter, farming is sharply curtailed. People work in commune owned industry at this time.

The Chinese are determined to put an end to "stoop labor" as they call it. However, members of the Northeast Prosperity Commune, like this woman, will have to continue to tend to the ducks which form an integral part of the commune's economy.

The Factories: "Our Workers are Tough"

A laborer works on an Oriental rug in a small factory.

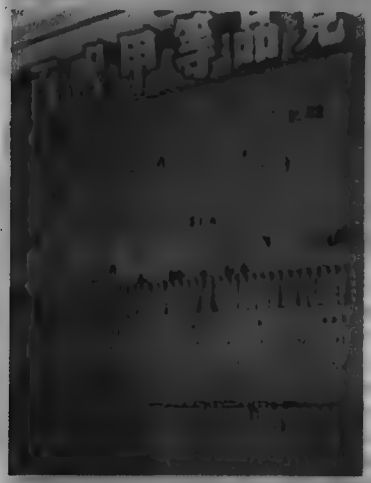
Chinese Youths "learn to love labor" at school. At factories their parents practice it.

Adults in China work a 48 hour week and are also expected to devote 4 to 5 hours for extra political study and work meetings. Within the factories most salaries lie on an eight step scale ranging from $34 to $85 a month. Salaries, like other facets of a worker's life, are determined in conjunction with fellow workers in the production brigade or team.

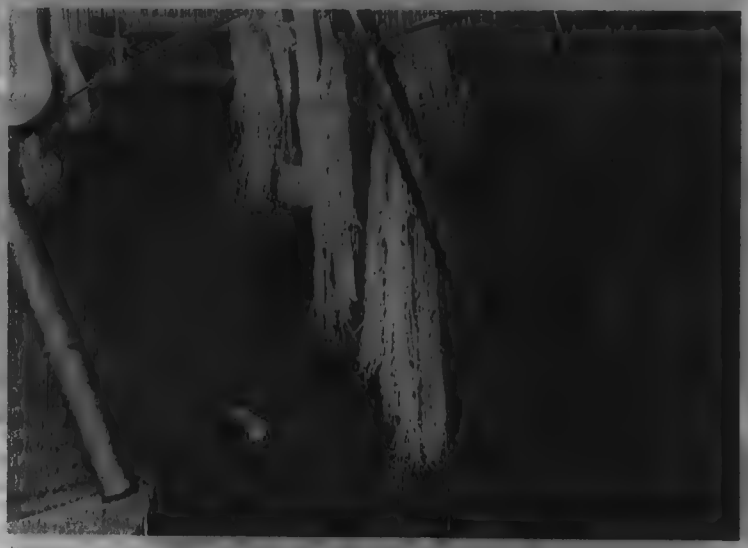
Co-workers in the same area or unit of production meet about twice a week to discuss working condition, quotas, goals, and many aspects of what we would consider the worker's private lives. Home life and attitudes towards workers or working seem to affect output, and so are a part of one's coworkers concerns. Together production team members work to find a solution or ease a troubled path.

In solving problems or working to meet new challenges, constant reference is made to the oppressive days of the past and the improvements which have taken place throughout the country "under the wise leadership of Chairman Hua." Yet the present leadership has called for faster change and more immediate progress. Workers must produce more, but working conditions within the factories have changed little in twenty years. The new goal is "to catch up with the most advanced units at home and abroad."

Steps have been taken to eliminate "bending of the back" and stoop labor; safety conditions have improved. However, most factories have working conditions intolerable to "soft" American standards. "Our workers are tough," said our chief guide.

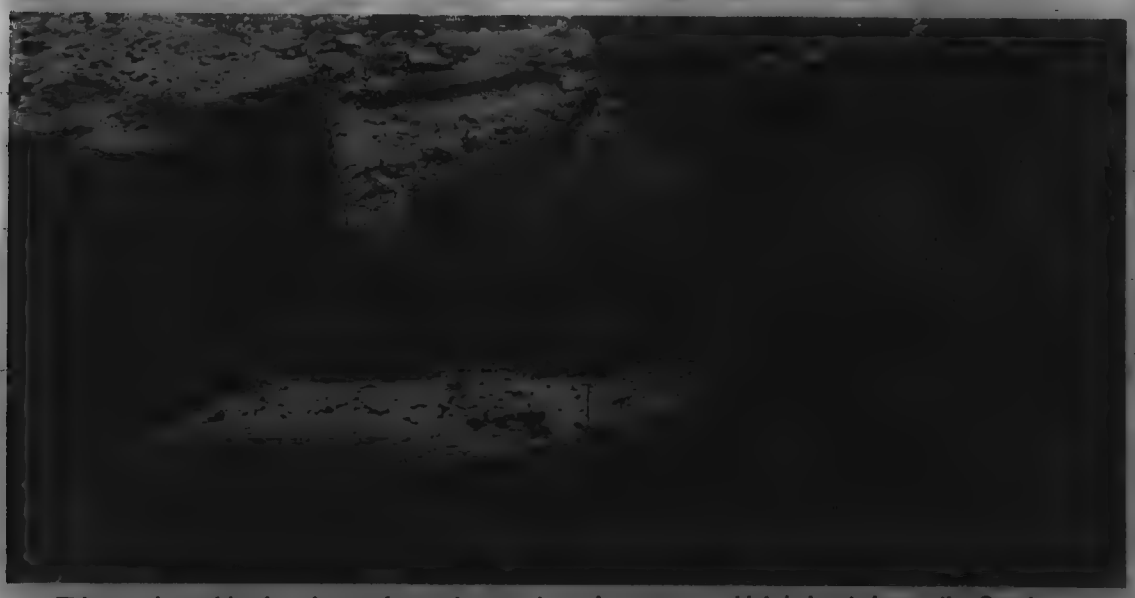


Progress and the importance of the "permanent revolution" help to keep the workers motivated. "The continuing battle to build a Socialist world" is fought in the factories and on the communes. To help keep them striving, model laborers are held up as examples to the workers. A small red flag flies beside their place. Fellow workers "emulate the models and so made another great contribution to output and progress," according to our guides. This competition (although "there is no competition in China," said our guide, "just sharing of talents"), has no effect on a worker's salary. It serves to motivate him through his sense of pride and self respect instead.



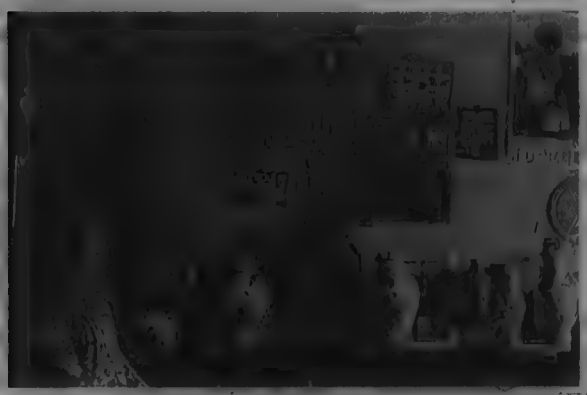
While Chinese laborers may not have a choice about where or what kind of work they do, they do receive many benefits which exceed those of their American counterparts. Health care is covered for 80 per cent of the costs, with the workers paying less than $8 a year. The factory also provides security and a sense of community. Social activities in many places we visited centered about the production team. "And of course our production brigade has a T.V." said one worker. Time off with pay, should relatives visit from out of town, is also available. Vacations are rare, but each worker gets the opportunity to spend one month in the countryside—although the month is spent working the fields.

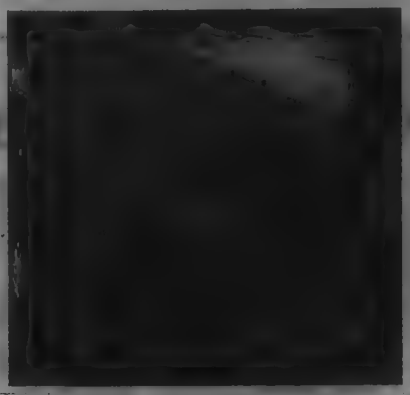
Security and pride in one's work mix well with the Chinese compulsion for progress, in which each worker feels he plays a vital role. "Working to build a better China, to perfect the world for Socialism," the Chinese factory worker lives his life fulfilled.



—Michael Lissack

The quality and efficiency of each production teams' work as well as their attitudes towards their work are evaluated weekly on this factory chart.





The workers in this factory do not seem to mind what would be poor working conditions by American standards. The atmosphere was relaxed. Workers were able to take occasional breaks for tea or for cigarettes when they wished. Nevertheless, they worked diligently.

This man is working in sub-zero degree temperatures in a quarry which is located near the Great Wall of China.

At communes and residential areas we frequently broke into smaller groups to talk to families and to get a closer feel for everyday life. This woman went on to tell us that before Liberation, she had worked as a chambermaid for a capitalist while her husband pulled a rickshaw; she then described how much happier and secure her life is now.

These two older men in a park were photographed at a distance on the first day of our trip. People ran away from us when we tried to take their pictures and the guides got upset with our rude behavior.

Shopping, by necessity, is a daily activity in China due to the lack of refrigeration. Each morning, the small shops specializing in teas, fruits, meats and vegetables are bustling with people wielding baskets and sacks which they will fill with the day's fare.

"I think I should talk about the people . . .

The woman doing the morning chores outside of her home on a commune in Peking has chosen to be a housewife. We were told that most of the younger women decide to work in the fields so that they can provide a second source of income for their families. The work for them is less strenuous than the work for the men and women are permitted to retire five years earlier. An older woman told us that she spent her time sewing clothes for her grandchildren.

An elderly shopkeeper is enjoying a rare moment of serenity. He is usually seen working at a hurried pace and serving the customers who flock here to buy his highly valued tangerines. The fruit was probably grown on one of the nearby communes which provide the city of Shanghai with all of the produce that the people need. Although we were served a disproportionate amount of protein at all of our meals, we discovered that the majority of people in China rarely eat meat. We noticed that our guide Fu returned one day from a visit with his brother's family with a fifty pound sackful of grain.

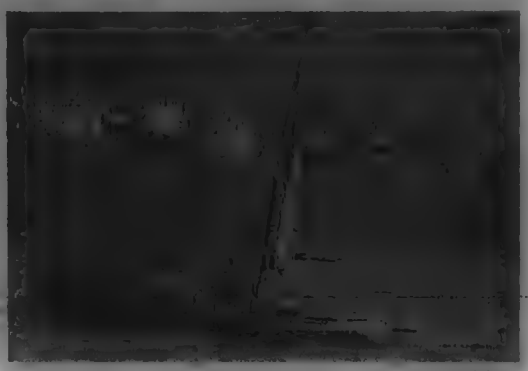
↑ The proximity of this scene should not betray the inaccessibility of this sort of street life to us. Our location on the seventh and highest floor of our hotel was just one symbol of the differential treatment we were given which continually kept us at an observer's distance. We were told, for example that we could not eat at a restaurant while Chinese were there and we decided to forego our efforts to escape the hotel cuisine. From perches such as this, we were able however to get some candid perspectives on the unstructured time of the people.

In the lake resort town of Wusih, we spotted this man fishing in much the same way as his ancestors probably had centuries ago. Wusih was the only rural area that we visited; the hotel there was situated on what had once been an ancient Confucian retreat and the government was in the process of restoring it. On the large lake which was the principal feature of the town, we saw traditional Chinese junks emerging out of the thick fog. →

. . . people make civilizations interesting."



As Bob Hatch wrote, "I can't tell you what I thought of China for my overall impressions stem from such diverse experiences. I think that I should talk about the people because it is the people who make different civilizations interesting. While we went to China hoping to experience some of the life of her people, once in China, we were just observers whose very presence disrupted normal life.

The language barrier was the greatest drawback during the trip. It narrowed the field of people that we were able to talk to to a mere dozen or so interpreters, assigned to us at various times during our stay. So I must say that the visual experience of just being there and watching everyone is what I remember most vividly.

The masses of people, everywhere, all the time, is inconceivable to those who have not been there and is what sticks in my mind most whenever I think of China. One day all of the streets are packed with bicyclists, going both ways, impeding traffic and oblivious to everything except for the few feet in front of their bicycle.

A dedicated teacher spent a lot of time on this honeybee costume for this little girl. We were often delighted by the plays and scenarios performed for our benefit by the school children in the kindergartens. "One day we performed a dramatic rendition of "Old MacDonald" to a roomful of stupified children. At the end, they remembered to clap.

In the harbor at Shanghai, activity is dominated by both modern steamers and Chinese junks.

Dressed according to the dictates of Peking fashion, this gentleman models a navy and green outfit.

Left: From early morning until late in the evening, the streets and stores of Shanghai overflowed with people. Bicycle riders collided as they tried to avoid vegetable carts and other obstacles in their path.

Below Left: Our guides pose for a picture. Fu is on the far right and Wang is next to him. Fu was a man of some importance in the travel service and Wang, who also worked for the travel service was a Party member. Fu reported that he too had applied for membership.

Below Right: The Chinese were very curious about foreigners in general and us in particular. When we walked down the street we drew an enormous amount of attention and stopping to tie a shoe or to load a camera usually could be counted on to attract a small crowd. Responses to our smiles and Chinese hellos varied from stone cold evasions to appreciative laughter and a hello in exchange. We were a major attraction as we tried on clothes in the Peoples' Department stores.

Mao stands for posterity under the Nanking Bridge which is considered by the Chinese to be one of their finest technological accomplishments. The bridge spans the Yangtze river and its completion symbolized the linkage of the northern and southern parts of the nation.

Education:
Teaching dedication and usefulness

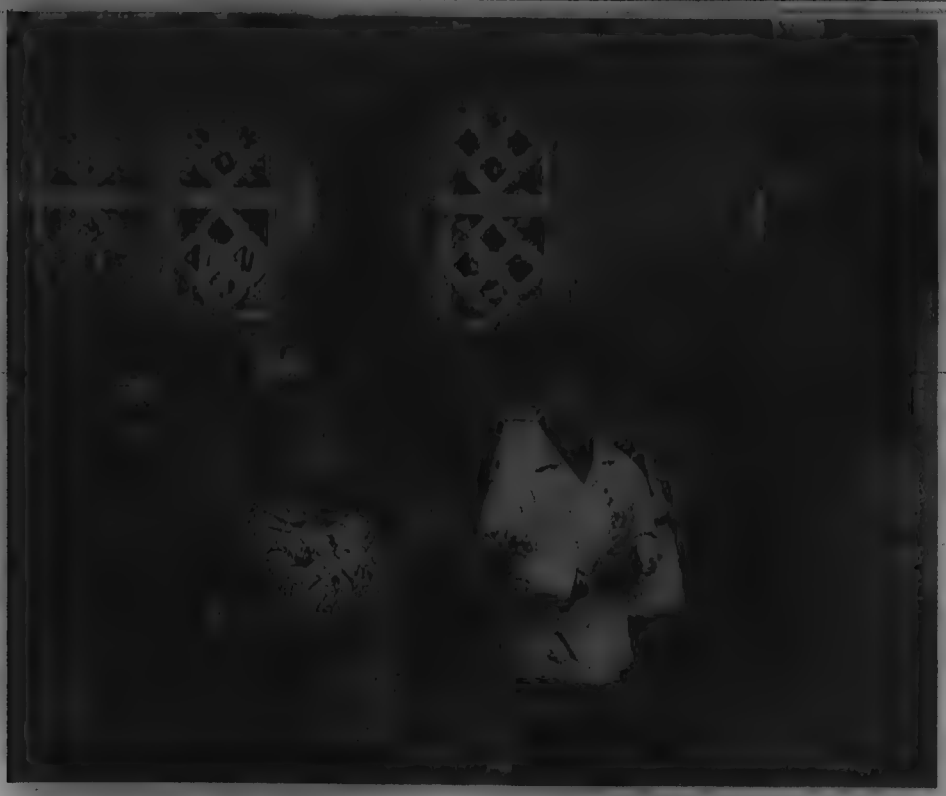
The universalization of education has been an important goal of the Chinese Communist government. Prior to Liberation, the majority of people were preoccupied with making a living, and only the sons and daughters of the ruling elite and the bourgeoisie could afford either the time or the money to obtain a formal education. The majority of people were illiterate. Since 1949, the government has launched a campaign to extend education to all citizens of the country. Their original goal was to provide primary education for all children, and to combat illiteracy among the workers and peasants. They seem to have succeeded, although the quality of education apparently varies throughout the country, and they are now moving towards providing universal middle and high school education also. Entrance to the universities is still selective. The Cultural Revolution beginning in 1966 was a set-back to higher education as the schools were closed down for a number of years. They are still on the road to recovery.

Much of the progress in education is due to the Chinese conception of education as extending to all areas of society. Education is not limited to school studies. Education occurs in the factories, on the communes, in the neighborhood committees, and around the family table. It is not necessary, the Chinese reason, to build a fancy school or buy thousands of books or provide expensive equipment. There was a noticeable lack of these things in the schools that we visited but the students were no less willing or capable to learn. Classrooms were furnished with necessities, the only decorations being portraits of Mao Tse-tung and Hua Kuo-feng and in the upper levels there might also be portraits of Marx, Engels, Lenin, and Stalin. In the colder areas there would be some sort of heating a stove perhaps in the center of the classroom—but the windows were always left open and the students were always bundled in layers of clothing. Of course the American visitors were always cold.

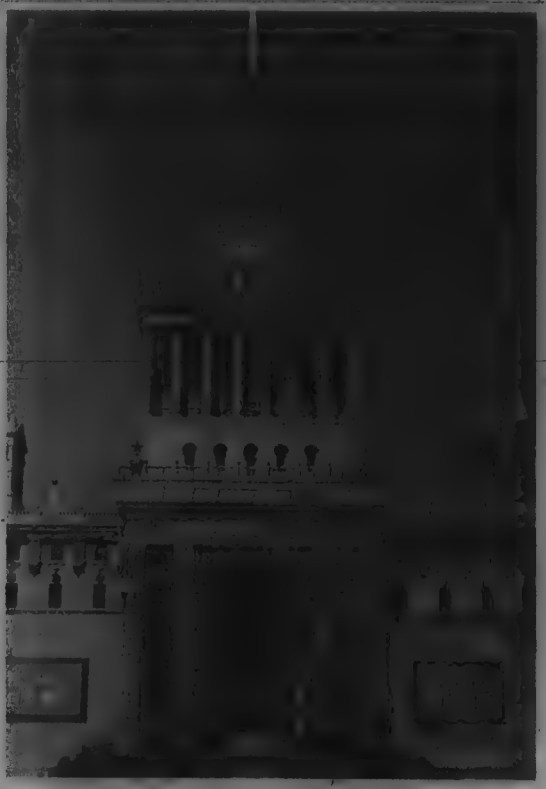
Studies are similar to what one might find in the United States—language, mathematics, science, art, music, physical education and foreign languages. But what is evident in all of the school-related activities, is political and ideological training. Schools teach the importance of dedication to the revolution, the necessity of a concern for others and of working together, and emphasize that obstacles have and can be overcome with the proper socialist consciousness. There are models to be emulated, whether they be national heroes or a member of the class that has done an exemplary deed. Ideology must be a part of everyday life, not an abstraction to be forgotten upon leaving the classroom, the Chinese reason.

The same applies to book-learning as a whole. Theory divorced from practice is meaningless. In the old society there was an intellectual elite which held a privileged position. The Communists have attempted to break down the division bewteen physical and mental work and to remove the intellectuals from their special position. Students are expected to spend a part of their time in useful labor. This, it is supposed, will keep them in contact with the masses and improve their consciousness. It will provide them with practical experience and an opportunity to apply the principles which they have studied. It also provides an extra source of man-power in the society. The students may work in school shops or near-by factories and communes. We even observed some kindergarteners working in a small garden at their school, weeding and eatering their plants.

Some people call it "brainwashing" or "indoctrination", or "thought control". I sometimes wonder if we aren't subject to the same kinds of influence in our own system. The main difference seems to be that the Chinese have set their objective. They know what kind of society they hope to create. And their educational system is designed to reach that end. They seem to be successful.



—Piper Orton



Included in a book entitled "Little Red Guards," this story illustrates the themes we heard again and again in the kindergartens and primary schools. Approximately one third of the children in each elementary school class are designated by their teachers as "little red guards" and are supposed to serve as models of emulation for the rest of the class. The select few who retain the honor throughout their school career will most likely become Party members in the future. The children, we are told, are motivated by such a system and the teachers assert that discipline is not a major problem in China because of this. A school leader further observed that order is maintained because "the teachers tell stories about the good leaders and also know that they too must set a shining example for the children."

At the Yehteng Road Kindergarten, we are greeted by a group of students who lead us into the school. Thirty two adults staff the daycare center of 260 children whose ages range from three to seven years old. Parents are able to drop their children off here before they go to work and pick them up after they return. The tuition is approximately six dollars per year. Language skills are stressed and the children are taught to speak both Cantonese and Mandarin. Activities include singing, dancing, jumping rope and swimming. We sit in on a class of six year-olds where the children are sitting perfectly still and looking straight ahead at a classmate who is reciting the story of the Tortoise and the Hare.

At Fu-tan University, we were told that the aim of education is "to promote intellectual, physical and moral development." Established in 1905, the University has fourteen departments and there are approximately 3,000 members of the student body. We visit an English class and listen as they recite that "the proclamation of Nixon's China visit surprised the whole world."

One kindergarten featured a small vegetable garden where the children could work. Throughout the Chinese school system, the importance of work is stressed. One middle school had a small factory on campus and at Futan University, we were told that students spend two weeks out of every year working on a commune in the countryside.

A geometry class meets for a forty-five minute period at "The East is Red" middle school in Nanking. Over 2,000 students attend here for a five year course of study.

Entertaining the Americans

The acrobatic shows were extremely popular with Chinese audiences. This balancing routine was featured along with animal acts.

In one People's Revolutionary Opera, the story proceeded as follows:

A Cassack woman is elected as the leader of her production unit but her husband becomes jealous of her and consorts with some unsavory types to blemish her exemplary record. They sell off the bales of hay that belong to the team and when the culprits are discovered, the wife is angered but as any ideal citizen, she is more concerned with running the perfect production brigade than with her foolish husband. In the end, the husband refuses to participate in the second conspiratorial plan to let the baby lambs freeze to death and he realizes what a mistake he has made and returns to aid and reinforce all the good that his wife has done. The lesson is obviously that a woman is as qualified as a man and that cooperation and hard work are necessary to ensure the success of the continuing revolution.

Current political themes dominated all of the operas, movies and song and dance revues that we saw at night and the shows usually emphasized third-world and national minority themes. We heard "A tribute to Chou En Lai" sung to an accordion accompaniment and we heard "Old Man River" performed in Chinese by men in grey Mao suits.

As we grew to be able to anticipate each night's program as the Chinese, we perceived were able to do, we began to watch to see what kinds of things were particularly popular with the audience. There were oohs and ahs when the curtains opened to present gaily clad women in colorful Mongolian costumes. Especially well received also was an "erotic" African dance featuring slight gyrations of the pelvis. And Mr. Fu, our distinguished guide of thirty-five loved the slapstick routines of the clowns at the acrobatic shows.

The first night however, as we clapped loudly after the opening number from our front-row seats, we noticed self-consciously that no one else was joining us. The Chinese only clap when they particularly like something. They reason that because the actor forms as integral a part of the society as the field worker who is sitting in the tenth row, it would be inappropriate to acknowledge him and not the worker. "Everyone in China," Miss Yu told me, "knows that they are appreciated."

Minority themes dominated the song and dance revues. This is a Tibetan folk dance performed with traditional music and costumes.

Popular demand inspired a trip to see the pandas at the Peking Zoo.

China's Old and New

actually in evidence. There are no privately owned automobiles in China, but there is no law against such ownership. But, as many Chinese explained to us, it would not be fair for individuals to own automobiles for such ownership would place the owners above those who could not afford such a luxury. Furthermore, the production of automobiles would divert the production needs of present China and destroy the common front which is needed to move ahead in the realm of the true needs of the people.

Present day China is not without deep symbols which are also religious in character. During our last few days we became conscious of these symbols in Peking at Tien an Mien Square, and, especially at Chairman Mao's tomb. We entered the massive, dignified building in a ritual. We tool our hats off, left cameras and tape recorders elsewhere, entered silently four abreast and walked by Mao's statue and then the glass encased body itself. We sensed that most Chinese—and even some of us—were coming close to the power of China by this ritual. We were as Mercea Eliade reminds us, "returning to the founding." A pervasive myth about the vision of the new China was made more vivid. We sensed the psychic and religious combination of taboo and mana—we could only linger for a moment by the encased body of Mao and then had to move on and we were both attracted and repelled by the distorted body. The visit to the tomb had, clearly, an iltimacy for many Chinese, and a sense of depth for many of us.

Trustees formulate future plans

The 22-member Board of Trustees assembled on campus last night beginning numerous conferences which will continue through tomorrow afternoon concerning many aspects of College life. Of particular interest was last night's meeting between the Trustee Campus Life Committee and campus groups concerned about apartheid and divestiture.

According to Dean Peter Berek, who organized the Campus Life Committee conference, there will be representatives present from the Anti-Apartheid Coalition, the Faculty Group for Divestiture, a group opposing divestiture, and the Executive Committee of the College Council. In addition to discussion of divestiture, the Council representatives will brief the Trustees on the Latin Honors situation and the arts at Williams. Berek suggested that this meeting is an example of "student input into College decision-making."

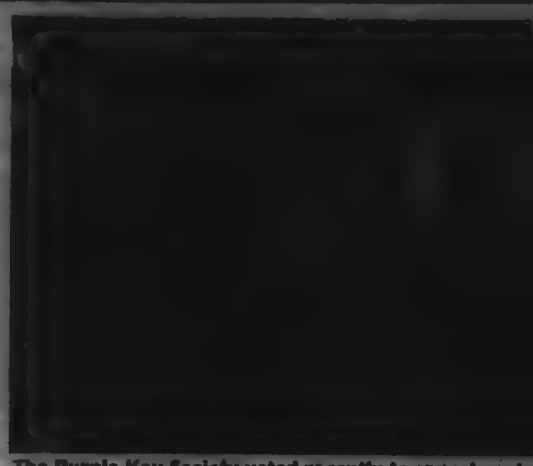
The Campus Life Committee's Thursday night meeting, held four times each year when the Trustees gather on campus, is routinely organized by Berek. He asked the Council and the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities to select the groups that were present. Overall, at least 20 students attended it. "It is premature," Berek stated, "to expect the Trustees to have any reaction (to the divestiture issue on campus). This is a chance for them to be better informed."

The remainder of the Trustees' agenda for the weekend differs considerably from its format in other years. "This meeting is unusual," said Trustee Secretary and College Treasurer Francis H. Dewey III, "because it deals with long-range concerns rather than with the day-to-day operation of the campus." For this reason five "plenary planning sessions" were held today. The topics of discussion at these sessions included: "Some Speculative Looks into the Future, Alumni and Public Relations, and Student Life."

The Buildings and Grounds and Budget and Financial Planning Committees voted on a recommendation Friday morning concerning the purchase of a new computer.

Saturday morning the full Board will convene at Mount Hope Farm to review the results of committee meetings held the previous day.

Council re-elects Lissack as Secretary



After a debate that weighed the representative and technical aspects of the position, the College Council Wednesday night, reelected Michael Lissack '80 as its Secretary. The Council rejected an Elections Committee recommendation that Chris Diangelo '79 be named to the post to succeed Lissack. The duties of the Secretary include handling Council correspondence, taking minutes at meetings, managing the CC office, in addition to being a voting member of the Council and serving on its Executive committee.

Vice President Chris Jenkins '80 reported that the faculty has agreed to make the new Latin Honors standards effective beginning with the Class of '80 rather than '79 as originally specified. He added that the move was an act of "good faith" toward the Council. The faculty voted previously not to reconsider the Latin Honors issue after making its initial decision.

The CC endorsed the Food Services Committee's revised board plan, described to the Council last week. The plan would allow students to omit breakfast from their eating arrangements with a saving of one hundred dollars in board fees. Dean Eileen Julien cautioned, however, that despite the Council's approval of the proposal, it would probably not be implemented.

Joel Smith '79 clarified the CUL's position on coed accommodations in Row Houses. The CUL, following a similar ruling by Dean Cris T. Roosenraad, has stipulated that Fort Hoosac, Gar-Wood, and Perry-Bascom must maintain single-sex buildings until a majority of both men and women are in favor of coed living arrangements.

Faculty revises Latin Honors standards

The faculty voted to roll back the change in Latin Honors requirements to affect the class of 1980 instead of the class of 1979 at its meeting Wednesday. Committee on Educational Policy(CEP) Chairman Gordon Winston made the motion to rescind the action taken at the February meeting; it passed by a hand vote 72-14. A motion to make the requirement of a 9.0 grade average necessary for graduation cum laude for the class of 1980 passed on a voice vote.

Winston outlined the history of the change. The CEP originally proposed that the faculty raise standards for cum laude from 8.0 to 9.0 effective with the current sophomores. It was, he said, a compromise between changing immediately, and waiting until 1982, when all students presently enrolled had left. When this motion reached the faculty in February the body amended it to take effect as soon as possible.

The College Council, Winston continued, debated the matter, and reached the conclusion that the original CEP motion was the best compromise of immediacy and fairness.

Dean Peter Berek praised the College Council and the student members of the CEP. Through their "reasoned, careful, thoughtful ... arguments" they persuaded the Council to move from asking that the change take place in 1982 to 1980. The students, Berek said, feel that they have gone at least half way to meet the faculty, and "if we want the students to act that way, we should act that way."

Professor MacAlister Brown asked "how long do we want to go along with a ridiculous standard?" He observed that the number of students graduating with honors had reached outlandish proportion through no fault of the faculty's, but that if it voted to lower the standards for the class of 1979 it would be "ridiculous not by inadvertance, but through design." He jokingly asked if the faculty would like to confer degrees "sum sympathia" for those who did not receive cum laude.

Cath Carpenter '78 who at the February faculty meeting advocated making the change for the class of 1978 withdrew the suggestion.

Sums up College's action

Dewey releases statement on

A statement from Francis H. Dewey 3rd, Secretary of the Williams Trustees and Secretary of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities, summing up recent actions taken in connection with stock owned by the College:

Created by vote of the Williams Trustees in January and appointed by the President, the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities is authorized to propose shareholder resolutions or letters to corporate management or a general statement of investment principles or even a divestment of specific stocks. In the course of its first half-dozen meetings, however, whether to vote stock proxies for or against management positions became the most pressing issue before it.

To date the committee has considered 36 possible proxy votes. In three cases it recommended that the College-owned shares be voted in favor of shareholder proposals and against management positions. The three cases in brief:

General Electric Share Owner Proposal No. 6 asked G.E. to "evaluate the human rights situation in any country with which a contract is contemplated" and to "decline any sale to a country which does not meet ... minimal standards." The G.E. Directors opposed this idea as "inappropriate," but our Advisory Committee recommended a vote in favor of it.

First Chicago Corp. Proposal No. 3 (from two stockholders) asked for detailed information on the bank's loans in South Africa and "the contribution of each loan ... to the well-being of the black majority." Management said this would breach the confidentiality owed its customers—and besides, no loans had been made to South Africa's public sector since December 1976. But our Advisory Committee recommended that the Williams shares be voted in support of this proposal.

Union Carbide Stockholder Proposal No. 5 called on the corporation to "make no further investment nor expand its operations" in South Africa until that country's government commits itself to ending apartheid. Management objected on grounds that "corporate policy must follow U.S. Government policy, and not

Taylor receives grant from the Guggenheim Foundation

Mark C. Taylor, assistant professor of Religion, has been awarded a grant by the John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation which he will use to support a year of study at universities in Denmark and Germany.

Taylor is one of 292 scholars receiving this year's Guggenheim Fellowships, chosen from a field of more than 3,000 applicants.

Mark Taylor, Assistant Professor of Religion has received a grant for study abroad.

The topic of Taylor's work under the grant will be "A Comparative Analysis of the Philosophical and Theological Positions of Hegel and Kierkegaard." Taylor says he will do the bulk of his study at the Kierkegaard Institute of the University of Copenhagen in Denmark, the Hegel Archive at Ruhr University in Germany, and at the University of Heidelberg.

Taylor's studies will build on work done for his book "Kierkegaard's Pseudonymous Authorship: A Study of Time and the Self," published in 1975, which Taylor describes as an exploration of the Danish Theologian's "interpretation of the stages of development of individual

At Williams since 1973, Taylor earned a B.A. from Wesleyan University in 1968 and a Ph.D. from Harvard University in 1973.

Who's to blame?

by Peter Green

The members of Perry-Bascom and Gar-Wood houses who had their desires to coeducate denied must be careful not to place the blame on the minority who voted against the proposal. The blame must be placed upon a set of Rules conceived in the Deans' office and rubber-stamped by the C.U.L. (Committee on Undergraduate Life).

The presidents of the affected houses were not consulted in the establishment of these Rules, nor even informed that such Rules were being considered. The reader might see this as indicative of a lack of respect. Many of the house presidents saw it the same way.

The Housing Committee, consisting of the 15 house presidents and several other members, expressed serious reservations with the Deans' office dictum. The Presidents of Perry-Bascom and Gar-Wood vigorously fought its implementation. Alas, it was to no avail, and the proposals to coeducate the houses failed under the new Rules, though better than two-thirds of each house supported coeducation.

Both presidents went to the C.U.L. last Monday to protest the Rules that were forced upon their houses. Both presidents left, as the meeting went into "executive session", shaking their heads and chuckling at the prospect that the C.U.L. might go against the Deans' office. The C.U.L. upheld the Deans' office Rules.

Did I hear you asking why the C.U.L was deciding this housing issue and not the Housing Committee? You say that the house presidents probably know a lot more about housing issues than the C.U.L. or Deans' office? You contend that you'd rather have a group of house presidents, with a known constituency and the respect of it, make such a decision? I'm sorry, you'll have to speak louder, no one is listening.

There were two guidelines that the Deans' office used in drafting The Rules. First they wanted to protect the rights of the minority, and second, as long as it was consistent with the first, they wanted the will of the majority to be realized. No one disagreed with these goals. Unfortunately, these goals were lost sight of as the C.U.L. and the Deans' office zealously fought to keep The Rules untarnished. When the C.U.L. discussed the issue on Monday, no one asked whether the rights of the minority were violated. Instead they argued for an hour and a half as to whether or not the rules had been followed. When the C.U.L. decided to keep the two houses single-sex they did so because The Rules, which they reaffirmed, dictated that.

The threat of tyranny of the majority is very real at this school, and the Deans' office is right in working to prevent it. But in these two cases, no one on the minority side indicated that they would have felt tyrannized had the proposals passed. Even if they had, the Deans' office said it could easily meet the needs of such individuals by placing them in a preferable rooming situation. So whatever happened to the goal of realizing the desires of the majority if the rights of the minority are protected?

For the sake of the sanctity of a set of Rules, two-thirds of each house will be living in a rooming situation they did not want. Though it might be contended that the outcome of the issue will cause serious internal divisions within the houses, this need not be the case. Both sides of the proposal in both Perry-Bascom and Gar-Wood houses can now unite. They can unite against the fact that a decision-making process was handed down to them against their will from somewhere above.

Granted, all decision making power cannot lie within the houses. However, one would hope that such decrees would be made in consultation with the affected students, rather than by a committee containing no row house members, or by a deans' office containing minimal students.

The habit of invoking doctrines upon students by certain entities without consent or consultation of the students affected cannot continue.

Peter Green is president of Perry-Bascom house.

Rethinking Divestiture

by Charles Karelis

I'm writing as someone who has strongly opposed apartheid ever since I learned about it more than fifteen years ago. I've proselytized about it, and over the years I have argued about it with dozens of white South Africans. I've written my senator.

To recite even such a modest record doubtless seems smug. I do it because I want to dispute an assumption which is being urged on us all: that to question divestiture is to be unconcerned about apartheid and indifferent to human rights.

Divestiture may be the moral duty of the trustees of Williams College. But the published arguments of the "Williams College Faculty and Staff for Divestiture," together with my own reading on South Africa, leave me very far from persuaded that this is so.

The trouble is that, evaluating the situation from Williamstown, one can't know, or even have good grounds for thinking, that economic disruption in South Africa would make things better rather than worse for the black majority. Many acknowledged experts say economic disruption would help. (One is quoted in the WCFSD position paper.) Other acknowledged experts say economic disruption would be harmful. For instance, the black South African newspaper editor Percy Quoboza, a hero of the anti-apartheid movement who recently spent five months in jail for his political views, writes in Time (April 17, 1978) as follows:

> Driven into a corner, the Afrikaner will take up arms and will leave a trail of destruction all along the way. What is more, he will leave this country in chaos and ruin. A bloody racial confrontation is what we are all battling to avoid, and I believe deep in my heart that we can succeed. To impose economic sanctions on South Africa would be to acknowledge total abandonment of a peaceful and negotiated settlement. What is more, the creation of economic chaos here would expedite the very thing we are all trying desperately to avoid: a bloody racial confrontation. (My emphasis.)

Given that we in Williamstown don't have good grounds for thinking that divestiture would improve rather than worsen the South African situation, we have to look squarely at the effects divestiture would have in Williamstown itself.

Surely it's illogical to admit ignorance about divestiture's likely effects in South Africa and then say that it would be an idealistic gesture which would have an educational benefit as such. You can't teach goodness by example unless there's reason to think that your exemplary gestures are actually going to help people instead of hurt them.

Leaving aside the "idealistic gesture" norm, what other effects would divestiture have in Williamstown? There is evidence that the educational goals of the College would be endangered by divestiture's price-tag. I am certainly no expert on these things but might not choices have to be made between cutting scholarships, raising tuition (thus putting Williams beyond the reach of some middle-income families), and cutting faculty raises (thus making it harder for the College to hire and keep good teachers)? Maybe not. Maybe there's so much fat in the present budget that none of these undesirable things would be necessary. But if there is fat in the budget now, proponents of divestiture still have to show that it would be better used in financing divestiture than in, say, increasing present scholarship aid.

Mr. Karelis is an Assistant Professor of Philosophy at Williams.

The Best Defense. . .

by Jeffrey Trout

America is nothing, as a nation, if it does not stand for the principles of human dignity and liberty. Diversity, tolerance, freedom of choice and expression—these are the essence of the American polity, the principles embraced by Thomas Jefferson's Declaration of Independence, Abraham Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, and Franklin Roosevelt's Four Freedoms. To attack or undermine the application of these ideas is the most fearful and dangerous threat to our being as a nation. Liberty is the course of each American's individual security, and the defense of liberty is—or should be—the chief criteria of our national security.

The question which we must ask ourselves is whether our current pursuit of a narrow, militarily-oriented concept of national security does not run counter to our deeper, more fundamental interests. In short, are missiles, covert operations, and the National Security Council compatible with liberty? Clearly, they are not. We waste precious resources on defense, thus limiting our options and our ability to establish, for our own people and for peoples throughout the world, those minimum standards of basic welfare necessary to dignity and freedom.

The secrecy and chicanery involved in the operation of our present defense and intelligence establishment undermine not only democratic choice, but personal liberty, both here and abroad. But most of all, the spirit of conformity and self-righteousness which pervades a government claiming the absolute standard of national security does more than serve to shield Watergate-like offenses; it infects our whole society with a sickness of which McCarthyism was only the most virulent form. Thirty-two years ago, George Kennan, the noted American stateman, warned that the greatest danger America faced in the Cold War was of becoming like the repressive, totalitarian states to which we were opposed. In many ways this prophesy has been too well fulfilled.

The tragedy of contemporary American politics is the confusion which exists about principles and labels a confusion which has caused "patriotism" to become a dirty word in both the Republican and Democratic parties. Most people (even you, perhaps?) would find it almost impossible to believe that a conservative Republican like myself could advocate nuclear disarmament, human rights, a negative income tax, and non-military foreign aid. But these are conservative positions—they come directly from the essence of the American Dream, peace and human dignity. It is this dream, not any particular political or economic system, which conservatives seek to preserve; it is for this vision, a vision born of a radical revolution two hundred years ago and still unfulfilled today, that patriots have struggled. Indeed, the true measure of patriotism in America is the willingness to fight for reform consistent with the values of liberty, to oppose the hypocritical deeds of a federal government choking on its own bureaucracy and ideological intolerance. When viewed in this light, our society seems to have a wealth of patriots. The tragedy, however, is that most of them don't realize that they love their country.

Letter: Clothes Day

To the editor,

In keeping with its overall policy of rational and intelligent discussion of the serious afflictions plaguing Williams College, the Friday Morning Junta calls on all those who think the Thursday Night Coalition is a waste of time to wear clothes this Tuesday. It is important that all true humanists join in this statement to the campus community and to the world. By wearing clothes on Tuesday, you, the student or faculty member, will be making a clear and unequivocal stand on this important issue.

We cannot overemphasize how important it is that we all join in in this effort. To paraphrase a recent letter to the Record, we must see to it that it is the people who do not wear clothes on Tuesday who stand out. Let us hope that our courageous Dean will lead this effort by wearing clothes. If he does, we believe that the Friday Morning Junta will have been vindicated.

So, remember Clothes Day, Tuesday, April [illegible].

Sincerely,

NEWSBRIEFS

Poetry Winners

Laurie Ciemza '79 and Charles Merzbacher '80 have been named co-winners of the annual Academy of American Poets Contest at Williams. The winners and four students cited for Honorable Mention—Alison Morgan '79, Mark Duran '79, Dwayne Freeman '79 and Marilyn Bennett '79—will read from their work Thursday, April 27 at 4:00 p.m. in Driscoll Lounge. The reading is sponsored by the English Department.

The contest was judged by a Williams graduate, Adam LeFevre '72 author of a book of poems entitled Everything All At Once, just published by Wesleyan University Press.

134 poems were submitted by 49 students in this year's competition at Williams.

Faculty for Divestiture

According to Richard Nuccio, Asst. Professor of Political Science, 43 faculty and staff members have endorsed the Faculty and Staff for Divestiture proposal as of April 18, surpassing the committee's goal of 40 signatures.

An additional ten members indicated a desire for more information, while one individual came out explicitly against the proposal. Nuccio explained that the body of supporters includes "senior faculty members and people who may be in the Administration next year."

The proposal was printed in the April 14 issue of the Record. The committee believes that the college "will seriously compromise its educational mission as a liberal arts institution if it continues to act in tacit support of the South African regime."

CUL affirms decision

On Monday, the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) affirmed the procedure outlined by the Dean's Office specifying that a majority of both sexes is needed to change the make-up of row houses. Pursuant to this decision, the CUL did not overturn either GarWood or Perry Bascom's decision to remain single-sex. CUL Chairman Robert Bell said, "I think we have to be particularly careful to protect the rights of the minority," adding that the men in the houses raise legitimate issues.

President of GarWood, Chip Buckner, said, "The decision was unpopular with the house but it's been made. Now it is our job to make it work." He feels CUL should "start now on ground rules for next year."

"People in the house are the very upset with the decision-making process," said Perry-Bascom President Peter Green '78. Several have refused to participate in room draw. Green lamented the lack of input from presidents in the policy making process. Though Green foresees the house as going coed next year (since the most of the incoming sophomores desire it), he feels the policy will "unfortunately" remain about the same.

Mercury Column: Statistics

"Nor will any science do the job—it must be a science as simple and materialistic as the subject can possibly admit. It must be a science of statistics and not of ideas." So wrote Lionel Trilling on the Kinsey Report. What follows are some statistics and at least one idea. Use them in good health.

For reasons physicists will be glad to explain to you, a B.T.U. is at the same time a measure of heat and a measure of energy. The N.Y. TIMES (26 March) reports that in 1976 U.S. industrial companies used about 20.5 million billion B.T.U.s of energy. That sounds like a whole lot to me, but the article's main thrust had to do with increased energy efficiency in industry. To wit: In 1947 U.S. manufacturers used 59,800 B.T.U.s to produce one (1974) dollar of output; by 1975 the figure had declined to 39,900. Good for them, I guess.

In an effort to see how we as a college are doing in this regard, we need to take into account the growth in the student body and in the physical plant, as well as changes in severity of winters. The following table gives a cost index and a heat index (decimal points suppressed, as in the cost-of-living index). The cost index gives energy costs per student per square foot per degree day. The heat index gives the same computation for B.T.U.s rather than dollars.

The relative sizes of the sets of numbers across years and with each other are what is important.

The TIMES article goes on to say that industry is paying about twice as much for energy, in constant dollars, as it did in 1971. I have not figured the Consumer Price Index in here because a) I'm not sure that's what the TIMES used since b) energy costs have risen at a rate quite different from the general inflation level. Dividing cost index by heat index gives a 3-fold rise; factoring in the CPI makes it about the same price rise as for industry.

Year	1971-72	1973-74	1974-75	1975-76	1976-77
Cost Index	2210	2420	[illegible]	3414	[illegible]
Heat Index	1900	1735	1530	1168	1227	985

What do these figures show, besides the fact that we are using less energy and paying more? Note the cost jump in 74-75, the year of the oil embargo. Another jump like that and we'd better all think of moving south with the robins. The Energy Conservation Committee is proposing the cost index (or some variant thereof) to the Administration as a measure of how to look at energy costs as a basis for various actions. If the numbers remain stable, we're doing all right.

Now look at the heat index. Even before the formation of this committee, proportional usage had declined by nearly 30 per cent. This speaks to the constructive actions already taken by Buildings and Grounds and explains why this committee seems to be concerned with such niggling items as extra lights. Many of the un-niggling items have already been handled; not all, but many. Like the cost index, if the heat index goes up we're in trouble. If the heat index goes down, we are doing a plausible job of energy conservation. (The index involves not just heat, but both oil and electricity converted to B.T.U.'s.)

The job of the Energy Conservation Committee will be to take steps which will make the heat index go down still further, thereby putting us in the position of the optimistic presidential press secretary and apologist during the depression, of whom it was said that he never met a statistic he didn't like.

How to Review—shows how

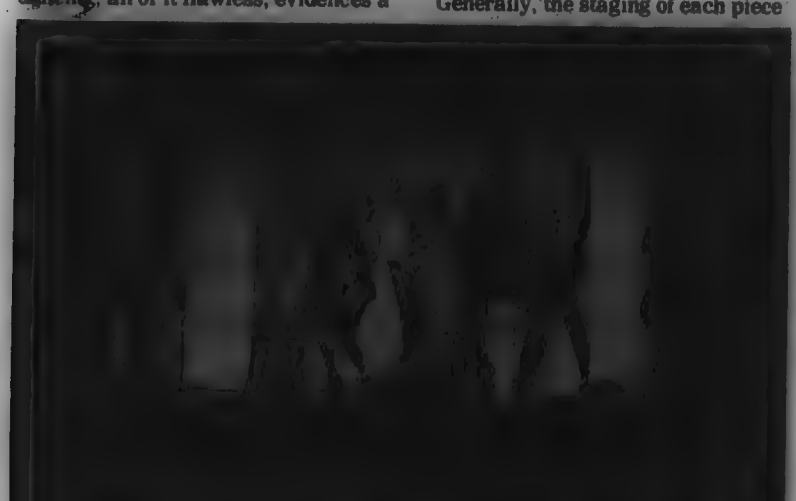
by John Libertine

Take a group of extremely talented singers, a selection of the finest show tunes ever written, and a typical sugary sweet musical cliche for a plot to tie everything together and what do we get? We get what we got last weekend in Jesup auditorium: The How To Musical Review. Playing to packed audiences, the Review came off a smashing success as one of the finest and most important musical events at Williams in quite a while.

The music was perfect. Peter Gloo is to be congratulated for his superb musical arrangements. The hard work which obviously went into the harmonizations bore plentiful and exquisite fruit. The harmonic accompaniment to "I Left My Heart at the Stage-Door Canteen" was especially memorable. Congratulations Peter.

Director Will Weiss and Choreographer Beth Popik did incredible work with the ensemble. Weiss worked at getting each member of the cast to produce at his best consistently. The large amount of dancing, all of it flawless, evidences a lot of time and hard work on the part of Popik. The dancing was expert and visually exciting. Both Weiss and Popik did terrific jobs.

If one examines the individual acts in the show, one can only marvel at the powerful raw talent in the cast. Individuals excelled without destroying the unity of the whole group. From the opening "Wilkomen" to the closing "The Closing Number", the cast exuded a sparkling vitality and set a high level of excellence that never diminished for a moment during the entire evening.



The program included various works from a hundred years of musical theater, each a guaranteed winner, made even more successful in the hands of the cast. The works ran the gamut from the poignant "I Wish I were a Lion Tamer" to the slapstick "You're the Top"; from the touching and powerful "Can't Help Loving That Man" to the ridiculous "Brush up your Shakespeare" from the nauseatingly sentimental "The Party's Over" to the blatantly offensive "Sodomy".

Generally, the staging of each piece worked to full advantage. Unfortunately, in a few isolated cases, problems arose. The song "Tomorrow" from Annie was totally upstaged by the introduction of a human Sandy, Annie's dog. The dog, unfortunately, detracted from a very touching and poignant song. On the other hand, the staging of "I Left My Heart at the Stage-Door Canteen" was brilliant, with the girl of the song off-stage, gorging herself out of misery over being left by the singer of the song. Overlooking such small errors, the production was first-rate and of stellar quality.

The members of the cast, drawn from all four classes, are all relatively new faces to the Williams stage. Yet the excellent quality and talent of the cast suggests the college has a large untapped source of musical talent just waiting to be released. Unfortunately, the musical seems to occupy a very low spot on the totem in theater.

Singer Andy Robinson will appear at the Rathskeller on Saturday night from 9:00 until 11:30 p.m.

Siri Sokol

Pianist wows audience with Mozart

by Gene H. Bell

A sparse audience in Thompson Memorial Chapel last Sunday listened, astounded, to a young pianist whose name, Siri Jan Sokol, is almost as striking as her artistry. Ms. Sokol, a Swarthmore alumna, is currently a graduate student in music at SUNY-Binghamton. The concert was sponsored by Prospect House.

Ms. Sokol's lengthy, demanding program seldom lost force or feeling. Probably her best playing came in the Mozart G Major Sonata. This much-played piece sounded as fresh as if it were just discovered. Ms. Sokol played each movement as one long uninterrupted phrase, with a liberal use of pedal that—miraculously—never resulted in blurring. Her right hand glided through Mozart's runs with a marvelously buoyant lilt and a crisp, steady movement. The six-chords and chromatics in the opening allegro were particularly sweet and luscious. It was some of the loveliest Mozart playing yet heard.

Somewhat less satisfactory was her account of Beethoven's opus 110. This sonata is the old master at his most broodingly subjective, even idiosyncratic. Only a seasoned, fully-developed pianist can do justice to the work's unprecedented meanderings. Ms. Sokol was a bit uneven—the A flat minor arioso sang beautifully, and her crescendo repetition of the G Major chords was breathtaking in its effect.

On the other hand, Beethoven's freer, more eccentric passages—they look and even sound like a genius's inspired doodlings—did not come off improvisatory enough; she seemed unwilling to let herself go. More seriously, the final fugue lacked a clear sense of growth and focus. The one moment in the afternoon when Ms. Sokol seemed not in control came in the Trio to the Scherzo—a movement which otherwise displayed admirable drive and energy. Ms. Sokol will no doubt arrive in time at a more organic conception of this redoubtable work.

Sokol capped an already impressive afternoon with Schumann's Kreisleriana. Like much of the great Romantic's piano music, this piece gets rather long-winded and diffuse—and yet Ms. Sokol made it hang together. The slow movements were appropriately dreamy and introspective, while the fast sections had a stormy intensity, like a Turner painting. Even her pauses between the dark hues of the actual movements seemed expressive. No encores were given, unfortunately as the audience—was hoping to hear how Ms. Sokol handles, say, a Chopin waltz or some folksy Bartok.

The Prospect House sponsorship was a fine idea. (Cultural chairpersons take note.) Somewhere here or out there are numerous young talents seeking public exposure; many a young instrumentalist would find it a plus to appear at a place like Williams. By courting artists other than the established stars, the latter of whom the Administration will always bring, the houses can help expand College cultural life. If the student houses at Yale can produce Figaro or even give the world premiere of a Debussy opera, then certainly the Williams Houses can invite young artists of the caliber of Siri Jan Sokol.

Coffeehouse

This Saturday, April 22, the Williams Coffeehouse will present singer-songwriter Andy Robinson in concert in the Rathskellar from 9 until 11:30 P.M. Also appearing will be Purple Cow Recording Artist Scott Lankford, one of the featured performers on the saon to be released album, "The Best of Williams".

Robinson began singing professionally while still a student at the University of Colorado in Boulder, appearing with Judy Collins, Odetta, Eric Andersen, and others. Their encouragement led Andy to New York, where he met Janis Ian, who produced his first album, "Patterns of Reality" on the Phillips label. A series of college tours in the east and midwest followed the release of Robinson's second album, "Break Out of the City," on Janus Records.

Robinson is a popular and steady performer who has recently played concert dates with George Benson; Leo Kottke; David Bromber; Maria Muldaur; Bonnie Raitt; Livingston Taylor; Fairport Convention; The Nitty Gritty Dirt Band; Blood, Sweat, and Tears; and Janis Ian. Noted for his wit and entertainment, Andy accompanies himself with six and twelve string guitars. His songs run from album favorites like "Ballad of a Summer Girl," "Party Ball," and "Dance Zarina," to new originals like "Livin' for the Seventies," "Mind Reader," and "Sunshine Rider."

Dance-Drama

CENCI, a dance-drama created to please French playwright Antonin Artaud, will be performed at 8:30 P.M. on April 27, 28, 29 on a specially constructed arena stage in the Towne Field House. It has been conceived, staged, and choreographed by John K. Savacool and Joy Anne Dewey. Marc Lichtman '78 composed and will conduct.

The dance-drama deals with one of the scandals in late Renaissance Rome, a story which was later used by Percy Bysthe Shelley for a five-act tragedy. In 1935, Artaud used the Shelley version as a basis for a new play for his Theatre de la Cruaute in Paris. The Dance Society has taken its material from Artaud's play.

Purple album to be released

"The Best of Williams—1978," an album featuring 14 songs by seven student groups, will be released by Purple Cow Records on Friday, April 28. The artists include Scott Lankford, the Williams Octet, Library Incident, Pyenson-Friesen, the Ephlats, Andy Kelly Band, and the Jazz Ensemble.

The album was professionally recorded in January for the Purple Cow label, which is owned by sophomores Steve Case and Bill Beckett. The fourteen songs on the LP were selected, according to Case, "to please a wide variety of musical tastes. There's a lot more diversity than I ever expected." One of the selections, Lankford's "River Song," has been chosen as the theme for an upcoming PBS-TV special.

The album will sell for $5.00, but students can purchase it at the reduced rate of $4.00 until May 6. Seven-hundred and fifty copies were pressed.

Case and Beckett are already planning a second volume, to be recorded next January. "We're looking for everything on the next one to be original," Case said, "from the songs to the artwork." Auditions will be held in the fall, and Beckett expressed a desire that students plan ahead, and write and arrange their songs over the summer.

"Masculine Feminine"

Vintage film unveils confusion

Sponsored by Reel Vintage.
Bronfman auditorium, Saturday at 7:30.

by Spiro Rombotis

Jean-Luc Goddard's "Masculine Feminine" (1965) impressed the audiences in the 1966 New York Film Festival with its unusual structure and its new mode of conveying the director's views to the public. A typical Goddard creation, "Masculine Feminine" is a vague and elusive film that focuses on the life of Paul (Jean-Pierre Leaud), a young Parisian who tries to untangle his confused attitudes about sex, politics and in the very end, his own existence.

For Goddard, Paul is representative of the disillusioned generation of the late 1960's which was responsible for the student unrest of 1968 that shook the Gaullist establishment in France to its foundations. To quote Goddard himself, "this generation could be called the generation of Marx and Coca-Cola", meaning that their lives are an unconventional blend of socialism and the typical western way of living. This unorthodox mix renders Paul's life a loose collection of political activism leading nowhere, with no dominating motive. Paul just chases Madeleine (Chantal Goya), a singer, who manipulates him for her own pleasure.

Goddard became interested in the progressive urban French youth from the dawn of his career. One of his first films, "Tout les Garcons oppellent Patrick" (1954), dealt with exactly the same material in a much more concise form. Goddard's technique borrows freely from Djiga Vertov's notion of "cinema verite" (true cinema) as in the scene where Paul subjects a girl to a lengthy interview, while she occupies the whole frame or [illegible] when Paul witnesses the killing of a man by his jealous wife.

The flow of the story is random and accompanied by seemingly unrelated gags, such as the sequence in which Paul and his friends witness Brigitte Bardot discussing a screenplay with a director in a Parisian cafe. For the [illegible] viewer such gags seem immaterial in relation to the film's plot; but are just Goddards peculiar way of depicting the atmosphere in which Paul is living. This technique is the same one that Goddard uses in "Pierrot le Fou" that he made six months later.

This unusual manner of using human types as the instruments of conveying the film-makers' views in an insistently specified film, arises out of Goddard's notion that "Philosophers and film-makers share a view that belongs to a whole generation".

Mountaineering #2.

SELECTING THE PROPER GEAR

The Busch label is where it all begins. Note the snowy, craggy peaks affixed thereto. They are the mountains.

You are the mountaineer. And this is an ad. The subject of which is selecting the proper gear for mountaineering. (It all fits together so nicely, doesn't it?)

First and foremost, you'll need to pop the mountain top. For this task, faithful mountaineers use a church key. Secular mountaineers use a bottle opener. Don't be confused by these antics with semantics. Just remember, the opener is your primary tool. Be true to it and it will be true to you.

Second, choose a glass. Here the options become immense. German steins, hand-blown pilseners, old jelly jars, that cute little Mr. Boffo mug you've had since third grade.

Be adventurous. Experiment. Most mountaineers have a personal preference. You'll develop one too.

Food is next. Proper mountaineering, not to mention proper nutrition, requires a smorgasbord selection of snacks. Some mountaineers have suffered from a potato chip deficiency, a pretzel imbalance or other serious dietary defects. Plan ahead.

Comfort is crucial. If you mountaineer in public, pick a padded bar stool, preferably one that spins (to facilitate admiring the scenery). At home, a comfortable chair or sofa will do. Rule of thumb: if it feels good, and the police don't seem to mind, do it.

Then turn on the tube or spin a tune or crack a good book. The choice is strictly between you and the dominant hemisphere of your brain. Of course, some mountaineers say the smooth, refreshing taste of Busch is entertainment enough. And thank goodness they do, because it's an excellent conclusion.

Don't just reach for a beer. BUSCH Head for the mountains.

Laxmen pound Union in rain

April showers bring May flowers, the saying goes, but the Williams College Lacrosse team picked its flowers early by soundly trouncing Union College 13-7 in the drizzling rain at Cole Field Wednesday.

The Williams attack of Todd Eckerson, Pete Thomsen, and Dick Goodbody combined for ten goals and eight assists to lead the Ephmen to what head coach Renzi Lamb said was "a very good win under the conditions."

A drizzling rain prevailed most of the afternoon causing the sloppy playing conditions which hampered Williams play somewhat.

Dick Goodbody and Brian Benedict scored Williams' two first goals, but it was not until 8:40 of the first period when Todd Eckerson converted on a Peter Thomsen feed that Williams finally got untracked and pulled away from Union for good.

Williams scored three other times in the first period to take a comfortable 5-2 lead. Three more times in the second period and once in the third quarter of the game.

Williams goalie Bob Cowin continued his outstanding play. He effectively shut off Union's outside shooting and grabbed twenty saves total. Williams' defense of Pete Unger, Pete Santry, Ralph Murray, and Russ Gee, aided Cowin by holding Union's attack to just one goal.

Williams faces a perennially strong Massachusetts squad this Saturday at Amherst. Coach Lamb is fairly optimistic despite his team's winless record against Massachusetts. He said, "We can win but we will have to play up to and above our potential."

Wesleyan dumps Eph nine

by Frank Pergolizzi

In the opening round of Little Three action for both teams, the Wesleyan University baseball team defeated Williams yesterday, 3-1.

Williams opened the scoring with a run in the first inning. Shortstop Scott Harrington singled and scored when Frank Kreutz hit a ground ball through the shortstop's legs that found its way into the left-center field gap.

Wesleyan scored two runs in the fourth to take the lead. A single and two walks by Williams' pitcher Tony Stall loaded the bases. The tying run scored on a fielder's choice by first baseman Tom Dwyer. Shortstop Mark Anderson singled in the go ahead run.

The Cardinals picked up an insurance run in the bottom of the fifth on a homerun by Bob Latessa.

Williams had a chance to tie the game in the top of the seventh. But with the bases loaded, pinch hitter John Thiel hit a sharp line drive right at the left fielder.

Bob Coolen went all the way for the victory. The sophomore lefthander aided his own cause by picking off four Williams' baserunners.

Williams is now 3-4 overall and 0-1 in the Little Three. The Ephmen resume action Friday afternoon in Schenectady against the Union College Dutchmen and entertain Bates College Saturday in Williamstown at 12 noon.

Purple rackets hit Harvard 6-3

by Evan Bash

A pleasant spring day in the Purple Valley almost turned into disaster for the Harvard men's tennis team on Tuesday, but the Crimson managed to pull out some tough tennis when they needed it, edging out the Ephmen 6-3. Despite the final score, Williams' scare of Harvard proved coach Sean Sloane's racketmen are a legitimate New England power.

Usually Harvard handles the Ephs easily, but exceptional individual performances by Martin Goldberg and Captain Jim Parsons served to keep this year's contest close. After the singles, Williams was still alive in the match, trailing by only 4-2. With the pressure on in the doubles, Harvard's third team came through with some fine play to clinch the victory.

Goldberg pulled what he termed "one of the best wins of my life" when he beat Harvard's no. one player 6-3, 2-6, 7-5 in a tense, close battle. Captain Parsons had it all going, making some great shots in a 6-4, 7-6 victory.

Dan O'Connell and Peter Friesen also had strong showings, although both fell just a little short, O'Connell losing 7-5, 6-4 and Friesen dropping a 6-1, 6-7, 6-3 decision. Allen Barnes had an off day in a 6-4, 6-0 loss, and Evan Bash was blown out, 6-2, 6-0.

Williams was confident going into the doubles that they could win all three and pull out the match. However, the Crimson's third team played superb doubles to beat Alan Wall and Peter Friesen 6-4, 6-2 to close the Ephs out. Goldberg and Parsons and the no. two duo of Tad Roach and Barnes halted their matches at one set apiece due to darkness.

Williams takes its 4-2 record to Tufts tomorrow.

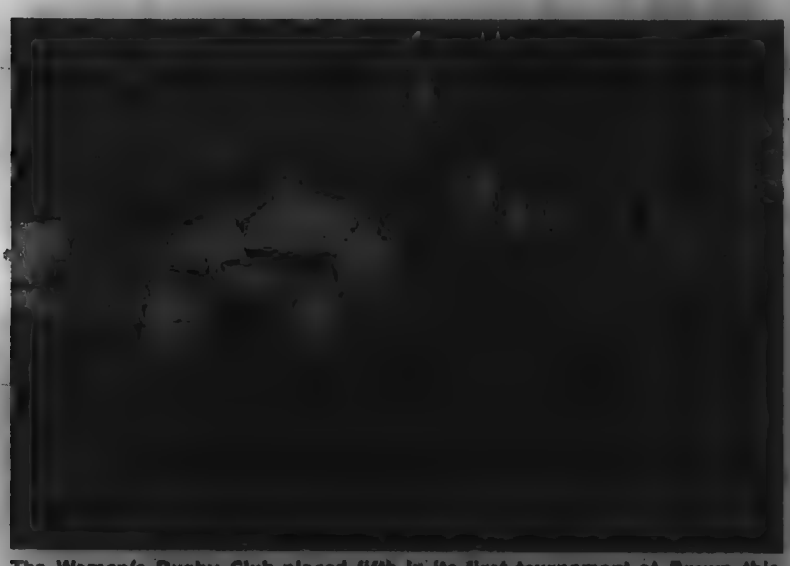
Men's Volleyball qualifies for regionals

Unbeknownst to the vast majority of people in the Williams college community, the Men's Volleyball Club does exist. Last Saturday, the team ended their regular season play at Westfield State College, qualifying for the New England League Championships on Sunday, April 23 at Boston University. Competing in the tough Northern Division of the league, the ballbangers compiled an impressive 36-18 record, earning a wild card berth in the post-season tournament.



Although inconsistency plagued the squad during the middle of the season, the team is on the upswing, and should put on a strong performance in their third consecutive trip to the championships. "The length of the season may have caused us to peak too early", said Junior Captain Rick "Pound-That-Puppy" Moog "but I think that we have a good chance to do well in Boston." The reasons for such high hopes are the overall balance and depth of the team.

The hitting prowess of Senior Dan Rudolph, who terrorizes opponents with his irretrievable spikes, has been a driving force behind the climb out of mid-season doldrums, as have the quick reflexes and excellent game sense of classmate Bill Fleming, who often came up with outstanding digs at crucial times. "I brought the Cartesian method of volleyball to Williams," Bill remarked, "and I think it has helped the underclassmen on the squad immensely."

Two sophomores who obviously have benefitted from this tutelage are Jeff Graham (known league-wide for his primal screams and floor-shattering spikes) and John "Fingers" Larose, whose unpredictable back sets always keep opponents on their toes. Both have been selected to play in the league All-Star game, the first time that two players from Williams have received that honor. Martijn Schouten, another member of the class of '80, has provided steady play throughout the season. Affectionately known as "the Flying Dutchman" to his teammates, Schouten's shrewd service returns tend to bewilder foes, as do his timely dinks.

Despite being plagued by injuries for much of the season, Dave "Beanblossom" Furlow dominated net play with his long reach and unusual leaping style. His Dillonesque air and mystical insight were valuable pressure-easing assets during tense matches. The mere physical presence of Ent-like Frosh C. J. Pietzner brought many a would-be competitor to the floor. So did his awesome blocking ability. During his first season, C. J. progressed amazingly well, as did all of the first-year players. Juniors Mark Lewy and Chris Clark have been welcome additions to the squad. Lewy's driving ability, both on and off the court, got the team's adreneline going, and Clark's unique "windmill" spike was an offensive asset. As the third setter on the team, Freshman Troy Elander used his beach-ball savvy to the team's benefit, and his consistent bumping often steadied the team.

Although the team has done well all season long, a strong performance at B.U. would make the four month long season all the more successful.

Women ruggers finish 5th

The Women's Rugby team placed fifth in the First Annual New England Collegiate Women's Rugby Tournament held at Brown University last weekend. Matches between the eight teams, Albany Law, Brown, Cornell, MIT, Siena, UConn, Williams, and Yale were selected by draw, with the top six teams (decided by match play on Saturday) competing three times. Williams drew MIT in the first round.

The Williams team held its own but in several cases were overpowered by their outsized rivals; MIT defeated them 16-0 and went on to place second overall. The second round was a lot more enjoyable as the team beat Yale 4-0. The try was scored by the extra efforts of the scrum, Sue Kraus, Lesley Bryer, Cyndy Tufts, Margie Olney, Lee Shackleford, Jane Ingalls and Toni Ceckler, who pushed stand-off Linda Collins over the end line.

On Sunday, the women faced a combined Siena-Albany Law team in the game for third place. Frustratingly, the Williams team lost 8-4 to the same team that it had beaten the weekend before. The one try was scored on a break away run by Linda Collins. This gave Williams an overall fifth in the tournament. Throughout the tourney the team was plagued by minor injuries but with the aid of our sponsor Genesse Cream Ale these were soon forgotten.

Tomorrow the team has its first home game against Albany Law; Co-Captain Sue Kraus expects an exciting game—so be there!

Laxwomen's burst thwarts Lady Jeffs

by Mary Kate Shea

Sparked by Sally Kruse's six-goal performance and "determined defense" on the part of the entire squad, the Williams women's varsity lacrosse team captured the first leg of the Little Three in its season opener, trouncing Amherst 12-4.

Williams took a while to warm up in the contest, leading the Lord Jeffs 5-3 at halftime. As the offense gained confidence and the defense tightened up, the Ephs proceeded to outscore Amherst by a 7-1 margin in the second half. Kruse's scoring splurge was complemented by two scores apiece from second home Mary Fish, third home Sue Wright and center Priscilla Buckley.

Despite the high score's indication that Williams' performance was solely an offensive one, the squad's "determined defense" was the key to its wide margin of victory. The Eph offense concentrated on strong defensive play in addition to its goal-scoring chores, and the use of the double team by the defense caused many Amherst turnovers. Goalie Marty Taft had a good afternoon in the net, stopping 10-14 Amherst shots she handled.

Women's lax faces the Jumbos at Tufts this Saturday and then takes on Mt. Holyoke at Cole Field on April 25 in varsity and J.V. contests starting at 4 P.M.

Women's lacrosse defeated Amherst 12-4 at home on Tuesday.

Rugby men split pair

Coming off an 18-7 loss to Dartmouth two weeks ago, the Williams Rugby Club managed a split in two home matches this past weekend. The Club defeated Albany Medical 10-6 Saturday, then lost a close game with Berkshire Rugby Club Sunday 8-7. The B-side lost to Dartmouth 10-0 and to Albany, while defeating Berkshire 11-4.

The Dartmouth game was marked by close even play for all but the opening twenty minutes of the contest. Williams fell behind 14-3 as both teams went on to manage only one try each in the remaining 60 minutes. The scrum had good day against the bigger and more experienced Dartmouth club.

Against Albany, the club again fell behind but managed two second half tries to pull off the victory. Colin Hart and Tom Kondel scored the tries. Captains Jim Stewart and Wally Boyer and wing forward Paul Shorb all played exceptional games.

Albany's game looked like a repeat of Albany. Williams fell behind despite a field goal and a try by Jack DuPre. The club had numerous scoring opportunities but were again plagued by an inability to score from in close.

In the B-side game, Jeff Dunn and hooker David Weyerhauser each had one try in the 11-4 victory.

The Club next meets Albany Law tomorrow, returning to Cole Field Parents' weekend for a match against Union.

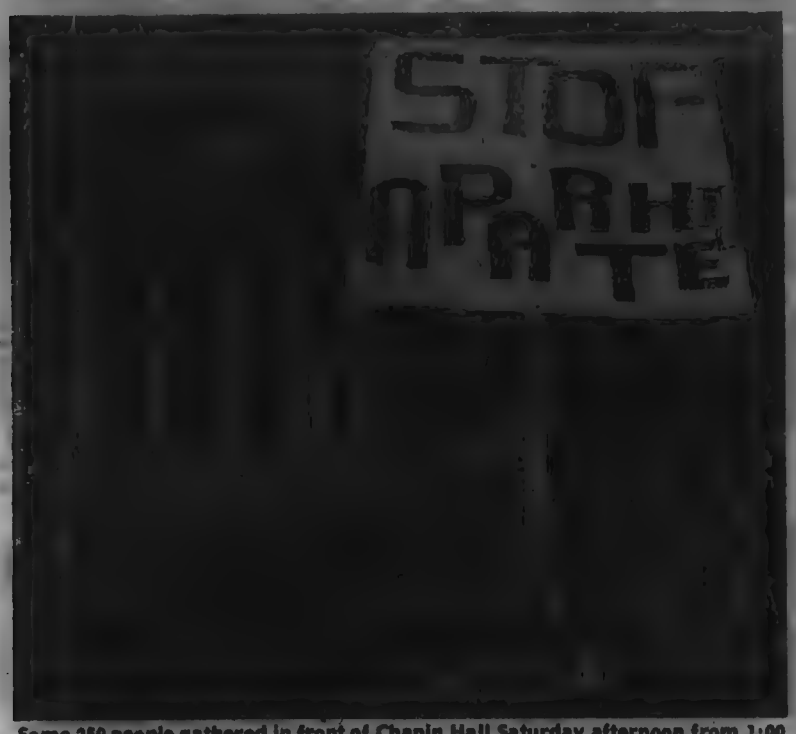
Trustees promise to consider action against apartheid in So. Africa

by David MacGregor

The Board of Trustees is committed to seriously consider any action, including shareholder proposals and selective divestiture, against apartheid in South Africa "consistent with the best interests of the College," several members of the board promised at a press conference Saturday.

The trustees did not commit themselves to taking any specific action at this time, but noted that the College has taken "a new direction" in voting for certain shareholder proposals against management, and will continue to do so, where appropriate.

Trustee Campus Life Committee Chairman Wayne Wilkins '41 described a meeting between students and the trustee Campus Life Committee Thursday night as "exceptionally useful and informative," adding that he and other trustees were "dismayed that students did not realize" that the trustees are as concerned about South Africa, and the American role there, as they are.



President John Chandler commented on the trustee impression that students and trustees were agreed in opposing apartheid, but disagreed on what Williams can or should do about it.

Executive Committee Chairman William Curtiss '40 contended that American corporations as a group are a powerful force for positive change in South Africa, citing several black leaders in the U.S. and South Africa as supporting that view.

Trustees William Sneath '47 (chairman of Union Carbide) and Preston Parish '41 (vice chairman of Upjohn), both of whose firms operate in South Africa, told students at the Thursday meeting that they felt their companies could do more to improve conditions in South Africa by remaining than by withdrawing. "You can either withdraw from the world or you can work to improve it," said Sneath, "I would rather work to improve it."

Finance Committee Chairman Charles Moot '53 noted that the College has not traditionally voted stock proxies against management, but on the advice of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder responsibility the College voted against management on two proposals. He claimed that in most cases, attempting to influence corporate behavior by shareholder proposals was more likely to be productive than divestiture. He also said the trustees would consider

by Fred Thys

"The US multinationals are parties to racial oppression", Raymond Baker, Assistant Professor of Political Science, told the 250 people gathered in front of Chapin last Saturday. The crowd had rallied to protest Williams' investments in companies with interests in South Africa.

Baker was responding to the contention that US companies are playing a progressive role in South Africa. He cited black South African insistence that economic sanctions against the racist regime can only cut off support for institutionalized oppression in that country. If US multinationals withdrew from South Africa, Baker said, only 0.4 per cent of the black labor force would be directly affected.

Baker quoted from the Clark report on South Africa saying that US multinationals "have made no significant impact" on relaxing apartheid." The report concluded that US multinationals are parties to racial oppression in South Africa.

Baker explained that South Africa could be singled out for attack because it is the only country in the world where a racial minority holds the ever-tightening reins of power by which they can legally sanction the economic, social and political oppression of the majority.

Addressing the suggestion that Williams be wary of getting involved in economic sanctions against South Africa, Baker pointed out that "through our portfolio we have already acted."

Timothy Weiskel, Assistant Professor of History, received a standing ovation for his speech denouncing "ignorance, indifference and intimidation" as the three evils on this campus which must be overcome if any action toward divestiture is to eventually be taken by the trustees.

Weiskel cited the 1000 signatures on the petition calling for divestiture and the 40 to 50 faculty members in support of the measure as proofs that the demand no longer comes from a minority.

Steve Horton '78, representing the Anti-Apartheid Coalition, warned those calling for divestiture that "it is important to understand the people you are dealing with." He quoted one of the Trustees as saying: "I am convinced that what my company is doing in South Africa is right."

Kenneth Karston, a white South African exile, characterized the Vorster regime as one headed by a man who has never divorced himself from his pro-Nazi tendencies and which "will stop at nothing to suppress dissent".

Other speakers at the rally included Ben Blakney '78, David Langston, Assistant Professor of English, Richard Nuccio, Assistant Professor of Political Science, Robert Peck, head of the Physical Education Department, and Sarah Wilson, a freshman representing the Feminist Alliance.

Trustees relate divestiture feelings

President John Chandler released this response on Saturday by six trustees to the concerns about South Africa expressed by students in a meeting with trustees Thursday night. Chandler emphasized that the authors are responding as individuals, but added that the letter "represents the general sentiment of the board."

To the editor:

As trustees of the College and members of the Committee on Campus Life, we participated in the meeting last Thursday evening with some students and faculty to discuss, among other subjects, the question of the divestiture by Williams of its holdings of securities of corporations doing business in South Africa. We write to communicate with those in the Williams community who were not able to attend Thursday's meeting.

The vigil was dignified and effective. The presentations to us at the meeting were thoughtful and impressive. The intensity and sincerity of feelings was obvious. Although these observations are necessarily personal, the racist policies of the South African government are as abhorrent to the trustees as to the rest of the Williams community. On the evil of the South African system, there can be and was no disagreement between us and others at the meeting. We also agree that we and all people of good-will should work to end these racist policies. We do not believe, however, that to oppose divestiture is to support apartheid. The discussion properly focused on whether and how the Williams investment portfolio should be used to achieve that objective.

Some urged divestiture upon us as the only moral course. Others—though a minority at least of those present at the meeting—opposed divestiture as an unrealistic measure. Still others urged us to use the voting power of the Williams share holdings to influence corporations to withdraw from, or curtail their activities in, South Africa. Those positions and others advanced at the meeting have merit. On the other hand, there is genuine disagreement—even among black South Africans—as to the desirability of the more enlightened U.S. companies withdrawing from South Africa.

Our duty, which is extremely difficult, is to find the proper balance between our moral outrage and the interests of the College. In the words of Harvard's Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility with respect to South Africa, we are "bound both as a matter of law and of moral responsibility to use (the funds of the College) for the purposes for which they were intended." We support the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities, and we await its recommendations. For the present, we are personally persuaded that we can best assist South African blacks, and most importantly also honor our obligations to Williams, by continuing to support and encourage progressive actions in South Africa by U.S. corporations in which the College holds shares. The influence of colleges like Williams on these issues can be appreciable, but we believe at this time that total divestiture is not the best means of exerting our influence. Our judgment is based in part upon our personal knowledge and study of the facts of South African life. We will monitor that situation and the activities there of corporations in which the College is a shareholder. Measured use of the voting power of our holdings is an aspect of our effort to support enlightened corporate conduct. We may, as we have in the past, communicate our views directly to management. We will gladly work with those at Williams who propose other kinds of action addressed to ending the misery in South Africa.

What we cannot do is jeopardize the financial strength of the College. As we believe the Thursday meeting demonstrated, there is much agreement between us and others at Williams despite the complexity of the issue. The areas of disagreement are important. But, we are willing to discuss these issues with those who represent all points of view on the Williams campus. We will continue to ponder the suggestions made to us, and to act, finally, in what we sincerely believe to be the best interests of this great College.

Sincerely,

Alexander L. Fetter — Edward L. Stanley
W. L. Hadley Griffin — Francis T. Vincent, Jr.
Charles H. Moot — E. Wayne Wilkins, Jr.

Lecturers address US involvement in So. Africa

Gunnenman seeks change

Professor John Gunnenman of the Yale Divinity School stated that U.S. corporate policies involving South Africa can best be molded by shareholder pressure rather than immediate divestiture. The speaker addressed a small group in Griffin Hall Friday night.

Gunneman advised against outright divestiture because it would involve liquidating the college's only source of leverage against the companies in question. A "symbolic withdrawal" in which Williams acted as a precedent-maker would have few advantages, he said. "It might cause a big splash, but when it's over you've lost what little power you had originally."

Gunnenman recommended a systematic method of pressuring the corporations to change their policies using, for example, proxy votes, as an alternative to divestiture. This, method would bring about more permanent results in the long run, he felt.

Gunnenman emphasized that Williams has a responsibility to exert leverage on the policies of the corporation in which it holds stock. "If effective power is present, but is not used, it is an abdication of responsibility and share holders' rights," he stated.

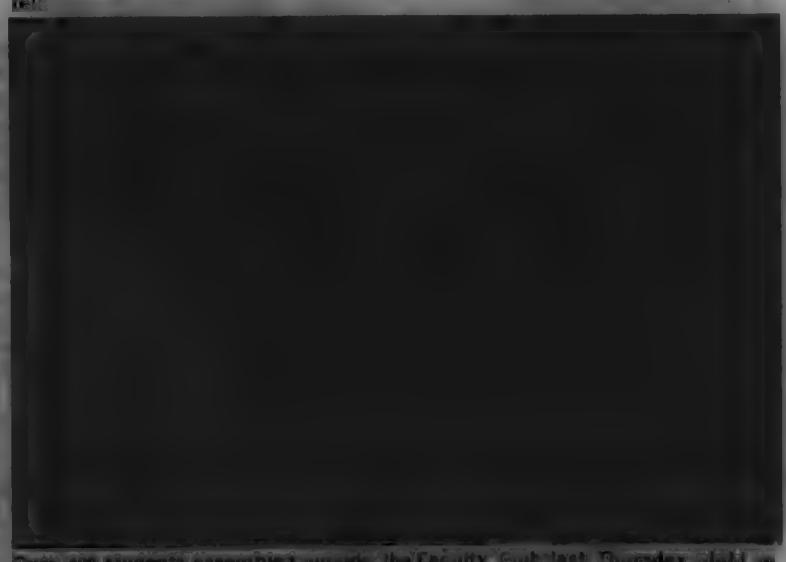
According to Philip Smith, Director of Admissions, 984 candidates have been accepted to the class of 1982 from a field of 4463 applicants. As 4700 applied in 1977, the figures indicate an overall decline of 5 per cent from last year.



Smith speculates that the decrease occurred in the lower castes of the applicant pool, as the overall group appeared stronger than last year's. In addition, only one less high school was represented this year, as compared to 1977.

Smith aims for a class size of 490, up 10 from last year. As the number of upper classmen spending a year away is increasing, Smith hopes to fill the gap with freshmen.

Slight increases occurred in the numbers of applications from foreigners, Hispanics, and Orientals, while the number of black applicants declined slightly. Overall, there were eight per cent fewer male and one per cent fewer female applicants.

Last December, 142 Early Decision candidates were accepted from a group of 529. During January and February, the admissions office accepted 164 of the most promising candidates from the regular admissions pool.

In the Ivy League, Smith stated, numbers of applications are higher than last year. As these schools are accepting more candidates early, they may be discouraging applications to comparable schools such as Williams, according to Smith. Though applications to Amherst are up to 4100, Williams remains the most popular of the Little Three in terms of numbers. Wesleyan's applicant pool declined from last year.

Over 400 students assembled outside the Faculty Club last Thursday night to hold a "Candlelight vigil" protesting Williams' investments in South African corporations. Inside, Trustees heard from student groups including supporters and opponents of divestiture. The vigil was sponsored by the Thursday Night Coalition. (photo by Doughty)

Chandler on investment policies

Statement by the President at the Faculty Meeting of April 19, 1978

In view of the large amount of time and attention now being devoted to the question of the College's investment policies and practices, especially as they relate to South Africa, I want to make a few comments.

The focus of the discussion on campus so far has been largely on South Africa, and that is entirely appropriate. But the discussion is also very much about Williams College. The information about Williams' investments and how they relate to South Africa is public information, and the Advisory Committee is studying that information carefully and will consider the question of how Williams depends on its endowment and how particular decisions and policies concerning the endowment are likely to affect the present condition and future prospects of Williams. I hope the larger Williams community will consider the same questions and that those who have views and opinions will air them both openly and to the Advisory Committee.

I want to turn more particularly now to the work and responsibility of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities which was established a few weeks ago and which has been quite busy since then.

Williams' responsibilities

The establishment of this committee recognizes that the College bears some responsibility for the behavior of the companies in which it invests, and the function of the Advisory Committee is to monitor that behavior and advise the Trustee Finance Committee on actions designed to influence the behavior of companies in more socially desirable directions. With respect specifically to South Africa, we certainly should express repugnance and horror at the apartheid system and all the suffering and injustice it inflicts. And we should insist that companies in which the College holds stock do all they can in their practices and policies to promote justice, decency, and fair and equal treatment.

Reasonable and decent people do and will disagree on how best to achieve such ends. For that reason there will be disagreement on some of the shareholder resolutions which aim at social improvements in South Africa and elsewhere. The Trustee Finance Committee has followed the recommendation of the Advisory Committee in two instances. It did not follow its advice on how to vote the College's shares on the other stockholder resolution. It was made clear from the outset that the Advisory Committee's function was to make recommendations and that the Trustees will and must retain final authority over an area in which their responsibilities are large and important. Unfortunately, some persons are now repudiating the Advisory Committee and claiming that the structure for making decisions lacks credibility because the Trustees failed to adopt one recommendation. I find that argument difficult to follow. The Advisory Committee is working well. The Trustees are taking its recommendations seriously, but there will undoubtedly continue to be some disagreements. It would be strange were disagreements not to occur. I appeal for support for this reasonable and fair way of reaching decisions on difficult and important questions.

Some other considerations

Despite all the arguments and demands on the subject of South African investments the debate has really not been joined on some fundamental questions. In particular there needs to be close analytical and dispassionate examination and discussion of the range of assumptions and implications in some of the actions which the College is being urged to take. I am particularly concerned that much of the discussion seems to suggest that to question or oppose divestment is to support apartheid. That equation simply will not stand inspection, and I hope it will not gain enough credibility to inhibit free and open discussion.

In the midst of the present debate and the passionate atmosphere in which it is occurring I hope all of us will remember that an institution that is chartered and designed to promote learning makes its fundamental contribution to desirable social change by educating its students, thereby enlarging their capacity and, we hope, their desire to serve the needs of humanity. Education is a preeminent social good, and the resources and energy of this institution must be devoted to serving its educational mission. The College is, of course, an institutional citizen. It has responsibilities in the area of investment and in other areas as well. And one must sadly confess that a college is inevitably implicated in many of the wrongs of the world. To be a part of the human scene at all is to be implicated in many wrongs. But we must make clear distinctions between what is appropriate for us as individuals and private citizens and what is appropriate for the College by way of responding to the wrongs and needs of the wider world. Even those who would like to see Williams attempt to end all economic involvement with South Africa will recognize how difficult it is for an individual consumer in this society to avoid such involvement. The kinds of sacrifices and risks that appear to be unreasonable for individuals who would prefer to have no involvement in South Africa suggest that an institution as complicated as a college would have even greater difficulty in completely cutting its ties with every unjust economic and political reality of a world that is as interdependent as this one.

Political actions

It is, of course, not possible to make sharp and clear distinctions between the College's ethical responsibilities as an investor and the political actions appropriate to the exercise of those responsibilities. I am concerned, however, that some are demanding that the College adopt political purposes that go well beyond what I regard as appropriate expression of its responsibilities as an investor. As members of this college community—as faculty members, students, alumni, and trustees—we hold many different views about political objectives, priorities, and tactics. We must preserve an atmosphere in which such disagreements can be fully debated and expressed. And in order for the College to function as an educational institution it must be free of political turmoil and tugging over whose political instrument it will be and whose political purposes it will serve. As numerous examples throughout the world illustrate, an atmosphere of serious learning does not flourish in a politicized college or university.

Role of the Trustees

The trustees will be on the campus this weekend, and they will again be devoting attention to the topic of the College's position as an ethical investor as well as many other serious topics. In particular, they wish to examine some issues relating to the long-term plans and prospects for Williams. The Trustees are a group of able, decent, and humane men and women who devote their services to the College not only freely but at considerably sacrifice to themselves. They are glad to render this service, and the College very much needs the assistance of custodians and advisors who are able to view the institution with some detachment and in the contest of the commitment to maintain and augment its strength and its capacity to serve both the present and future needs of its students and faculty and the larger society of which it is a part. As the Trustees and I look at the ethical investment and other issues it is important for us to maintain a perspective which recognizes that the future will have its imperatives that will be no less compelling than the imperatives of the present. In responding to the imperatives and needs that are brought forth by the present generation of members of the Williams community we must avoid making the fortunes of future generations of students and faculty the hostage of decisions that favor too exclusively the demands of the present. That is a difficult perspective to maintain, but it is absolutely essential that it be maintained.

Advisory committee

Excerpts from a letter to Lawrence B. Urbano, chairman of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities. President Chandler sets a charge for the Committee.

... Because the Trustees are legally responsible for the College's financial assets and for its economic stability and well-being, they must finally decide—through the Finance Committee—how to vote the shares of stock held by Williams. They must also retain authority over any other actions taken in the name of the College designed to influence the behavior or policies of companies whose stock the College owns.

Those responsible for the endowment attempt to provide a sturdy and stable economic base to enable the College to carry out its educational mission. The preeminent social good served by Williams is the education of its students, and that must remain the service to which it devotes its resources and energies. Consistent with that view of its mission, the College must avoid unwise financial risks in its investments. But if a company's policies or activities clearly involve intentional or avoidable major injury to the social well-being, it is also the right and responsibility of the College as a stock owner to consider what steps it might take to alter the company's behavior.

Shareholder resolutions are frequently used to influence company policies and practices, and a special task of your committee will be to recommend to the Trustees how to vote the Williams stock shares on resolutions. It is also within the authority of the committee to propose resolutions of its own for consideration by the Trustees. There may be other instances in which the committee will decide that a letter to management would be the most effective instrument. Any such letters would, of course, have to be approved by the Trustees.

An important question is whether the committee should attempt to formulate a general statement of principles dealing with social and moral considerations relating to investment. Such a task is within the purview of the committee. It is understood, of course, that for any statement to become College policy it would require Trustee approval.

Much recent campus discussion has focused on divestiture of College shares of stocks, especially shares in companies with connections to South Africa. Your committee is not foreclosed from studying and recommending divestiture as one alternative. But I hope that any such study will deal with the question of what the legitimate social and political objectives of the College's endowment policy are beyond the promotion of the immediate educational and economic interests of the College. And who should decide which social and political objectives are directly sought through the instrumentality of investment actions? What risks or costs is it appropriate to subject the College to in taking investment actions for non-economic reasons?

I hope that the committee in its deliberations will consult broadly within the College community and that it will become the body through which students, faculty, staff and alumni will direct their views and concerns about investment responsibility to the Trustees.

The kinds of questions your committee will be considering are inherently difficult, and they are even more difficult when an institution depends heavily on its endowment. Williams is in the fortunate and unusual position of being able to count on its endowment for more than twenty-five per cent of the income for its educational and general budget. Thus the performance of the endowment has an important relationship to the level of tuition the College charges, the salaries it is able to pay, the financial aid it can offer its students, and the general quality of its programs. And in view of the fact that the endowment has been built largely through gifts from alumni and other friends of the College, how it is managed and the policies that govern it may have a substantial influence on the attitudes of those on whom the College depends for financial support.

Letters:

reappointment

To the editor:

At the April 22 rally against South African Apartheid, Professor T. C. Weiskel suggested that the administration has subtly threatened the reappointment of junior faculty members because they support the movement for the withdrawal of U.S. corporate involvement in South Africa.

Professor Weiskel, a junior faculty member, is the only professor of African History at Williams. African History plays an essential role in my education at Williams as I am Black and I am a concentrator in the Afro-American Studies Program. I trust that the decision on his reappointment will be based on an honest evaluation of his scholarship and his teaching and not on his stand against South African Apartheid.

In any event, the decision will reflect the administration's commitment to cultivate a meaningful Afro-American Studies Program.

Roman orgy

To the editor:

A most disgusting event took place in Mission Park this past Saturday evening—a Roman Orgy.

Since I live in Mission Park I had the misfortune of seeing and smelling this event. Because the food was prepared by Food Services in lieu of our regular meal, with our board money, and took place in the halls of my dormitory, I feel that I have the right and the responsibility to voice this protest.

Two years ago the Roman Orgy was held in the Mission Park dining hall. Since the cost of cleaning and repairing the rug was so great, this year the Orgy was held in the main corridor. Somehow this made it difficult to avoid, so upon returning from eating elsewhere I stopped to watch. Food was flying through the air and the floor was covered with chicken, oranges, olives and bread.

Some of the Romans were unfriendly and proceeded to pummel the glass that I was standing behind with oranges. However, not all of the participants were so rude and violent, and I imagine that some of them felt guilty about the waste of food.

Maybe 100 people were there and food was prepared for 300. But this was no problem since throwing food seemed to be one of the main attractions. In fact, plates were forbidden to add to the fun.

As I stood there smelling the stench of spilled wine and wasted food I kept asking myself how the College ever permitted this event to occur. Could they have thought that this would only be a bunch of college students having a good time? Did they not see that this Roman Orgy would undoubtedly encourage the wasting of food along with acts of drunken violence? Did they not realize that it would interfere with students' access to their own living quarters?

The fact that it was scheduled on the day after a Collegewide fast two years ago and during Passover this year makes me question the sensitivity of those involved in the planning. I hope the Administration sees that it must put a stop to this Mission Park tradition. And I know that when I say this, I am expressing the sentiments of the members of the Mission Park Dining Room staff.

To the editor:

I hope I speak for many in applauding Mr. Charles Karelis for adding a humanitarian voice of reason to the cacophony already being raised over the divestiture issue.

'Cenci' reenacts Shelley's Roman scandal

"Theatre, real theatre," wrote Antonin Artaud, "is like the plague." It suddenly confronts the spectator with an incomprehensible experience designed to destroy his habitual manner of evaluating human deeds. To please Artaud, the Williams College Dance Society has chosen to perform CENCI, which, according to director John K. Savacool, should be "strange, beautiful, slightly shocking, and utterly absorbing."

CENCI will be performed at 8:30 P.M. on April 27, 28 and 29 on a specially constructed stage in the Towne Field House. It has been conceived, staged, and choreographed by Joy Anne Dewey and John K. Savacool, and re-enacts one of the scandals of late Renaissance Rome. There are more than 50 people involved in the production, including faculty, students and townspeople. The original music score was composed and will be conducted by Marc Lichtman '78.

CENCI is, in all respects, an experimental play; it takes an Elizabethan melodrama written by Percy Bysse Shelley and treats it as a surrealist myth. In doing so, the Williams College Dance Society pays homage to some of Artaud's theatrical theories and prophetic notions. Artaud viewed dramatic art as an amalgam of music, dance, and myth, with only minimal attention given to the traditionally privileged element of language. With this in mind, 95 per cent of the words in the original Artaud play have been suppressed, and some scenes are treated as rituals, others as processionals or dances. In addition, western theatre, according to Artaud, should serve its original function in classical Greek theatre of a ritual for exorcising the dark forces behind "civilized" behavior. To please Artaud, Savacool and Dewey have taken the scandal of Francesco Cenci (who murders his sons, rapes his daughter, and is then murdered by his wife and children), and have treated it as a product of an heroic outburst of more than human energy. CENCI is the product of a very Neitzschean protest against the constraints in which we are obliged to live; the character of Francesco Cenci is portrayed as beyond good and beyond evil, in an amoral world.

Both Dewey and Savacool agree that "CENCI is the most challenging production they have undertaken. Not only have they produced a drama which employs some avant-garde dramatic theories, but they have chosen to perform it in the Towne Field House, a place not intended for theatre. Thus they have been forced to "think in other categories", which would also have pleased Artaud.

It is the directors' hope that the spectator, too will be forced to "think in other categories", both during and after the drama. CENCI is meant to serve as an "agent provocateur" by "disorienting" the spectator with a new view of human morals and deeds, CENCI may make him ill at ease, but fascinated by this condition.

Clark calls to sever trade relations

Michael Clark outlined ways in which United States-based mutinational corporations presently support the South African government in his lecture on "Profits and Apartheid" following last Thursday's candlelight vigil.

According to Clark, 300 U.S. corporations have $1.7 billion presently invested in South Africa, an amount which constitutes 17 per cent of South Africa's net foreign investment. In addition, he said, a total of 6,000 U.S. companies have "some sort of trading relationship with South Africa," although no more than one per cent of the overall assets, sales and profits of any U.S. company are derived from that country.

Among the indirect methods of US support of the present South African regime he cited the lending of money, the paying of taxes, and the supplying of strategic materials. Both the black majority and the white minority recognize the importance of the role that the corporations play, Clark stated. "The question is, will Americans realize this?"

Clark stated that American corporations need to sever all trade relations which support the South African government. "The moral responsibility of the companies in South Africa cannot be weighed by total wages, working conditions or whether they segregate their washrooms," he emphasized.

Trustees explain stands

proposing shareholder resultions if the advisory committee recommended them.

Trustee Martha Wallace told students Thursday that she had been to South Africa several times in the last five years and had noticed "a remarkable improvement" in the economic condition of black South Africans affected by American employment. Some of these improvements have been in violation of South African law, she added. In response to charges that the number of people so affected was small, due to the small number of people employed by U.S. firms, Mott responded that the effect of a U.S. withdrawal would therefore also be small.

Sneath conceded that the political situation in South Africa has worsened in the past year, despite economic improvements, but claimed that political reforms could not be brought about in the near future by American corporate action. Several trustees told the Thursday meeting that such political reforms could better be promoted by U.S. government action, and suggested that individual trustees and students write letters to government figures urging them to take political action. Chandler, who was not present at the Thursday meeting, stated that several trustees are already closely involved in organizations dedicated to combating apartheid and pressuring the U.S. government to take further action.

Mott also argued that divestiture as a general policy would have severe implications for the financial well-being of the College, and therefore would violate the fiduciary responsibility of the trustees to future Williams students and faculty. "Half of the Fortune 100 firms have some operations in South Africa, however small, and a blanket divestiture would put an extremely severe constraint on our investment managers."

He said the trustees have a legal and moral obligation to preserve the financial viability of the College for future generations, and cannot jeopardize that viability to pressure South Africa.

Reed to read from work

Ishmael Reed, novelist and poet, will give a reading from his works on Thursday, April 27, at 8 p.m. in 3 Griffin.

Reed is the author of the novels The Free-Lance Pallbearers, Yellow Back Radio Broke Down, Mumbo Jumbo, Flight to Canada, and two books of poetry, Chattanooga and Conjure. His most recent book is a collection of essays, Shrovetide in Old New Orleans. In 1975 his fiction received the National Institute of Arts and Letters Award.

Men's crew wastes Wesleyan. All six crew boats swamped Little Three opponents in Middletown this weekend. (photo by Ericson)

Crews sweep Little 3 races

Men's

The Williams College Boat Club stole the show as they won every event they entered Saturday in Little Three competition on the Connecticut River in Middletown.

The Williams varsity men's crew made history as it rowed past Amherst and Wesleyan to win its first Little Three rowing championship and the Saratoga Oar Trophy. The Saratoga Oar is given annually to the winner of the varsity boat race between Williams, Wesleyan and Amherst. A Williams crew has not won the Trophy since it was donated in 1968.

As expected, the race was a duel between Williams and Wesleyan. Amherst faded early. The two crews jumped out together and were even as they settled into the 2000 meter race on the rain-swollen river. After trading seats for 500 meters the Williams eight began to move through the Wesleyan boat, anticipating the Cardinal's perennially fast sprint.

Passing the 1000 meter mark, the Purple oarsmen pulled out to a boat-length lead. With 750 meters left in the race, coxswain Molly Burchell called the stroke rating "up two" to counter the Wesleyan sprint. As the two crews pounded toward the finish, the Cardinal boat took back several seats but could not pull it out, as Coach John Peinert's oarsmen finished in 5:34 with a comfortable four-second margin.

The Purple freshmen continued Williams' Little Three dominance in that category as Coach Brian Norris' '78 heavy and lightweight crews both rowed to convincing wins. The heavyweights powered their way past the Amherst and Wesleyan frosh and never looked back as they finished with a length of open water on the Cardinal frosh, with Amherst a distant third.

Women's

Williams Women's Varsity boat has held the Elizabeth R. Neal Trophy since its initiation in 1975 and was not about to give it up in Little Three competition this Saturday.

The Williams eight began behind the Wesleyan boat on the staggered start, but caught it in only ten strokes. The Amherst Jeffs faded back into the Connecticut river even faster. The Ephwomen steadily took seats away from the Wesleyan boat.

By the first 1000 meters of the 2000 meter event, Williams commanded a boatlength and a half lead over Wesleyan. The varsity finished in a fast 6:11.2 time.

Williams provided the only real competition of the day against their own women's crews. The Williams novices gave their fellow varsity lightweights a run for their money in a race against the Wesleyan novices. Both Williams boats started off the 2000 meter event strongly, waving their oars goodbye to the Wesleyan froshwomen. The staggered start gave the Williams lights a lead which they refused to give up.

Throughout the first 1000 meters the lights held a two-to three seat lead while the novices threatened them with every stroke. After the first half of the race the lights steadily gained while the novices steadily wained. The lightweight eight "broke through the novices" (passing the entire boat) around the 1500 meter mark. Cox'n Cindy Goheen called for a sprint from her mean and lean crew near the end in order to increase the margin of victory.

Williams batters beat Bates Bobcats

by Frank Pergolizzi

Despite giving up four unearned runs in the last two innings, the Williams College baseball team held on to defeat Bates College Saturday, 7-6.

Pete Kastrinelis started for Williams and ran into early trouble. In the top of the second inning, he found himself in a bases loaded, none out situation, the result of two singles and a walk. However, the senior righthander induced the next two batters to ground the ball back to him, forcing two runners at the plate.

The Ephmen came back with two runs in the bottom half of the third inning. DH Rick Walter led off with a double to left center field. First baseman Ken Hollingsworth was hit by pitcher Dave Casey, putting runners on first and second. Walter and Hollingsworth worked a double steal, allowing Walter to score on a subsequent Casey wild pitch. Hollingsworth scored on a fielder's choice by right fielder Bill Masse.

The Bobcats tied the score in the next inning. DH Dave Farris walked, went to second on a single by catcher Al Cook, third on a walk to Gabree, and scored on a fly ball to right by Spotts.

Casey and Albert settled down and the score remained tied until the sixth inning.

The Ephmen added two more in the seventh. Walter singled, but was thrown out attempting to steal. Shortstop Scott Harrington followed with a bloop single to left. He went to second on a fielder's choice by Hollingsworth and scored on a triple by left fielder Frank Kreutz. Labombard knocked in Kreutz with a ground single to left.

Albert was breezing along when three Williams errors in the top of the eighth allowed Bates to tie the score. Second baseman Jim Bazzano walked. Cook hit a ground ball to deep shortstop that was fielded cleanly by Harrington. He made a long throw in an attempt to nail Cook at first. Bazzano tried to take third on the throw, but Hollingsworth had alertly fired the ball to Labombard. The third sacker misplayed the throw allowing Bazzano to score and Cook to reach third. Cook scored when right fielder Masse dropped a line drive by Gabree. Gabree later scored on a single by left fielder Bob Asensio. The three unearned Bates runs tied the score at 5.

Williams bounced right back with two runs in the bottom of the inning. McEniry led off with a single but was out at second when Williams was again unable to sacrifice bunt successfully. John Friborg reached first on the attempted sacrifice. Emrick hit Walter with a pitch, putting runners at first and second. Friborg and Walter worked a double steal and Friborg scored on a bad throw to third by Cook. Walter scored on a double to deep left by Hollingsworth.

Sophomore John Carey was on the mound for the top of the ninth. Carey walked leadoff hitter Pugatch. Harrington threw out first baseman Gary Page on a slow ground ball up the middle. Pugatch tried to take third on the throw to first. Hollingsworth's throw again had the runner beat but Pugatch knocked the ball out of Labombard's glove and scored on the error. That made the score 7-6, Williams. When shortstop Greg Zabel doubled to left field, Williams' coach Jim Briggs brought in senior right hander Steve Maier. Maier walked the first batter. But with the tying and go ahead runs on base, Maier got Bazzano to look at a third strike and Cook to fly out to right field.

Albert picked up the win, making his record 2-0. The junior righthander went 52-3 innings, giving up four hits and four runs (three unearned). Albert had previously been unscored upon, but his ERA is still at a low 0.69.

Tufts upsets Netmen 6-3

by Evan Bash

Just when it looked like the men's tennis team was flying high, a gust of wind and Tufts brought the racketmen fluttering helplessly to the ground in a 6-3 upset Saturday.

Like rain in a football game, wind serves as neutralizer in a tennis match. When the netmen failed to adjust their games to the conditions as the Tufts players did, the advantage went to the Jumbos.

Williams hung tough in the singles, trailing only 4-2. With the three doubles matches to be played, the Purple still had a good chance to take the contest. But Tufts again delivered in the doubles as they had in the singles, securing the upset.

Only Martin Goldberg and Evan Bash managed victories in the singles. Goldberg, undoubtedly the Ephs most consistent performer, played a strong match in an easy 6-2, 6-2 triumph. Using an attacking game, Bash secured a 6-1, 7-5 win at the fifth position.

Stymied at the other spots, captain Jim Parsons took the only other set for Williams in the singles. Captain Jim fell just short with a 6-3 loss in the third, while Dan O'Connell and Allen Barnes lost by 6-4, 6-1 scores. Peter Friesen never got his touch in a 6-1, 6-0 loss.

Williams' doubles have been strong all year, but Saturday just wasn't to be the Eph's day. After Goldberg and Parsons captured the first match 6-4, 6-2 in a strong show, to narrow the match score to 4-3, things looked brighter. But Mitch Reiss and Bash, in their first match in the line-up, dropped a tough one, 7-6, 6-1, to give the Jumbos the match. Tad Roach and Barnes capped the afternoon in an unfortunately fitting way, losing 6-0 in the third.

This afternoon the Ephs faced Trinity, and this weekend coach Sean Sloane's squad travels to Amherst for the New England tournament.

Eph stickmen fall to U of M laxers

by Wayne Eckerson

A sunny day brought a large crowd to the slopes surrounding University of Massachusetts' lacrosse field to see the Minutemen ease past the Williams College stickmen 18-11.

The Williams laxmen were anxious to pull off a first-time victory against Coach Dick Garber's rebuilding squad. Garber graduated several All-American players and his team has dropped below last year's high ranking among Division 1 schools.

Williams' high hopes were smashed early. Capitalizing on several errors, Massachusetts rolled up a resounding 7-1 first quarter lead which swelled to 12-2 at half-time.

Massachusetts seized upon Williams' little mistakes—missed ground balls, bad passes, sloppy team defense, and unnecessary penalties—which have been overlooked against less precisioned teams.

The second half saw a reversal of Williams' first half performance. Williams outscored Massachusetts 9-6 total and 6-2 in the fourth quarter.

"We finally started to move offensively, control loose balls, and successfully clear the ball," said Coach Renzi Lamb. "We need to continue that type of play in our remaining games."

Pete Thomsen and John Glynn contributed most to Williams late rally. Thomsen pitched in four goals and added one assist, while John Glynn scored a career high three goals.

Jumbos tie women's lax team

Three quick goals within the first ten minutes of play and a 4-2 halftime lead were not enough for the women's lacrosse team as Tufts fought back in the second half to secure a 5-5 tie.

First home Sally Kruse tallied twice and second home Mary Fish added a score before the Jumbos got on the scoreboard with a goal at 12 minutes into the half. Sarah Baldwin, on attack wing, extended Williams lead to three goals before Tufts narrowed the margin to two with five minutes left in the half.

The Williams defense continued to work well together in the second half, yet Tufts managed to slip in three goals within the first eight minutes of the period. The defensive squad of third man Dawn Bedrosian, cover point Joy Rotch, point Marcy Holmes and goalie Marty Taft tightened up to hold Tufts scoreless for the remainder of the contest.

Down 5-4 with eight minutes left to play, Williams came back to tie the game on a goal by third home Sue Wright. The Ephs pressed Tufts defense in an effort to score the winning goal, but they couldn't quite do it as several shots in the closing minutes of play went wide of the goal.

The Williams women's lacrosse team hopes to improve on its 11-1 record when it travels to Smith for a 3 P.M. game this Thursday.

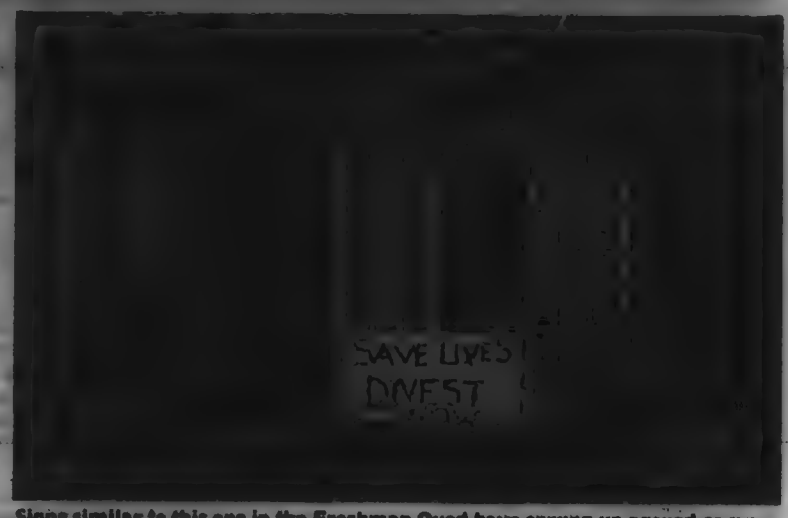
Winter Study Committee discusses future plans

by Tim Jones

The Winter Study Review Committee, described by its chairman William Grant, professor of biology, as "proceeding with all dispatch, but also with a low profile," began its investigation of the College's January term at its first meeting Tuesday.

"Under no circumstances will Winter Study 1979 be changed. The Faculty has already voted on the calendar for the upcoming year so it's locked in," Grant stated. The committee at this time is intent on preventing the circulation of rumors about its future decisions. Grant emphasized that at this point "members of the committee have no idea what our final recommendation will be."

Before any conclusions are reached, the committee will solicit opinions from the College community. The committee decided early this week that the senior class should be polled before graduation on their feelings regarding Winter Study, said committee member Lucienne Sanchez '79. It is important to canvass the seniors, she stated, "because they have had four Winter Studies here."



Sanchez and the other student members of the committee, Susan Laidlaw '80 and Joel Smith '79, have arranged for College Council house representatives to poll the seniors. The class of '78 will be asked to describe Winter Study's weaknesses and strengths and to outline ways in which it can be improved.

The Faculty will also be questioned about Winter Study during the next few weeks. In addition to delineating the program's drawbacks and attributes, they will be asked to relate their own feelings on courses they have taught and the student response to them. The present freshmen, sophomore, and junior classes will be asked to complete questionnaires next fall.

"If we decide that changes should be made," Grant said, "I would hope that we could have a recommendation (for changes in Winter Study 1980) on the President's desk by the end of the fall semester."

The Winter Study Review Committee was created in March at the urging of the Faculty Steering Committee. It was put together, according to committee member Gary Jacobsohn, professor of political science, in response to faculty "dissatisfaction" with Winter Study as it currently stands. "Clearly there are problems" with the program, he said. Winter Study is also overseen by another student-faculty committee with predominantly administrative responsibilities.

The six faculty appointed to the committee by the President are: Jean-Bernard Bucky, Grant, Sherron Knopp, Jacobsohn, Paul Solomon, and John Stambaugh. Its ex-officio members are David Booth, R. Cragin Lewis, Robert Peck, and Philip Smith.

Clamshell Alliance holds workshop

by Stu Massad

Clamshell Alliance, the coalition of anti-nuclear groups from throughout New England, brought its "no nukes" message to Berkshire County with a "Non-violence Training Workshop" Sunday at Dodd House.

The workshop, which provided training in "organized non-violence as a tool for social change," is a prerequisite for Clamshell's June 24 occupation of the nuclear power site being constructed in Seabrook, N.H.

There organizers expect that some 10,000 occupiers from throughout the Northeast will face arrest and dispersal by gas, fire hoses, police dogs and mounted troopers, as well as arrest. All trainees, while not required to commit themselves to occupation, received tips on how to resist dispersal without provoking police.

Trainees were taught:

To resist a charging dog, huddle in a tight group. To resist arrest, go limp. In jail, refuse bail, since bail discriminates against the poor. Keep calm, and try to persuade everyone—police, workers, media and bystanders—to oppose nuclear power.

Williams students joined with area residents and students from North Adams State for the workshop. Four trainers, all veterans of last year's Seabrook occupation where over 1,000 were arrested, mingled the philosophy of non-violence with tips on tactics.

The trainers described the history of passive resistance as used by war resisters, suffragists and civil rights activists, the heritage of Gandhi and King.

Training techniques ranged from a movie and slide show to discussion and massage. In a role playing session near the end of the workshop, trainers and trainees as police and occupiers practiced their passive resistance skills.

Trainers explained in detail Clamshell's innovation on the traditional theory of non-violence, the "affinity group." Groups are organized around common interests or geographical origin and number around 20. They are designed to give members coolness and confidence in crisis, and to provide an organizational unit with medic, moderator and media coordinator.

Clamshell, trainers emphasized, is not merely a push to end the nuclear age. They claimed it is a drive for a new "decentralized society" based on non-violence, consensus and respect for the individual.

The workshop was the first of its kind in Berkshire County. The trainers, who came to Williamstown from other Western Massachusetts communities, promised to return to hold other workshops in North Adams and Pittsfield. In addition, Greg Weber and Stu Massad are organizing another workshop for Williams before final exams begin.

Survey shows drinking plays important role on campuses

Less than five per cent of New England college students abstain from drinking, according to the April 1978 newsletter of the Medical Foundation, Inc. This finding emerged from the Foundation's survey of drinking and related factors among students in 34 colleges and universities in New England.

Another finding was that male collegians drink more often and in larger quantities than women and become intoxicated more frequently. The statistics indicated that male students, unlike females, drink more frequently as they progress through college.

The large majority of both sexes, according to the survey, began to drink before entering college. Their drinking level in high school is the strongest indication of how much they will drink in college.

The report also suggested that "pressure to do well in school is felt by the students to be their greatest problem."

Regular drinking (at least weekly), drinking in sizeable amounts, and drunkenness were found to be not at all uncommon. Other findings included that beer is the favorite alcoholic beverge of New England male collegians, but not of the women; there is a relationship between drinking and smoking cigarettes, and a strong relationship between drinking and use of marijuana and illicit drugs.

The Foundation's director of research, Dr. Henry Wechsler reported that women usually drink in small groups of both sexes or with one person of the opposite sex while men are as likely to drink in groups of men only as in mixed company. Wechsler added that women who drink frequently and in large quantities report more personal and social problems than abstainers or occasional drinkers; this tendency though was less evident among men.

The Foundation's survey, when compared to a national survey conducted by Robert Straus and Seldon D. Bacon in 1950, suggests that today's students are drinking more often and in larger quantities than their counterparts did a generation ago.

In 1950, according to the Straus and Bacon study, 20 per cent of college men and 40 per cent of college women considered themselves abstainers. In addition, the report indicated that 21 per cent of the men and 35 per cent of the women had their first drink in college. The Medical Foundation's survey indicates that about 90 per cent of both sexes had their first drink before college.

The Foundation's aim was to discover the extent of drinking, the social context of its use, reasons for drinking, problems associated with drinking, and stresses experienced by students, among other items.

The sample college,s located in five of the New England states, represented state and private universities and colleges in urban, suburban, and rural settings, both co-educational and all-women colleges, and large- and small-sized colleges.

The study sample included 10,500 students, with more than 7,000 students (72 per cent) completing the 15-page questionnaire. Participation was voluntary, and procedures to safeguard anonymity and the confidentiality of responses were described to the students.

Council appoints 4 committees

The College Council elected the memberships of five CC committees Wednesday night. The Council accepted Elections Committee recommendations in each case.

Elected to the All College Entertainment Committee were Steve Case '80 (co-chairman), John Svoboda '79 (co-chairman), David Weinman '81, Keith Scott '81, Bill Webster '79, David Monnich '80, and Janet Lavin '81.

New Finance Committee members are Sally Midgley '81, Matthew Heineman '79, Darrell McWhorter '81, Mark Lanier '80, Michael Rayder '81, Alex Fort '79, and Diana Durivage '80.

Selected for the Admissions Committee were Priscilla Locke '81, Vicky Fleming '79, Marcia Leous '79, John Coleman '81, Janet Allaire '80, and Sandra Polin '80.

New members of the Career Counseling Committee are: Anne Salladin '79, Sandra V. Cochrane '80, Patricia Clark '80, Kathleen Oram '81, Jennifer Macintyre '80, John Adams '79, and Scott Kapnick '81.

The four heavily contested positions on the Lecture Committee will be filled by: William Ballew '80, Peter Winn '80, Scott Kapnick '81, and Gary Cole '81.

A debate followed the recommendations to the Lecture Committee. Several representatives voiced feelings that the application process was an inadequate way to evaluate nominees for some committees. Elections Committee members and others defended the system currently in use, saying that it facilitated objectivity and fairness in the selection process. Dean Eileen Julien expressed concern that a woman had not been named to the Lecture Committee, and endorsed the consideration of factors other than the application essay in the evaluation of applicants.

Sarah Mersereau '80 of the Housing Committee confirmed the accuracy of a recent Record article which dubbed that body a "rubber stamp for the Dean's Office."

Carolyn Dye '80 was elected as CC representative to the Housing Committee to succeed Mersereau, who is no longer on the Council.

Students enlarge monitor services

by Stacy Silverstein

In the wake of last year's murder and rape scares, Campus Security instituted the Student Monitor Service to meet a growing demand for campus protection.

"When things don't happen, you are being productive," says Walter O'Brien, Director of Security. He said he considers the monitors to be "of invaluable assistance" to the small full time security force of men. Their primary function is to serve as a late night escort service, but the monitors have helped out in other situations as well. When trouble arose with a group of high school students from Pittsfield, Security called for the assistance of the monitors. The combined strength of officers and monitors brought the fighting under control and prevented a near-riot.

Other duties are less dramatic but equally important. They include parking lot stake-outs following streaks of vandalism and general campus surveillance. In the beginning of the year, monitors often focused on Freshman Quad activities, anticipating outbreaks of water fights.

A closer rapport between the students and the Security Department is another source of satisfaction for Mr. O'Brien. The monitors seem to share this feeling. Frank Pergolizzi, '78 commented that among students, there is a "new respect for the full time men." He was also pleased to discover that Security has "a real concern for the welfare of the student body."

Of the six student monitors—Brian Fales, Colin Hart, Bill Pursche, John McGovern, Gary Hutchinson, and Frank Pergolizzi—two will be graduating in June. Several students have already placed their names on a waiting list for those two positions. In choosing new monitors, O'Brien will give first priority to students already holding jobs in the Security Department.

This year's monitors are all male, but O'Brien mentioned that he'd "be only too happy to hire girls." So far, however, the women that he has spoken to have objected to the late hours of the job.

Security hopes to expand the hours and responsibilities of the student monitors. They already provide much-needed assistance to the Department, but according to O'Brien, "they could be used even more."

NEWS BRIEFS

The Trustee Buildings and Grounds and Budget and Financial Planning Committees voted Friday to consider further the purchase of a new computer. At their June meeting the trustees will decide which of the two systems already approved by the Computer Services Committee will be bought.

"Some of the trustees offered to let the College use their corporations' expertise (in the computer field) to evaluate the two remaining vendors," said Trustee Secretary and College Treasurer Francis H. Dewey III. The new computer, he added, should be installed by the end of 1978.

PARENTS ADVISE STUDENTS ON CAREERS DURING PARENTS' WEEKEND Saturday, April 29, thirty parents will advise students in career areas of Arts, Communications, Law, Business, Education, Medicine, and Community Affairs. Informal discussions will start at 3 PM and a panel on Dual Careers will start at 4 PM at Mears House. The career sessions are sponsored by OCC in cooperation by the Pre-Law Society, Pre-Medical Committee, and the Feminist Alliance.

Letters: legal, moral issues, ids and road trips divest?

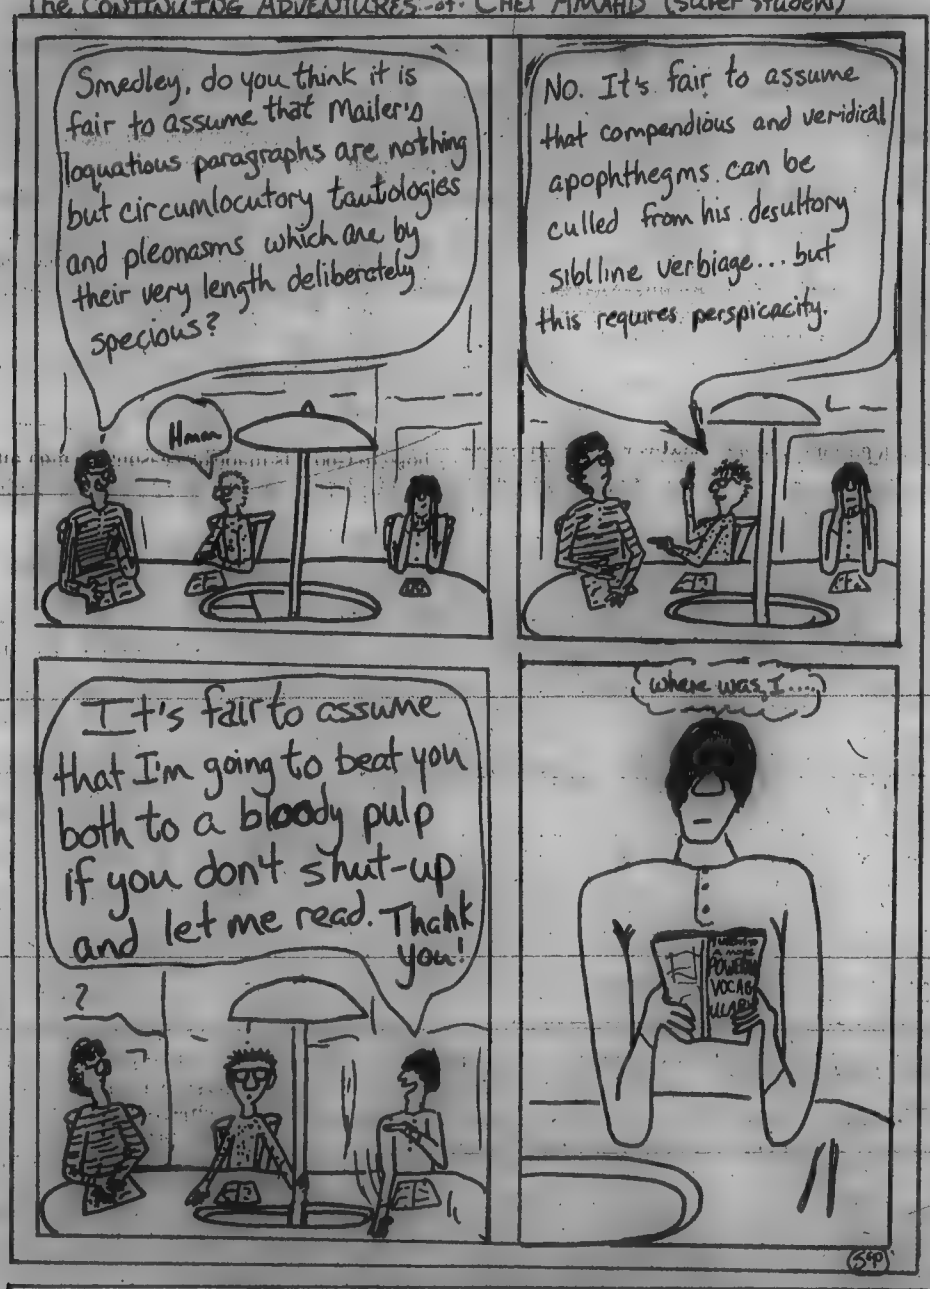
To the editor:

It was a moving, even a beautiful sight to see the silent vigil the other night about the faculty club, the candles and the sign: DIVEST. My doubts about the vigil stem from my inability to understand the reasoning behind it. Suppose we do "divest." Stock certificates do not sit around in Wall Street offices unowned. If we sell someone else will buy—someone who is not likely to be interested in South Africa and will vote with the management on proxy questions. Will we have helped the people in Soweto?



Just for argument, let me propose the opposite course: try to persuade the College to become actively concerned in South Africa. To invest in companies that do business there, to consider, through the present Advisory Committee or its successor, what impact, good and bad, such companies can have, to vote the stock carefully, consistently, intelligently. Williams has not much leverage with its holdings. What if many colleges and universities became involved? Or labor unions with their enormous pension funds? Such a course would not succeed overnight. People would have to keep at it, analyzing and persuading. There are no fast, easy solutions to complex problems. Candlelight vigils, though uplifting, do not suggest to me the stubborn, patient, molecular work which slowly turns societies around. Rather, they suggest to me: "How cruel, how bad. Let us get as far away as possible. Divest, remove, exit, quit, then we won't have to do anything more."

What bothers me is that the leaders of the divestiture movement must have thought about all this and concluded that the easy course is in fact the best one. Could we have the reasoning explained to us? I don't want to hear anything about morality. Morality is a boring and static concept that smells of self-righteousness and blacklists and arbitrary censorship. I note that the organization calling for divestiture calls itself the Anti-Apartheid Coalition. If opposition to apartheid is equated to favoring of divestiture, then what is opposition to divestiture?

I would like to hear exactly how divestiture is going to work to the advantage of Black people in South Africa. As far as I can understand, this is the only important question. For the sake of argument I have suggested another, more obvious course, even though one can make quite strong arguments against it. Isn't it time to turn off the apparatus of persuasion—or coercion—until the community has had a chance to reach a rational consensus? Then perhaps people could stop persuading and get to work.

vigil dilemma

To the editor:

I was one of the many students last Thursday evening who hadn't wanted to attend the candlelight vigil sponsored by the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition.

Like many others who've questioned divestiture, I've struggled with balancing the economic reasons against the moral ones. One can't simply reduce the solution to, "Well, it's morally right that we divest and that's all that matters". If the answer was that easy, we wouldn't have a problem. Whether we like it or not, it's the trustees who make the final decision and they are viewing us as idealistic kids who haven't yet had a chance to see what a jungle the real world is. Therefore, it is crucial that they understand that those who support divestiture also know completely why they support divestiture. This doesn't come through in any mass demonstration.

But I attended the vigil anyway, not because I was responding to peer pressure, but because I couldn't not go. After hearing more economic reasons why Williams should stay in South Africa than would seem possible, I nonetheless believe that we should divest. My feelings come not as a result of the emotional stories, the stimulating speeches or the dedication of so many concerned students, although all these factors helped increase my awareness. But I cannot deny that the situation in South Africa is wrong, and by investing in corporations that are working there, Williams is symbolically sanctioning oppression.

It's important, then, that everyone on campus attend the activities supporting divestiture and that they understand why they are doing so. It's frustrating enough to be a college student anyway because it seems as though there's so little one can do. But let's at least take advantage of the small power that we do have. The trustees aren't stupid; they know that this is a growing movement across the nation. If they still choose not to withdraw from South Africa, it will no longer be just the students who are living in Williams' ivory tower.

To the editor:

I have two questions for Ross Keller.

Why do I, a board contract holder well-known by checkers at Driscoll, have to sign a chit when I forget my id. while row house diners aren't even asked to produce one?

And why must the College pay for personalized blue chits when the least expensive and most practical solution to meal stealing is to just take a closer look at the i.d.'s of those who are unknown to checkers?

I eagerly await justification

Name withheld for fear of association.

genocide

To the editor:

From Monday's New York Times, about refugees who escaped from Vietnam by boat:

"For 18 days they bobbed helplessly ... On the sixth night, a freighter stopped 20 feet away. For three hours, enough time to check with a home office by radio, the ship sat there while the refugees shouted and pleaded and the crew looked down from the decks in silence. Then the engines started and the freighter pulled away.

"'We were all prepared to die,' Miss Nguyen said, 'but we weren't prepared for all the suffering.' Twice a day each refugee ate one spoonful of rice. They trapped rainwater in raincoats but when it ran out, they drank the children's urine. Ship after ship passed, ignoring shouts and even a fire ...

"On the 16th day they caught some small fish and shared them. On the 18th day Miss Nguyen's 9-year-old sister died. On the 19th day her 11-year-old brother died. She said: 'They were so hungry, you know, and thirsty and we were all wet all the time and they just grew quiet and died.'

"On the 20th day, a Greek ship, the Krios, became the 23rd vessel to pass. 'We didn't even wave,' said Mr. Nguyen. 'We just watched it go and then went inside to die.'

"A little later, however, the Krios returned to rescue them. Crewmen donated clothing and food. The ship radioed requests for asylum to Taiwan and the Philippines but was refused. A call to the United States Naval base at Subic Bay in the Philippines went unanswered. And Japan refused to take the refugees until Greece promised to accept them if no one else would."

Fortunately, the United States has agreed to let in the boat people. But how can we let this go on so quietly? It is all very nice to condemn apartheid in South Africa, but it is wrong—morally wrong—to emphasize that while not paying due attention to the thousands of Vietnamese adrift in the ocean or the millions of Cambodians who have recently been murdered in their country.

We wonder how the world could have let the Holocaust happen. What are we doing now in the face of genocide in our time?

Road trip record

To the editor:

In full recognition of the effort Messers Adkinson, Mitchell, Rainey and Zerbino made in what they claim to be "the longest road trip in Williams history," (Record 4-14-78) I feel obliged to call this and your attention to the fact that their trip to Goucher and the University of Virginia was exceeded many times in the late 1930's by a group who often journeyed to Sweet Briar College, which is at least 60 miles beyond Charlottesville. I don't recall all the names of those intrepid voyageurs (long before turnpikes and the interstate highway system), but they include John Gilleth '40, Win Todd '40, Arch Knowlton '40, Bob Smith '40, Bob Cave '40, Steve Botsford '41, and me.

And can anyone match the trip which included Al Bedford '41 and John Newcombe '41, who decided to pass up the after-dinner demi-tasse at the Alpha Delt House and "drive down for a cup of coffee," a trip that took them to New York City where they dutifully drank a cup of coffee and then returned to Williamstown? This trip, fortunately, did not include me.

Bakke

To the editor:

In his column on the Bakke decision Peter Stark notes that his opinions will inevitably "offend some people." My reaction to his article was to sit back and wonder how he could exhibit such blindness and insensitivity to the fundamental issues of the court battle.

Stark refers to certain "principles" which he fears may be compromised should the Supreme Court legitimate Affirmative Action programs. A more fundamental question is, "Who will be hurt if Bakke is victorious?" The answer is no surprise. The very people who have suffered oppression and been denied opportunities for advancement because of their race, sex or religion will continue to be slighted.

One must ask Mr. Stark and those who join with him in the current uproar over quotas why they were silent when quotas were used to insure an abundance of places for privileged groups—historically White Anglo-Saxon Protestant Males.

Mr. Stark goes on to state that, "We are fools if we believe that three hundred years of oppression may be overcome by the imposition of legitimized discriminations." The real fools are those who truly believe the effects of past oppression will ever be overcome without the use of Affirmative Action. Given the ingrown nature of college admissions, for example, meaningful change will take generations unless legally expedited. Witness the advantage alumni children have in the admissions game, the referees of which are often alums themselves. Unfortunate as it may be, the only way to bring about an end to sexism and racism and to realize the goal of an egalitarian society put forth in the Constitution is through Affirmative Action.

Finally, Mr. Stark mentions the resentment generated by "reverse discrimination." Who will feel resentment? Certainly it will not be the woman or the black or the native American, etc., who is given a fair chance or compensated for past wrongs. The only resentment I can forsee is on the part of those people who will miss their oversized portion of the pie and will cease to enjoy the unfair advantages of the past. Understanding will come about when those who have been given a chance to obtain meaningful positions in the societal hierarchy show their basic humanity in dealing with all human beings. If future generations can bear witness to the diversity of ethnic groups which administer and serve as models in America, then understanding will be promoted.

Mr. Stark and those who agree with him would do well to think in terms of human misery instead of the protection of abstract principles; which have in the past benefitted them to the detriment of outsiders.

Students were great; the faculty was great; and the weather was great; what more could we ask for. The WAAC (Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition) has had as its main purpose the organizing of the Williams student body. Other activities have included the gathering of information and discussions with the Trustees. Each of these [illegible] proven successful in raising the conscience of the college community.

Students have expressed their growing knowledge of the oppressive regime in South Africa by actively supporting WAAC initiated proposals. Over 800 signatures have been collected on the petition started by the TNC last January. The candle-light vigil drew over 500 concerned students. The daily vigils have averaged over 50 students and on two occasions over 100 of us marched in protest of the racist South African regime. The rally on Saturday drew over 300 students and proved to be one of our most successful events by providing students with enough information and action to keep the South African issue alive in the talk of students for some time to come. What more can be asked of the students except that we must continue to strengthen our position by bringing South Africa out of our talk and onto the streets.

Consciousness raising has also occurred among the Trustees. They now acknowledge that Williams College has a responsibility as an investor in the corporations of the United States. Student pressure was instrumental in the creation of the Investment Advisory Committee. The Committee has recommended that the Trustees vote against management on three South African related proxies. The Trustees felt fit to accept this advice on only two of these votes. Finally, and most importantly, the Trustees, with a few exceptions, generally underrated the reality of the direct link that Williams College investment has to the oppressive South African regime. This acquiescence is minimal considering that 500 students and faculty drowned out the Trustee meeting discussion in the Faculty Club with chants of "Out Now!"

The Trustees have continued to deny the seriousness of the racist, family breaking, murderous, and morally deplete actions by the South African government. Furthermore, they attempt to deny that American capital, technology and taxes play a roll in supporting the apartheid state. They accept that in the past United States corporations invested in South Africa without regard to the racist implications of this policy. They refuse to even consider the possibility that corporations are unable to work within South Africa for the economic benefit of the black population. They forget the fact that corporations have been claiming progressive action since the early 1970's and nothing has been accomplished. They also don't understand that U.S. corporations can't have a widespread social impact when they only employ 0.2 per cent of the blacks in South Africa. This .2 per cent of Africans employed by U.S. corporations is meaningless compared to the damage done to Africans by the $2.5 billion dollars of U.S. money supporting that regime. When asked what specific steps have been taken by U.S. corporations to improve the lot of the black South African, Mr. Sneath, the Chairman of the Board and Chief of Operations of Union Carbide, Mr. Parish, Vice-Chairman of the Board of Upjohn Chemicals, and other influential Trustees were silent.

The trustees also have stated that they prefer to work with the established channels of the U.S. government and foreign policy apparatus. Yet when pressed on this point Mr. Sneath, clearly among the more influential of the trustees, stated that he was against trade embargos! It is the sentiment(s) of many within WAAC that Mr. Sneath's vision and his conscience is being clouded by the fact of the new Union Carbide plant on the border of Transkei South Africa.

In all the Trustees exhibited their gross lack of commitment in working towards a progressive solution to the problem of the social harm of our investments. They continuously claimed that they were unable to act as a unified group on this matter. This the WAAC cannot accept. As an organization with diverse membership we have always been able to discuss and hash out proposals so that collective action is possible and we question the competency of an administrative group that claims to be unable to do this. Few organizations require a unanimous concensus before acting and we wonder how these people have reached their positions of influence and power without working out differences amongst themselves. This claim in light of their overwhelming inactivity can only be viewed as a thinly disguised ploy. Case in point: the Trustees claim to have been working on the issue for close to six years, yet they have done and thus accomplished virtually nothing. Who are they fooling?

The WAAC expresses sincere and warm gratitude to all members of the College community who have voiced their awareness and concern about the College's support of Apartheid. Unlike those many who profess concern we have chosen to act and our unity and hard work has done much to advance the cause of freedom and self-determinatin for black South Africans. The progress we have made must be safeguarded, but WAAC is confident that concerned members of the community will continue to fight what the international community has defined as "Apartheid's crimes against humanity".

Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition

con:

Now is the time for all to aid . . . their college

The time has come for those of us who are fed up with the jeering rabble of demonstrators and protestors to take to the field of battle. No longer can we allow the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition to go unchallenged. In case you haven't heard the news, God did not grant a monopoly on morality to anyone.

As a constituent of, what I hope is, the more rational element on campus, the silent majority, I believe that one CAN be passionately against the South African regime, passionately against apartheid, and passionately against supporting that regime and its system and at the same time, be passionately against divestiture without being a racist, and without being morally insensitive. The two positions are not mutually exclusive.

I believe that we can all agree that apartheid is wrong—indeed, morally reprehensible. And if that is the case, why do we need a group calling itself the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition? There is no one here that must be pressured into abhorring apartheid. It comes naturally for truly concerned humanitarians everywhere—at home and abroad, in churches and corporate board rooms. The morality, or rather lack of morality, of apartheid is not at issue.

What is at issue, in the last analysis, is the means by which we can effectualize our common goal—the fall of the South African regime and the end to tyranny of the black majority by a small and rabid minority. And if we can all agree that means is the question, not ends, then we should also be able to agree to the proposition that means is not a moral issue, but rather, is a question of mechanics. And mechanical questions, such as how does one proceed from A to B, are answered by considering the efficacy, efficiency, and cost involved in using one means as opposed to another. Divestiture is but one means, and a very questionable means at best, of achieving our desired goal. It is not the only means, and for the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition to insinuate the contrary, and to couch that insinuation in terms of a moral law, is tantamount to insinuating that "If you're not with us on divestiture, then you're a racist." Only madmen "reason" with such a paucity of reason.

If Williams College is to take a formal position on which means is best to pursue our common moral goal, then let us hope that informed dicsussion on the pros and cons will result in a wise choice, that takes into consideration, not only the passions of today, but the ability of Williams to pursue its mission in the world tomorrow, as well. If Williams College must take a stand, and I'm not so sure that it must, then let us hope that the stand we take does not alienate those whose hearts are in disagreement; indeed, let us hope that the stand we take is one on which an informed and democratic community can agree is, in fact, most effective in successfully achieving our common end. If Williams College is to take a stand, then I hope to God it is made by reasonable men and women, and not by jeering mobs and sign-carrying moralists.

If you are in agreement with the sentiments expressed above, let your position be known to the faculty, administration, and trustees of Williams College. Write letters to them or to the Record, do anything except let the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition cow you into submission and make you a slave to their conception of morality. If you are morally opposed to apartheid and are against divestiture, then by God come out of your closets now, while there is still a chance to preserve debate and the free exchange of ideas among democratically inclined rationalists everywhere.

Change or Hypocrisy

I'm glad to see that the trustees of the College have come out in favor of corporate responsibility. They state in their letter to the editor of April 25 that, "Measured use of the voting power of our holdings is an aspect of our effort to support enlightened corporate conduct." Unfortunately, this statement is incompatible with the reality of what the College has been doing in recent years and weeks.

IBM: A Case Study

Last Monday, IBM held its annual shareholder meeting to consider and discuss a resolution from its stockholders about its corporate activities. This year, IBM was asked by some of its shareholders to consider a resolution concerning its sales of computers to repressive governments in South America. The resolution asked IBM to act to insure that the company's products are not used in the abridgement of human rights and asks the company to initiate an investigation in Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Uraguay to assess whether its computers are being used to aid police repression or to abridge human rights.

Williams is a major holder of IBM stock. The College's portfolio contains $1,446,000 worth of IBM common stock according to the "Williams College Report of the Treasurer For the Year Ended June 30, 1977."

Sometime within the past two weeks, a decision was made on whether Williams would vote its IBM stock in favor of the above resolution or against it. The Shareholder Advisory Committee did not even consider the IBM resolution. Members of that committee told me that it was not their intent, and indeed it was not within their capability, to systematically handle the College's shareholder resolutions this year. Rather, they had selected a few resolutions to consider and ignored the rest.

Because the Shareholder Advisory Committee took no action on the IBM resolution, as it has not taken action on about 90 per cent of this year's resolutions, Treasurer Dewey voted Williams' IBM shares. They were voted in favor of management and against the resolution asking IBM to stop selling computers to repressive governments.

The IBM resolution failed. Virtually all such resolutions do. (In fact, no resolution has ever passed which has not been favored by management.) Institutions like Williams are one of the reasons why, despite their rhetoric about supporting "enlightened corporate conduct."

The General Picture

If the case of IBM were an isolated incident, then there would be little to complain about. Unfortunately, it is not. Trustee Finance Committee Chairman Charles Mott '53 noted last weekend that the College has not traditionally voted stock proxies against management. That's a pretty innocuous statement until one realizes what it means. It means that in 1976, for instance:

1.] Williams voted against a resolution discouraging General Motors from expanding its operations in Chile until specific conditions were met.

2.] Williams voted against a resolution requesting Motorola to report to its shareholders on the working conditions in the company's facilities in South Korea and on its relations with the Korean government.

3.] Williams voted against a resolution requesting Union Carbide to stop importing chrome from Rhodesia until economic sanctions on that country voted by the United Nations had been lifted.

4.] Williams voted against a resolution asking IBM to report on its operations in South Africa and Namibia.

5.] Williams voted against a resolution asking Bristol-Myers to disclose information on its infant formula sales.

6.] Williams voted against resolutions to Ford, General Motors and Exxon requesting them to report on the political contributions they made [illegible].

7.] Williams voted against a resolution asking General Electric to report on all the adverse environmental impacts of the B-1 bomber.

(Treasurer Dewey confirmed these allegations noting, however, that in some instances Williams may not have actually voted its proxies because U.S. Trust Company did not bother to send him some of Williams' proxies. Instead, nominees from that bank's trust department probably voted Williams shares against these resolutions.)

This is just a sampling of how Williams has been using its portfolio to "support enlightened corporate conduct." Dewey stated that Williams has voted against management only once in the past five years. That means that the College has been voting against resolutions supporting affirmative action, equal employment opportunities for women and political nonpartisanship as well.

Well, I suppose that one could argue that what is past is done with and there is no use crying over spilled milk (or in our case, over dead babies who were fed diluted infant formula milk.) After all, the trustees have now gone publicly on record as saying that they will "minotor" the activities of corporations in which the College is a shareholder. Everything is now being taken care of; or is it?

I wonder how the College will vote on the resolution to ITT coming up soon asking that nice corporation what the hell it's been doing in Chile. I wonder how the College will vote on the resolution coming up asking Exxon to affirm its political nonpartisanship. I wonder how the College will vote on the resolution coming up asking Ford to disclose information about any former government employees it has employed or retained in top management positions.

The Shareholder Advisory Committee is not, at this time, planning to consider these or the other upcoming resolutions. Members of that committee maintain, perhaps rightly, that their chief task now must be to set guidelines for what next year's Shareholder Advisory Committee will do. Unfortunately, the inaction of the committee on a resolution is being taken by the administration and trustees as an endorsement of voting in favor of management.

It seems to me that the trustees have a responsibility to, at the very least, deal with this issue in a straightforward manner. If they want to argue that Williams can best influence corporate behavior by holding on to its stocks in corporations which have strayed from the straight and narrow path, then they better be able to demonstrate that Williams is using its voting power on the side of progressive change. The alternative is hypocrisy.

The Hostage

What about getting from one gag to the next?

by Lisa Fraser

It must have been one of those nights.

Any live performance risks a ragged night now and then. That danger infuses the theater with an excitement we can't get from movies or TV. Plays like The Hostage require a live and crackling circuit between the stage and the audience to break down the barriers between belief and artifice. And when the circuit shorts, as it did at the premiere of Jean-Bernard Bucky's production at the AMT on Friday night, we can't figure out why: faulty artistic conception, sloppy execution, or simply the vicissitudes of opening nights.

Brendan Behan's play doesn't fit neatly into any one style of performance. It juggles realism, absurdity, and music hall entertainment with Irish post-Revolutionary politics. We see a shifting series of masks, each one ripped aside only to reveal another. Appropriately, Bucky doesn't provide an answer. For him, the lodging-house is part myth and part Finnnian McLonerghan, complete with leprechaun stories and Irish whiskey, part modern-day PLO terrorism, and part Brechtian didactic musical stage.

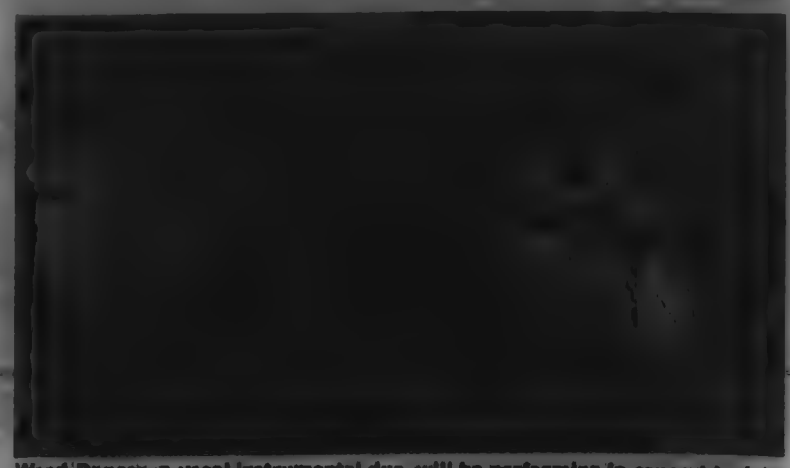
Such a play, then, demands an uncommon confidence and precision in performance if it is to evoke the complex reactions playwright and director intended. But when the company's characters falter and they are unsure of their relationship to the audience, the effect isn't ambiguity, or even hollowness—it is simply confusion.

In The Hostage, memories of a heroic struggle have congealed into self-indulgent delusion; and Bucky's updated version heightens a lurking sense of metaphysical absurdity. The revolution is not real; it is a godot more worthy than most. For the house's equally unreal inhabitants, it is a state of mind.

Unaccountably, many of the actors in this boldly theatrical play seemed to think of their characters as flesh-and-blood people with believable pasts and motives. Anybody who's seen Oklahoma knows that real people do not pivot to the audience and burst into song. Musicals need spirited and joyous entertainers to do that. The very best moments of Friday's uneven performance were the most brazen: when the menage-d-trois of Earl Childs, John Feltch, and Kevin O'Rourke wail into "We're Here Because We're Queer," we enjoy them so much because they're enjoying themselves.

Too few of the actors could ignite a similar enthusiasm. The entire first act labored under an unbearable turgidity. The energy level of a narcolepsy ward. The jolly music-hall vivance of Dorothy's Cafe. The play may be, as Bucky says, "a series of gags," but what about getting from one gag to the next? Even a musical comedy with a serious theme needs crisp and bright pacing. After Act I had been safely interred, moments of reaction and transition still lasted split-seconds too long, long enough to betray the cast's discomfort and confirm our own.

The shame of it is the loss of potentially effective performances, a loss more plainful in some cases than others. The central duo of Robert Gregory as Pat and Fran Civardi as Meg Dillon, bravely attempting a dialect American kids know only from Barry Fitzgerald movies, eventually find out where the audience is and bawl out IRA ballads the lustier the better. Namesake Stephan Bowers gives boyish UK soldier Leslie more life than has the rest of the cast put together. He finds the right acting style for this play: a delicate and energetic balance of two-dimensional song-and-dance and the fervence of a real character if not its credibility.



The most delightful relationship onstage, (in fact, the only one that really works), is the guilt-ridden pair of priggish Miss Gilchrist and pompous Mr. Mulleady. Cecilia Rubino and Gregory Boyd relish the play's most outrageous lines as zestfully as they do their entire performances. When Mulleady mutters and boasts ("my second cousin was a Kilkenny from Kilcock") in the frayed whispiness of a boggy civil servant gone to seed, his pallid jowls quiver like old jello.

But the best part belongs to Rubino as the frowsy "sociable worker" whose straight-laced primness dissolves into gushes of drunken self-recrimination and latent sensuality. She proves again that two-dimensional characters can be as compelling as more fully-rounded ones, and certainly more flamboyant. Every part of her body, every gesture, and response, is consummately and spontaneously Miss Gilchrist, from gimpy ankles to facial features sharp enough to cut stone.

Among a large cast, John Lloyd gives his customary workmanlike performance, this time as Monsewer, the constipated and dyspeptic relic of the pre-1918 Sinn Fein. If only he and the rest of the cast could give themselves over entirely to the audience and the acting ensemble, we might see The Hostage approach its director's conception. I'm unsure, but I plan to find out.

Actors Michele Corbeil and Stephen Bowers rehearse a light moment from Brendan Behan's music satire, THE HOSTAGE. The last Williamstheatre production of this season finish with performances tonight and tomorrow.

Wood Dancer, a vocal-instrumental duo, will be performing in concert tonight in the Rathskeller beginning at 9 p.m. Also appearing at 8 o'clock will be sophomore guitarist Mike Hill.

Music Notes

Myrna Nachman

Myrna Nachman, pianist, will give a free public recital on Tuesday, May 2, at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The program includes J. S. Bach's Partita No. 4 in D Major, B.W.V. 828, Robert Schumann's Fantasiestucke, Op. 12, and Franz Schubert's Sonata in A Major, Op. Posth.

Nachman, Visiting Assistant Professor of Music at Williams this year, is a native of New York City. She has been active as a performer, teacher, and musicologist. She received a Master of Musical Arts degree in piano from the Yale School of Music where she is completing a performance doctorate. She has also done advanced work in musicology at the City University of New York Graduate Center, where she is in the Ph.D. program in music history. The recipient of several awards, including the Ellsworth Grumman Scholarship, the Lado Award, and the Charles H. Ditson Award, Nachman has performed throughout the east coast and in the midwest in solo and chamber music programs at such places as Carnegie Recital Hall, Lincoln Center, the New York Historical Society, New York University, and Brooklyn College.

Griffin Hall Concerts

The tenth season of Griffin Hall Concerts at Williams College will conclude on Saturday, April 29, at 8 p.m., with a program of music for flute and harpsichord performed by Janet Geroulo and Victor Hill. Admission is free and open to the public.

The concert opens with the Handel "Sonata in G major" for flute and harpsichord and closes with the work in which Miss Geroulo made her debut in 1969, the Bach "Sonata in E minor." She will also perform a fantasia by Telemann for solo flute.

Hill, the founder and director of Griffin Hall Concerts, will present harpsichord music by three composers. Included are a set of variations by Pachelbel on the "Passion chorale" made famous by Bach, the "Suite in A minor" of Henry Purcell, and a selection of short pieces by Purcell's student Jeremiah Clarke.

Janet Geroulo is a graduate of Mount Greylock Regional High School and, in medical technology, of North Adams State College.

Berkshire Symphony

The Berkshire Symphony, under the baton of Julius Hegyi, will present its final concert of the season Friday night at 8:30 p.m. in Chapin Hall. Violinist Daniel Phillips will play Brahms Concerto in D. Major, Op. 77 with the orchestra. The concert is free with College ID.

In addition to the Brahms concerto, the program includes Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 in A Major and Liszt's Tone Poem The Battle of the Huns.

Daniel Phillips, still in his early twenties, plays like "a mature violinist and musician," according to the N.Y. Times review following his New York debut. Last year, after his graduation from The Juilliard School, he won the Young Concert Artists International Auditions and then the Bronze Medal of the Leipzig International Bach Competition in Germany. When only 15, he had won the Kosziuszko Foundation's Wieniawski Prize.

The Battle of the Huns, finished in 1857 when Liszt was in his mid-forties, was inspired by a mural painted by Kaulbach, which depicts Christianity's triumph over paganism. Less well known than Les Preludes and the Hungarian Rhapsodies, this highly pictorial work dictates that "the whole coloring must at first be very sombre and all the instruments like spectres in tone."

Brahms had written only one concerto, one for piano twenty years earlier, before he composed his D Major Violin Concerto in 1878. In three movements, the work is a display piece for the soloist's artistry, but is at the same time an ideal partnership of violin and orchestra. Brahms conducted the premiere performance in which Joachim, his good friend and great Hungarian violoinist, was soloist. One music historian has counted sixteen different cadenzas through the 100 years since that performance, but Joachim's remains the accepted one.

Dwyer and Ennis will perform major 19th century vocal works

Baritone Terry Dwyer and Pianist Paula Ennis will give a free public recital on Saturday, April 29th at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel, Williamstown. The concert is one of many special events planned for the Parents' Weekend at Williams.

The program includes four songs each by John Dowland, by Faure, and by Hugo Wolf, two by Modest Mussorgsky, and Schumann's Liederkreis, Op 39. Except for Dowland, whose songs were written in the very early part of the seventeenth century, the works all represent major nineteenth century composers for the voice, from England, France, Austria, Russia, and Germany, respectively. The Liederkreis (words for which were written by Eichendorff) is a collection of twelve songs composed immediately following an idyllic fortnight in Berlin enjoyed by Schumann and Clara, who would become his wife later in that year, 1840.

Dwyer is a graduate of Indiana University's school of music from which he holds a M.M. in vocal performance and is currently a resident of Albany, N.Y. where he is a member of the Capital Artists Opera Co. He is a voice instructor at Union College, Schenectady, N.Y., Hartwick College, Oneonta, N.Y., and at Williams. This past summer he was the bass soloist at the Aspen Music Festival and has appeared as soloist under the batons of Boris Goldovsky and Robert Shaw. Aside from operatic appearances in Der Freischutz, La Boheme, Carmen, and The Telephone among others, he has given several recitals in upstate New York. He made his debut recital in Williamstown in October, and was a soloist in the Williams Choral Society's performance of Mozart's Grand Mass last month.

Paula Ennis is on the piano faculty at S.U.N.Y.-Albany. A student of Menahem Pressler and a former Fulbright scholar, she is completing her Doctorate in Music in piano. Among her many concert appearances are her recital with Dwyer in October and with Douglas Moore at Williams last year.

Sour Pickles

A layman's guide to Division III

by Peter Rintels

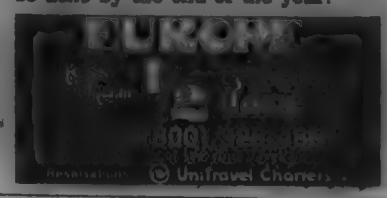
A large number of Division I and II people, I have found, would rather walk into a TNC meeting with a "Made in South Africa" T-shirt than set foot on the science quad. Well, it hardly seems right that so many people will leave Williams without some idea of what takes place on the south side of Main Street, so I grabbed my notebook last week and set about finding out what kind of research projects the people over there are up to.

In the Psychology Department, which is not really Division III, but close enough for our purpose, Professor McGill is doing research into animal behavior, in particular mammalian sexual responses. His latest paper, "Copulation in History Professors" will soon be published by a leading journal.

Professor Criswell, a physiological psychologist, is investigating the effects of various drugs such as alcohol on the brain and behavior. "I do most of my research on evenings and weekends," explained Criswell, "and I find it very stimulating, euphoric almost. I've also had many enjoyable collaborations with students and colleagues."

Professor Goethals is a social psychologist who is interested in non-verbal forms of communication. His plans right now call for his research to culminate in a translation of the Complete Works of Freud into body language. He is also interested in creative displays of displeasure and is investigating the possibility that a recently discovered pre-Colombian Aztec custom of stuffing tuna into the ears of people they did not like may be an instinctoid form of behavior that in modern times is repressed in infancy. I was going to pursue the point further with him when he produced a can of tuna from his desk and I took that as my clue to leave.

In other on-going work in psychology, Professor Crider, the abnormal psychologist, is being studied by other members of the department.



In the biology department, Professor Dewitt conducted me on a tour of the research facilities. We first passed a neurophysiology lab where Professor Woodcock was doing research on the nervous system. The nervous system, explained DeWitt, is hierarcharly, ordered like a phone system with the brain as the switchboard. Woodcock's results, he said, showed that people planning on using their nervous system heavily should do so after 11:00 p.m. when the rates are lower.

We then passed a locked door, which he said was a stalled project in biogenesis. "We're still waiting for a key piece of biological material and an electrical storm to complete the project," he said. "By the way, what size hat do you wear?"

"A seven, why?"

"Oh no reason. Just curious."

Dewitt also led me past a plant physiology lab where Professor Rosinski was at work under a commission from a cereal company to create a hybrid strain of rice, which when you puff it and add it to milk snaps, crackles, pops and sings the national anthem. "She's up to the third verse," said Dewitt, "and should be done by the end of the year."

Mountaineering #3.

METHODOLOGY

Mountaineering, as all but the chronically misinformed know, is the skill, the science and the art of drinking Busch Beer. It begins by heading for the mountains (i.e., a quick jaunt to your favorite package emporium or wateringhole) and ends by downing the mountains (i.e., slow slaking swallows of the brew that is Busch).

¶ However, between those two points lies a vast area of personal peccadilloes sometimes called technique and sometimes called methodology (depending on your major). Hence, this ad. ¶ Sipping vs. chugging. Both have their merits, of course. But generally speaking, except for cases of extreme thirst or a leaking glass, sipping is the more prudent practice for serious, sustained mountaineering. ¶ Next, the proper position. Some swear by sitting; others by standing. Suffice it to say that the most successful mountaineers are flexible, so you'll find both sitters and standers. (Except on New Year's Eve, when it's almost impossible to find a sitter.) ¶ Which brings us to additives. Occasionally a neophyte will sprinkle salt in his Busch; others mix in tomato juice, and a few on the radical fringe will even add egg. While these manipulations can't be prohibited (this is, after all, a free country), they are frowned upon. Please be advised that purity is a virtue, and the natural refreshment of Busch is best uncompromised.

¶ Finally, there's the issue of containers. Good taste dictates a glass be used. But bad planning sometimes prevents that. If you find yourself forced to drink from the can, you should minimize this breach of etiquette. Be formal. Simply let your little finger stick out stiffly (see Fig. 4). Happy Mountaineering!

Don't just reach for a beer. BUSCH Head for the mountains.

"Don't want no smart people . . ."

Much has been written in the past year about the discrimination suffered by Williams women, blacks, and homosexuals. In this emerging spirit of reform, I think it's time that the most blatantly institutionalized and readily apparent form of bigotry was unmasked. It is a sad but undeniable fact that those who happen to have lower IQ's are openly oppressed by the administration, the faculty, and the admissions department at Williams.

Such open and covert forms of anti-intellectual bigotry must be put to an end. An effort has already been made to have a statement inserted in the "Handbook" stating that, "Williams College does not discriminate on the basis of race, creed, sex, sexual preference, or intellectual capacity," but resistance from the administration and the trustees was so entrenched that the proposal was quickly tabled as soon as the older members of the board recovered from spasmodic fits of mocking laughter.

In the face of such opposition, I am requesting all members of the college community who support the less intelligent among us to wear "cut-offs" on Tuesday, May 2, as a demonstration of both solidarity and outrage. We certainly expect that Dean Berek, Professor O'Connor, and President Chandler will bare their legs to show their unflaggingly liberal concern for the cause of tolerance amidst diversity here at Williams. In addition, a silent vigil will be held each night at 10:45 PM outside the library to dramatize concern for the mentally impoverished.

As a final symbol of hope for those like myself who have faced the humiliation of "coming out of the closet," I offer this bit of musical [illegible]

"SMART PEOPLE"

Smart people got no reason
Smart people got no reason
Smart people got no reason to live

They've got little brown noses
And big GPA's
Bed's in the library
Been there for days

They use big words
But their minds are so slow
You got to speak in FORTRAN
Just to say hello

Well I don't want no smart people 'round me.

Smart people are just the same as you and I Want partial credit until the day they [illegible]
(It's a wonderful world)

Smart people got nobody
Smart people got nobody
Smart people got nobody to love

They've got fourteen calculators
Ten slide rules
They're taking all the places
In the graduate schools

They've got big thick glasses
And little beady eyes
Great big foreheads
And no sex lives

Well I don't want no smart people 'round here.

Trustees make appointments

The trustees voted Saturday to appoint Prof. Daniel O'Connor, Dean of the College, effective July 1. Asst. Prof. Dean Chandler will be an Assistant Dean.

Willard Dickerson will become Executive Director of Development, responsible for long-range planning of fund-raising, and John Pritchard will replace Dickerson as Director of Development, responsible for the day-to-day administration of the development effort.

Frederick Copeland, retiring Dean of Admissions, will become a Part-time Associate in Admissions. The Admissions Office will add Erik Bertelsen as an Assistant Director.

The trustees also appointed Eileen Julien Assistant Professor of Romanic Languages, Charles Dew Professor of History, and reappointed James Ogilvy Visiting Associate Professor of Philosophy, Timothy Cunard Lecturer in Art, and Julius Hegyi Lecturer in Music, Conductor and Violinist in residence.

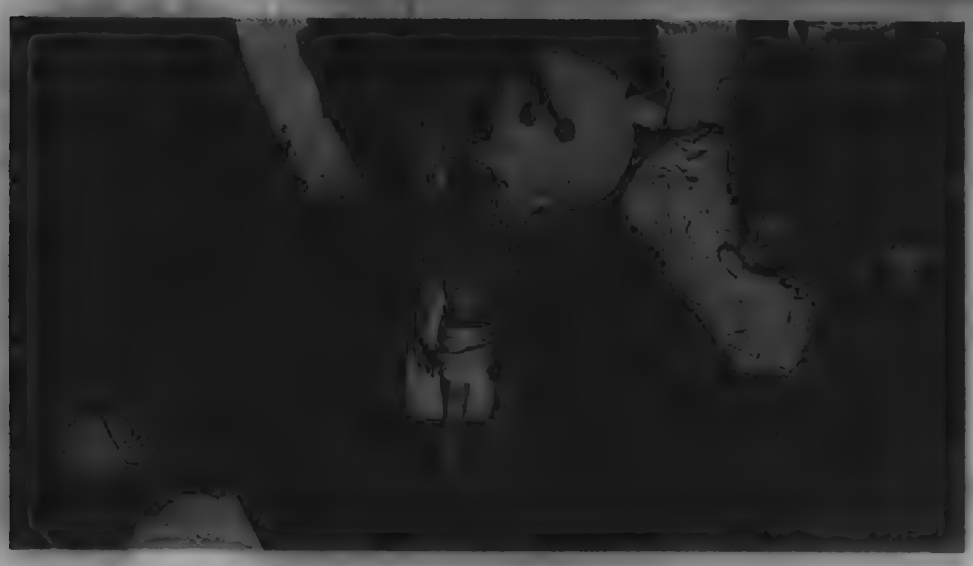
Musicians from Africa to perform

On Tuesday, May 2, Williams College will host the Batourou Sekou Kouyate Griots under the sponsorship of the Afro-American Study Program, the Black Student Union and the Anthropology Department. The musicians have come to the States from Mali, West Africa, where they are well-known and respected performers. In traditional Africa the griot was an oral genealogist, historian, and praise singer—an important and festive figure on all special occasions. On Tuesday evening the griots will demonstrate their art, singing tales and praise songs and playing the kora, an African instrument akin to our guitar and harp. All are welcome. May 2, Driscoll Lounge, 7:30 p.m.

Water polo hosts tournament

The Williams Water Polo club hosts its annual spring tournament this weekend, taking on a tough Trinity group at 4 p.m. Friday, prior to the season wrap-up against RPI Saturday at 9 a.m. in Muir Pool. The RPI game will be the final game for Williams seniors Guy Hoelzer, Mike Feltes, Mike Murphy and Mark Roche.

The Ephmen tuned up for tomorrow's tournament by trouncing Westfield State 13-7 last Saturday. Behind 2-1 early in the game, Williams scored 5 second period goals to put away the improved state squad. Hoelzer sneaked in four goals, with Murphy also hitting the mark four times. Roche hit the corner for 2 while Gordon Cliff, Brian McDermott and Peter Howd each supplied one goal, in the Eph's first spring victory.



The sun and temperatures of this week convinced sunbathers, frisbee throwers, teams, and quad groupies that spring has finally arrived.

The Mercury Column

Joseph Wood Krutch writes that "The charge most to be brought against New England is not Puritanism but February." The charge of the present Energy Conservation Committee was to identify areas of College life where energy conservation was possible and appropriate. We have done that, and our report will go to the administration and to the faculty. Its focus is on credibility and motivation: "Maybe there is a problem, but it's not my problem." Here are two excerpts from that report.

1. Students are not necessarily the most difficult constituency to reach but, being the largest, are of first importance. In the long run, indoctrination of incoming freshmen is the only plausible procedure. This committee is focusing on next year's J.A.'s now, with suggestions and invitations for cooperation. For upperclassmen, house managers are the natural overseers: They are paid to make sure that the house is in order. We have met or will meet with house managers, house presidents, and J.A.'s. The committee must continue to do this, if for no other reason (but there are other reasons) than to remind these people that they are models for the other students. Whether they like it or not they are models and, lacking better ones (no offense intended), they must form our cadre for the great leap forward into energy awareness.

Yale awarded $500 to the house doing best in electricity conservation during Feb. and March. We promoted two monthly contests on electricity, each with a $25 prize. (The heating plant is not set up to monitor heat to individual houses.) The students reacted interestingly: They found the electric usage problem "Mickey Mouse" compared to heat loss. This is where credibility gets into the act, and why credibility and motivation are two sides of the same problem. If students are convinced that the College is doing its collective part in energy conservation, it becomes easier to get them to do their individual parts. (This observation is not restricted to students, but because they are transient it probably hits with more force.) Contrariwise, if we can motivate a large subset of individuals their collective actions establish credibility for the whole operation and establish appropriate culture patterns, even among those who might not otherwise be so motivated. (Again, this observation is not only pertinent to students.)

2. We call upon the administration, in conjunction with this committee, to promote and publicize a rise in the discomfort index on the campus. No matter how much the College community practices conservation, we will eventually reach a point corresponding to "pollution overload." This is a technical term in ecology which refers to the practical upper limit of pollution control: The point where ecological cleansing produces more pollution than is cleansed. There are practical upper limits to energy conservation—as E. B. White says, "There is a limit beyond which you cannot push beauty because of the lines it leaves in the face." We must all be ready to be more uncomfortable than we are now, conservation or no. We cannot sit in our offices - classrooms - dormitories in our shirtsleeves without paying an exorbitant cost. The committee has already voted that all thermostats be turned down to 65 degrees. The administration should make clear, and this committee will support, a new standard of discomfort, unpalatable as that may sound. We must all be made to realize that, even if money were no object (which it is!), winter in the Berkshires involves a certain amount of just plain being cold and dark.

That last paragraph reflects the ideology (if such there be) of the Energy Conservation Committee report. My personal ideology should be clear after these almost-periodic columns. In the words of the Paris graffito: "Je suis Marxiste—tendance Groucho."

Ask Procter & Gamble what you can do with your BA degree!

You could become the advertising/marketing manager for one of these P&G products!

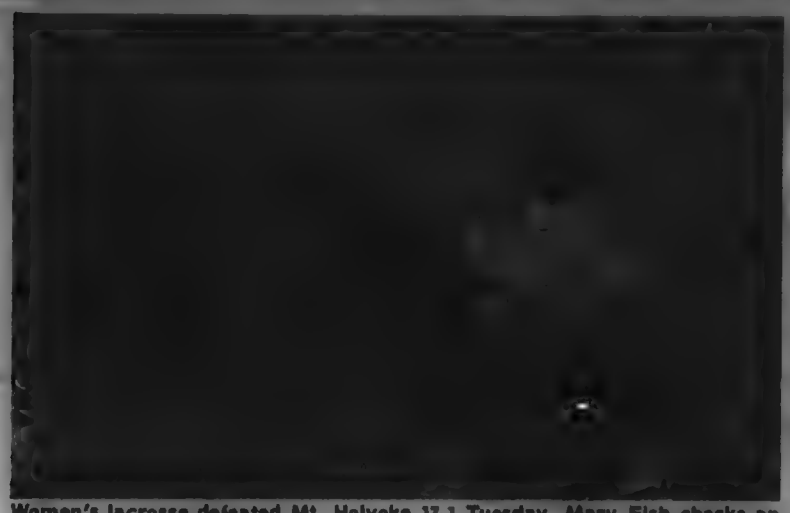
Although only 5 are shown here, Procter & Gamble makes more than 50 well-known, well-advertised consumer brands.

For each brand, there is a small management group, usually just 3 people, totally responsible for planning, creating and supervising everything that is done to increase consumer acceptance of their brand.

The group is headed by a Brand Manager, an important level of management in our company.

Right now, we're looking for a few highly qualified college seniors with the potential to become Brand Managers.

You would start at our Cincinnati headquarters as part of a brand group for a specific brand, perhaps one of those shown here. To help you learn quickly, your Brand Manager would give you challenging assignments of increasing responsibility in various key marketing areas such as TV advertising, package design, special promotions, budget planning and analysis, and market research.



The emphasis would be on you, your ideas, your ability to contribute. You'll be promoted on the basis of merit alone. It's not uncommon to become a full Brand Manager within 3-4 years.

Since you will begin to manage from the day you join us, we're looking for "take charge" people with outstanding records of leadership while in college. "Superior academic achievement", "innovative", "a record of being able to get things done", and "good oral and written communications skills" are some of the words we use to describe the people we want.

If this kind of work interests you and you think you qualify, please send me your resume.

Swiacki fans 12 for Amherst

by Frank Pergolizzi

Led by a 12-strikeout pitching performance by Bill Swiacki, the Amherst college baseball team edged Williams yesterday, 3-2. Swiacki gave up only five hits while walking one. Both Williams' runs were unearned.

Williams went ahead early, scoring two in the second inning. Ken Hollingsworth singled and Frank Kreutz reached base when shortstop Mark Manning booted a sure double play ball. After both runners were bunted over, Bob Labombard knocked them in with a line single to center field.

The Lord Jeffs got a run back in the third when Dave Jauss singled, went to second on a fielder's choice, and scored on a double by Bob Sternberg.

Williams' pitcher Tony Stall had to leave the game in the fifth when he sprained an ankle on his follow-through. Steve Maier was brought in to replace him.

Amherst won the game in the seventh. Frank Forgione doubled to left and Tim Moynahan walked putting runners on first and second. Rich Thompson cleared the bases with a triple to deep left field.

"At one point, he retired ten batters in a row."

Swiacki gave up only one hit in the last six innings, getting stronger as the game went on. At one point he reured ten batters in a row.

The 6-7 pitcher picked off one Williams base runner and catcher Eric Lundgren threw out two runners attempting to steal.

"It was a well played game by both teams," said Williams coach Jim Briggs. "The key to their victory was the way they shut off our running game."

Williams is now 4-5. The Ephmen journey to Maine this weekend for a Friday afternoon game against Colby and a Saturday doubleheader against Bowdoin. The box score:

Lacrosse bows to Big Green

by Nancy Rhein

Dartmouth's Big Green Machine rolled into Williamstown Wednesday, and coming off the momentum of a three goal lead, churned by the Williams men's lacrosse team 15-9.

The visitors asserted their strength early on, putting one past Williams' goalie Bob Cowin 45 seconds into the match. Dartmouth made it 3-0 before a stagnant Eph offense could get on the board with a minute left in the first quarter. Todd Eckerson went in unassisted to get Williams started, but Dartmouth was unwilling to lose the three goal lead and put in one more with :47 left to go up 4-1.

Williams first serious offensive threat came in the early going of the second stanza with frosh Brian Benedict firing in an unassisted tally 49 seconds into the period. While the visitors sat out on a slashing penalty, Tam Murray took a feed from Peter Thomsen to put Williams within one with twelve minutes left in the half. Williams offensive spurt was smothered quickly though, as Dartmouth fired in four more goals to put it 8-3 for the half.

As the second half began, Dartmouth added fuel to the fire, running the score to 11-3 as a dazed Williams squad stood by. The visitors ability to grab the ground balls and to keep the offense moving made the Big Green seem unstoppable—until attackman Dick Goodbody threw a kink into the well-tuned Dartmouth machine. Goodbody scored first with 5 minutes left in the third, and then repeated his unassisted tally two minutes later. Thomsen then got in on the action, assisting in Goodbody's third goal within the next minute.

Following a Dartmouth time out to regain composure, the visitors scored again to put Williams down by six. Dartmouth kept that lead as the two squads traded goals in the fourth quarter. Goodbody added one, while Thomsen took two from Eckerson to round out the nine Williams goals.

Williams now looks to Part I of the Little Three competition as they meet Wesleyan Saturday at 2 pm on Williams' Cole Field.

Spirited laxwomen pound Mt. Holyoke

by Mary Kate Shea

Everything just fell into place for the Williams College women's lacrosse team as an awesome attack and a defense that stuck like glue combined and Williams trounced Mt. Holyoke 17-1, raising its record to 2-1-1.

In the first half, the Ephs tallied eight times before the visitors could muster enough attack to get themselves on the scoreboard with a shot over goalie Marty Taft's shoulder.

Despite its eight-goal halftime lead, the Williams squad was anything but complacent in the second stanza as it scored eight more times while shutting out Mt. Holyoke.

Sally Kruse was unstoppable as she weaved through Holyoke's defense, picked up loose balls and shot in traffic, scoring eight times. Kruse is averaging over four goals a game in Williams' first four games this season. Mary Fish put the ball in the net four times including a score on an overhead shot with her back to the goal. In her first-half stint, Maggi O'Brien demonstrated her ability to pick the corners as she hit the upper corner of the net twice and registered a third goal on a pretty shovel shot to the bottom corner. The second half scoring also included scores from Elizabeth Shorb and Val Corning.

The entire Williams team played a fine defensive game. Sue Wright's great anticipation and quickness led to many interceptions that initiated successful Eph offensive drives. The steady defensive unit of Marcy Holmes, freshman Joy Rotch and Dawn Bedrosian continually hassled the Mt. Holyoke homes, rarely allowing their opponents a free shot.

Goalie Taft was largely responsible for holding Holyoke to a single goal. She was extremely effective in coming out of the cage to stop the oncoming attack, as was shown when she turned away three consecutive Holyoke shots from in close near the end of the first half, preventing a virtually assured Holyoke goal. Taft stopped 20 shots in the course of the contest.

The Ephs seek to capture the first Little Three women's lacrosse title tomorrow in a 2 p.m. home game against the Wesleyan Cardinals.

Tennis team trounces Trinity

Strong performances by all members of the men's tennis team led the Ephs to a convincing 7-2 victory over Trinity on Tuesday. It was the racketmen's best win of the year and raises their season record to 5-3.

With last week's disappointing loss to Tufts still on their minds, coach Sean Sloane's squad played inspired tennis throughout the contest. Trinity, a sound team with a win over Tufts this year, could not answer the Ephs attacking, virtually errorless showing.

Williams jumped out to an unbeatable 5-1 lead in the singles competition. Martin Goldberg stretched his personal winning streak to four with fine play in a 6-2, 6-2 triumph. Both Peter Friesen and Evan Bash put on impressive displays in identical 6-3, 6-2 wins. After taking the first set tiebreaker 5-2, Allen Barnes went on to record a 7-6, 6-0 victory. The Ephs and Trinity split the day's two, three-set matches. Dan O'Connell played well even though he suffered a close three-set loss, while captain Jim Parsons hung tough for a 6-4, 1-6, 6-2 triumph to clinch the match for Williams.

Much to their credit, Trinity played strong doubles matches even though they had no hope of winning the contest. The Ephs' undefeated duo of Goldberg and Parsons were extended before prevailing 4-6, 6-4, 6-2. Mitch Reiss and Bash played well to take a 6-2, 3-6, 6-3 decision, and Tad Roach and Barnes, the number two team, slipped to a tough 6-4, 6-7, 6-3 loss against a good duo.

Bouyed by this strong victory, the netmen travel to Amherst this weekend for the New England tournament with confidence and high hopes.

Golf squad sinks 2 of 3

On a sunny, windy day at the storied, tradition-filled Taconic Golf Club, the Williams College Golf team slaughtered Trinity and Siena, but lost to a lean and hungry Colgate squad. Firing a disappointing 418, Williams fell prey to a lack of practice after the spring trip. In addition, young Bill Sprague, 1977 College Champion, suffered a brutal, crippling knee injury which could see the promising shooter sidelined for the season.

Co-captain Doug "King" Chumbley grabbed medalist honors for Williams with an 82. In the tornado-like winds, "King" played double-bogeyless golf, a portent of great things to come from the sometimes erratic senior.

Marcel Oudin and Dan Katz tied for second with scores of 83. Known in Williams circles as the 1974 Canadian Junior Champion from Cape au Breton, Quebec, Oudin, staving off the ravaging effects of the Mongolian flu, continued his steady play. Threatened within an inch of his life during a controversial rules decision, a visibly shaken Katz looked ready to come unglued. Fortunately, the junior hung together for five consecutive pars to complete an otherwise respectable round.

At 85, Bill Upton and Chris Holm rounded out the Williams scoring. Both players were forced to earn their spots in a thrilling, pressure-packed sudden death qualifying. Perhaps this explains why neither could get their powerful games untracked; with Upton victimized by a balky putter and Holm unable to shake the ill-side effects from an early morning wakeup after a late Friday night celebration.

With the season record at 2-1, the team is looking forward to the one win it needs to notch their 500th all-time victory, and number 150 for fifteen-year coach Rudy Goff. Improved play from the starters and the return of Ed "Big" Bousa and Chris "Moses" Malone from the golfing under-world will undoubtedly bring about this glorious event very quickly.

Advisors to examine proxies

by Dave MacGregor

The Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility is discussing ways to examine College stock proxies more fully, including possible reorganization or expansion of the committee, according to Treasurer Francis Dewey III.

The committee is now drafting a College investment policy, to be presented to the trustees for approval, said Dewey. He also revealed that trustee Finance Committee has acted on an advisory committee recommendation regarding a Motorola proxy vote, but refused to reveal that action until the advisory committee had been informed.

The proposed investment policy is to be a general policy statement, similar in scope to one adopted by Harvard. "We are trying to come up with an overall outline of how the committee should operate, then we can proceed to more detailed matters," said Dewey.

In a separate interview, President John Chandler discussed some of the limitations facing a College investment policy.

"There is no disagreement that the College as a shareholder bears some responsibility for the behavior of the corporations in which it holds stock. We are implicated in the wrongs they commit, just as we share in the credit for the good they do," commented Chandler.

"The disagreements are over what a College should do with its influence and resources, and over what Williams in fact can do," he added.

Chandler said that a college should do everything in its power to maintain its moral position, but "should not presume it has a monopoly on moral high ground," lest it become so politicized that its primary duty, education and the free exchange of ideas, be compromised. "If a company acted with no objective other than profit maximization, and did not respond adequately to our requests for an explanation, then that would be grounds to question whether we wanted to continue to hold stock in that company. This would have to be done on a case-by-case basis," explained Chandler.

He suggested that a general divestiture was an unrealistic solution, both for legal and financial reasons. The trustees are legally obligated to administer the assets of the College "as a prudent man would" and therefore may not have the legal authority to sell its resources on purely moral grounds, he suggested.

He also noted that part of the College's stocks are restricted gifts, which were given on the condition that they not be sold, or that they not be sold for a specific period. Dewey said that about $4.7 million of the total endowment of $66 million is so restricted.

Finally, Chandler maintained that the fraction of any one company owned by Williams is so small that "a company would not even know we sold unless we publicized it."

College Treasurer Francis Dewey III released the list on page 3, used by the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility, of corporations in which Williams has invested which operate in South Africa. The list, compiled by the Africa Fund, does not include firms with indirect ties to corporations operating in South Africa.

Divestiture Poll

The Record conducted a telephone poll to assess student opinion on divestiture during the week of April 25-30. A random sampling of 170 students, approximately 10 per cent of the student body, were questioned. Respondents were asked to answer yes, no, or undecided to the following statement:

"I support Williams College divesting itself of all stock it owns in corporations operating in South Africa."

Results are as follows:

	Yes	no	undecided

Administrators and students raise parental awareness of divestiture

by Stu Massad

Parents' Weekend, along with the concerts and tours, marked another round in the controversy over divestiture as administrators and pro-divestiture faculty and students argued their positions, hoping to win parents to their views.

President Chandler, in his address to parents Saturday in Chapin Hall commended students working against investment in corporations working in South Africa for their energy and activism. But he reaffirmed the administration's policy, enunciated by the Trustees two weeks ago, of not divesting stock in these corporations but of pressing them to act humanely in South Africa.

Dean Berek also defended the administration's stand before parents and students when he spoke Sunday at the Jewish Association brunch.

Proponents of divestiture met opposition and apathy from parents at their rallies and discussion, but they apparently raised awareness among parents and may have induced a few to write letters to the Trustees, Chandler and The Record in support of divestiture.

Student pickets outside Chandler's opening address to parents in Chapin Hall opened the move to present pro-divestiture views to parents via what Ben Blakney characterized as "alternative propaganda".

Picketing continued at the lunch for parents on the Greylock lawn, where placard-carrying students marched around the lunch lines and passed pamphlets through the crowds.

At a meeting held later by divestiture proponents in Baxter Hall, parents asked about divestiture, its costs to the College and its benefits to black South Africans. Representatives from the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition responded to these and similar questions—"very articulately," one parent said—with answers most recently used in debate with the Trustees.

The group's arguments won over parents at the meeting, though most parents were " sympathetic beforehand. Parents volunteered to write College officials to express their support, and Blakney proposed the creation of a parents committee analogous to the student and faculty organizations pressing for divestiture.

Chick receives Fulbright Grant

German professor Edson M. Chick has been awarded a Fulbright Research Grant which he will use to support a year in Germany studying satire in the German theatre since 1890. He will do his research while on leave of absence during the 1978-79 academic year.

Chick said his research will concentrate on the works of five German playwrights: Brecht, Kaiser, Durrenmatt, Wedekind and Sternheim. He said he will explore audience interest in the works of the five artists as well as popular reaction to the plays. He will also study critical reactions and decisions to censor the playwrights' works.

"Plays make a statement about the times and the human animal as well," said Chick, who claims a strong interest in the history of ideas. He is particularly interested in the "cast of mind" that left Germans susceptible to Nazi ideology. He said that studies on aggression done by psychologists in recent years are a valuable tool for studying the satire of the German playwrights. According to Chick, since satire deals with aggression, he will be able to "decode the plays," to find the statement they make about the contemporary mood.

Chick has been at Williams since 1972. In 1960, he spent a year in Germany under a Fulbright Research Fellowship, and the following year while a professor of German at Dartmouth College, was in Zurich under a Faculty Development Grant.

Five faculty members receive promotion to full professor

President John W. Chandler has announced the promotion of five faculty members to the rank of full professor effective July 1.

The five are: Raymond Chang, associate professor of chemistry; Victor E. Hill, associate professor of mathematics; Thomas C. Jorling, associate professor of environmental sciences; John E. Stambaugh, associate professor of classics; and Reinhard A. Wobus, associate professor of Geology.

Chang joined the Williams faculty in 1968 as an assistant professor of chemistry. Prior to coming to Williams he spent a year as a post-doctoral research fellow at Washington University in St. Louis and one year on the faculty of Hunter College. On sabbatical leave from Williams during this school year, Chang is doing research in bioinorganic chemistry at Stanford University.

Hill is both a mathematician and a concert harpsichordist. Since coming to Williams in 1966 he has expanded the department's work in group theory, mathematical logic, and history of mathematics, and has also established himself as a harpsichordist in an annual series of Griffin Hall Concerts.

Jorling, on leave of absence as director of the Center for Environmental Studies, is serving the Carter Administration as head of one of the five major divisions of the Environmental Protection Agency, the Office of Water and Hazardous Materials.

Stambaugh joined the classics department in 1965. He spent the 1969-70 academic year at Brown University studying Egyptology on a fellowship from the American Council of Learned Societies. In 1976, Stambaugh was Professor-in-Charge of the Intercollegiate Center for Classical Studies in Rome. The author of numerous articles dealing with the classics, he has also written a book entitled "Sarapis Under the Early Ptolemies."

Wobus, who holds a Ph.D. in geology from Stanford, has been a faculty member since 1966. For the past summers Wobus has worked along with selected students in Colorado for the U.S. Geological Survey preparing geologic maps of different portions of that state.

Dean Chandler to replace Julien: Development Office promotes two Dean Chandler, an assistant professor of Chemistry, will be taking over the position of Assistant Dean next year, replacing Eileen Julien, who will return to teaching duties.

The Assistant Dean is basically a counselor, responsible for minority affairs and the College tutoring program. Chandler said that students taking math and science courses tend to use the tutoring system most often. He expects to expand the program in that direction. Chandler also hopes to offer a study skills course, similar to, although not as extensive as the program offered during Winter Study.

Another function of the Assistant Dean is to represent the administration's viewpoint at College Council meetings. Chandler said he felt it was helpful to have someone from the Dean's Office at the Council to "expedite matters" by answering questions.

The Williams College Trustees have approved two promotions that reflect a reorganization of the college's Development Office. Willard D. Dickerson'40, who has been Director of Development since 1958, has been named Executive Director of Development and John S. Pritchard '57, an associate director of development, will assume Dickerson's former position as Director.

The Development Office at Williams is responsible for solicitation of capital gifts to the College. The reorganization, according to President John W. Chandler, is designed to gain maximum advantage from a newly-formed Development Council. The small organization of alumni and friends of the College is assuming major responsibility for helping to raise the balance of approximately $17 million required to meet the Williams capital campaign goal of $50 million by the end of 1980.

In his new position, Dickerson will provide staff support to the Development Council and spend more time directly soliciting gifts and grants.

Pritchard will be responsible for the supervision of the Development Office and fund raising activities. He came to Williams in 1977 as an Associate Director of Development.

"NIGHT FEVER"

TICKETS ON SALE

Sophomores Steve Case and Bill Beckett, the organizers of the "Night Fever" disco-rock party, have decided to sell tickets for their May 5 production to prevent over-crowding at the Mission Park Dining Hall. Tickets are $2.00 in advance, and will be on sale at Baxter Hall from 11:30 to 12:30. The promoters do not expect that tickets will be sold at the door.

Letters: Academic freedom, dual divestiture

To the editor:

In a letter appearing in the April 25 issue of the Record, Augustin J. Hinkson '80 gave voice to the fear that "the administration" may ... have ... "subtly ... threatened ... the reappointment of junior faculty members because they support the movement for the withdrawal of U.S. corporate involvement in South Africa."

It was with the deepest concern that we read those words. It is in the hope of putting to rest the fear they express that we make this response. Academic freedom, as the American Association of University Professors' (AAUP) 1940 Statement of Principles indicates, extends not only to what is said in the classroom but also to "extramural utterances". Williams College is fully committed to the protection of that freedom. Any allegation that it was being infringed would call into question the very integrity of our whole educational enterprise. Such allegations, therefore, ought not lightly to be made; nor, once made, can they lightly be dismissed. Because of this we have had in place for some years a formal set of procedures available to any faculty member who believes that considerations violative of academic freedom played a role in his or her reappointment or promotion decision. The intrusion of such factors would constitute "improper consideration" and the evidence that such improper consideration had occurred would be weighed by a formally constituted panel composed of elected faculty members, non-tenured as well as tenured, who had no part in the original decision but who would have full access to all information used in arriving at that decision.

Such procedures, modelled upon the AAUP's 1972 Recommended Institutional Regulations on Academic Freedom and Tenure, affirmed by the faculty and approved by the Board of Trustees, are designed to prevent any erosion here at Williams of that commitment to academic freedom which, in the country at large, has been one of the hard-won achievements of the American academic community. That no one in the past has found it necessary to invoke those procedures protecting academic freedom should not lead us in the present to forget that they do in fact exist.

To the editor:

Scott Fenn's April 28 Viewpoint was devastating in its expose of the Trustees' perfidy. Now I know how Marlowe must have felt as he discovered the truth about Kurtz in Heart of Darkness. It seems as though Williams, too, is one of the "dark places of the earth."

After reading this Viewpoint, I have come to the conclusion that I will have to divest myself of any future financial involvement with Williams. Many of my friends say that divestiture is "the easy way out"; that I would be more effective to contribute to Williams and use my influence to elect a Board of Trustees with some exposure to the twentieth century.

But President Chandler tells me, and I believe him, that the Board of Trustees is largely self-perpetuating. Since I can see no way of working within this system, I suppose I will have to remove myself from it entirely.

viewpoint

To the Trustees of Williams College:

At this moment, South African black people are suffering humiliation and deprivation under the system of Apartheid. We who identify ourselves as Christians cannot acquiesce in this situation. Being followers of Christ means that we are called to aid the suffering and for this reason, as we shall explain, we support the withdrawal of U.S. companies from South Africa. Toward this end, we wish to lend our support to the various campus groups pressing for divestiture of stocks held in corporations profiting from the South African situation.

The entire college community opposes Apartheid, and is concerned that Williams College not profit tacitly from the suffering of South African blacks. Being certain that you share this concern, we are dismayed at your reluctance to assume the responsibility entrusted you to invest the college portfolio not only in a sound financial manner, but in a sound moral manner as well. We recognize your obligation as a group of trustees to keep the College on a firm fiscal foundation, but to rest our own well-being, even if indirectly, on the pain of others undermines the ideals of freedom of thought and action upon which this institution was founded.

It is important to emphasize that the goal of divestiture is not to "separate" ourselves from the world and hypocritically, under the guise of "acting morally," abdicate our moral responsibility. We, and others, are asking you for divestiture because we believe that it is the best way to force American companies out of South Africa. The resulting disengagement of American capital, 16 per cent of all foreign investment in the regime, would undercut the structure of the Vorster government. Other foreign capital would not rush in to fill the gap because the withdrawal of American companies implies the withdrawal of American political support for Apartheid. No sound business would want to invest in such a potentially unstable situation. Disengagement is simply the first small step in insuring that the South African government sees that America will no longer support Apartheid. We must help the South African people face the future: either Apartheid must go, or there will be a civil war. Disengagement is the best means of working against Apartheid, and thus divestiture is a political and economic tool to implement our moral obligation—to end our support of Apartheid, and help the blacks in South Africa gain their freedom and dignity.

We do recognize the several steps that you have taken up to this point, but feel they fall short of the requirements of the situation. For that reason we propose, along the lines of the Faculty proposals, that:

(a) Williams College vote its proxies in accordance with pro-withdrawal stockholder resolutions, and

(b) You as Trustees write the corporations involved explaining our actions and asking them to disengage in South Africa.

(c) Then, if having failed after two votes, Williams College divest itself of stocks in companies still actively doing business in South Africa.

THE VENERABLE WILLIAMS CLASS OF 1927

THE INTREPID CLASSES OF '78, '79, '80, and '81

This summer play a vital role in helping a young, well-financed company introduce a new product to America—namely—a PREVENTATIVE MAINTENANCE KIT which CONSERVES ENERGY, REDUCES POLLUTION, and saves car owners fuel and maintenance dollars. You can truly profit by joining this now nation-wide organization and promoting ADD-A-TUNE—the chemical Tune-up kit that will improve the environment, reduce oil imports, and fight inflation.

Extremely high, part-time earnings are possible (with no investment) while you build your own business wherever you may be this summer. If you are imaginative you can create large cash ANNUITIES payable to you after graduation, and, for members of '79, '80, and '81, payable while still in college. These annuities are payable for years after graduation.

There is no door-to-door selling. There is no investment. This entire opportunity is SCRUPULOUSLY clean or this LOYAL WILLIAMS SEPTUAGENARIAN graduate would never be involved.

Students to perform Rhapsody

A Rhapsody in Blue performed in the complete original manuscript version will be a highlight of XII, a studio class sponsored by the Music Department on Wednesday, May 3 at 8:00 in Chapin Hall. It will be the first such performance of the popular Gershwin work in over fifty years. The Williams Ad-hoc All-Star Jazz-Blues Consortium, an all-student orchestra, conducted by Peter Gloo '78, with Mark-Obert-Thorn '78 as solo pianist, will play the piece at the end of the concert. Admission is free.

Paul Whiteman asked George Gershwin in 1923 to compose a work for Whiteman's planned concert of American music. Not having agreed to do so, Gershwin was surprised to see press releases announcing that he was hard at work on a "jazz concerto." Undaunted, and with little more than a month left before the concert, Gershwin composed the Rhapsody in a two-piano score, which was then orchestrated by Whiteman's top staff arranger, Ferde Grofe. A copy of that jazz-band orchestration is in the college's Paul Whiteman Collection; it was completed on February 4, 1924, and the premiere was given at New York City's Aeolian Hall eight days later.

Obert-Thorn discovered four orchestral bars and 44 bars for the solo piano music which have never been published or recorded in the Whiteman Collection. They will be included in the Wednesday performance. In addition, about a dozen other major variants in the piano solo part will be included.

There will be a reception in Driscoll.

Dan Wagoner Preview

'Kinetic' company to dance

by Mimi David

When "big name" arts professionals perform at the college, one witnesses a flurry of activity as to announcements, attendance, and the like. However, if one does not recognize the "big name," there seems to be an almost proportional lack of interest. In the case of the Dance Society's presentation of the Dan Wagoner Dance Company which will hold a master class Thursday at 3:30 in Lasell Gym and performance Friday and Saturday nights at 8:30 in the Adams Memorial Theatre—perhaps this situation can be avoided.

If for a moment one manipulated the "big names" in such a way to elucidate the significance of the new one, the Dan Wagoner Dance Company could be described as combining fragments of Martha Graham's technique with Paul Taylor's characteristic postures, topped by a nonsequential approach which links the steps that derive from Merce Cunningham.

Wagoner specializes in a kind of "kinetic jabberwocky" that is totally fascinating and original when at its best. Wagoner's dances have been likened to perpetual motion machines. They are well constructed, even somewhat formal, and briskly paced with much verve and humor.

In fact, there is good reason why Dan Wagoner's Dance can be related to these other dance styles; Wagoner was a distinguished member of the Martha Graham Company as well as the Paul Taylor group.

As with all the Dance Society's residency programs, the master class on Thursday afternoon allows direct student participation and a most unusual insight into the style.

PARSONS IN PARIS

This summer you can study in Paris with Parsons School of Design and earn nine academic credits.

The seven week program provides students with an opportunity to draw upon the rich heritage of art and design only Paris can offer. A major resource this summer will be The Pompidou International Center for the Arts, the world's most exciting new museum. Excursions to points outside Paris are also part of the program. All courses carry three credits and include Painting, Museum Painting, Drawing, Visual Concepts, Fashion Seminar, The Writer Among Artists, French History, History of Architecture, Interiors and Decorative Arts, The Medieval Mind as seen in Romanesque and Gothic Architecture and Sculpture, Academy and Avant Garde, and French Language.

The entire program, including nine studio and/or liberal arts credits, round trip air fare, accommodations with breakfast for seven weeks will cost $1,600.

Golfers hassle Harvard, Holy Cross

If Sam Snead had heard that a golf team from Williams College planned to do battle at the testing Pleasant Valley Country Club against Division 1 powers Harvard and Holy Cross, he would undoubtedly have commented, "Things look blacker than a Virginia polecats eyes in the middle of winter." Unfortunately for the two titanesque powers of eastern golf, the fired-up purple contingent scored two impressive victories, upping its season score to 4-1. Even more amazing, the wins brought the all time golf team totals to 501 victories overall, and number 151 for fifteen year coach Rudy Goff.

After finding out that he struck the wrong ball on the second hole, junior Dan Katz suffered temporary insanity, visiting places that Renaissance man drew on maps to signify the end of the world. Even with the two stroke penalty, Katz garnered medalist honors for Williams with an 80, only two shots off the best score of the day.

Freshman "Moses" Malone and Sophomore Marcel Oudin tied for second with solid 83's. Moses did not hit the ball as well as in his glory days as a fearsome junior player in Connecticut, but the talented newcomer employed intelligent course management to return his finest round of the year. Marcel Oudin, a fine second year man whose steady game was blessed with the seal of approval over a double Chivas Regal by 1976 Williams College Champion Dave Tomaszek, continued to prove that he can play the game in any weather conditions. In the bone-chilling cold and cyclone-like winds at tour-tested Pleasant Valley, Oudin maneuvered his way around the course with accurate iron play.

In fourth position, Doug "King" Chumbley felt at home on the vast acreage of the Sutton, Mass. layout. Had it not been for some late hold difficulties which included a double bogey on number eighteen, King could easily have been medalist.

The fifth and sixth best scores were recorded by Bill Upton and Ed "Big" Bousa. Although he shot 85, Big, mired in the depths of a mind-blowing slump, seems ready to shed his incredibly strong grip and return to the prominent position he once occupied. As for Upton, the enigmatic junior has not realized the glorious promise he demonstrated on the spring trip. Upton must pull his impressive game together for the team to stand a chance against Amherst and Dartmouth. Though their numbers were high, Upton and Bousa's scores were crucial in the victory over Holy Cross. After adding up the low 5 scores, Williams was [illegible] with the Worcester school. Since in college golf the sixth score breaks the tie, Williams won by 9 big strokes.

Though the scores may seem high, Goff was very pleased with the team because of the horrendous weather conditions. Whenever the golf team beats Harvard and Holy Cross, the words of Mark Hanna upon the election of William McKinley immediately came to mind: "God was in his heaven and all was right with the world."

Tennis team takes 4th at New Englands

by Evan Bash

Sparkling performances by Martin Goldberg and Jim Parsons led the men's tennis team to a fourth place finish in the New England tournament held this past weekend at Amherst College. Goldberg reached the finals of both the A division singles and doubles tournaments, while Parsons, Goldberg's doubles partner, also made it to the semi-finals of the B division singles.

The fourth place finish out of a field of 32 entrants was Williams best in the competition since 1971. Yale captured first place in the team standings, while Dartmouth and Harvard also outscored the Ephs.

All of the Williams racketmen had strong showings, but it was Goldberg and Parsons who were most impressive. Goldberg swept his first five matches without losing a set to reach the finals. Included in these wins was a 6-4, 7-6 upset of the no. two seed from Dartmouth, a player who had beaten Goldberg in a dual match earlier in the season. In the finals, however, Goldberg was defeated 7-6, 6-2 by Yale's Matt Doyle in a tense, exciting struggle. Doyle has now won the event for three consecutive years.

Captain Parsons played sharp tennis all the way to the semi-finals where he was upended by the division's no. one seed, 7-6, 7-5. Only a few crucial points in this well played match prevented Captain Parsons' trip to the finals.

Seeded as the no. one team in the doubles, Goldberg and Parsons struggled through the early rounds before settling down to play well to get into the finals. Harvard's team was waiting for the duo in the finals, though, beating the Eph pair 7-6, 6-2 for their first loss of the year.

Williams' high finish would not have been possible without other fine showings by team members. Dan O'Connell won two matches before falling to Doyle 6-4, 6-4, while Peter Friesen also had two wins before bowing to the no. three seed in the B division. Evan Bash took two matches and then fell in three sets to a seed from Harvard, and Allen Barnes managed one victory in the C division.

In other doubles action, Mitch Reiss and Bash made it to the quarter-finals of the C's where they lost to the no. two seeded team from Dartmouth, 6-2, 6-4. Tad Roach and Barnes were knocked out of the B doubles action in the first round.

The Ephs look to improve on their 5-3 dual match record at Wesleyan on Wednesday.

Trackmen drop Little 3

The varsity track team put together its best effort of the season on Saturday but was unable to overcome the well balanced Amherst and Wesleyan squads. Amherst captured the Little Three title with 76 points followed by Wesleyan with 64 and Williams with 51. Coach Dick Farley was quite pleased by the team's performance as Ephmen took winning honors in six events.

Sophomore Jim DeSimone emerged as the leading purple-point-getter as he finished first in two events and picked up a fourth in another. DeSimone launched the shot 45'9" for a personal record, stepped back into the circle and spun the discus a winning distance of 125'5" and then followed Larry Tanner's 173'4" first place heave in the hammer with a 122' fourth place effort.

The running events started off with a pleasant surprise as Dee Reeve's blazing anchor leg brought the Eph quartet to second place in the 440 yard relay. The initial momentum continued through the next two events with Phil Darrow capturing the mile in 4:20.6 and Tom Selden tearing through the 120 yard high hurdles for a 15.7 second victory.

The Eph distance squad contributed an eight point scoring effort as Tom Schreck and Frank Carr pulled away from the field for a 1-2 sweep of the three mile run.

Stickwomen stymie Smith

In what proved to be a battle of two potent offenses, women's lacrosse team outlasted Smith College for a 16-12 victory. The win boosts the Ephs record to 3-1-1.

A wild first half saw both teams running and gunning with Williams ahead 9-6 as the period ended. The Ephs outscored Smith by only one goal in the second half, but the three-goal lead from the first half established a margin great enough to insure a Williams victory.

Sally Kruse maintained the incredible scoring pace she set at the start of the season, this time with a four-goal performance. Val Corning also had a good game on attack, matching Kruse's goal total for the afternoon. Steady performers Mary Fish and Maggi O'Brien each tallied three times, while Elizabeth Shorb and Sarah Baldwin added a goal.

Eph Crew: Men cruise, Women lose

Men's

The Williams varsity men's crew remained unbeaten as it nosed by Columbia University's varsity boat in the last few strokes of Saturday's 2000 meter race on the Harlem River in New York City. The Purple oarsmen saw their six-seat lead disappear in the last 300 meters when a series of standing waves slowed the Williams eight, but the Ephs pulled together to grab the win by eight-tenths of a second as the two crews crossed the staggered finish line.

Columbia jumped out to a five-seat lead at the start but could not move away from the Williams eight, even though the Ephs were understroking (rowing fewer strokes to the minute) their Ivy-League opponent by several beats for the first 250 meters. Rowing a strong middle 1000 Williams moved up on Columbia to break through the Lions and take a four-seat lead at the 1000-meter mark.

Heading for home, the Williams eight pulled out slowly to nearly a boatlength lead when it ran into trouble with about 300 meters left in the race. The Purple oarsmen found themselves struggling to keep their rhythm and balance as they encountered a set of standing waves near the finish, diminishing their lead over Columbia. Once free of the rough water, Williams snatched a narrow victory over its opponents.

The lightweight freshmen were edged out by the Columbia J.V. crew but kept closed water on their rivals for the duration of the race. The heavy frosh also lost to a freshman crew that has consistently provided Columbia's varsity with tough competition during practices.

Women's

The Williams women's varsity lightweight crew traveled north Saturday to "Big Green" country to match oars with Dartmouth's lightweight boat. The 1500 meter course on the Connecticut River was too rough for racing; at Dartmouth's suggestion the boats rowed three 1000 meter pieces farther downstream on smoother water.

The lights resoundingly beat Dartmouth. Williams jumped off the starts, taking a Dartmouth seat with every couple of strokes, completely passing them within their first fifteen strokes. Refusing to sit on their leads, they rowed powerfully and confidently throughout, finishing each piece with two to four boat lengths of open water between themselves and Dartmouth.

The women's varsity boat met with stiffer competition Saturday in Princeton, NJ. The varsity pounded out 1500 meters against Dartmouth, Univ. of Pennsylvania (finalists in last year's Eastern Championships) and Princeton crews. Williams waged oar-war against Penn for second, losing to them by a mere one-tenth of a second. Princeton secured a victory four and a half seconds earlier; Dartmouth finished fourth.

Princeton and Dartmouth crews also provided the Williams novices with tough competition, occupying number one and two positions throughout the race.

Next week the Williams varsity and novice boats meet Dartmouth and Colgate on their own Lake Onota near Pittsfield at 11:30 while the lights meet up against their toughest opponent yet, Radcliffe, on the Charles River in Boston.

Laxmen whip Wesleyan

by Nancy Rhein

Strong man-up play and an aggressive attack spelled Little Three Victory for the men's lacrosse team Saturday as they cruised by Wesleyan 15-7.

Wesleyan, suffering from slashing sickness, found the disease fatal, as Williams scored on three straight man-up situations to go ahead 4-1 in the first quarter, after an opening goal by the visitors. Tam Murray went in unassisted on the first two extra man goals, feeding Peter Barbaresi for the third. Mark Murray then tallied from Peter Thomsen to put it 4-1. A lively attack, anchored by Todd Eckerson, Dick Goodbody and Thomsen kept the pace up with Goodbody putting in Williams fifth goal before the hosts scored again as their fourth man-up goal of the quarter.

Sitting on a comfortable lead going into the second period, the Ephmen never slacked off with Eckerson feeding Goodbody for the opening tally of the quarter. Excellent defensive play by Peter Unger held Wesleyan scoreless in a rare man-up situation. Following a goal by John Glynn, Wesleyan made it 7-2. Plagued by penalties, the Cardinals found themselves in the box again on an unsportsmanlike conduct call as Eckerson hit Thomsen for another man-up goal. With a minute left in the period Goodbody scored from Thomsen, before a scuffle resulted in a Wesleyan ejection and a Williams man in the box at the half's end.

Opening the quarter with nine men each, the teams traded passes with Williams goalie Bob Cowin making a crucial save in the early going. A Cardinal slash set up a Goodbody goal, this time from Thomsen. The duo repeated its goal to make it 11-2. Wesleyan then scored to make it 11-3 for the period, sending Cowin to the bench with 7 saves.

The fourth period got underway with Tam Murray grabbing his third man-up goal. Within a minute John O'Herron made it 13-3. Wesleyan then picked up the pace to put it 13-6 before O'Herron scored again. With less than a minute left in the contest and part one of the Little Three Championship in hand, John Moore tallied on a pass from Wayne Eckerson for Williams' fifteenth goal. Wesleyan then scored on the buzzer to finalize it at 15-7.

Although Williams grabbed a slight ground ball advantage (66-55) and outshot its Wesleyan opponent's 39-21, it was the 17 Wesleyan penalties that clinched the win for Williams. The well disciplined Ephmen, playing smart lacrosse, took advantage of the penalties to grab the victory and set themselves up for another Little Three title.

Class of '82 reaches record numbers, forces housing changes

by Randy Wong

Increased numbers of upperclassmen taking next year off, abroad, or on exchange has led Philip Smith, Director of Admissions to raise the target figure from 490 to 500 students for next year's incoming class. Dean of Freshmen Lauren Stevens said he expects that about 80 upperclassmen will be away.

To meet this increased target figure, an additional 20 applicants on the waiting list have been accepted. As of last Wednesday, Smith had heard from all but 80 of the original acceptance pool; 480 replied affirmatively. These statistics indicate that 100 accepted students remain to fill the gap of 20 between the target figure and the present class size.

The first two floors of West College will be converted into one male and one female freshman entry to handle the influx, according to Stevens. Originally, Seeley House, a satellite of Dodd, was to be a freshman house—when the target figure was 490. Seeley has since reverted to Row House overflow. Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad claimed not to have determined its affiliation, though members of Perry House assert that Seeley has already been assigned to them.

Only one more entry has actually been created—the proposed Seeley entry had been in the original plan. One source speculated that two to three female JAs of the waiting list will fulfill the need.

According to Roosenraad, two suites of six in Mission Park had earlier been annexed for Dodd House overflow. Contrary to rumors, he added, no overflow members of the Park will live outside of the Park next year, despite the loss of these two suites. Normal summer attrition, he feels, will open up more rooms.

Smith said he foresees no problems with the numbers of next year's class, commenting that "everything is going just about on target." He is "very pleased" that the College was able to accept students off the waiting list since this year's applicant pool was "particularly strong" and because "we sometimes make mistakes."

Over the past several years, the trend has been for successively larger numbers of upperclassmen to spend a year away from Williams. A spokesman for the Dean's office predicted that the trend will continue.

After apartheid filibuster

Council passes resolution

by Sharon Nelson

The College Council adopted 20-4 and sent to the trustees a resolution calling on the College to either persuade firms in which it holds stock to conform to a list of non-discrimination principles or, if that effort fails, divest.

Bronson Fargo, CC president, abruptly called for the cessation of all audio and visual taping of the meeting during preliminary business. Members of the council immediately contested the ruling. After brief debate, a motion was passed allowing only audio taping. Visual recording was banned for fear that the ensuing "heated discussion" would be hampered by the "disconcerting" effects of the camera.

Joel Smith, '79, co-author of the resolution, elaborated on the need for the resolution at the present time. He spoke of the South Africa system as compared to the Cambodian situation—both were "intolerable."

"Williams is responsible. It is not neutral," Smith continued. "It has given its tacit approval to apartheid by possessing investments in South Africa."

In answer to his own question on why the proposal should be brought before the council, Smith explained that the CC is "the voice of the student body." Further, this action would "show that an actual response was given to the trustees."

A RESOLUTION

WHEREAS apartheid is a racist system offensive to the dignity of Mankind; and

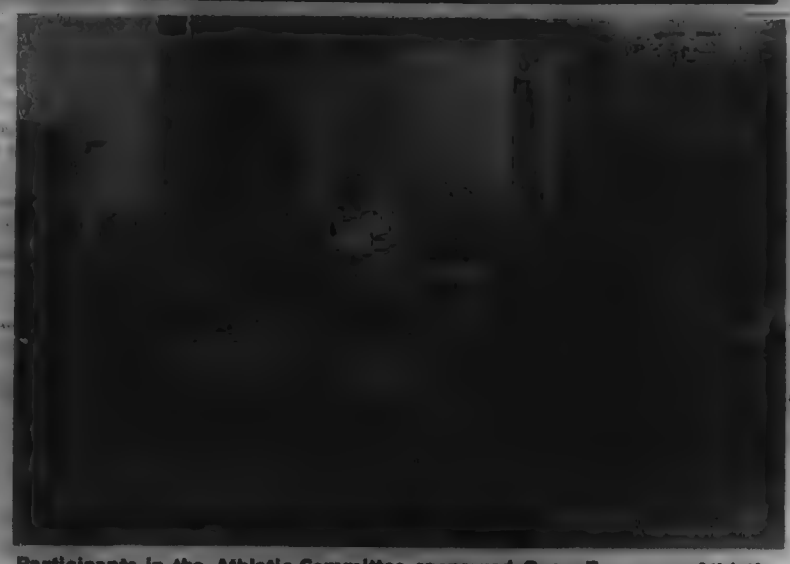
WHEREAS Williams is responsible through its investments for the maintenance of the apartheid system in South Africa; and

WHEREAS the Trustees of Williams College have not formulated an effective policy for using the College's influence to end apartheid in South Africa; and

WHEREAS the students of Williams College are disappointed by the present and past lack of concern shown by the College to take meaningful steps to end apartheid; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Trustees participate in and initiate shareholder proposals that will require all firms with South African operations either to withdraw their investments from S.A. or to have their investment meet the following requirements:

1. The provision of equal monetary and non-monetary benefits for equal work;
2. Support for the development of African labor unions;
3. The establishment of a minimum wage as determined by the European Economic Community;
4. A substantial increase in the number of non-whites in supervisory, administrative, clerical and technical training programs and jobs;



and within six months' time

5. The cessation of all operations in illegally-occupied Namibia; and
6. The cessation of all further sales of equipment to the government of South Africa; and be it further

Resolved, That if a corporation should fail twice to respond to progressive shareholder proposals embodying the criteria outlined above, Williams' investments in that corporation shall be sold, and the sale publicized; and be it further

Resolved, That the Trustees shall vote all College proxies in support of any shareholder proposal that advocates a moratorium on further investment in South Africa or the disclosure of all corporate activities within South Africa. The College shall vote for any proposal to end the extension of new credit or the renewal of old loans by United States banks to the South African government and South African companies; and be it further

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this Resolution one copy shall be sent to each of the Trustees of the College at his or her address of record.

Participants in the Athletic-Committee sponsored Open Forum on Athletics Tuesday evening argued the advantages of post season play for team sports.

Forum on athletics considers the problem of post-season competition

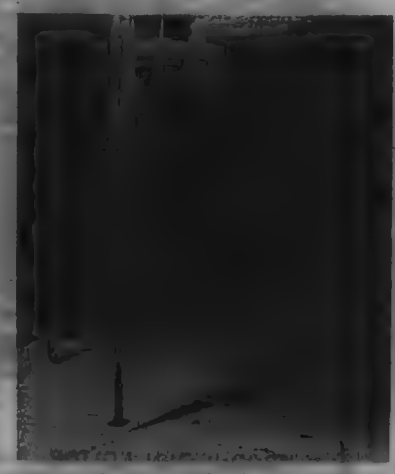
The Athletic Committee will send President Chandler a memo citing the advantages and drawbacks of national post-season competition for Williams team sports before he attends a meeting of the New England Small College Athletic Council on May 16 and 17. The memo will explain points raised at Tuesday night's Open Forum on Athletics at Williams.

Director of Athletics Robert Peck addressed the problem of financing extended team play. "I would oppose channeling athletic funds from women's and second-level sports programs into post-season competition, he said. "The college philosophy is to encourage broad participation in a number of different sports, and I couldn't justify cutting down on the offerings in order to finance something in which relatively few people would be involved."

Peck went on to say that the college presently allows a $1,000 budget for individuals who qualify for national post-season competition, but that this fund is well below what is actually spent.

Athletic Committee Chairman Ted Chick raised the question of the scheduling of national competitions. "The problem of conflict with classes and exams must be considered," he said. Later discussion implied that most national team competitions in Divisions II and III have been rescheduled for weekend and vacation play, apparently in answer to this concern.

Peck also expressed concern for coaching overlap, should post-season play be permitted. In some cases, sports seasons would extend up to three weeks past their traditional end. "Coaches' commitments to different teams already overlap somewhat, which is unfair not only to the coach but to the teams which must practice without him," he said.



Most who attended the forum strongly supported a NESCAC rule change in favor of post season competition. One student said that competition on the national level offered "a rare chance for an athlete to explore his potential in an area other than academics," while an athlete who had attended such competition as an individual cited the "excellent experience involved."

One coach said that, although few teams will qualify for national post-season competition in any given year, it would be nice if "the door weren't permanently locked." To all teams Peck agreed that it would be optimal to be able to consider each case on its own merit, taking scheduling, cost and the number of players into account, but that unfortunately this was not an alternative. "The Council would never support that," he said.

Peck explained that any change in NESCAC policy must be approved by seven of the ten member presidents. If approved unanimously, a new rule can take effect immediately. Normally they require one year before being instituted. However, the Williams faculty retains the power of ultimately approving or discarding any change in college policy. It would vote on whether or not to institute the change in college athletic policy.

At this point, one student noted that faculty members were ill-represented at the forum. "Unless they are well-acquainted with the history and intent of the NESCAC ruling, and the viewpoints being expressed here tonight, how can they expect to vote knowledgeably on a proposal which affects so many people?" she asked. Peck affirmed the wide appeal of athletics among students at Williams, saying that 57 per cent of the people here participate in intercollegiate sports.

CEP focuses on diploma requirements

The Working Group on the Curriculum, will begin studying the College's academic diploma requirements in June according to its Chairman Dean of the Faculty, Francis Oakley. The Committee on Educational Policy formed the investigative group in April, Oakley said, because the Faculty expressed concern over the degree of "structure in the non-major part of the curriculum."

After comparing Williams to other similar institutions, the CEP recently concluded that "we're at the freer end of the spectrum" of academic requirements, Oakley said. "This surprised the faculty," he added. They subsequently voted to accept the CEP's proposal that an ad hoc committee be organized to obtain information and draw up a recommendation.

The Working Group may focus on the divisional course requirements in particular. Oakley said he believes that these guidelines have evolved to a point where they represent "a Division III requirement that must be fulfilled." Even though students must complete two courses in each division, they still tend to avoid courses considered valuable for a liberal arts education.

The group will also evaluate the faculty's educational goals. For example, Oakley said, the committee could ask faculty members if "students should be exposing themselves to some knowledge that originated outside the Western World."

He emphasized that any proposed changes would be introduced gradually, to give the faculty plenty of time to adjust to the new ideas. He cautioned, however, that the group's "proposal could be to do nothing." Any academic changes recommended by the group would be implemented slowly and thus not affect students currently attending Williams.

Endorsement of "a required freshman course focusing on great writers is an extreme possibility," Oakley said, "given the (academic) history of this college."

Faculty members of the Working Group are Michael Bell, David Park, and James Wood. Its student members include David Schwartz '81 and Jay Wallace '79.

B&G revamps campus

The Buildings and Grounds Department is re-equipping College buildings in an "extended effort" to make them accessible to handicapped persons, according to Peter Welanetz, Director of the Physical Plant.

Some $10,000 has already been spent modifying existing buildings, and Welanetz projected that it will cost over $25,000 to complete the job. Work being done includes the construction of exterior access ramps and the modification of bathroom facilities to accommodate the handicapped.

Despite the College's efforts to provide for the handicapped, Welanetz pointed out that "it's just not practical" to convert all the College's buildings for that purpose. He cited as an example Hopkins Hall, which would require a 60 foot ramp to allow external access to the handicapped.

Welanetz claims that the College is taking a "common sense approach" toward accommodating the handicapped. He pointed out that in the past, the college has dealt with the problem on an individualized basis. He added, however, that "while we don't expect a heavy influx of handicapped people we're certainly prepared for that possibility."

The freshman experience...

by Chris DiAngelo, '79

When the freshmen in my entry ask me why I wanted to become a junior advisor, my answer throughout the year has been: "I figured that if I weren't a JA, an even bigger asshole would take my place." That pretty much sums up my feelings as I enter the final weeks of my participation in a system I have serious reservations with.

By "system", I do not mean to focus on the matter of junior advisors, or the selection process, or any of the usual points of attack. If you are going to run a freshman year in the manner that Williams does, chances are this is the best way of doing things. People sometimes complain that the JA's are too much alike; that they perpetuate a social, beer-drinking, unintellectual stereotype. This is mostly incorrect: the truth is that any two (or three) JA's do tend to be quite a bit alike, but on the larger scale of all JA's, there is probably almost as much variety as there is in the school in general. If an unintellectual bias actually does predominate, that would be a reflection on the school, not the JA's in particular.

Separatism

The things that I have trouble with are the single-sex entries and the whole idea of keeping freshmen separate. Williams is in a very small minority of schools which keeps freshmen in segregated housing. According to the "Report of the Committee on the Freshman Year" (January, 1976), "the residential and advisory aspects of the Williams freshman year originated, in a large part, as a reaction to a fraternity system that no longer exists. Although there are fewer and fewer schools that do it our way, we see no reason to change this fact." The school is not unaware that most other colleges seem to consider "our way" outdated.

While it seems to be historically true that the separate freshman year seems to have originated out of the fraternity system (now defunct for fourteen years) the college does have reasons for maintaining the status quo which were not revealed in the Freshman Year Report. I am a junior, and a member of Dennett house. I pay dues to Dennett, and the president of the house schedules parties, snacks, and whatever. The point is that the class of '79 does not collect dues from me, or plan parties, or is my primary allegiance on campus: I am first a member of Dennett, and second, a member of the class of '79. However, once I leave Williams, all the fund raising done by the College is run through the class, not the houses. The College believes that if students do not have the experience of living together as freshmen, not such a strong sense of class unity will develop; alumni contributions will fall. This is not my imagination: a member of the Administration has admitted to me that this is in fact true.

But don't get me wrong: the separate freshman year is not some cruel and unpopular item thrust upon unsuspecting students by a greedy Administration and Development Office. A CEP-CUL questionnaire of 1974 indicated that 73 per cent of the freshmen were opposed to being housed with upperclassmen. It should also be noted that many students continue to live as upperclassmen with their freshmen roommates, and many freshmen swear up and down that having all freshmen together makes the transition to college life much easier. Other surveys have shown that upperclassmen as well prefer things as they are.

Discontent

Some freshmen, however, are not content. The Deans' Office records list nine freshmen as having moved out of their dormitories this year, and into upperclass houses. I spoke to several of these freshmen, as well as to other students and one faculty member. What emerges from their comments is, I think, useful, insofar as it points to areas of concern among some students here at Williams, which may in fact be symptomatic of larger troubles rumbling around under the surface of the college community as a whole.

Sexism has been an issue at Williams this year, and many of those I spoke with seemed to feel that the single-sex entries which the freshmen are forced to live in make a massive contribution to the problem. Ruth Glasser, '81, who moved out of the quad to live in Currier, explained that she believed all freshman housing should be as co-ed as possible. She claimed that the current arrangement breeds misconceptions about the sexes, and makes it very difficult to see members of the opposite sex as friends rather than "lovers or adversaries." She related examples of "sexist" behavior she was familiar with, including a rumor that some male entries take bets on "getting the first freshman girl" and an incident involving a friend of hers who left her laundry in the dryer overnight in the quad, only to find that the next morning the crotches had been cut out of all her panties.

Jordan Finegold '81, who describes himself as "very happy here," and Todd Tucker '81, who is admittedly disillusioned with much of his freshman experience, both seconded Ruth's opinions about the sexist nature of many male entries. Jordan referred to an "imposed vulgarity", and claimed that the freshman male is faced with many social pressures to conform to a real macho, Williams-man image. Again, the comment came up that it was very difficult to make friends with the other sex, and that most Williams students operate under a "high-school date situation." Jordan continued, "you're here, you're living with these people; the girls aren't someone you just see on weekends," and concluded by claiming Williams has a "singles-bar type atmosphere."

Todd, a resident of Williams D, noted many of the same points as Jordan, claiming that his entry was "loud and violent" with "... broken windows, emptied fire extinguishers ... bottles broken, beer spilled all over the place" as a common scene. He believes that the JA's as a whole have a strong social orientation, and claims that it took him a long time to meet a junior advisor who seemed to be more academic or intellectual than social.

On the subject of sex relations, Todd called his entry "tremendously sexist," saying that Cheryl Tiegs posters were occasionally used to advertise parties. He related to me the events of an entry get-together earlier in the year, where almost all members of his entry agreed that "there was a conspiracy among freshman women to ignore freshman men." According to Todd, one of his entry-mates, commenting on the lack of opportunities for freshman men, said, "A friend of mine on the hockey team said more guys leave this school because they are afraid of becoming gay than any other reason."

. . . sexism and separatism

This was a recurring theme I discovered in my talks with freshman men: that the women here at Williams, and in the class of '81 in particular, are frigid. One freshman woman I spoke with remarked that there was no conspiracy, but that there was "more of an attraction for upperclassmen because they look more like men." She added that she believed most freshmen guys were afraid of showing any interest in a girl, for fear "she'll be all over them."

Opposing views

Peter Clarke, '81, formerly of Williams D, took a somewhat opposite stance, explaining his opinion that freshman women simply do not want to get a reputation. He claimed that in sex relations here at Williams, "a double standard applies; it is the most important aspect of freshman life . . . some freshmen women like to have a good time, but people who are more inhibited, prudish, less liberal, or whatever, bad-mouth those who sleep around."

Meredith Hoppin of the Classics Department backed up Peter's views in a lengthy talk about the freshmen living situation. According to her, some students claim that "you get a reputation if you sleep with more than two guys." Prof. Hoppin remarked on one aspect of the campus social scene which many people find peculiar: men and women never seem to touch each other in public. "It's nice to be in a world where you can hug and squeeze." She claimed that in general, the sexual atmosphere on campus was "not healthy", and claimed that many of the problems were reducible to the freshman living situation. She agreed with many of the freshmen I spoke with about the need to have more co-ed housing among the freshmen to break down the mysteries surrounding the sexes. She even suggested that co-ed bathrooms, an anathema to the College, might not be so bad: "it's very healthy to see each other in underwear."

Most freshmen I talked to were more concerned with the relative lack of co-ed living than they were with the separateness of the freshman class from the rest of the campus. Some saw this as two sides of the same coin, which I believe is correct. Ruth Glasser and Elisa Waingort '81, another freshman who has moved out, seemed to indicate that they believed upperclass housing such as Mission Park and Greylock was much more conducive to a healthy social atmosphere for the freshmen.

This is due to several factors, not the least of which is the more sex-integrated housing. The other major benefits of integration seemed to be that it breaks up the idea of the entry altogether. Many of those I spoke with were harsh on the whole idea of the entry, claiming that such set-ups alienate as many people as they benefit. Many freshmen, the argument goes, feel forced to go along with "the entry", while others who do not participate feel, as Ruth Glasser puts it, like "social misfits."

Prof. Hoppin, commenting on the argument that entry living encourages learning to live with diversity, called that line of reasoning faulty. She noted that it was common interests which bring people together, not living next door. Working on a play or other group-oriented activity brings people from all backgrounds together for a common purpose, and encourages them to interact willingly, which the entry system does not do. As a junior advisor, I must accept this argument as being basically true: being roommates does not necessarily mean sharing your interests, thoughts, or lives. Our entry system may encourage what Prof. Hoppin called a "self-conscious politeness," but certainly no sense of getting to know, or understand better, people you would otherwise not associate with.

Lesley Bryer is a freshman who has never lived in a freshman dorm: due to her late arrival at Williams she was placed in Mission. She is associated with Morgan MW, and says she gets along very well with the other freshmen in the entry, as well as with her JA's. She does not miss living in Morgan at all: "It's not that I don't want to live there, but I'm just as happy living here."

All of the freshmen who moved out whom I talked with spoke of the need for freshmen to get to know the other members of their class, but did not think the entry system was the best way of achieving that goal. The feeling was that in many classes, a freshman only gets to know the others in his entry.

Barriers

The biggest problem I personally see with the freshman year as it is now is that it tends to erect unreal and unnecessary barriers between members of the student body. First there is the sex barrier: the girls (or the guys) are always "somewhere else" during the freshman year; the other sex is mainly useful for picking up en masse and taking over to a Baxter guest meal, then returning them to where they belong. I simply cannot believe that there is so little informal contact between the sexes as there is at Williams, and I believe that by maintaining the system as it is the College is not fully exploring the value of coeducation.

The question of integrating the classes is more difficult, and I only saw it as a problem while serving as a JA. It bothers me that the upperclassmen are upperclassmen at all: so many times freshmen I know will pass right by me if they see me with my "upperclass" friends. As a JA, I have always felt that it was easier for me to approach freshmen, even the ones in my own entry, than it was for them to come to me. This is all very hard to define, but it comes down to the matter of distance: there is too much distance between people here at Williams.

This in fact may be at the root of the type of problems which have surfaced at Williams this year, since distance encourages another, more obvious evil, that of insensitivity: the insensitivity of the library-incident perpetrators toward women, the insensitivity of the straights toward the gays, the insensitivity of some students on the South Africa issue. After all, the girls, the gays, the South Africans are all "somewhere else."

This is not to say that all the College's troubles can be solved by changing freshmen housing. That would be hopelessly naive. What I am saying, however, is that the College should be becoming more interested in the question of "what type of person is Williams educating its students to be" rather than focusing exclusively on "what type of education do people get here." The Administration, faculty, and students should begin early next year to dig deeper than they have in the past for answers to this question, and an investigation of the freshman year might be just the place to start.

Jews, divestiture and the holocaust

It was with great surprise that I recently read a Record article which referred to the Williams College Jewish Association brunch as one of the places where student supporters of divestiture met opposition by the parents. Being at the brunch, it seemed to me that quite the opposite was true. As a relatively strong debate went on between Dean Berek and numerous students, one could hear the loud murmurs of support among the parents for the students. At one point, Dean Berek asked for some comments from the parents. Surely enough, one father began to question the validity of the Administration's definition of morality. In fact, the only person in the audience who spoke in support of Dean Berek was Professor Jacobsohn. Considering the organization, one could hardly not expect the outcome.

The parents and students of the Williams College Jewish community, by its very nature, are intensely aware of the parallels between the case of South Africa and the indifference shown by the U.S. public to the repression in Nazi Germany. While I may be accused of oversimplifying the relation between two different societies, a level by level analysis will clarify this view. When the Nazi's originally began their repression of Jews, it was not with the intent of extermination. Instead, they were separated from society and placed together in ghettoes and camps where their labor could be better utilized. As the war progressed, and the Jews became a burden, the final solution was put into effect. Today in South Africa, the government is in the process of relocating the black population on Bantustans, thus separating them while still utilizing their labor. Are these Bantustans nothing more than over-sized forced labor camps? While it would be foolish to predict that a "final solution" will also come to South Africa, I can only speculate on the extreme action that might be taken by the government if the current internal pressure reaches a point where the whites feel severely threatened. At the moment this is not likely but suppose that next year, Vorster is assassinated by a black guerilla. A more reactionary successor, supported by a public desire for vengeance, could conceivably begin large-scale executions of potential suspects. You can finish the story yourself.

The problem with the above scenario is not that it is a slim possibility but an inevitable one. As any student of history can see, the forces that are driving the South African blacks towards discontent and protest will not subside but rather increase with each passing day. A civil war is going to break out, maybe today, maybe in five years, the only way to prevent it is for the government to make major concessions. Experience, however, has shown that this will not happen voluntarily. Thus, the only solution is economic pressure. It would be a lot simpler if Congress put a ban on U.S. investments. Social and political movements, however, do not generate influence directly through bureaucratic means. They start at the lowest levels and work themselves up as they expand. Perhaps Divestiture of Williams stock will be only symbolic and nothing else. This alone would be a worthwhile accomplishment. As more and more schools consider divestiture, they would use Williams College as a precedent for themselves. If one has doubts, you need only consider the number of times in the past few months that faculty, students, and administrations referred to precedents in our own arguments. As this domino effect goes on, eventually most public and private schools will have divested. This can then be translated into political leverage. My point is that we cannot close our eyes while a civil war or another holocaust breaks out. At this time, divestiture is the only way that we as a college community, can help. If we choose to ignore this, the future generations will look back and wonder how we could so quickly forget the tragic lessons learned only 35 years ago. To these accusations, we will only stand naked behind our rationalizations.

Div. III for the amateur, part II

I'd like to finish recounting the highlights of my recent tour of Division III, which I undertook recently to set the story straight on what really goes on over there (and when I say story, believe me I mean story.)

When I got to the Chemistry building, I happened on Prof. Chandler who is involved in physical chemistry. "The difference between physical and normal chemistry," he explained, "is that when things go wrong in normal chemistry, we go back to the drawing board. When things go wrong in physical chemistry, we hire two muscle men to kick around the machinery."

Chandler also discussed the concept of entropy, according to which all chemical reactions increase disorder in the universe, and occasionally wreak havoc around the chemistry department, too. Some physical chemists have predicted that because of entropy, the universe will be in a state of total disorder in 16 billion years and this will mark the end of everything, with the possible exception of the MCAT's and LSAT's. Chandler, however, is skeptical. "I think the Berkeley chemists went too far when they dressed up in monk's habits and paraded around with signs saying 'The world will end in 16 billion years,'" he said. "I don't put much stake in these prophets of doom and personally give the universe a good 25 to 30 billion years; with proper conservation measures maybe even 40."

Elsewhere in the department, Prof. Kleier is working on quantum chemistry. Equations have predicted that there is a good probability that a piece of chalk resting on a table will leap off of it given sufficient time, say three trillion years. Kleier hopes to test this hypothesis as part of a long range research project beginning sometime next year. He is also interested in some of the practical aspects of the field and his paper "Should Quantum Mechanics be Licensed" will be published soon in a major journal.

In organic chemistry, Prof. Mariagraf is working under a grant from Union Carbide to develop a special food additive for campus meals that will cause people's tongues to detonate when the word "divestiture" is mentioned.

Over in the physics department, I learned that Prof. Crampton is doing research into masers, Prof. Brown is doing research into lasers, Prof. Pasachoff is doing research into quasars, and Prof. Shelton is doing research into wood burning stoves. "Prof. Shelton has always been a little out of step with the department," explained a physics major I stopped in the corridor of the physics building.

Later, I found Prof. Blaha who is interested in fundamental particles and explained quark theory to me. "Now your basic heavy particles, protons and neutrons, are made up of three quarks. If you want to you can add a fourth quark and make it a gallon. The boys at Stanford tell that one," he chuckled. I quickly dropped any thought of applying there for graduate school and moved on. Elsewhere, Prof. Park is working on theoretical applications of special relativity, such as: if a dry cleaner is moving through space at almost the speed of light, what effect does this have on his one day service?

Finally, Prof. Lathrop is doing research into the history of the universe, with emphasis on the romantic period.

Unfortunately, I had not time to visit Division III's other departments, but I am sure that they too are doing important research work.

Children's day

To the editor:

We would like to thank the following for making Children's Day of 1978 the best yet: Lehman Service Council, Food Services, Dr. Peck and the Athletic Department, Tropical Gardens Pet Center of North Adams, the Williams College Jazz Ensemble, and the Williams College Pipe Band, the Record, Mark Hopkins House, the Suite 45 Coalition, Abbey Hall and of course all the student volunteers who helped to run events. We are happy at the chance to show the concern of the College for the youth of the immediate Berkshire Area and the ability of many different areas of the College Community to work together for a common goal. Thank you.

Andy Masetti, Chairman
Children's Day

—Notes from OCC—

STATE DEPARTMENT TAPE

OCC has received a tape recording from the U.S. Civil Service on the requirements and procedures for applying to the Foreign Service as a Foreign Service Officer or Foreign Service Information Officer. This includes taking the Foreign Service Officer Examination given once each year usually in Dec. If you would like to listen to the tape, please ask for it at the front counter of OCC, Mears House.

SUMMER HOUSING LISTS

A number of housing opportunities and situations wanted are coming into OCC for the Williamstown, New York, and Wash., D.C. areas. Come in and look at the clipboard on the counter at OCC if interested.

A MEMBER OF THE VENERABLE WILLIAMS CLASS OF 1927 ADDRESSES

This summer play a vital role in helping a young, well-financed company introduce a new product to America—namely—a PREVENTATIVE MAINTENANCE KIT which CONSERVES ENERGY, REDUCES POLLUTION, and saves car owners fuel and maintenance dollars. You can truly profit by joining this now nation-wide organization and promoting ADD-A-TUNE—the chemical Tune-up kit that will improve the environment, reduce oil imports, and fight inflation.

Extremely high, part-time earnings are possible (with no investment) while you build your own business wherever you may be this summer. If you are imaginative you can create large cash ANNUITIES payable to you after graduation, and, for members of '79, '80, and '81, payable while still in college. These annuities are payable for years after graduation.

There is no door-to-door selling. There is no investment. This entire opportunity is SCRUPULOUSLY clean or this LOYAL WILLIAMS SEPTUARGENARIAN graduate would never be involved.

BE MY GUEST AT THE WILLIAMS INN ON THE FOLLOWING DATES:

Friday, May 5 at	2:45 p.m. 4:30 p.m. 7:30 p.m.
Saturday, May 6 at	10:00 a.m. 1:30 p.m. 4:30 p.m. 7:00 p.m.
Sunday, May 7 at	2:00 p.m. 4:00 p.m.

Please come promptly at one of the above times and I shall tell you all about it. All students and faculty members are welcome.

Berkshire Symphony enervates capacity Chapin Hall crowd

by Jean L'Ecuyer

The Berkshire Symphony gave its final concert of the season with Julius Hegyi conducting last Friday to a well-attended Chapin Hall. The program included Liszt's The Battle of the Huns and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7. Guest violinist Daniel Phillips gave an electrifying performance of the Brahms violin concerto.

The concert opened with a fine performance of the Liszt piece. All the musicians played the difficult work quite well, and Hegyi kept strict control over his performers. One could have hoped for a somewhat better organ, such as the chapel organ, but the performance was still good nonetheless.

Unfortunately, after the intermission, the program degenerated. The performance of the Beethoven symphony was a great disappointment. The work was riddled with missed cues, early and late entrance, and too many incorrect notes. The first violins were the major culprits. When they were playing the correct notes together, they were invariably too loud, drowning out the rest of the sections. This was most noticeable in the final movement, when the strings ran roughshod over the sweet, melodic woodwinds passages. The piece obviously was not given enough preparation, and it definitely suffered.

Mention must be made of the singular performance of the timpanist during the Beethoven. His ability and high quality shone out from an otherwise dismal performance.

His performance was a masterpiece of perfection. He brought out all the power and all the emotion inherent in his violin with learned ease and style. He held his audience rapt throughout the piece. Every eye watched him; every ear strained to catch every sound and nuance.

Nachman displays ability

by Sarah Doerschuck

Myrna Nachman's piano recital last Tuesday night was an outstanding performance which demonstrated her fine musical ability. The program included Fantasiestucke by Robert Schumann, Partita No. 4 in D Major by J. S. Bach, and Sonata in A Major by Schubert.

Fantasiestucke is a collection of five short pieces that are one of Schumann's most technically demanding piano compositions. Nachman expressed the melodic beauty of the piece as well as meeting the technical challenge. In the Partita, a baroque composition which is quite different from the romantic Schumann, Nachman once more demonstrated her technical virtuosity. Her interpretation, if not quite strict, was nevertheless enjoyable to listen to.

The highlight of the program, however, was the Schubert Sonata. Nachman's performance was simply excellent. She played with humour and lyricism. She delighted the entire audience. As an encore she played a Schubert piece from Moments Musicaux. This short, familiar piece was beautiful in its simplicity; the perfect ending to a truly enjoyable recital.

Nachman has been at Williams only for this year. We are losing a fine musician.

Dan Wagoner and Dancers will present two performances tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. in the AMT. Tickets are $2.00 with Williams ID.

Forman's direction highlights film

by Spiro Rombotis

The well known Czechoslovakian director Milos Forman made the "Fireman's Ball" (originally: HORI, MA PANENKO) in 1967. It was his last film in Czechoslovakia before he came to the US and started making films in Hollywood. Forman is well known for his style of warm, delicate irony and his rare capability of observing seemingly unimportant aspects of everyday life, which nevertheless give the tone of the situation under examination.

"The Fireman's Ball" deals with an honorary ball for the retirement of an old fire brigade commander. The retiring commander is to be presented with a ceremonial hatchet by the winner of the ball's beauty contest. The film covers the whole ceremonial event, the process of which is interrupted twice: once with the summoning of the hosts to a nearby fire and the other one with the apparent theft of the raffle prizes. The film concludes with a highly loaded scene where the firemen offer their chief the token of their esteem—and what proves to be an empty hatchet case: The gift itself was stolen.

Forman's irony weaves an intricate pattern through relatively unimportant gags to the overall plot of the film. He attacks the firemen's hypocrisy in organizing the beauty contest, their dishonesty in stealing the gifts of their own ball, and finally their inability to exercise their main duty, namely to extinguish a fire. The farce is interrupted by very touching sequences like those involving the old man whose house burned to the ground.

Milos Forman's direction is so flexible that he can manage to move from laughter to tears from hilarious scenes to heartbreaking ones. While the whole story reminds one of Checkovian short stories, he introduces a new conception of creating a balance between the funny and the tragic, thus achieving the maximum effect on the audience. The actors' faces are masks in Forman's hands, ranging from the comical to the distressing, a very unusual demonstration of how powerful the film medium can be. "The Fireman's Ball" is one of those rare films that combines light entertainment and high quality cinematic expression.

"Fireman's Ball" will be shown tomorrow night in Bronfman at 7:30.

Off-campus housing proffers peace and privacy

by John Friedman

If you're tired of sharing your shampoo, your record collection, and your life with 80 others, if you're sick of Mission's sterility, Greylock's brawls, or cafeteria style food, off-campus housing may have something to offer.

Students living off campus unanimously prefer this option to on-campus living. They claim they have more peace, independence, and better food, usually at a price below College room and board.

"The only disadvantages are the demands it puts on your time," one senior said. "You have to think through your meals, buy the food, cook, clean up, pay the bills." Another disadvantage is the social isolation, some students insisting they felt like mystery figures while on campus. This is not a serious problem, particularly for those who live near campus on Rt. 7, or on Hoxsey, Southworth, Water, and Meecham Streets.

"Most people go off to gain control over their environment," said another senior. "We had a desire to escape dorm life, dining hall food, and to save some money."

Rent for off-campus houses and apartments ranges from as little as $80 per month including utilities to $145. Jack Watson and Mary Dempsey, the two realtors who rent most frequently to students, try to keep their rates in line with those of the college, which will charge about $100 per month for rooming next year. "The cost is usually a little more than College rooming when you include utilities" said Harry Sherman who, with Watson, will be renting 3 houses or (13 bedrooms) to students next year.

Henry Whittemore, '78, who lives in a four bedroom house on Meecham Street, agreed: "We pay as much as $70 each for gas and electricity during the winter months. The real savings come on food."

Next year the college food bill will be $115 per person per month, while the off-campus average is only $85. "We pay about $15 each per week on food" said Cordie Gould '78, who lives in a house behind Pine Cobble School. "The cost is often higher when you add liquor . . . people seem to expect you to throw parties when you move off-campus."

Of the roughly 160 students who applied for off-campus living next year, 117 have been given permission, according to Charles Jankey, Director of Student Housing. Priority is given to seniors, but the figure includes one or two juniors who will be returning after a year off and several other juniors given permission because of unusual circumstances.

Since the college has a shortage of beds, it is forced to allow at least 80 students to live off campus each year. (Next year's figure of 117 is an increase of 17 from this year's 100.)

In addition to the advantages of privacy, independence ... and improvements in the cost and quality of food, students like the chance to meet townspeople not connected with the College. "We really like our neighbors" was a common statement from those off-campus this year.

Most don't recommend off-campus living until the senior year. It tends to cut you off prematurely from the social life on campus and isolates you among a particular group of friends. "Isolation is not necessarily bad," one senior added. "You can maintain contact with the people you want. Others you can avoid."

Much of the housing is found by word of mouth, mostly from faculty who plan to be on sabbatical or from students currently living off-campus. The two realtors may be helpful in locating last minute openings. Because of the tight market, some seniors did not find houses until September.

Student off-campus were a matter of concern two years ago among some townspeople. Demand exceeds supply even if students are not in the market. Inevitably some students absorb low-rent housing otherwise available to families. Sherman said last fall that he didn't really fulfill for family use, but Jankey argues that owners may take advantage of student wealth and charge more than usual. Students do fill some low income housing and may force people to live outside Williamstown, he said.

For those who feel on-campus housing is going to the dogs, the off-campus alternative is appealing. (photo by Holder)

CUSTOMER INFORMATION FROM GENERAL MOTORS

HOW TO REDUCE RUST

YOU MAY BE WASHING THE WRONG SIDE OF YOUR CAR.

Spring is a perfect time to do something about rust.

Rusting is a year-round problem, and corrosive conditions have become a lot worse in the last five years.

If you live where salt is used to melt ice on the roads, that is speeding up corrosion on your car. If you live in the country, it's the calcium chloride that's spread on dirt roads to hold down dust. And corrosive chemicals in the air are causing rust in every part of America.

We're doing something to help prevent rust on the new cars we're building. Meanwhile, you can do something about reducing rust on your car.

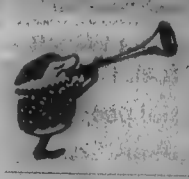
It's important to wash your car often. Use a mild soap and lukewarm or cold water.

Please don't neglect the underside of your car. The worst rusting happens from the inside out. That's because salt, slush, and even mud tend to collect in the crevices underneath the car, in the door creases, and inside the fenders. Moisture gets trapped in those places and causes rust. So try to wash the underside of your car, too. In winter, if you can, and at the first opportunity in spring. Even if it's only a few times a year, that would help some.

If your car gets dented, scratched, or chipped, try to get it repaired as soon as possible. Even a "small" scratch is bad. Because once a car starts to rust, the damage spreads fast. The paint around a dent or scratch can look okay, but rust is spreading underneath. In the long run, it's cheaper to fix the car right away.

A lot of people think that parking a car in a heated garage during the winter will help prevent rust. But it's just the opposite. Cold slows down the rusting process, as it does most chemical reactions.

We're doing more now to protect GM cars from rust. For one thing, we're using more rust-resistant materials, including different types of zinc-coated steel, in places where rust usually occurs. Also, our new paint primers and the way we apply them are designed to provide a thorough finish, even on some parts of the car you can't see.



Our goal is to protect your car so that it lasts longer and gives you the most value. And fighting rust helps.

This advertisement is part of our continuing effort to give customers useful information about their cars and trucks and the company that builds them.

revealing that a majority of students polled favor divestiture, Smith maintained that this resolution echoed the majority's sentiments toward apartheid.

"Let's go out on a limb. Let's pass it!" declared Smith amid the applause of the majority present.

Treasurer John Simpson '79 and Randy Wang '80 questioned whether the council had the right to vote.

"Do we really know how the students feel about this?" Simpson continued. "I say no".

Ted Stroll, co-author of the resolution, countered Simpson by stating that the resolution should not be penalized because certain council members had done a poor job representing the students.

Debate rages on hiring

Debate raged between panel members at the Monday discussion on affirmative action at Williams, as panelists attacked or defended the administration's present policies toward hiring women and minorities.

Dean of the Faculty Francis Oakley asserted that the College is attempting to increase the number of women and minorities on its payroll. He said the College actively seeks to meet self-established affirmative action levels in hiring.

Ass't. Prof. Lynda Bundtzen disputed Oakley's statements, citing the difference in male and female roles at the College, the paucity of women and minorities in tenured and administrative positions and the high rate of attrition among faculty women.

College Provost Neil Grabois, chairman of the College's Affirmative Action Review Committee, noted that the group has met only once. When it becomes more organized, he stated, it will evaluate how well the College has met its standards and then make recommendations.

After months of preparation and argument, three row houses have voted to offer coeducational living next fall, following CUL guidelines.

Spencer-Brooks will mix the sexes in both its main houses as well as Woodbridge House, this year part of Garfield-Wood House. The motion passed 17-10 among the men and unanimously among the women.

Gar-Wood and Perry-Bascom houses went coed after adopting a compromise proposal which will guarantee women in both houses single-sex housing next year.

Earlier, in separate proposals, the men in the two houses had overwhelmingly approved coeducation plans while the women had narrowly defeated them. Because house officers had represented the ballots as "final and binding," the CUL required the houses to offer single-sex housing for any woman desiring it.

After two futile attempts to get the CUL to change its ruling, the two house presidents, Peter Green '78 and Chip Buckner '79, met with Dean Cris Roosenraad to hammer out a compromise arrangement. The compromise "Chadbourne plan" guaranteed single-sex housing for women of both houses in the Perry satellite Chadbourne House while offering coeducation for the majority in the four main houses.

Waterpolo crown evades Ephs

Trinity College squeaked out 10-8 victories over both Williams and RPI to win the annual Williams spring Water Polo tournament at Muir Pool last weekend.

Action began Friday night as the Ephs were upset by RPI 11-6. Although Mike Murphy, Gordon Cliff, and co-captain Brian McDermott each found the mark for two goals, Williams lacked the balanced scoring which enabled them to finish sixth in the New England Championship last fall. Later Friday night a tired RPI squad swam with a solid Trinity Club for three periods, but fell to the fresher team in an exciting 10-8 game.

Williams came out strong Saturday morning, hoping to beat Trinity and deadlock the tournament. With defensemen Peter Howd and John Trapp providing stingy defense, Trinity was unable to maintain their usual penetrating offensive pattern. Mike Feltes, back in form, made his shot count to break the 3-3 tie, and McDermott added his second and third goals to put the Ephs ahead 7-6 going into the final period. Trinity used their experience to advantage scoring 2 quick goals then hung on for the 10-8 victory.

Frosh Gordy Cliff played his usual inside game against Trinity adding a pair of goals to the Eph's cause. Murphy, Williams strongest shooter, also rocketed two goals home to keep the Ephs close.

Women ruggers embarass Smith, 20-0

The Women's Rugby team demolished Smith this past weekend 20-0 on Cole Field.

Sandy Tchen scored the first try early in the first half as she maneuvered past two Smithies. Yvonne Vogl then followed a kick in for a touch down to make the score 8.0.

Jeanne Weeks had a terrific 35 yard run in for the next four points. Linda Collins was high scorer with two running trys to give Williams their biggest win yet. The new fullback Louise Van Dyke and scrum half Lee Ash also had fine performances.

In the exciting contest, the Ephs' lost ace lineman Margaret Couper to a fractured wrist. They head into this weekends' rematch against Smith without her.

The Ruggers are now 3-0 for the season having beaten Albany Law 4-0 two weeks ago. The women's last home game is Saturday May 13 against Old Blue, a New York Club Team.

The women ruggers shamed Smith Saturday, 20-0.

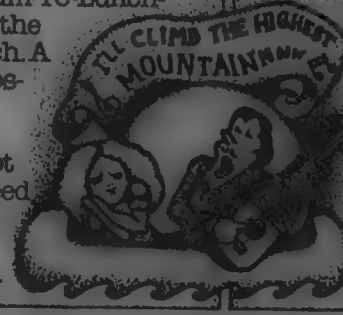
Mountaineering #4.

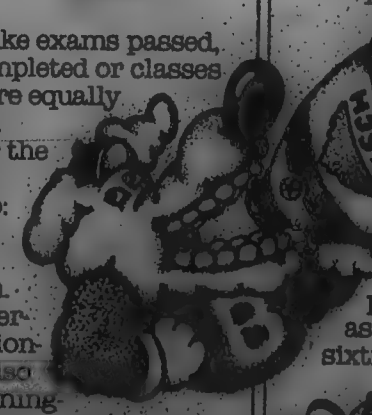
THE OPTIMUM MOMENT.



Mountaineering[1] is a skill of timing as well as technique. The wrong moment, like the wrong method, marks the gap between amateur and aficionado. So the key to successful mountaineering is to choose the occasions wisely and well. When, then, is it appropriate to slowly quaff the smooth, refreshing mountains of Busch Beer?

Celebrations, of course, are both expected and excellent opportunities to test your mountaineering mettle. Indeed, on major holidays it is virtually mandatory to do so. Imagine ushering in the fiscal new year or commemorating Calvin C. Coolidge's birthday or throwing caution to the wind during Take-A-Sorghum-To-Lunch-Week without the benefit of Busch. A disturbing prospect at best.

On the other hand, not every event need be as significant as those outlined above.



Small victories like exams passed, papers completed or classes attended are equally acceptable. Remember the mountaineer's motto: matriculation is celebration.

Interpersonal relationships are also meaningful times. There are few things finer than taking your companion in hand and heading for the mountains, transcending the ho-hum and hum-drum in favor of a romantic R & R. Naturally, couples who share the pleasures of mountaineering run the risk of being labeled social climbers. But such cheap shots are to be ignored. They are the work of cynics, nay-sayers and chronic malcontents.

Similarly, the ambience of an athletic afternoon (e.g. The Big Game) is another ideal moment. Downing the mountains elevates the morale of the fan and, hence, the team. Therefore, if you care at all about the outcome, it is your duty to mountaineer.

When should one not enjoy the invigoration of the mountains? Here, you'll be happy to learn, the list is much briefer.

Mountaineering is considered declasse with dessert, improper during judicial proceedings and just plain foolish while crop dusting around power lines. Otherwise, as the hot-heads of the sixties used to say, "Seize the time!"

[1] Mountaineering is the science and art of drinking Busch. The term originates due to the snowy, icy peaks sported by the label outside and perpetuates due to the cold, naturally refreshing taste inside. (cf. lessons 1, 2 and 3.)

Don't just reach for a beer. BUSCH® Head for the mountains.

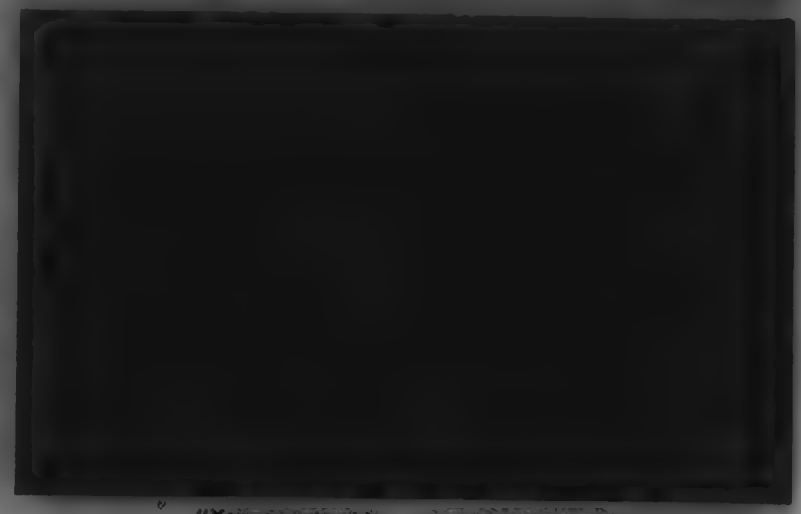
Golfers surprise Dartmouth raise season ledger to 5-1

After upping their record to 5-1 with a 5 stroke devastation of Union, the Williams College golf squad shook in terror at the horrifying prospect of facing the Big Green machine from Hanover, New Hampshire. Fresh off an impressive victory in the Ivy League Championships, Dartmouth expected a pleasant tour around the Taconic Golf Club, confident of triumph over the Ephs. Unfortunately, like Napoleon at Waterloo, like the Egyptians at the Red Sea, the Eph linksters did the impossible, scoring a stunning, shocking monumental five stroke victory over the disconsolate Tribe.

As Judah Maccabee discovered when a tiny canister of oil lasted seven days longer than it was supposed to, miracles can happen. On this glorious May 2, the angels were singing as Ed "Big" Bousa, one of the most powerful players to grace the illustrious Williams College golfing stage returned from the darkest depths of the most discouraging slumps in his storied career. Big showed that he is back to stay, winning medalist honors with a 76.



Reappearing after a self-imposed exile, Mike Lynch, whose left heel rocketing back to earth evokes visions of a Jack Nicklaus emerge in the midst of Augusta pines, shot a solid 81. Hopefully, his performance will mark the beginning of a return to his impressive freshman scoring of three long years ago. Tied with Lynch at 81 was Marcel Oudin. Had it not been for some strange putting, Oudin's solid iron play could have produced a much lower score.

Dartmouth expected a pleasant tour around the Taconic Golf Club. . .

In fourth position, junior Bill Upton fired an 84. The talented veteran is capable of much better, and the team is hoping for a return to his spring trip heroics against a super Amherst team.

Exuding out of both nostrils the Ross Keller cuisine ingested only a few hours before, a usually steady Dan Katz could not get his game untracked. Katz parlayed a monotonous, frustrating string of bogeys into a disappointing 86, the fifth counting score for Williams.

With their record standing at 6-1, the Ephs get ready to face a series of weak teams before the final, cataclysmic clash with Amherst at the Little Three. Amherst won the New England Championships, and also were victors over Dartmouth and Harvard. However, the Purple linksters are definitely capable of one last upset, because this is a special team. A team that is hungry. A team that has heart.

"You can see the sky . . . from your side of the trail."

Purple racketmen down Wesleyan

The men's tennis team is a stubborn lot. Even though it has been six years since the racketmen last suffered a defeat in Little Three competition, they apparently still have no intention of spreading the wealth around. Taking the first step toward yet another Little Three championship, coach Sean Sloane's netmen downed Wesleyan 7-2 on Wednesday to set up a match for the title with Amherst tomorrow.

Wesleyan has slowly been building up a team capable of knocking off the Ephs, and the Cards definitely threw a scare into Williams by taking two of the singles matches. But the Eph's had confidence in their still superior ability. That this confidence was justified came through in the doubles as the netmen swept all three contests.

Aware of Wesleyan's strength, Williams began the singles expecting a struggle and they got just that. Martin Goldberg had to play well to take a hard earned 6-3, 7-6 triumph for his fifth dual match win in a row. At the no. two position, Dan O'Connell used strong pre-match preparation on the way to a come from behind 4-6, 6-2, 6-2 win, and captain Jim Parsons frittered away a 5-1 second set lead only to hold on for a 6-3, 7-6 victory. Pete Friesen was dropped by a player who was red-hot, 6-4, 5-7, 7-5, but Evan Bash balanced this with a convincing 6-0, 6-2 triumph. In an "I just can't believe it" match, no. six Mitch Reiss was demolished 6-0, 6-1.

With the outcome of the match resting on the doubles matches, Goldberg and Parsons put on a sound performance to clinch things for the Ephs, winning 6-1, 7-6. Reiss redeemed himself as he teamed with Bash for a 6-1, 6-3 blow out at the second spot. Bill Whelan showed he hasn't lost his Little Three touch, as he returned to action in whites, teaming with O'Connell for a three set win.

The Ephwomen's strong first half baffled Trinity's unusual zone defense and secured an 11-8 victory.

Laxwomen edge Trinity 11-8

by Mary Kate Shea

Williamstown, Mass.—It was only a strong first half performance resulting in a 6-3 halftime lead that enabled the Williams College women's lacrosse team to raise its record to 5-1-1- with an 11-8 win over the Trinity College Bantams.

Williams seemed unhindered in the opening period by Trinity's unusual zone defense, which resembled a wall around the goal crease. The Ephs built up as much as a six-goal lead early in the game and held a three-goal edge at the break. The Bantams fought back in the second half, opening the period with a goal and scoring three goals in a row at one point late in the half. Williams, however, did not succumb to the Trinity pressure, matched its opponents goal for goal in the second half, and pulled out the victory.

The Eph attack was led once again by Sally Kruse who registered five goals, picking the corners three times and surprising the Trinity zone with quick-stick shots on passes from Maggi O'Brien and Val Corning. O'Brien cradled through heavy traffic around the cage and found the goal three times on successful drives penetrating the visitors' wall zone. Mary Fish, Sarah Baldwin and Sue Wright each managed to break through the zone to add a score apiece to Williams offensive effort.

Williams defense, after a sharp first-half performance, looked a bit tired in the second stanza; they pushed themselves to contain the Trinity offense and were given added inspiration when O'Brien and Kruse finally tallied for Williams after the Bantams had narrowed the lead to 8-7. Marty Taft was tough in the goal, registering 15 saves in the contest.

This Thursday, Williams travels to Hanover, N.H. for a game against a perennially tough Dartmouth squad. The Ephs are hoping to avenge last year's tight 8-7 loss to the Indians.

Middlebury defense leaves laxmen losers

MIDDLEBURY, VT.—Williams failed to get its motor running in time to catch a well-tuned Middlebury lacrosse team Wednesday. By the final flag, Middlebury had lapped the sluggish Ephmen 18-9.

Middlebury did virtually nothing wrong. It capitalized on its first three extra man opportunities, won all but two faceoffs, and scooped up ground balls like a Hoover vacuum cleaner. Williams was left in the dust before it was even out of first gear.

When Williams finally did begin to hum, it was led by the well precisioned attack of Todd Eckerson, Dick Goodbody, and Pete Thomsen. They combined to score several dazzling fast-break goals which added some respectability to the team's overall poor showing.

This effort which produced six goals in the fourth quarter came much too late. Middlebury dominated the first half and by the fourth quarter had established a 13-3 lead.

Williams was harassed all afternoon by Middlebury's aggressive double-teaming defense. This ploy hampered Williams ability to clear the ball out of its zone and generate an adequate offense.

Williams hopes to even its 4-5 record and capture the Little Three crown this Saturday against Amherst. The game will be played at Amherst at 2:00 p.m.

Women's V-ball obtains status

At a recent meeting of the college's Athletic Department, the members of the department voted to grant varsity status to the Williams women's volleyball team. The fact that the team has been granted varsity status means that it will now receive increased support from the Athletic Department.

The squad's only senior, Leslie Ferguson, started the team at Williams four years ago and it has had club status since its inception.

This past season, coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin's two squads consisted of 30 women. The "varsity" team finished its regular season with an impressive 15-2 ledger, including wins against such schools as the University of Maine, the University of Bridgeport, the University of New Hampshire, the University of Mass., and the University of Vermont. Following post-season tournament play, the women's volleyball club posted a 16-3 record and was ranked third in the [illegible].

A strong nucleus of enthusiastic and talented players who will be returning from this past season's successful squad makes the future look bright for the women's varsity volleyball team.

of a Jack Nicklaus charge in the midst of Augusta pines, shot a solid 81. Hopefully, his performance will mark the beginning of a return to his impressive freshman scoring of three long years ago. Tied with Lynch at 81 was Marcel Oudin. Had it not been for some strange putting, Oudin's solid iron play could have produced a much lower score.

Dartmouth expected a pleasant tour around the Taconic Golf Club. . .

In fourth position, junior Bill Upton fired an 84. The talented veteran is capable of much better, and the team is hoping for a return to his spring trip heroics against a super Amherst team.

Exuding out of both nostrils the Ross Keller cuisine ingested only a few hours before, a usually steady Dan Katz could not get his game untracked. Katz parlayed a monotonous, frustrating string of bogeys into a disappointing 86, the fifth counting score for Williams.

With their record standing at 6-1, the Ephs get ready to face a series of weak teams before the final, cataclysmic clash with Amherst at the Little Three. Amherst won the New England Championships, and also were victors over Dartmouth and Harvard. However, the Purple linksters are definitely capable of one last upset, because this is a special team. A team that is hungry. A team that has heart.

year. Log Committee Chairman Eva Grudin said that the committee is very pleased that Mike has agreed to take on the job, and that she is confident that he will provide strong leadership for the Log in the coming year. She stressed his enthusiasm, his original ideas and his willingness to solicit suggestions as the key points in his favor.

Masi outlined a two part plan for encouraging people to come to the pub next year. He said he wants to build a following for specific shows on the big TV screen, and secondly attract a variety of people down to the Log. "I want everyone to feel that the Log has something for them," he said.

He specified the addition of inexpensive popcorn, a new electronic game, and "import nights" featuring unusual beers as possible attractions for next year. Of course, he said, we will maintain the specials that worked well this year.

In his interview with the Log Committee he expressed concern that the "Bring a Professor" nights had worked as well as they might. He suggested working through the various departments to get more faculty down to use the facility.

Popcorn, a new electronic game and unusual beers may be featured next year.

Masi looks forward to spending the year in Williamstown. "I like the College atmosphere," he said. "I think another year would be fun."

Above all, he stressed that he wanted to hear from the students and faculty. "I'd really appreciate ideas," he said. I want to know what you want to do.

Eva Grudin praised both Masi and his predecessor. "I'm sure Mike will carry on with the leadership Claudia has shown. That enthusiasm is something we need to keep up. The Log does well because it has grown into the kind of place where people want to come and relax."

Lindsey leaves the Log to go to Stanford business school next fall. Her assistant manager Brian Fales '77 will attend Northeastern Business School. Former manager Gene Faulk returns from France to enter Tuck Business School.

According to Case, the sole outlet for the "Best of Williams" album from now on will be the Record Store. The record will continue to be available for $4.00, a discount price, until May 12.

Night Fever and the Sickness unto Death

by Jeff Kovar

I swore that I would never go to a Steve Case party, or buy a Steve Case record album; I don't care if the Ephlats do sing "Here Comes the Sun" on it. It's nothing personal, it's just that I despise rampant laissez-faire capitalism on the college campus. It is too wide open for that sort of thing, and we all have too much money floating around loose. In fact, there is something unholy about a media-hype super New York disco being organized at Williams. It would be almost acceptable if Prospect House did it, because everyone knows they're always desperate for attention, but Purple Cow Productions?

We all know too well how the College was swamped for weeks with ads on WCFM, in the Record, and on bulletin boards in every house: "Night Fever, Rock-Disco multimedia extravaganza." Originally promised was a real New York City disc jockey, and all the lights and other props necessary for transforming that ugly behemoth Mission Park into Super-Disco. Things didn't exactly turn out as planned. I overheard one of the organizers talking in the bathroom during the party and he stated it thus: "We're getting stomped on."

It's hard to feel sorry for Purple Cow Productions. From what I have heard, some of PCP's members have turned quite a profit supplying the sound for various campus parties and also organizing the "Magic Bus" to Albany after each semester. Steve Case told me they expected to lose $400 on the party. He claimed that only by packing the place could he have possibly broken even, but I tend to be a little skeptical of that. He is a businessman, not just a nice guy willing to underwrite Williams parties from out of his own pocket. Hell, I never even saw him dancing!

Friday morning I was rudely interrupted from a sound sleep induced by too much beer consumed the night before, in an attempt to ignore a lame effort by Pure Prairie League. It was my News Editor: just the person you want to talk to first thing in the morning. I heard some vague words about doing an article on the "Night Fever" party that night. For some reason I heard myself responding enthusiastically to his suggestions.

Traces of High School

I was nursing a cup of coffee in the dining room of Dodd House when it finally hit me that I was going to that party tonight! Ugh! My mind raced back to high school and the disco dances we had then. Visions of swept back blow-dried hair, platform shoes, and silk shirts came flooding back. At Williams? It was too horrible to imagine. What had I gotten myself into? What if everyone did wear authentic clothing? Not me, man. I had enough of that in high school. When my roommate lost his eyeballs staring at my two pairs of platform shoes that first day in Fayerweather Hall, I knew this wasn't Easton Area High School. I put them out to pasture and I never wanted to be reminded of my sordid past again. I was really born to be a preppy; it just took some time to find that out.

The most ironic part of the whole "Saturday Night Fever" craze is that nobody really understands the movie. It was a colossal put-down! It deflated everything about the typical teenage existence and loves of John Travolta and his buddies, including the local disco. So why does everyone have to go dancing after seeing it?

"This is not a Williams party," I thought to myself walking along the path leading to Mission Park, and seeing the flashing lights and stream of brilliant spots flowing around the dining hall. I couldn't wait to get inside. (Oh, just for reference, I kept a very low profile at the party. You know, objective Record reporter, and all that. I put on my best pair of ratty grey cords, sneakers, and an imitation lacoste shirt. One in a million.)

The first thing to do at every Williams party, is to head for the beer. First, however, I found my way to the punch table and gave it a taste. Just as I expected: it tasted like someone had lost his lunch in it. I quickly got away from that fragrant concoction and was pointed to the beer. Surprise! God bless you, Steve Case! A Williams first! It was dark beer! Yes, there really was dark beer on tap.

As I clutched the prized brew, I stopped and chatted and tried to size up the crowd. This was not a typical Williams party crowd, it seemed. There must have been half a dozen or so silk shirts in evidence, which was quite a surprise. I even spotted a pair or two of platforms that weren't on black feet. I danced a few rounds and was caught up in the feverish atmosphere on the dance floor. But the dancers were really moving, and bodies were doing more than just the mere jiggling they usually perform as they pretend to dance. People were stepping and moving their hands and bodies in a quite, well, "feverish", way. "Steve's pulled it off," I thought.

When "Stayin' Alive" by the Bee Gees came on and everyone screamed and raced for the dance floor I knew I had stayed too long. I lounged up against the wall, and realized that maybe it was just another Williams party. I was on my sixth beer and was still feeling pain. I stood there leaning, looking around fitfully at the others

Before divestiture

Before we can recommend that the College divest itself of the stocks of corporations with investments in South Africa we must ask a number of questions. The answers are not necessarily evident, and people will disagree.

What is the goal of divestiture?

Proponents of divestiture have a genuine concern for the black people of South Africa. They believe that if Williams sells it stock in American corporations with South African investments the companies will withdraw, crippling the South African economy and forcing the government to end the system of apartheid.

Will the withdrawal of American corporations end apartheid?

American corporations contribute about one per cent of the South African GNP. The government would certainly notice their withdrawal. It probably would not cripple the economy."

If, however, the move to cripple the economy is successful, the first people to suffer would undoubtedly be the blacks. Leaders on both sides acknowledge that the black would be the first to lose employment and government services. Proponents argue that the end of apartheid justifies the momentary discomfort. Opponents point out (1) that it is very easy for someone across the sea to say that someone else should make a sacrifice, and (2) that there is no guarantee of either a quick or an eventual capitulation and that this move may hurt the blacks without the promise of a better future.

In their favor, American corporations do break South African law providing, in many cases, equal pay for equal work, integrated dining and washroom facilities and promoting labor organizations. Although black South African leaders disagree, many maintain that American business is a progressive force in the country. Their absence would be a step backwards for the country's blacks.

It is not immediately clear whether an American pullout would help or hurt black South Africans. The question "Is it moral to stay?" must therefore be coupled with "Is it moral to withdraw?"

Is divestiture the best way to get Americans out of South Africa?

If we decide that it is unconscienable to remain, we must determine the best way to achieve that goal. Divestiture would entail the sale of our stocks in corporations with investments in South Africa. If Williams is the only institution to do so it is a futile gesture. If other stock holders follow suit the mass action will probably depress the price of stock. This will not directly affect the corporations, as they got their money from the original sale of stock, the price-level of subsequent trades affects them only if they seek additional capitalization from another stock issue.

An additional consideration must be that if Williams sells the stock, who will buy it? While the College holds the stock and votes the proxies it has some, albeit small, leverage. Once Williams sells its shares it forfeits any right to influence corporate policy. Will future shareholders be as concerned about black South Africans as Williams?

Is this the best way to spend our money?

The transaction costs of the sale of Williams' stocks involved with South Africa run over 100,000 dollars. Charles Mott, chairman of the trustees finance committee estimated that this figure was just the tip of the iceberg. Refusal to invest in corporations with South African holdings limits the flexibility of the Williams portfolio, thus costing much more in the long run. Assuming, for the moment, only the 100,000 dollar loss; is this the best way to spend that money? Should we put that money into financial aid, the Williamstown chest fund, or should we sell the stocks and send the money to a Wall Street stockbroker?

What sacrifice will we make?

If we decide that divestiture is morally and economically sound, and that it will have the desired effect, we must look toward ourselves. Anyone who calls on the College to make a sacrifice must be willing to make one himself. It goes without saying that he must divest himself of holdings in these corporations. To be morally consistent he must boycott their products as well. (The sale of a company's products is much more important to its well-being than the price of its stock.) It is hypocritical to call for divestiture and then: drive to class in a GM, use the IBM computer center, or drink Coke in the dining halls.

How do we persuade the trustees?

Well reasoned argumentation is very effective. A College Council resolution on the subject would be very good if the trustees felt that sufficient time went into it. The current resolution, on which the CC spent two hours on amendments and procedure, and then less than thirty minutes on substantive issues is worse than useless.It shows that we do not really care.

So what do we do?

The trustees have elected to exercise their proxies on shareholder resolutions as they relate to South Africa. Although slow and conservative this will have a direct sustained impact on the corporations involved. The burden rests upon the pro-divestiture people to demonstrate that their plan is more than a one-shot fireworks display that attracts attention, but accomplishes nothing.

Letters to the editor

Freshman year

To the editor:

This letter is in response to several erroneous conclusion various members of the college community have drawn from my remarks as they appeared in Chris DiAngelo's article on freshman housing.

1) When I refer to the loud, violent and sexist climate in the entry I in no way mean to imply that all, or even a majority of the residents of Williams D fit that description. Most of the people in the entry are intelligent, concerned and respectful of divergent opinions and lifestyles. They know who they are and they know I respect them and consider them my friends.

However, there is a minority of students who not only live in a manner which infringes upon the rights of others, but demand conformity to their way of life. It is this group [illegible] and often succeeds in making the entry as an architectural entity, an unpleasant place to live. Fortunately, their ethos is not adhered to be many members of Williams D.

2) Many also believe that I am pointing an accusatory finger at my Junior Advisors. At the beginning of the year they seemed to have a laissez-faire attitude towards events in the entry. They are however, sensitive and approachable and never condoned the destructiveness which I mentioned. My JAs, Tom Cox and Tom Gardner, have shown their dedication to the well-being and personal integrity of each individual in Williams D. At times they have even accepted ridicule as a consequence of stands they have taken. I am thankful for that, consider them my friends and did not intend to give the impression that they fostered the pernicious and intolerant behavior alluded to above.

Money and Politics

We would like to express our dismay at the College Council's newest proposal, to be introduced at their meeting on Wednesday, May 10. This proposal would prohibit the allocation of Council funds to any organization attempting to influence "political opinion" on issues of concern to the college community (divestiture, for example). If this proposal is passed, the vitality of campus life at a college already held by many to be "sleepy", will be drained still further (Williams is sometimes referred to as the "Brigadoon of colleges"—it wakes up once every hundred years). For the following reasons, we urge the defeat of this proposal:

(1) The College Council's primary responsibility is to represent the student body. Since a large number of Williams students are politically concerned, the financial disowning—and thereby strangulation—of all campus organizations of a political nature would constitute the Council's refusal to represent an important segment of the student body. For this reason, the proposal contradicts the Council's avowed purpose as a representative organization.

(2) The proposal would damage the ethical nature of the college. Whatever the administration may like to believe, morality is not a matter of mere blather. Persons and institutions reach their fruition as moral agents through action. Without the vital interplay of belief and action, William's "free exchange of ideas" becomes an academic [illegible].

Students who take political action are attempting to make a concrete ethical commitment. If the College Council cuts off political activity at Williams, then it is denying students this right, and is reducing their moral efforts to the level of discussion only. It seems to us that no representative body should have the right to do this. By passing this proposal, the Council would in effect be saying, "We do not support the moral enterprise."

(3) The proposal would hurt the educational quality of the college. If education at Williams is to be worthwhile, it should help us to discover how we want to live, and what ethical commitments we believe to be important. But we do not find this out by isolating ourselves from our community, but rather by interacting with different people and by trying on different lifestyles to see whether they suit us. By eliminating political organizations, the Council would deprive students of one of the most meaningful opportunities for personal interaction at Williams, and would deprive them also of the opportunity to experiment with life-styles and interests which they might find deeply gratifying. For these reasons, we feel that the resolution would eliminate one of the most important components of a liberal arts education.

(4) The category, "political", on which the proposal relies, is extremely vague. Under the cover of this word, the Council could arbitrarily deny funds to any organizations of whose activities it disapproved. We, the students, would be unwise to give the Council the power to limit student activities, when that power is couched in a word as vague as "political."

(5) If the Council passes this proposal, it will be catering to the desires of the administration, who would like nothing better than to suppress student dissent. Despite what Mr. Chandler has been telling parents and alumni, the administration is worried by the prospect (and reality) of a "politicized" campus. They would be quite happy if students were to remain docile, and behaved like "good little girls and boys."

(6) While this proposal is intended to cripple left-oriented political organizations (like the Williams Action Coalition), it would have the same repressive effect upon more moderate political groups, such as the Williams Republican Club, and the Americans for Democratic Action as well as media organizations like The Record, WCFM, Backtalk, and Pique. It is therefore in the best interests of all students on this campus to prevent the implementation of this resolution.

We urge members of the student body to contact their College Council representative and ask that she or he vote against this proposal. It is clearly a resolution which would hamper the development of free thinkers and ethically responsible in[illegible] Becoming a "literary" person has always held a certain attraction for me, and now that I am writing for the paper regularly (that might be stretching things fairly early) is more accurate—regular enough at least that I haven't been approached by laxative companies asking for endorsements) the thing doesn't seem as far-fetched as it once did. I must frankly admit that the thought of becoming a literary person is in danger of going to my head, although I'm not really sure what it'll do when it gets there. If it chooses to wait until after my last exam to arrive, however, it will at least have the advantage of off-season rates, and perhaps that will keep me from having to deal with it for a while.

Sour Pickles: Literary observations on Williams

In any case, there is one thing that literary people around here seem to do a fair amount of that I haven't tried yet, and that is to offer something in the way of a commentary about life at Williams with special attention to its more disagreeable aspects. Since this is the last opportunity I will have to establish any sort of a reputation this year, I feel compelled to offer below a list of my own gripes about the school.

1) There is not enough humor around here. It seems that everywhere I go someone is mentioning the dearth of humor on this campus. It's usually me, and that may explain it but I still think the CUL ought to try a find out why in an average week the funniest thing here is the taste of the lemonade in Baxter. Certainly the alumni do their share by wearing House of Walsh pants for their reunions. Can't the students think of something with as much comic chutzpah?

2) On political matters, not only do I believe that Williams should pull out of South Africa, but I think it should pull out of the Western Massachusetts and go to Florida where the weather is tolerable. How is it that Williams got built in a land where anyone fool enough to try and celebrate May day is liable to get frostbite? A place where the concept of "the warm" is like a Platonic form which seems to exist in our memories but never corresponds to any outside reality? Of course pulling Williams out of Western Mass. wouldn't make our consciences any clearer, but it would work wonders on our sinuses. No doubt some people here who like snow would object to our moving to a warmer climate, but they could become philosophy majors and never know the difference.

3) There is too much emphasis on drinking at Williams. And I don't just mean alcohol either. So often when I'm out with friends I'll hear the same refrain; "Hey, want to go to the snack bar and get a coke?" or "Do you mind if I stop at this water fountain for a drink?" Fluid intake appears to hold the position on this campus that the hula hoop and stuffing people in phone booths once had and I wouldn't be surprised if hardly a day goes by for the average Williams student in which he doesn't engage in it in some way. Nor do people here seem very receptive to the idea that it's excessive. You should see the icy stares I have received on the rare occasions that I have gotten up the gumption to suggest to a soda seeking companion that perhaps a candy bar might be more appropriate.

Of course the administration isn't crazy about having expositions of the seamier side of life here like having the drinking problem appear in the paper, but as long as I am writing this column I control what goes in and no one in Hopkins Hall is going to silence my pen.

(Editor's note: Peter Rintels may be back next year to write more of Sour Pickles. We'll know for sure when we hear from the Dean's office over the summer.)

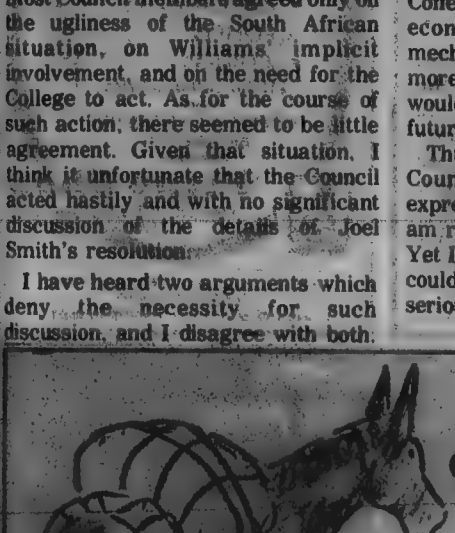
Letter: CC Resolution

To the editor:

I am writing to clarify the statement which I made at the College Council meeting of May 5 and which seems to have confused many people who were in attendance.



As I stated at that meeting, I believe that the Council should voice its opinions on important issues and I firmly support the spirit of Joel Smith's resolution. Having attended College Council meetings for three years, I applaud the Council's move to consider issues (in addition to financial and committee matters) and, in this instance, to show concern for the plight of black South Africans. I, like many members of the Williams faculty, staff and student body, believe that the withdrawal of American investment from South Africa is a morally and politically appropriate act. Yet I am disturbed by the manner and form in which the College Council expressed its views on this question. It seemed to me that most Council members agreed only on the ugliness of the South African situation, on Williams' implicit involvement, and on the need for the College to act. As for the course of such action, there seemed to be little agreement. Given that situation, I think it unfortunate that the Council acted hastily and with no significant discussion of the details of Joel Smith's resolution.

I have heard two arguments which deny the necessity for such discussion, and I disagree with both. The first is that the proposals in question have been described in literature on campus and that the student body has been discussing these questions throughout the semester. The fact that literature has been handed out and that public and private conversations have taken place does not seem to me to absolve the Council from the responsibility of studying a proposal point by point, debating the issue on the floor and knowing the substance of what it is endorsing.

The second argument some offer is that the resolution is important regardless of its details because it expresses student support for strong action by the College. Given the controversy at the meeting, I believe that sentiment to be the only one clearly shared by most Council members. It seems to me therefore that a simple and firm statement to that effect—one which did not purport an understanding on the part of College Council members of complex economic, procedural, and mechanical issues—might have been more honest and more persuasive and would have left the Council options for future discussion and actions.

Thus I do not challenge the Council's intention and right to express its views. To the contrary, I am reassured by its efforts to do so. Yet I feel that Joel Smith's resolution could have been an occasion for more serious discussion.

Sincerely,
Eileen Julien

Dick Goodbody

Gallery highlights Goodbody

A retrospective show of the photographs of Dick Goodbody will open tomorrow afternoon at 5:00 in the Dodd Student Art Gallery. Goodbody is a well-known student photographer at Williams. As past President of the Photography Club and teacher of numerous Winter Studies in photography, Goodbody's work has been seen previously in exhibitions at the Images movie theatre and at Dodd.

This show, however, is unusual in that it is a retrospective, and as such, reflects Goodbody's growth as a photographer from Freshman to Senior year. The maturation of his visual perception is evident in the changes in his most frequent subject, contemporary landscape. Landscapes extend from Paris and Stonehenge to the backyard of Goodbody's off-campus home. An important component of Goodbody's landscapes is their technical quality—and one notes a progressive improvement of his skills. Goodbody has learned the technique of both black and white and color.

Errata

Massive editing errors caused two paragraphs to mysteriously disappear from and two others to be switched around in John Libertine's review of the Berkshire Symphony's concert. The paragraphs in question concerned guest violinist Daniel Phillips, a 23 year old musical genius and virtuoso (at least in the reviewer's opinion). Phillips deserves nothing but praise for the brilliance of his performance [illegible]. Opinions of the rest of the concert, particularly the Beethoven symphony, remain as stated in the article.

Gay rights

To the editor:

We wish the Hechingers had visited Williams College and talked with us, for they seem to have missed totally both the point and the spirit of campus gay activism—above all, coming out—as we know it. They worry that students' coming out may represent "premature commitment" and "opting too early for an exclusively homosexual life." This heterosexist either-or conception of coming out has nothing to do with our own. Those of us among the students and faculty of Williams who have come out have done so as a commitment only to liberation, not to sexual exclusiveness. We don't intend merely to exchange one strait jacket of sexual hangups for another. Nor do we view our coming out as a personal sacrifice to politics, which is what the Hechingers imply in comparing homosexuals' coming out to other oppressed minorities' being "driven to a militancy that subsequently restricts their own privacy." The Hechingers fail to see that coming out is not just a tactic but is, precisely, the goal. For them, "the ultimate goal, for heterosexuals as well as homosexuals in a free society, is the right to privacy in matters of sexual preference and practice," whereas what gay people want and need and claim in justice is the right to be as publicly gay as straight people are publicly straight. Coming out is what it's all about.

Had the Hechingers visited Williams, they would have found an exception to the general tendency they noted, that small non-urban colleges do not foster gay activism. Here is perhaps the best illustration of our organization's vigor and of the strong support we have won from others at Williams: Last November, the Williams College Council (the student representative body) resolved by a vote of 18 to 3 to request that the President and Trustees add the category sexual orientation to the College's official nondiscrimination statement. At the Council's initiative, the same resolution came to a vote in the December faculty meeting, where it failed by 40 to 69. The faculty did resolve, however, by a vote of 97 to 12, to endorse a more informal statement, made by the President, committing Williams to a policy of nondiscrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. We gay men and women are proud of ourselves, and we're proud of Williams.

Sincerely,
Williams Gay Support Organization

Referendum

To the editor:

While we appreciate the demands of space, the editing of last Friday's College Council article leaves our position on the South Africa resolution unclear.

We did, as you state, question the right of the Council to vote on the resolution. It was and still is our feeling that student opinion on the complicated issue of South Africa has not been accurately determined. Indeed, a show of hands at Wednesday's CC meeting indicated that only 3 of the 24 representatives present had spoken with their house members concerning the resolution. Thus, we suggested that it be voted on by the entire student body. Unfortunately, our motion for a student referendum failed by a vote of 16-8.

Our motion however does not mean that we do not favor the resolution. Indeed, both of us spoke in favor of it and voted for its passage.

Sincerely,
John Simpson '79

Coed housing

To the editor:

To the member of Perry House who supported "common sense" in denouncing the Committee on Undergraduate Life for its stand on the co-ed housing issue (April 28):

Why did you retreat to the "classified" section? The CUL spent many hours considering the problem of election results for co-ed housing in both Perry and Gar-Wood. We explored every issue to its fullest extent and finally reached our decision with the idea of "credibility" very much in everyone's mind. We knew at the time that we could not please every individual, but it is disappointing to have to deal now with the cheap shots of the obviously misinformed. If you really have something intelligent to say, you might at least write a full letter explaining yourself (Perhaps the extent of your comment explains you very well). If you have nothing more to say, you might try diverting your clearly boundless creative energy and "common sense" to some other problem of international concern.

who weren't dancing. I looked from one face to the next, searching for the girl. I knew she wasn't there. She was buried deep in the dance floor somewhere, or else in some carrel of Sawyer Library. The rejects really looked bad that night. I wondered if perhaps the other rejects weren't thinking the same thing about me. I tried to think higher thoughts—the Sex Pistols, Moby-Dick, and so on—but realized that I was only fooling myself. I headed for the door. To the Dodd party!

When I finally talked to Steve Case and heard him saying what a dirty trick the other party organizers had pulled, I knew I should be over there. His party had exhausted any sort of possibilities it had by then.

To Dodd

I knew that the Dodd House party was really different not when I saw it was only 75c, or that they were selling pizza at 60c a slice, or even their door prizes (all obvious attempts to lure cheapskates away from "Night Fever"), but when I saw the people dancing there. No one was dressed any differently than at a normal Williams party, but this crowd was nuts. Some fool was bleating on a whistle that grated in my ear more than many times as I attempted to boogie in a space amounting roughly to a square foot. The dance floor was incredibly dark, and all sorts of strange sights were beheld. Not only were more ODA's in evidence, and the crazy-sexual "Freak" dancing, but there were actually gay couples gyrating together. What a shock to see such a thing at Williams! This was the real New York-style disco, not that plastic thing that Purple Cow Productions had pumped up over at Mission Park. Maybe there is hope for Williams yet.

Women win at Onota

Williams varisty and lightweight women's crews splashed over the finish line first this Saturday on their own Lake Onota near Pittsfield; Dartmouth and Cornell crews followed in the Williams wake.

The Williams varsity shot off the start, grabbing two seats from Dartmouth and four from the Cornell women. At the 500 meter mark Dartmouth, then trailing Williams by half a boat length, ran into the Eph's boat. Stunned, the Dartmouth women slowed, while the unruffled Williams women took this opportunity to pull away from Dartmouth. Each of the boats held their position over the remainder of the 1500 meter course, Williams and Dartmouth increasing their margins over the boat behind.

The Williams lights also finished a strong first against Dartmouth and Cornell junior varsity crews. Despite a less-than-optimal start, Williams pulled out on Dartmouth, holding Cornell for the first 250 meters. Guest cox'n Molly Burchell then decided it was time to say good bye to the other crews and called for power. The lights had it for her at the end of their oars and promptly passed Cornell. Cornell and Dartmouth pursued Williams for the rest of the 1500 meters, but to no avail.

The Williams novice boat almost claimed a victory against the Dartmouth and Cornell novices, but lost the lead they had captured at the 500 meter mark during their last thirty strokes. Approaching the finish Dartmouth sprinted powerfully, gaining back the six seats previously lost to the Williams women. Dartmouth won by only three-tenths of a second with a 6:07.3 time. Cornell again brought up the rear with a 6:31.0 time.

Next Sunday, May 14, the best-in-women's rowing will be featured on Lake Onota. Williams will host twenty-four other colleges at the Women's Eastern Intercollegiate Rowing Championships.

Bats are silent, Ephs drop 3

by Frank Pergolizzi

It was a tough weekend for the Williams College baseball team. On Saturday, they dropped a doubleheader at Amherst, 3-2 and 8-2. Sunday, American International College came to Williamstown, and used a six run ninth inning to deal the Ephmen a 9-3 loss.

Saturday's opener was a pitching duel between Williams' Steve Maier and Amherst ace Bill Swiacki for the first five innings. In the top of the sixth, Swiacki hit catcher Mike Krikorian. After John Friborg hit into a force play, Rick Walter lined a single to right, putting runners on first and second. The hit was the only one of the game for Williams.

Scott Harrington hit a ground ball to second baseman Dave Jauss, who, in attempting to get Walter at second, threw the ball into left field, allowing Friborg to score. Another throwing error by third baseman Frank Forgione allowed Walter to score, putting Williams ahead 2-0.

Amherst came right back in the bottom of the inning. Paul Harasiminociwz doubled and Tim Moynihan singled, putting runners on first and third. Shortstop Mark Manning hit a long fly ball just over the left field fence, giving Amherst a 3-2 lead. Williams had the tying run on third with one out in the seventh, but failed to score.

Four run innings in the fourth and fifth gave the Lord Jeffs plenty of breathing room in the second game. Tony Stall walked four men in the fourth and gave up two singles. In the fifth, a bases loaded triple by Bob Sternberg was the big blow.

A.I.C. turned a 3-2 game into a rout with a six run ninth inning. With two men on and two out and the score still 3-2, Gary Barcher unloaded with a triple to right center to put the game away. Barcher scored on a wild pitch, and singles by Chris Olinski and Bob Foley drove in the last three AIC runs.

Williams had jumped out to a 2-0 lead with two unearned runs in the second. Ken Hollingsworth scored on a passed ball. Frank Kreutz came home when he tried to steal third and catcher Bob Drury's throw went into left field.

A.I.C. tied the game with single runs in the fourth and fifth. The Yellowjackets went ahead in the seventh when Jeff Altman scored on the tail end of a delayed double steal.

Steve Mercadante went all the way for the winners, striking out eight and walking three. Charlie Thurston pitched up the loss for Williams.

Laxmen whip Lord Jeffs

by Wayne Eckerson

Amherst,—Led by a 17 point scoring output by its attack, the Williams College lacrosse team handily disposed of a rebuilding Lord Jeff squad to capture its ninth straight Little Three crown.

Junior Pete Thomsen did the first damage and put Williams ahead for good with two solo efforts early in the first period. Twice he outran his defenseman and came around the goal to dump the ball into the net.

Thomsen followed with two goals in the second period, one which he rifled past a dazed Lord Jeff goalie from 25 feet out.

Adding four assists to his four first half goals, Thomsen was Williams' top scorer. Close behind were fellow attackmen Todd Eckerson who garnered one goal and four assists and Dick Goodbody who finessed four goals from his crease position. Brian Benedict and Pete Barbaresi scored two and one respectively from midfield to complete the scoring.

Amherst never threatened the whole game. Bob Cowin shutout Amherst in the first half making twelve saves. In the second half, Amherst increased its tempo but only managed to put four shots on Cowin and four on back-up goalie Bill Childs. Defensemen Pete Unger, Russ Gee, Mike Curran and Pete Santri played well holding the Amherst attack scoreless.

Of note is Amherst's recent acquisition of Middlebury's head coach Dennis Daley to head its hockey and lacrosse programs. Daley, an Amherst graduate, established Middlebury as a ranking New England lacrosse power. His transfer to Amherst will undoubtedly provide Williams with stiffer competition for the Little Three title.

Hot Golfers putt, drive, and chip way to victory

Armed with the knowledge that the near invincible Purple golfers were ready to notch their seventh win of the season, A.I.C. employed devious "cult of personality tactics" in an attempt to thwart the Eph onslaught. The match play format, in which man battles man to an individual, self-contained conclusion, did not provide the magic elixer for an A.I.C. victory. The Williams linksters upped their season tally to 7-1 with a convincing 4½-2½ triumph.

With his new-found weight transfer fostering the development of a lyrical swing producing club-ball contact reminiscent of Plato's music of the spheres, Marcel Oudin bludgeoned his number one opponent in a 5 and 4 triumph. Playing with Marcel, junior Dan Katz held on for victory at the number two position when his A.I.C. foe could not find an available oxygen tent on the eighteen and decisive hole.

At number 3, Ed "Big" Bousa continued his mercurial climb to the ranks of the great with some indescribable putting, inspired by visions of Arnold Palmer during his glory days at the helm of the golfing world. "Big" fired a 75, defeating his man by a 4 and 2 count.

A par on the eighteenth hole lifted Bill Sprague into a tie with his tenacious A.I.C. counterpart. Considering that Young Sprague is playing on damaged wheels caused by the ravages of a Baker's cyst, Coach Rudy Goff is extremely pleased to have the talented sophomore back in the lineup. Team members hope that each passing day will bring Young closer to the greatness he achieved in his Fall College Championship triumph, and look for him to go out in a blaze of glory against powerful Amherst.

Chris "Moses" Malone, a classy freshman with a tremendous attitude, fired a spectacular, stupendous 71 in a 4 and 2 victory over his bewildered opponent. When asked about his round Moses replied, "I parted the watered fairways with every drive, and commanded my putts to go in the hole." With this round fueling his confidence, there is no telling what miracles Moses can perform during the remainder of the season.

And thus Moses spake, "I commanded my putts to go in the hole."

Finally, in the numbers six and seven positions John Goodrich and Chris Holm lost tough decisions on the eighteenth hole. Although neither John nor Chris has played up to his potential, both are very strong players, and hopefully will soon find the swings which have produced some impressive gold in the past.

With a 7-2 win the tennis team won its sixth straight Little Three title Saturday. The team lost won singles match and doubles match. Martin Goldberg, no. one seed, lost in three sets. (photo by Oettgen)

Swim team elects co-captains

Juniors Peter Howd and Don Cameron have been elected co-captains of the Williams varsity swim team for the 1978-79 season.

Cameron, a Division III All-American backstroker and holder of a Williams record in the 100-yard event of his stroke, has been a top competitor for Coach Carl Samuelson's squad since his freshman year. Howd, a consistent performer in the individual medley, is also a three-year veteran of the team.

The two will head a young but talented Williams team including three other returning All-Americans, Jordan Lewis, David Amlicke, and Bill Beckett. According to both Howd and Cameron, the squad fully expects to take its eighth consecutive Little Three Championships (Williams, Wesleyan, Amherst) and to follow up on its strong second-place finish at the New England's this past season.

Junior Nina Murphy and sophomore Keron Walker have been elected co-captains of the Williams' women's varsity swim team for the 1978-79 season.

Murphy returns for her fourth season with Coach Carl Samuelson's four-year-old team, and for her second year as a co-captain. Last season she led the team to a 6-1 dual meet record and a strong showing at the New England Championships. She also steadily improved her personal performances throughout the winter. She holds a share of five Williams records in backstroke events and relays.

Walker is Williams' first female Division II All-American swimmer, as she took a fifth and an eighth in the Nationals in Georgia this spring. She is also the defending New England Champion in two events, the 50 freestyle and the 50 fly, and claims these among her seven Williams records.

The two will lead a squad which boasts returning contenders Linda Reed, Molly Murphy, Katherine Pearsall and Joanna Monroe.

Men's crew drops race to Ithaca, preps for Dad Vail Regatta in Philly

The Williams varsity men's crew battled Ithaca College for the entire 1800 meters of the race course Sunday, falling just 1.6 seconds short at the finish, on Lake Waramaug in New Preston, Ct. In the process the Williams eight blew away arch rival Trinity and left the Marist College crew on the horizon.

The Purple oarsmen were slow off the line and found themselves trailing both Trinity and the perennially powerful Ithaca boat as they settled into the race. By 500 meters the Williams eight began to move through Trinity while pushing Ithaca hard. Coach John Peinert's oarsmen broke away from The Trinity eight just after 1000 meters and kept the pressure on Ithaca in a classic rowing duel to the finish. Ithaca managed to maintain a two or three seat lead until 200 meters to go, when they took the stroke rating up and grabbed a four seat lead. Williams came on strong as stroke Peter Wells brought the Ephs' rating up to 36 beats to the minute to counter the Ithaca move, but the Ithaca oarsmen would not be broken in the last 100 meters of the race. The loss was the first for the Purple varsity this spring.

The light and heavy frosh both dropped races to strong Trinity and Ithaca opponents. The heavyweights battled an Ithaca crew to a tight finish only six seconds behind the winning time. The lightweights lost decisively to Trinity, but were only four seats behind a powerful Ithaca boat at the finish.

The crews will travel to Philadelphia Thursday to compete in the Dad Vail Regatta over the weekend. The Dad Vail is considered the national championships of small college rowing.

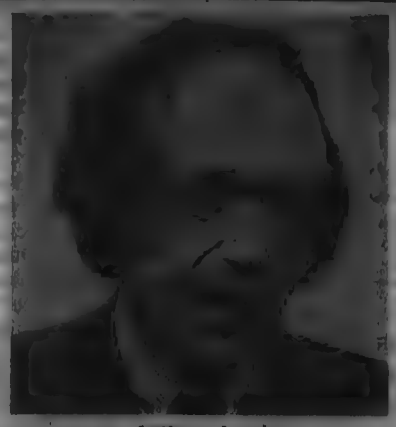
VOL. 91, NO. 50 WILLIAMS COLLEGE MAY 12, 1978

Columnist will salute graduating seniors

Anthony Lewis, two-time Pulitzer Prize-winning New York Times columnist has been chosen the main speaker for Commencement, on June 4. Marian Wright Edelman, founder and director of the Children's Defense Fund, has been selected as the Baccalaureate speaker for the service on June 3.

Lewis, the author of a twice-weekly column for the Times, received his first prize in 1955 for a series of articles written for the Washington Daily News on the dismissal of a Navy employee as a security risk. The second came in 1963 for his coverage of the Supreme Court for the Times.

Lewis, an acclaimed expert on the constitutional rights and duties of the press, currently teaches at Harvard Law School. He graduated from Harvard in 1948.



The author of two books, Gideon's Trumpet, about a landmark case before the U.S. Supreme Court, and Portrait of a Decade, about changes in American race relations, Lewis has also twice won the New York State Bar Association Press Award.

Edelman founded the Washington Research Project in 1968 which, in 1973 became the CDF. As director of the CDF, she has been active in a wide range of children and family issues, including health care, welfare, and adoption.

A graduate of Yale Law School in 1963, and Spellman College, Edelman has been awarded honorary degrees by Smith College, Lesley College, and Lowell Technical Institute. She was the first black women admitted to the Mississippi bar.

The CDF has been a leader in defending and expanding the rights of children through the courts, and promoting the need for quality child care and other services for children.

A recent New York Times article quoted Edelman as saying, "The point is, how do you bring up children with a realistic sense of the world, who have confidence in themselves and the competence to deal with life's problems? I would like to give them a sense of purpose—to be aware of the world and know they have obligations and responsibilities."

South African questions recent CC resolution

"I am here engaged in what they call 'terrorist activities'," announced Jeff Dumo Baqwa of the South African Students Organization at a discussion with the Azanian in Dodd House Sunday.

"If I go back to South Africa in the open, it is with the full knowledge that I face death from the authorities," Baqwa said. The SASO member was banned and restricted by the South African government in 1973 and fled the country three years ago.

Questions at the discussion centered around divestiture and its potential to effect change in South Africa. Baqwa argued that support for divestiture "gives blacks latitude" in working with corporations in South Africa, while foreign investment "lubricates the machinery of apartheid." He admitted that divestment will not force corporations out of South Africa.

Baqwa attacked the Sullivan Principles, which ask corporations to improve the lot of their black workers in South Africa and which were incorporated into the recent College Council resolution. He called them "window dressing," and claimed that improving economic conditions for a few blacks while leaving political conditions unchanged will aid South African propaganda and blur the issue of racism.

Unpublicized strikes and "armed struggle" are going on in South Africa today, Baqwa said, but added that the scale of rebellion is not close to that in Zimbabwe and Namibia. He noted that Azanian guerillas are being trained in socialist countries and that the training program has intensified steadily since 1967.

"We are not going to fight the South African army conventionally," the Azanian remarked, admitting its superiority. He would not rule out the possibility of the eventual use of Cuban troops in a guerilla war.

Baqwa attacked the South African government's plan to resettle the black population on 18 per cent of the country's land. "It is impossible for the bantustans to exist without the South African government," he said. Baqwa cited a 1953 report from the South African government which found the bantustan land "too barren to support life."

Baqwa also warned students to be wary of compromise. While he did not discount the potential of the College Council resolution, with its two-year grace period for corporate action, he so questioned whether students could maintain pressure over that time and force the issue in 1980.

College searches for an Affirmative Action officer

The College has begun the search for an Affirmative Action officer to join the President's staff next fall. The new administrator will work with the Dean of the Faculty and department chairmen to look at both institutional patterns and specific problems relating to the hiring and retention of female and minority employees, President John W. Chandler said that he "hopes very much that the person involved will be a woman."

The President noted that Williams had a good record in attracting and appointing women, and to a lesser degree, blacks. "The problem," he said, "is retaining them. I hope the person will be sensitive to conditions in the College and act to relieve problems," he said.

"We are unusual in that we don't have an Affirmative Action Officer," Chandler continued. He said that he took a survey of other colleges and found that most had benefited from the institution of such an administrator.

Until recently, Chandler said, the College had not felt a need for such a position. Williams, he said has a relatively thin administration and tries not to create new officers.

The President envisions the job as more than that of an ombudsman for the faculty and staff. The position requires that its holder keep abreast of current government regulations and grant requirements. Williams, he said, has not done well in getting funds from the National Endowments for the Humanities and the Arts. He hopes that if the College can stay informed that they will get a larger share in the future.

On the regulation front, the Affirmative Action Officer might set up an alumni network to monitor and correspond with lawmakers when legislation injurious to the institution has a chance of passing.

An ad hoc search committee composed of various classifications of employees will read and evaluate applications. This committee and then the Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP) will interview the best candidates. President Chandler said that he will make the final appointment based on the recommendations of the search committee and the CAP.

Announces opening for Assistant to the President for Affirmative Action and Government Relations. Appointee will be responsible for monitoring and coordinating implementation of the College's Affirmative Action programs and evaluating and articulating Affirmative Action policies. Duties will also include responsibility for collecting information on Federal and state legislation and programs applicable to the College. Experience in selective liberal arts college as teacher or administrator highly desirable. Position open September 1, 1978. Send letter of application, two references and resume by June 20 to: President's Office, Williams College, Williamstown, Massachusetts 01267. An Affirmative Action Equal Opportunity employer.

Council decides to fund campus political groups

by Randy Wang

The College Council passed a motion by treasurer John Simpson '79, Wednesday night "to fund activities specifically and clearly political in nature and designed solely to influence the College."

The ruling will serve as a guideline for the Finance Committee when it allocates funds subject to CC approval next fall

The CC constitution specifically forbids the funding of groups to influence national, state, or local governments. The question surfaced when the WGSO and the Anti-Apartheid Coalition requested funds to print leaflets on gay rights and divestiture. There had been no precedent. Debate centered on the fear that CC members might try to squelch unpopular beliefs and further personal political causes.

The CC also approved the Elections committee's recommendations on the following appointments: Calendar and Scheduling—Chip Buckner, Betsey Jeffrey, Phil Darrow, and Bonnie Schindel; Food Services—Steven Sugarman, Bob Safford, Susan Ellen Megna, Albert DeLeon, Jeffrey Coombs, Philippe Masser, Julia McNamee, Carolyn Haynes, and three freshmen to be selected in the fall.

Other appointments included Standing Committee — Warna Bellamy, Timothy Kenefick, Byron Walker and Jon Ballan; Student Education Committee—Randy Wang, Timothy Wang, John Goodrich, Carol Kostik, and Kathy Schwartz; Student Life Committee—Martha Griffin, Steve Davidson, Ruth Glasser, Carolyn Dye and Betsey Jeffrey.

The CC ruled to discontinue the Financial Aid Committee, as it has served no viable function and has lacked sufficient student interest.

Roger Prevot '80, co-chairman of the Housing Committee, stated that co-education in Row Houses will receive major attention next fall. "Special-interest housing is not part of the housing system," he said. He mentioned the possibility of providing "enclaves," where floors or sections of floors might remain single-sex to satisfy personal demands.

Asst. Dean Eileen Julien stated that the Dean's Office wishes to keep single-sex housing for the benefit of the minority. She felt that it would not inhibit diversity—the distinctive characteristic of College housing.

The CC approved Simpson's motions to fund the Roadrunners $100 for the "1st Annual Purple Valley Classic," a ten-mile marathon; and the Gargoyle Society $540 to print 2500-3000 copies of an alternate alumni review. The six page issue would contain articles from various student publications designed to inform interested alumni on student activism.

These courses have been evaluated for the Course Guide in Class. Students are asked to fill in questionnaires for other courses and return them to House and Entry Collectors.

Gargoyle elects new members

Gargoyle Society announced the addition of 16 members Wednesday.

Members from the class of 1979 are Jim Coben, G. Bernard Hutchinson, Lauren Jossa, Lorrie Lewis, Ann McCabe, Renelda Pierce, Joel Smith, Peter Sachs, and Jaqueline Wilson. Members chosen from the class of 1980 include Warna Bellamy, Tom Black, Marty Blount, Beth Geismar, Gus Hinkson, Mark Lanier, and Ben [illegible].

Since 1968, the self-perpetuating body has chosen members on a diverse basis which includes campus activities and committees, said Charlie Sanders, co-coordinator this year with Jane Garvey.

Gargoyle initiated College Council, the Honor Code, and the JA system. Members meet with Trustees and Alumni several times a year in addition to regular meetings.

This year Gargoyle met with members of the administration, particularly Deans Roosenraad and Berek and Trustees to discuss issues such as the sexual orientation clause, sexism and South African investments.

One project started this year which will continue into next year deals with student participation in the departments. Gargoyle would like the faculty to issue a statement similar to those set down on academic honesty and standards for the course telling students how they can contribute ideas or grievances about the department most effectively.

Returning members from the class of 1979 are Junetta Dyson, Bronson Fargo, Hilary Hodgson, Cathy Jackson, Lee Jackson, Cliff Mitchell, Lucienne Sanchez, and Jon Stolzberg.

Steve Jackson '79 won the Adelphic Union's Speaking Contest Tuesday for his impromptu speech on the topic of "resolved, that studying is more hazardous to one's health than smoking." Stan Paresi '79 placed second and Chuck Hirsch '80 third.

Letters: Night Fever, reverberations . . .

The RECORD regrets the error of leaving off a Viewpoint kicker on Jeff Kovar's article last issue. The article was not meant to be presented as news coverage; nor does the RECORD vouch for any of the facts as stated in Kovar's reflections.

Kovar:

To the editor:

It has been brought to my attention that in the article I wrote entitled: "Night Fever and the Sickness Unto Death," I might have inadvertently offended some black students on campus by referring to platform shoes "not on black feet." I want to assure anyone concerned that I meant absolutely no slur at all by this remark. If it was construed that way I beg those offended to forgive me an ill choice of words. I meant to satirize many traditional elements on campus, while at the same time attempting to convey my support and affirmation to the more progressive ones. Unfortunately, these more positive statements in the article were deleted by the editors. They would have put the questioned remark in better context.

In some of the deletions that occurred, and they were considerable, I criticized those who don't wear platform shoes, I affirmed the greater authenticity of the Dodd party due to its more current black disco music (not the Bee Gees), and finally in the deleted last paragraph I made my support for the more progressive movements on campus clear:

> Maybe there is hope for Williams yet. If the super capitalist can be defeated not only in spirit, but also to the tune of $400, then there is still promise in the corporate mentalities walking around this campus. Who knows, maybe next the Trustees will all vote for divestiture; maybe nobody will decide to go pre-med; maybe Harvard Business School will start hurting for students. Maybe the world will stop turning.

I am very sorry that part of my position was deleted from the article. I meant to criticize an awful lot of things in the article, but never did I intend to criticize blacks in any way.

Jeff Kovar

Case:

To the editor:

In the aftermath of the controversial "Night Fever" party, it seems appropriate that I clear the air.

The party was sponsored by Bill Beckett and myself. Originally, we intended to have several houses sponsor it, but everyone we approached declined because it was "too costly" and "too risky." Faced with the decision of bagging what we felt was a good idea, or backing it with our own money, we chose the latter.

It has been alleged that our goal in staging the party was to make money. This is simply untrue. Our original cost projection was $1125; we would have had to sell 512 tickets at $2.00 each to break-even. We printed 600 tickets, so in the event of a sell-out (which was by no means assured) we would have a slight profit margin ($75). This was important to have, because we were fully liable for any damage which occurred at Mission Park on the night of the party. Clearly, the figures indicate that we were not out to make money.

A lot of students objected to the $2.00 admission price. This utterly baffles me. Students constantly complain about the social life at Williams, and cite as a major reason the fact that every party is "beer and tapes." The reason for this is simple: the costs are low, and therefore so is the risk. To sponsor something a little different costs money, and that extra cost must be passed on to the party-goer. Our lighting system, for example, cost $505—almost one-half of the budget. Another "special touch," champagne punch, cost us over $100. Taking these things into account, we could not have charged less than $2.00 without losing money. And $2.00 does not seem like an unreasonable amount to pay for unlimited free beer (dark and light) and punch, plus a fully-equipped disco. Two dollars would get you two beers at most bars.

Objections were raised regarding our use of WCFM to publicize the party. These objections are reasonable and legitimate, but fail to take into account the fact that "Night Fever" was not intended to be privately-funded. When we were unable to obtain house backing, we immediately withdrew the ads from WCFM.

Because of the above "objections," attendance at "Night Fever" was far lower than expected, and we ended up losing more than $350. The loss doesn't bother us nearly as much as the disillusionment we have experienced with Williams students. If you want something more than "beer and tapes" every weekend, you're going to have to pay for it. If you're not willing to cough up an extra buck, then don't complain.

Steve Case

re Case

To the editor:

Thank God for the Record! Without Jeff Kovar's illuminating article on "Night Fever and the Sickness unto Death" I might never have realized that my roommate and former friend Steve Case was a bloodthirsty laissez-faire monopoly capitalist preying on the Williams community. When I read about Purple Cow Productions mafia-like sponsorship of such obviously diabolical projects as all-college parties, a Williams talent album, and a bus service to Albany, I was frankly shocked that anything quite so underhanded could be allowed to go on in a college so well known for its spotless economic morality.

As a result, I am voluntarily divesting myself of all contact with Steve Case. My door will henceforth be locked at all times; I will never again allow myself to be taken in by his devious offers to record me on an album free of charge; I will refuse to brush my teeth while he is in the shower. In addition, I will make it known to my other roommates that I believe Steve should be pulled out of our suite altogether.

I would also like to thank Mr. Kovar for his illuminating comments on the proper way to conduct oneself at a party. Being naive, I went to "Night Fever" and had a great time. I was even part of the tactless mob that ran screaming to the dance floor when "Staying Alive" came over the speakers. Thanks to Mr. Kovar, I now know that to be cool at a Williams party you should worry all day about what to wear; make snide comments about other's apparel; go directly to the beer tap to disguise the fact that you've got no one to talk to; deplore the way other people dance; drop hints that "real disco" is nothing like this; and stand by the dance floor making rude jokes about the "rejects" while staring at any gay couple with enough guts to dance together. I will certainly never be seen having fun at any party in the future.

Pro humilitas,
Scott Lankford, '80

Farewell

With this issue, the new editorial board finishes its first term. Political issues and events on campus sparked much debate this year, making our job an interesting and enlightening one. Hopefully the Record has somewhat clarified the facts and presented the campus with some food for thought through various letters and viewpoints.

In the process of delivering news we try to be fair, representative of the student body, and accurate; unfortunately, complete objectivity and accuracy are elusive goals for which we must constantly strive. Having learned much this semester, we realize our capacity for growth and improvement next year.

The Record would like to thank all those at Lamb Printing Co. for coping with us one more year (though we know our copy is a never ending source of amusement for them):

Bob: who bears responsibility for the printing of the Record and who is always there to lend a helping hand or a sympathetic ear;

Doris: who serves as alarm clock on early Friday and Tuesday mornings, slavedriver, and copyreader;

Jean, Shirley, Steve, Verna and Barbara: who paste-up, typeset, and prepare the dummies for camera.

A.M.

Record Awards

Record editor Chip Buckner cited five reporters for outstanding contributions to the paper this year. The announcements came last night at the annual Record banquet at the 1896 House.

The editorial board cited Tim Jones '81 as Rookie of the Year. "Tim has done an outstanding job in the news department this year," Buckner said. "We look forward to getting more from him in the next three years."

Randy Wang '80 garnered the honor of Best News Writer. For the second straight year Peter Rintels '79 earned the title Best Features Writer. "His analyses," Buckner said, "are the finest things we print."

Don Frazier '78 earned honors as Best Arts Writer for outstanding previews and reviews of stage and screen events. Evan Bash '78 took the title Best Sports Writer for his "consistent quality in covering racket sports."

The Record ceases regular publication with this issue. The staff will assemble and mail a commencement issue to all current students and subscribers at graduation. The deadline for copy will be 7:00 p.m. Wednesday May 24.

. . . Jews on apartheid, 'GSO

Jacobsohn

To the editor:

I would like to say something about the May 5 Viewpoint essay written by Kevin Welber '81. The view that is set forth goes something like this. What is going on (or will be shortly) in South Africa should remind Jews of the Holocaust. In the face of the monumental injustice that is apartheid divestiture represents a clear moral imperative for the College. Moreover, for Jews, whose sensitivity to such issues has a unique historical meaning, the call for divestiture is only natural. So natural in fact that nobody (with the exception of Professor Jacobsohn) supported Dean Berek's anti-divestiture remarks at a recent Williams College Jewish Association brunch. "Considering the organization, one could hardly not expect the outcome."

Mr. Welber's heart is in the right place but his head isn't. His insulting implication (that Berek and Jacobsohn must not be very good Jews) may have been only inadvertent. Yet for someone whose parents left Germany in 1939 (leaving some family behind), I'm not content to leave it at that. I want to affirm what to me seems only too obvious, but which apparently has thus far fallen beyond the comprehension of many at Williams and elsewhere. To oppose divestiture is not to condone the injustice of apartheid. To support divestiture is not proof of one's moral character. Nor is one's Jewishness measured by conformity to what some (perhaps a majority) of Jews consider morally sound political action. I happen to disagree with the parallels drawn by Mr. Welber between the Nazi treatment of Jews and South Africa's treatment of Blacks, but that is a point concerning which reasonable people may disagree. What it seems to me, is unreasonable is the expectation that members of a religious organization will naturally agree on a matter as complicated as the College's moral and political responsibilities.

One final point. I have no idea how the Jewish parents at the brunch viewed the issues under consideration. I do know how one parent perceived them. I'm referring to the father who, according to Mr. Welber, "began to question the validity of the Administration's definition of morality." That father spoke to me at the end of the discussion and indicated in no uncertain terms that he was in profound disagreement with the students who had spoken in favor of divestiture.

Gary J. Jacobsohn

CC resolution

To the Trustees:

We, the officers of the Williams College Jewish Association, like our brethren of the Newman and Christian Fellowship organizations, wish to make an appeal to the college about South African corporate investment policy.

Given our religious ideals, we too cannot sit idly while a nation is oppressed. We must emphasize this point since the Jewish people have been the object of persecution throughout the history of humanity.

Having read the College Council resolution, we feel that it is the most effective course of action for the college to take. Although divestiture should be used only as a last resort, we emphasize that if the use of shareholder proposals and proxies fails to elicit a proper response, that there be no hesitation in divestiture. In conclusion, then, we give our wholehearted support to the course of action outlined by the College Council resolution and to the hope that someday Williams College will be able to say that it took affirmative action on such a crucial matter.

clarification

To the editor:

I wish to clarify something the Record has obscured in publishing the WGSO's letter to the New York Times Magazine in its original form. The letter was published over my signature as a member of the WGSO, after consultation with the Times and full agreement on my part, only because Times policy requires individual signatures. The formula should have been "John Rhodes for the Williams Gay Support Organization."

Record staffers

To the readers of the Record:

As active members of the Record staff it was disturbing to read Mr. Buckner's editorial Tuesday night while we did not expect the newspaper to take the lead in agitating for progressive action as many college papers have, we had hoped the Record would maintain editorial neutrality on the issue.

The editorial was deserving attention because of any great controversy it will generate on campus. Because it will only strengthen the cynical views of some in the College community that the Record is a weak paper, a tool of the administration, and the product of an allegedly conservative clique of shortsighted editors.

In light of this, we affirm that Chip's stand is not that of the Record. We on the staff of this paper who support divestiture deplore the position of the Editor-in-Chief and will maintain the integrity of our work and the independence of our views.

rebuttal on JA's

To the editor:

As we five "assholes and even bigger assholes" discussed why we applied to be Junior Advisors, we agreed that we did so as a result of a positive freshman experience. Like 98 per cent of this year's freshmen, none of us found it necessary to move out of our original freshman housing. In writing about the current freshman housing system, Chris DiAngelo stated, "if you are going to run a freshman year in the manner that Williams does, chances are this is the best way of doing things." If anything, we believe this is an understatement of the system's value.

Unity

Because of the current freshman housing system our class is just that—the Class of 1980. The extant residential house system has the advantages of fraternities, cohesion and a social focus, without the disadvantages of elitism and self-perpetuation. Without a separate freshman system, houses would tend to become islands unto themselves. The bonds developed during freshman year lead to much of the interaction between the residential houses. An advantage of a small school is that it may function as a community. The Williams community depends upon interaction between as well as within houses.

Unity

As Chris DiAngelo does, we cite the 1974 CEP-CUL questionnaire which indicated that 73 per cent of the freshmen supported the separate freshman system. Over 150 members of our class applied for their second chance to live in freshman housing as JAs. We find this indicative of rising support for continuing the system.

Entry living

Professor Hoppin noted that, "it is common interests which bring people together, not living next door." Outside of one's entry, freshmen tend to gravitate toward other students with similar interests. Yet there is great value to interacting with those of different interests. We believe that the systematic diversity of the entry system demands that freshmen confront and cope with differences in others. The mere fact of living together creates a common interest.

Coed and Single-Sex Options

We find great value in the idea of coed freshman housing, which may help break down social barriers which do exist. Yet we believe strongly in preserving a single-sex housing option. Some students are thankful for the year of single-sex housing, which provides a transition to upper-class coed housing. We also see single-sex housing as providing a unique opportunity to develop bonds with members of one's own sex.

In conclusion, we would like to stress the popularity of the present system as an argument for its continuation. In creating a housing system, the needs and desires of the vast majority of students must be strongly considered. Fortunately the Williams community is small enough that the needs of individuals may also be addressed. We feel that the merits of the separate freshman housing system outweigh its shortcomings and would like to see it perfected, not scrapped.

Council decorum

To the editor:

It was most heartening to see such a large number of students at the College Council's meeting last Wednesday night (5/3). The Council, as part of our new Public Information program, is encouraging student attendance and participation at our meetings.

I am greatly disturbed, however, over the tremendous lack of courtesy and decorum shown by many of those who attended the meeting. Though the debate over the South African resolution was, and should have been, emotionally charged; there was no need for those who spoke, both pro and con, not to listen to each other with respect and common courtesy. Neither was there any reason for the spectators in the gallery to interrupt the meeting with frequent outbursts of applause or uncalled for booing and hissing. This, in my opinion, is not the kind of constructive participation that we are seeking.

Though I realize that students may have difficulty in sympathizing with the problems of the College Council and the pitfalls of its parliamentary procedure, I would urge them to take a second look at the Council. We are not full time professional legislators who meet daily and have the luxury of elaborate service staffs and research teams. We are, quite simply, a group of students elected by you to come together once a week for $1\frac{1}{2}$ hours in order to grapple with the multitude of issues that face the College. The success of the Council in dealing with issues and responsibilities ranging from Latin Honors to committee appointments deserves commendation, in spite of our curious affection for Robert's Rules of Order.

Sincerely,
Ted Tiberi

CC stance

To the editor:

Please allow us to clear up any possible misunderstandings of Wednesday's viewpoint, "Money and Politics."

There is not and has never been any proposal brought before the College Council to discontinue funding of so called political organizations such as The Williams Action Coalition, The Williams Republican Club and other similar groups. The issue to which the viewpoint referred was one brought before the Council two weeks ago. At that time the council was asked whether it wished to fund specifically political activities clearly and solely designed to influence the College. Your readers will be interested to know that the Council, at its Wednesday meeting, voted to fund such activities. This issue had not ever been considered by the Council and we are glad to see it clarified.

We would also like to note that Wednesday's viewpoint was not intended to imply that the College Council's raising or discussing this question was aimed at a particular organization. Rather, we all felt and still feel that a refusal by the College Council to fund political activities designed to influence the College (on issues such as divestiture) could only serve to limit the discussion of political issues at Williams. Such a limitation would have been most regrettable.

Sincerely,
Jeffrey Gross '79

Illustrious Panthers consider world

by Susan Russell

Despite the average Williams student's familiarity with Spring Street, he probably does not know of the "Spring Street Panthers."

A group of approximately thirty Williamstown gentlemen who meet at the Log for coffee from 9:30 to 10:30 a.m. five days a week, the Panthers are all illustrious members of the community. Most of them are retired; many of them are Williams alumni; some of them are presently professors at Williams. "We have no serious purpose," says one Panther, "except to entertain ourselves."

Actually, the Panthers do much more than entertain themselves. Daily discussions range from subjects such as how and when to fertilize one's lawn to President Carter and the situation in the Middle East. They discuss community affairs and when possible decide how these should be handled. As Professor Anson Piper of the Romanic Languages Department says, "We have a philanthropic heart." They often contribute money and counsel to what they deem to be worthy causes, and occasionally will do some low key campaigning for a proposal or candidate they support.

According to legend, the Panthers began around thirty years ago when two or three Williamstown gentlemen saw each other daily at a Breakfast coffee counter. Their conversations about community and world affairs began to interest other men there, and after a short time the counter was full of regulars. Over the years a few members have broken away and formed what the Panthers commonly refer to as "splinter groups," but there is no malice or rivalry. The origin of the group's name remains a mystery.

Most of the Panthers, though retired, are active members of the community. A few do volunteer work at Recording for the Blind, a nationally recognized institution which records materials for blind college and graduate students. Those who are not yet retired include Professors Bostert of the History Department, Fuqua of Classics, Shainman of Music, Piper of Romanic Languages, and President of the College John Chandler. Although Chandler is unable to attend many of the meetings, he is recognized as an honorary Panther.

The Spring Street Panthers, knowledgeable in Williamstown's past and present, serve as an excellent source of community information.

Chamber music program to play Barber, Brahms, and Dankner

The Clark Art Institute will sponsor "An Evening of Chamber Music" Tuesday, May 16, at 8:30 at the Institute. Works on the program include Samuel Barber's Hermit Songs, Brahms' Sonata No. 3 in D-minor for violin and piano, and the first performance of Stephan Dankner's arrangement of Body and Soul: a 1930 memoire. Artists on the program include Laura Dankner, soprano; Lucy Joseph, violin and viola; and Myrna Nachman, piano. Admission to the concert is free.

Dankner, soprano, graduated from the High School of Music and Art in New York and from Ithaca College. After earning her M.A. in music at Brooklyn College, she was a member of the faculty there for four years. She has sung and recorded with the Mid-American Chorale, the Janus Chorale, and the Gregg Smith Singers and was soloist in Stravinsky's Les Noces with the Williams College Choral and Dance Societies.

Joseph, violin and viola, a graduate of West Virginia University with a Master's degree in Music from the University of Illinois, has studied with Donald Portnoy and Paul Rolland, as well as the Guarneri String Quartet. A former member and soloist with a number of orchestras, she is presently a member of the Berkshire Symphony and director of strings in the local schools..

Nachman, piano, Visiting Assistant Professor of Music at Williams College, has been active as a performer, teacher, and musicologist. A former teacher at the School for Performing Arts at Brooklyn College (CUNY), the Neighborhood Music School in New Haven, and the 92nd Street Y Music School in New York, she is currently completing a performance doctorate at Yale.

Analysis of alcohol related issues on campus

Williams drinks less than national norms

by Peter Rosen

Twenty-five years ago, 20 per cent of college men and 40 per cent of college women considered themselves non-drinkers. A recent survey of over 7,000 New England college students found that for both groups, the figure today is roughly five per cent. In addition, the survey also found that this generation of students drinks more often and in larger quantities than its counterpart in the fifties.

The increase in college alcohol use and concomitant increase in alcohol related problems has been alarming enough to some schools that they have begun institution programs to deal with it. UMass, for example, has started a publicity campaign to try to curb alcohol misuse and Brown has appointed a half-time "Dean of Toxic Substances," who deals mainly with students having alcohol related problems. Brown has also formed a campus chapter of Alcoholics Anonymous to act as a support group for alcoholic students and staff.

Brown has appointed a half-time 'Dean of Beer.'

At Williams, Dean Berek and Director of Health Robert Goodell have been giving more thought to the question of drinking at Williams since attending in April a symposium on college alcohol use sponsored by The Medical Foundation, a Boston based research group. Preliminary results of the drinking survey were presented there, along with presentations about other research into student drinking.

Berek says that he has "no sense at all that Williams has a 'drinking problem,'" but he is bothered by some of the attitudes toward alcohol he finds here and elsewhere. He is concerned, he says, "not because I think the situation at Williams is troublesome, but becuase I think the emphasis on drinking among college age people is excessive."

Goodell generally concurs that alcohol abuse by students is not in itself a serious health problem here, but he suspects that there may be more of one than he has seen so far. "We don't perceive it (alcohol misuse) as a serious health problem," he says, adding however, "I can't imagine that the student population here is that much different from a place like Brown. I would bet there is a good deal of suffering (at Williams) that relates to alcohol."

In faet, the Medical Foundation's survey indicate the heavy drinking is less frequent here than among the most of the surveyed colleges. Separate data were compiled from a questionnaire filled out by 278 Williams students last spring and they showed that:

—29.7 per cent of the men and 5.6 per cent women at Williams said they usually drink four or more cans of beer when they drink any at all, compared to 42.7 and 15.6 per cent respectively for the entire sample,

—9 per cent of the men and none of the women here said that on more than half the occasions that they drink beer, they consume at least a six pack, compared to 21.3 and 4.3 per cent for the sample as a whole. Heavy drinking was generally less common among Williams students in the wine and hard liquor categories as well.

—Williams students, especially Williams women, reported lower frequencies of getting drunk than did the entire sample. 32 per cent of Williams men said they get drunk once a month or more compared with 34.2 per cent for all New England men. For women, the numbers are 9.1 and 16.8 per cent respectively. The data for getting high was approximately the same for both groups with approximately three quarters saying they got high once a month or more often.

The survey also found that for both samples beer was very much more the alcohol of choice among men than women and that men were much more likely to drink in small groups of the same sex than women, particularly at Williams.

The Infirmary's contacts

In addition to the direct effects of alcohol use, Berek and Goodell are concerned about some of its side effects, such as higher accident rates and disciplinary problems. "We see a steady number of accidents and injuries that are directly related to alcohol," says Goodell. His impression is that they are becoming more numerous. (Goodell also noted that the infirmary sees far fewer cases now that are related to the use of other drugs. In the past, the infirmary had to deal occasionally with students having bad reactions to hallucinogens, "but we almost never see that now," he says. In addition, he said that "marijuana is pretty much accepted both by students and by us as relatively safe," although he has seen a few "panic reactions" to getting high. Goodell also said he had some reservations about its long term effects.)

"a steady number of accidents are directly related to alcohol."

Related Problems

Berek feels that a large number of student disciplinary problems can be linked to drinking. "I suspect," he says, "that most incidents of student misbehavior here and at other colleges involve alcohol." Mild forms of it, such as window panes being broken and fire extinguishers emptied, "are a weekly occurrence," according to the Dean.

Both he and Goodell see the party atmosphere as a major inducement to student drinking. "I am concerned," said Berek, "about the extent to which students have a 'mono-dimensional' social life centered around alcohol."

In the Houses

Interviews with two house presidents, however, indicate that they are very conscious about providing a non-alcoholic alternative at parties that their houses sponsor. According to Patti Lerwick, last semester's president of Dennett House, "There are very few social events that you plan without alcohol, but at every event we've sponsored we've had a non-alcoholic alternative, and a lot of people drink it."

Chip Buckner, recent president of Garwood, says his efforts to set up events unrelated to alcohol have simply been unsuccessful. Says Buckner, "Basically I agree that alcohol plays too important a social role here. Our problem is that we can't get enough people to agree on an alternative."

Berek is also concerned about the extent to which the house dues structure makes drinking a bargain for the heavier drinkers in the house who are, in effect, subsidized at parties by the lighter drinkers. A handful of houses (roughly five according to Dean Roosenraad's estimate) have instituted reduced nondrinking dues and Berek would like to see more of this.

At Garwood, which has the option, roughly a fifth of the members have taken advantage of it. Yet the non-drinkers are still subsidizing alcohol use by the rest of the house to a small extent. Non-drinking dues are approximately two thirds the normal dues, but according to Buckner, alcohol accounts for at least a half of the house's expenditures.

In general, Berek says he would like students to become conscious of what they consider "acceptable" drinking behavior. He and Goodell suggested the possibility of establishing student support programs such as Brown has, but feel this should depend on student interest. Said the Dean, "I think there's some thinking about drinking that students haven't been doing that I'd like to see going on."

A Purple Key Guide recounts that occasionally on tours parents or prospective applicants will ask him if Williams is a "drinking school." "I tell them that every school is a drinking school," he says.

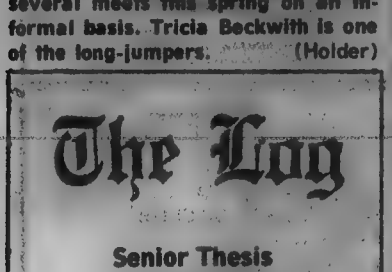
Laxwomen top Panthers

by Mary Kate Buca

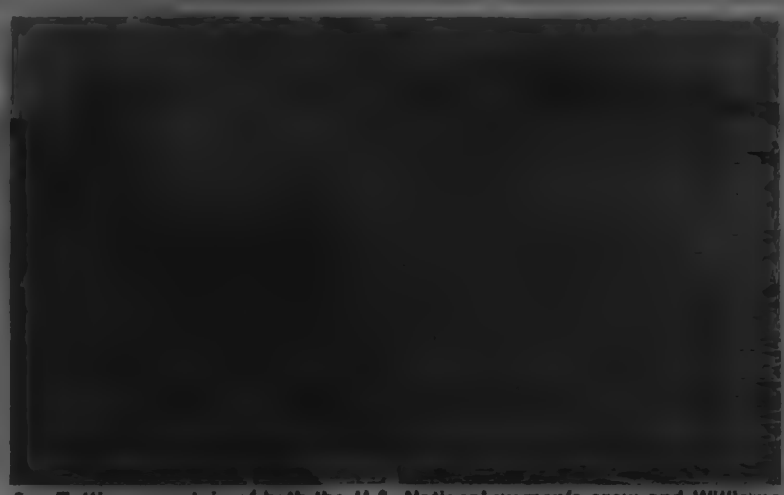
In what had to be one of the most exciting and emotional contests of the 1978 Williams College spring sports season, the Williams women's lacrosse team rallied to come from behind in the closing minutes of play to defeat Middlebury College 11-10.

Maggi O'Brien and Mary Fish gave the Ephs an early, but temporary, two-goal lead, as the Panthers struck back to knot the game at two all. Sally Kruse tallied the first of her six goals for the afternoon, giving Williams another short-lived lead. Middlebury then put on a burst of attack that accounted for three unanswered goals by the end of the first half and gave them a 5-3 halftime lead.



The second half was a see-saw battle between the two squads right down to the final horn. Kruse opened it with a score for Williams, then Middlebury tallied. O'Brien proceeded to run the ball from half field to take it in for a score; the Panthers again kept their lead with a bounce shot goal. Williams continued to press the Middlebury defense and O'Brien again maneuvered in traffic and scored her third goal of the game. The visitors, however, retaliated once again with another goal of their own.

Williams began to assert itself on the attack in the latter part of the second stanza. On a good second effort, Sue Wright pushed the ball into the net to narrow the Middlebury lead to just one goal. Kruse then tied the game, but the Panthers responded to the threat once again with a burst of offense and another score. The pattern repeated itself one more time—a goal by Kruse then a Middlebury score to reassume the lead—before Kruse tallied back-to-back goals, the first of which came on a beautiful lead pass from O'Brien, to tie the game and give Williams the one goal margin of victory.



The defensive combination of Marcy Holmes and Joy Rotch worked well together as they have all season long. Dawn Bedrosian played a key role in the Ephs' transition game as she stopped many Panther drives.

Marty Taft turned away 27 Middlebury shots, including several key saves in the final minute of play.

This game marked the end of the 1978 Williams women's lacrosse season. The squad finished with a 6-2-1 record, vastly improved over last year's 3-5 ledger.

Women's field and track attended several meets this spring on an informal basis. Tricia Beckwith is one of the long-jumpers. (Holder)

Sue Tuttle, co-captain of both the U.S. National women's crew and Williams women's crew, prepares the varsity eight boat. The Eastern Association of Women's Rowing Colleges regatta will be held Sunday, May 14, on Onota Lake in Pittsfield. Men's Crew is at Philadelphia at the Dad Vail Regatta.

Racketmen squeeze Colgate

by Evan Bash

Neither rain nor wind nor time nor even hardwood courts could keep the men's tennis team from closing out its fine 8-3 season Tuesday with a exciting 5-4 win over Colgate.

Some four and a half hours and a lot of sweaty palms after the match began, Dan O'Connell and Bill Whelan walked off the Colgate basketball court (yes, this was a tennis match) with a 7-6, 5-7, 6-4 doubles victory to break a 4-4 tie.

Martin Goldberg and Evan Bash managed to finish off their opponents before the rain, however, giving Williams a quick 2-0 lead.

And when Bash and Reiss lost, the stage was set for O'Connell-Whelan heroics.

Things were nip and tuck once the teams moved inside. Dan O'Connell had an important three set win, but captain Jim Parsons dropped a tough two setter. Both Peter Friesen and Mitch Reiss lost in three sets to knot the match score at 3-3.

Oarswomen host crews

by Diane Bissonnette

On Sunday, May 11, the Women's Crew will be taking part in the most prestigious event of women's intercollegiate rowing, the Eastern Association of Women's Rowing Colleges Championships.

Sponsored by the Onota Rowing Association, the day long event will draw seventy crews representing twenty-five colleges, from as far as Georgia, Wisconsin and Virginia to Lake Onota in Pittsfield. Novice, lightweight, junior varsity and varsity eights and fours will compete in seven events over the gruelling fifteen hundred meter course.

Qualifying heats for events with more than seven entrants begin at 8:45 am; finals will start at 1:45 pm in the afternoon.

Three Williams crews will go into the competition with last weekend's strong showing against Dartmouth and Cornell behind them. The varsity eight is seeded seventh in a field of twenty crews. It will be fighting for a spot in the finals against sixth ranked Penn, who barely caught them earlier in the season. The Williams novice crew (first year oarswomen) are seeded fifth in a very strong field. They anticipate a high finish after succumbing to Dartmouth's second ranked novices by inches last weekend. The varsity lightweights (under 130 lbs. and averaging 125), in a small but very competitive field of four, are second only to Radcliffe "A", the winners of the event last year.

Spots for spectators will be available on the finish line, in the park on the east side of the lake.

Sports Briefs

Men's Lacrosse

Harvard overwhelmed the Williams men lacrosse team 29-3 at Cole Field Tuesday.

Williams held Harvard scoreless during the game's first nine minutes. Seven penalties, however, finally took their toll when Harvard unleashed nine straight goals in the remaining six minutes of the first quarter. Williams never regained its momentum.

Coach Renzi Lamb said, "They simply outclassed us. But we never stopped hustling, even though it became apparent we didn't have the skills or experience to stick with them."

Williams hosts Boston State Friday in the first round of the NESCAC tournament, in which Williams is seeded second of all New England small colleges behind Middlebury. If the Ephs beat Boston State, they will play the winner of the Middlebury-Trinity game on Saturday.

Men's Rugby

On Saturday the Williams Rugby Club brought its season to an end with a 14-3 victory over Wesleyan and a 27-3 loss to Amherst. In the first game strong scrum work and the best line play of the season sparked Williams to the win. Dave O'Connell, Wally Boyer, and Peter Brooks on the outside all played excellent games. Paul Shorb and Jim Stuart led the scrum.

In the second game, the club ran into one of the higher ranked teams in this year's New England tournament and came out on the losing end of a rather lopsided battle. The game turned against Williams when both Jack DuPre and John Raitt left the game with injuries. An exceptional effort was put forth by the club; down one man against a much bigger club and down by many points they never gave up. Much of the second half was played in the Amherst half of the field. An excellent game was turned in by hooker Billy O'Reilly. The only try was scored by Peter Brooks.

VOL. 92, NO. 1 | WILLIAMS COLLEGE | SEPTEMBER 8, 1978

Housing shortage creates cramped college living on campus

Approximately thirty students currently live in rooms which the College had not intended to use as student housing this year. According to Associate Dean Cris T. Roosenraad, the number of withdrawals over the summer was not as large as expected, leading to a shortage of upperclass rooms.

The College increased the size of this year's freshman class to 501 last spring in an effort to ensure full occupancy of the College in the face of increasing numbers of upperclass students taking years elsewhere.

There are 271 men and 224 women in the Class of 1982, a slight increase in the male-female ratio over the Class of 1981. Admissions Director Philip Smith attributed the change to a return to usual levels of women accepting admission. In the Class of 1981, a greater percentage of women accepted admission to Williams than in previous classes.

The increased freshman class is not directly responsible for the housing shortage, since only upperclass housing is tight. However, the transfer of two floors of West College to freshman housing did reduce upperclass housing by that amount.

About fourteen students live in Dewey House, another fourteen in Mission Park living rooms, and two in the College Infirmary. Three or four students have not withdrawn or notified the College of their plans as of Tuesday.

The students in Dewey House are Dodd members displaced from Seeley House by Perry-Bascom members last year. They were intended to live in Mission Park, but were moved to Dewey when the housing shortage was discovered. Seeley House now houses Perry Bascom residents who gave up their space in West College to two freshman entries in an administration decision ratified by the Housing Committee last spring.

The College will not reduce the number of exchange students admitted next semester. "These are commitments we've made and intend to meet," said Roosenraad. However, he said he expected the size of the College to drop somewhat by next semester by normal attrition, which could relieve the housing shortage.

The College has been at its present size of 1850-1900 students for too few years to be able to accurately tell whether the current overpopulation is an aberration or a trend. Roosenraad said that this fall's housing situation will probably not be ignored in future planning however.

This year's overenrollment could "potentially" be reflected in reduced admissions to the Class of 1983, fewer exchanges and transfers next year, or a combination of all three. These decisions will not be made until next spring, he said.

According to Roosenraad, transfers are no more numerous than last year, but exchanges are, due to the full occupancy effort. The effect of the housing shortage falls most heavily on transfers, exchanges, and Williams students returning from years elsewhere, since they do not have rooms reserved in last spring's room draw. In a housing shortage, the variety of rooms from which they may choose is greatly reduced, leaving them with less desirable housing.

Williams confers honorary degrees

Seven present and past presidents of American colleges and universities, all of them Williams graduates, will be awarded honorary degrees by Williams at Convocation ceremonies this weekend.

Convocation marks the official start of the new academic year. Its theme this year is "The Liberal Arts: Perspectives and Prospects." As part of the weekend's activities, the seven presidents will participate in a panel discussion on the present and future of the liberal arts education this evening at 8:00 in Jesup Hall. The moderator of the panel will be Williams' own president, John W. Chandler.

The analysis of the liberal arts question will continue Saturday at the 11 a.m. Convocation in Chapin Hall. President Chandler, who is entering his sixth year as head of Williams, will be the keynote speaker. The weekend activities will conclude with the presentation of honorary degrees to the seven visiting presidents.

Participants will include Beverley D. Causey, Jr., retired past president of Hobart and William Smith Colleges in Geneva, N.Y.; Willard F. Enteman, who will be formally installed later this month as president of Bowdoin College in Brunswick, Me.; Theodore Friend, president of Swarthmore College in Swarthmore, Pa.; Louis A. Haselmayer, president of Iowa Wesleyan College in Mount Pleasant, Iowa; Richardson Pratt, Jr., president of the Pratt Institute of Brooklyn, N.Y.; The Rev. Michael Scanlan, president of The College of Steubenville in Steubenville, Ohio; and Archibald M. Woodruff, recently retired president of the University of Hartford in Hartford, Conn.

Causey, a member of the Class of 1933, earned his M.A. and Ph.D. from Harvard. After several years in the Navy, he joined the faculty of Trinity College, a position which was quickly followed by a career in Washington, D.C., as a foreign affairs specialist with the C.I.A. In 1962 he joined the faculty of Hobart and William Smith Colleges, where he was named president in 1969, a position he held through 1970.

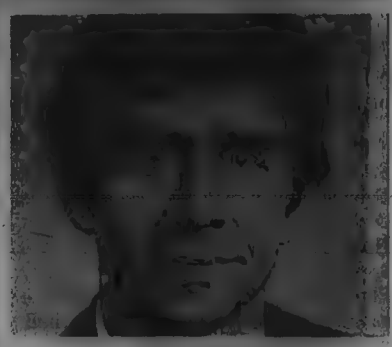
Enteman, a 1959 graduate of Williams, holds an M.B.A. degree from Harvard, and his M.A. and Ph.D. from Boston University. After teaching at Wheaton College from 1963 to 1970, Enteman joined the faculty of Union College in Schenectady, N.Y., where he served as both provost and associate professor of Philosophy. He was named president of Bowdoin during the summer

Friend is a member of the Williams Class of 1953, earning his doctorate from Yale in 1958. He became president of Swarthmore in 1973 after 13 years on the faculty of the State University of New York at Buffalo.

Haselmayer has been president of Iowa Wesleyan College since 1970 and a member of the school's faculty since 1952. A 1933 Williams graduate, Haselmayer earned his Ph.D. from Yale and a Master of Divinity degree from The General Theological Seminary in New York City.

A 1946 Williams graduate, Pratt has been president since 1973 of the Pratt Institute, a school founded by his great-grandfather in 1887. Pratt, who holds an M.B.A. from Harvard Business School is credited with bringing financial equilibrium to the Institute which specializes in the fields of architecture and art.

Father Scanlan, a classmate of Friend in 1953, became president of The College of Steubenville in 1974. A graduate of Harvard Law School and a member of the New York Bar Association, Scanlan was ordained a priest in 1964, the year he joined the faculty of The College of Steubenville. He left the college in 1969 to serve as Rector President of Saint Francis Major Seminary in Loretto, Pa., returning in 1974 as president.



Woodruff, is a 1933 Williams graduate. He received his Ph.D. from Princeton in 1936. After 14 years with the Prudential Insurance Company, Woodruff joined the faculty of the University of Pittsburgh. In 1959 he was named dean of the School of Government at George Washington University and in 1965, joined the University of Hartford where he was named president in 1970.

Seven Williams grads, also past or present college presidents, will receive honorary degrees in Convocation ceremonies Saturday morning in Chapin Hall. They will also participate in a panel on the Liberal Arts at 8:00 p.m. tonight in Jesup.

Record promotes four

The Record is pleased to announce the promotion of four staff members, effective with this issue. Randy Wong '81 will be news editor, Sally Midgely '81 will be features editor, and Susan Hobbs '81 and Mike Rayder '81 will be layout editors.

Wong joined the Record in the fall of his freshman year and became an associate news editor last year. He was sports editor of his high school newspaper. He will be responsible for assigning and editing news articles, and developing a news staff. His most important responsibility will be to keep himself informed of all newsworthy events occurring at Williams.

Midgely joined the features staff last fall. Her new duties include assigning and editing feature articles and developing a staff of features writers. Her toughest job will be to consistently find different and imaginative ideas for articles.

Hobbs and Rayder joined the Record as layout assistants last fall. Neither had previous experience in newspaper layout, learning the entire complex process in their freshman year. They will be responsible for arranging articles and photos on each page, writing headlines and photo captions, and training a staff of layout assistants. Their most difficult task will be to lay out the newspaper in an interesting and eye-catching way that will encourage the readers to look at the paper.

Williams sells Estate, special school to open

Williams College has sold the former Cluett Estate on Sale Road in Williamstown to a New Jersey couple who will operate it as a private school for boys.

The property was purchased by David and Joyce Milne of Chester, N.J., on August 31. They plan to renovate the buildings so that they can open their doors to the Highroad School students this fall.

The couple plans to establish the school for a few teenaged boys who have had problems with basic study skills. The faculty will be operated as a proprietary school paying property taxes to Williamstown.

The Cluett Estate was given to Williams in 1956 by the children of the late George Alfred Cluett, an 1898 graduate of Williams and a former trustee of the college. The original estate was 179 acres. Over the years a part of the land has been sold by Williams to various faculty members who have built homes on the property and now about only 100 acres still remain in the name of the college. No decisions have been made about the disposition of the balance of the land, however.

The Milnes have already begun renovations. Plans call for the estate's three-car garage to be converted into classroom space. The main house will be used as a dormitory and a dining facility. Two smaller houses on the property will provide housing for student and faculty of the Highroad School.

No divestiture now

Trustees set investing policy

by Peter Rauch

In a statement mailed to students this summer, the Trustees formally rejected demands to divest the College of stocks in corporations doing business in South Africa. The Trustees did, however, approve the establishment of a broad based committee to advise them on matters of shareholder responsibility and left open the possibility of selling holdings in corporations failing to meet College standards of ethical conduct "after thorough consideration."

The statement maintained that "The Trustees have a legal and moral obligation to manage the College's assets so as to meet the needs of present and future generations of faculty and students," adding that "Promotion of this social good must take priority over all other purposes of the College."

According to President John W. Chandler, the legal obligation of the "prudent man principle" written into the laws governing the management of funds of a non-profit institution. The laws require that the Trustees manage College funds "as a prudent man would." Chandler pointed out that the Attorney-General of Oregon recently held that divestiture of South Africa related stocks by schools in that state would be illegal on the basis of such laws.

The three page statement also declared South African apartheid to be an "unusually distressing instance" of political oppression, but opposed American corporate withdrawal from the country as a means to end it. "We do not believe," the Trustees said, "that actions designed to end American

Activities participate in Key night

Using the "Tonight Show" as a model, members of the Purple Key Society dedicated an evening of entertainment to introducing more than thirty campus activities to the freshman class, as well as acting as hosts for the freshman talent contest Tuesday night.

The new format, was designed to involve more Purple Key members in the event, explained Purple Key president Chris DiAngelo. In the past only the president of the organization would appear on stage as emcee; this year's talk show format allowed other members to participate. DiAngelo said the interview technique was designed to make organizations which don't perform more comfortable on stage.

Playing Johnny Carson for the night, Purple Key member Byron Walker spoke with representatives from organizations varying from the Rugby Club to the Feminist Alliance. Steve "Mono" Davidson acted as Carson's sidekick, Ed McMahon. Walker says he felt the new format gave Purple Key Night "a little bit of personality," although work is still needed, he commented, to move the program along at a quicker pace.

Under pressure from the dean's office to cancel the event, Purple Key Society made other changes in the program. The freshman singing contest, criticized last year for its obscenity and lack of originality, was replaced this year with a talent show. Entries competed with original acts they performed based on the theme "first impressions of Williams."

DiAngelo hopes in the future the contest can serve as a forerunner to the Freshman Review.

Judges awarded the combination team of Sage A and Williams B first place this year for their rendition of "The Twelve Hours of Williams." Other hit performances included Cap and Bells "Summer Nights," the Octet's "Blue Moon," and the Outing Club's rappelling demonstration.

These and other performances gave Purple Key Night its "spectacle value," DiAngelo said. Freshman are not introduced just to the various organizations, he said but also to the enthusiasm that members have for their activities. This enthusiasm, he concluded, which cannot be relayed in print, is crucial in sparking freshman involvement in campus organizations.

Couple serves as chaplains

He is serenely confident; his speech is relaxed and spontaneous. She is more intense and empathic, frequently leaning forward to stress a point. Both, however, are sincere and deeply committed, a fact which becomes obvious upon meeting them. They are Michael and Jane Henderson, the first joint chaplains in college history and who, coincidentally, are also husband and wife.

The Hendersons begin the 1978-79 school year with a remodeled and enlarged office, and plans for a similar expansion in the role of the chaplaincy. "We expect to maintain a much higher profile than in previous years," said Michael Henderson. A major factor aiding them in this goal will be their increased availability on campus. Where previously one individual combined the chaplain's post with regular teaching duties, the Hendersons will work on a full-time schedule. In addition, they will encourage students to contact them at home if the need arises.

Jane Henderson sees one of the primary goals of the chaplaincy as the encouragement of "more frequent and regular worship." She recognizes a danger, however, in "watering down" religion until it loses its individual character. "We want people to come to a faith of their own," she stressed. "We respect diversity."

Towards this end, the Hendersons hope to serve the needs of each faith to the fullest extent possible. They are currently cooperating with Associate Prof. Lawrence Kaplan, adviser to the Jewish Association, in the search for a rabbi to serve on campus.

The Hendersons met in 1974 while classmates at the Harvard Divinity School. Their immediate past experience has been varied. Jane Henderson worked with the Cambridge Council on Aging, an organization designed to serve the economic and social needs of the low-income elderly.

Michael Henderson was the younger of two chaplains at Harvard University for six years before coming to Williams. He noted that Harvard and Williams share an applicant pool that is "virtually identical." The primary difference he saw between the two schools is their relationship to their external environments. Cambridge, unlike Williamstown, is not a "city dominated by a college,"

Notes from OCC

Those planning to take the LSAT, GMAT, GRE, MCAT, and DAT examinations this fall are advised to register immediately. A mail service disruption could prevent your applications from reaching ETS in Princeton by the deadline dates required. Deadlines are:

MCAT - Sept. 1 GMAT - Sept. 21
DAT - Sept. 11 GRE - Sept. 28
LSAT - Sept. 14

Late registration is one week later but must be accompanied by the late fee.

OCC Workshop for Seniors

The first Senior Starter Workshop will be on Thursday, Sept. 14 at 7 PM in the OCC Resource Library. These one sessions workshops (others this month) will help you get your career counseling concerns off the ground.

New PACE and Foreign Service Exams

OCC has just received the new test information for the PACE (if you want to work for the Federal government) and the Foreign Service (State & USIA).

investments in South African would achieve results that are widely agreed upon as desirable," adding that withdrawal would "destroy the leverage" American companies now have to make social changes.

The Trustees did, however, advocate an end to the granting of new loans to the South African government and said they would "encourage fuller reports by companies on their South African activities."

The College presently subscribes to the Investor Responsibility Research Service, which provides information on the social implications of corporate activities, such as in South Africa. This summer, Williams joined with several other schools in increasing its contribution to the IRRS to provide funds for a special research team that will report from South Africa on American corporate practices and influences there.

The Trustee statement empowered Chandler to establish a long-term Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities to advise the Trustees on the "socially responsible" management of the College's investments.

At the recommendation of last year's Committee, Williams broke with its traditional practice and voted proxies against management or abstained from votes for four shareholder resolutions. According to College Treasurer Francis Dewey III, in the past "we felt if we owned stock in a company that we ought to vote with the management or sell."

In those four votes, Williams:

Voted its General Electric proxy for a share-holder resolution opposed by the management requiring that the company not sell military equipment to countries violating human [redacted]

Voted its Union Carbide proxy for a management opposed shareholder resolution demanding that the company stop expanding its operation in South Africa.

Abstained from voting its ITT proxy on a management opposed shareholder resolution requiring a full disclosure of the company's activities in Chile, and Abstained from voting its Motorola proxy on a management opposed shareholder resolution calling for the company to withdraw from South Africa and stop sales to the South African government. In a letter to the company, Dewey explained that the College supported only the latter part of the proposal.

The Advisory Committee will consist of the Treasurer and President of the College, two faculty members, [redacted] Chandler expects to make appointments in consultation.

B & G makes summer campus improvements

The annual summer task of rebuilding, refacing and rehabilitating the Williams campus continues as Buildings and Grounds staff finish up this year's round of improvements.

Students noticed several housing changes when they returned this fall. Garfield House reopened after being closed since January. The interior has been rebuilt and students have moved in, but some telephones and hardware have yet to be installed.

Doughty and Suzy Hopkins houses, both Fort Hoosic satellites, also saw renovation over the summer. Both were painted and papered. Doughty still awaits completion of a third floor fire escape.

Carpeting was put in the Mission Park Dining Room and the middle and west entries of Prospect House in an effort to improve esthetics and cut down noise.

The resurfacing of the College's two visitor parking lots has begun. The holes in both the Mission Park and Agard lots are slated for filling.

New entryways have been added to the Lasell Gymnasium and the news room. They are intended to both improve access by the handicapped and increase energy conservation.

The College's Facilities Study Committee, headed by Treasurer Francis Dewey, currently is seeking federal funding for improving access to other campus buildings. The Committee found "major accessibility problems with Griffin, Hopkins, Mission Park . . . and most of the student housing units," according to its last report.

A new addition to the campus sidewalk system went in facing Baxter Hall. The concrete walk is intended to eliminate the spring [redacted] problem in past years.

Chapin Hall work continues of the Chapin Hall addition. The walls and roof are up, and interior work continues. Officials expect it to open by mid-semester.

The Williams Record welcomes the class of '72

The Williams Record offers advice to the freshmen of a decade ago

Ten years ago, Williams' social life consisted of road trips to nearby women's colleges, the College Cinema replaced Walden Theater on Spring Street, and the Williams Record published LIKE IT IS: A Guide to Campus Life. Since then, the College has admitted thousands of women, the College Cinema has become the Nickelodeon which has become Images Cinema, Massachusetts lowered the drinking age to 18, and the slightly yellowed LIKE IT IS offers insights into Williams of the late sixties.

Excerpted from LIKE IT IS—September 7, 1968.

For what it's worth

Dear Freshman,

The Record editors offer this booklet to help you, a member of one of the largest freshman classes in Williams history, to wade through the initial vicissitudes of the Eph Experience. The jewels of information our crack reporters disclose herein are the things you should know, but which the Purple Key guide is too ashamed to tell you.

Before the Enlightenment begins, however, a couple of notes on your entry into the Land of the Purple Cow.

If there are any guiding rules at Williams, excluding those few handed down from the Dean's office, they are, first: don't get uptight. In the next few days everyone will advise you about all the aspects, wonderful and not-so-wonderful, of Williams life. Stay loose. Anything you forget that's worth remembering, you'll discover for yourself shortly.

Second, Williams is a haven for individuals. The secret is to treat your college existence as an experiment. Your "thing" may be epistemology or athletics, metaphysics or apathy, flower-arranging or bull sessions. Try them all, if you feel the urge.

Third, don't worry about marks. Your first D or E in English 101 or the arrival of mid-semester warnings may be your initial encounter with low grades. With a minimum of hard work, however, you will still be in school for finals.

Fourth, ask questions. As experienced veterans of three northeastern colleges, we can say that Williams is the most casual and friendly around. Anyone, from the Williams Hall janitor to President Sawyer, will try to help you with your queries.

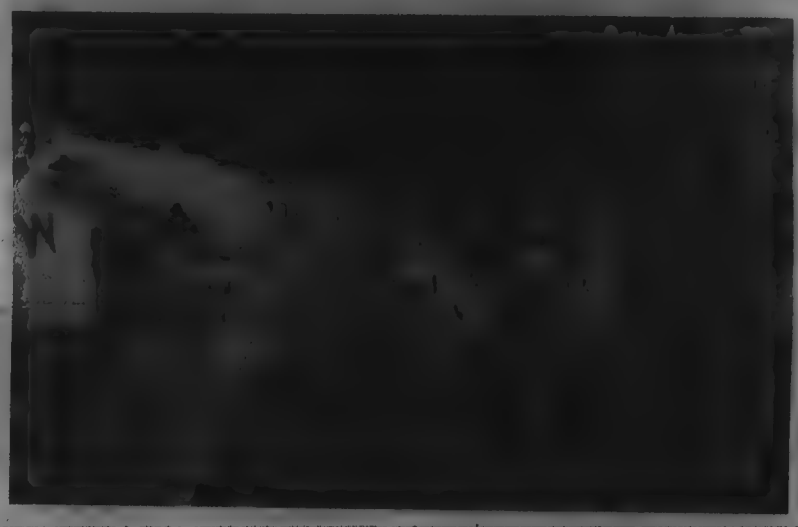
The Record welcomes you to Williams.

The Editors

Williams College

The Williams residential house system is perfectly designed, though not intentionally, to make sure that freshman are strictly segregated socially from the rest of the college until the upperclassmen are good and ready to let the youngsters in. Freshmen are provided with "separate but equal" living, dining and social facilities. Like those of the South, they are more separate than equal.

Don't count on the library for studying. Its quiet is minimal and its steam heat overwhelming. Many students prefer to find their own niche, often in classrooms, most of which are open at night. It's worth the search.



In general, the big weekend at Williams is an experience of sorts: parties of all varieties (keep the beer and band variety still reigns offensively supreme) athletics etc. Sample all that the phenomenon has to offer; you may be completely turned off by it, but you won't know until you're tried it.

Girls

One of the first things you'll notice about Williams, once your parents leave, is that there just aren't many girls around. And if you've just bid your high school honey a passionate farewell, the first few weeks of freshman life in wenchless Williamstown can be pretty frustrating. So in place of saltpeter in your Wheaties the Record offers this handy guide to the fair sex in New England:

If you're looking for girls in and around the Village Beautiful, forget it. Local women come in three categories: high school girls, who are just that; snack bar ladies, who are sweet and cook very well but are a little too old for you; and faculty wives, who are off limits to freshmen. So it's best to seek feminine companionship outside the shadow of Mt. Greylock.

Luckily, New England is virtually covered with institutions devoted to the education of the fair sex, and there are a half-dozen schools of varying quality within two hours driving time.

All of them offer mixers with bands and refreshments (sometimes beer, sometimes soggy cookies and watery punch), and these are often a good bet for meeting eager young ladies.

In addition, your JA's, as in past years, will offer a strong home mixer schedule this fall, which will feature the importation of hundreds (count 'em) of beautiful young things, anxious to throw themselves into the social fray.

These mixers are usually a good show, since the guys outnumber the girls about three to one. But there's always a loud band and plenty of beer, and if you haven't got a date it's a lot better than playing cards or studying on a Saturday night.

Whenever you try to generalize about girls at the various schools, you inevitably run into someone who says, "Well, I went out with a Bennington girl who . . . And we'll be the first to admit that generalities are usually grossly inaccurate.

But they are a lot of fun to make, so heedless of our detractors, the staff of The Williams Record offers the Class of 1972 this wrap-up of the girls' schools they will most likely be visiting the next four years:

though it's regarded by the social elite as the most chic girls' school in the country, mainly because it costs so much ($3500 a year), its collective body clothes itself mainly in bleached dungarees and work shoes.

Generally exuding a hippier-than-thou attitude, the girls reject most of the conventions of collegiate social life, and generally prefer sitting around and talking with men to having beer spilled on them while a band blasts in the background.

Bennington girls have unlimited overnights and a six a.m. curfew. Visiting hours for men in the girls' rooms are about the same as girls' hours in Williams' residential houses. To telephone a girl there, dial 802-442-5401 and ask for her by name. The initial charge for the call is 20 cents.

Skidmore—If there ever was an antithesis to Bennington, it's Skidmore, located just down the road from the race track in Saratoga Springs, N.Y., about an hour from Williamstown.

The girls at Skids aren't quite so intellectual as their counterparts at Smith, Vassar, and Bennington, but they thrive on the frenetic weekend social life which you'll soon grow accustomed to.

Skidmore is a good place to go on a date. Rumor has it that there's one bar for every seven girls, and in New York the drinking age is still, thankfully, 18.

Dress is usually neat, although tie and jacket are optional. Curfew for the girls is 2:30 a.m., and first semester freshmen are limited to seven overnights.

Smith—There are few schools which can match Smith for pomposity, hoary tradition, and general stuffiness. The girls there, for example, have to virtually memorize an inch-thick rulebook, (and they get tested on it, believe it or not). They also take lessons in posture and deportment. The girls generally enjoy grinding, and the place gives the impression of being a super prep school along the lines of Miss Porter's or Miss Hall's.

Smith is located in deadly Northampton, Mass., and a trip there is hardly worth the hour it takes. If you have a date, there's practically nothing to do except take in one of the local flics or try your luck at the Satire Room, a local dive which may or may not serve you, depending on which cop is on duty.

Generally, it's a better idea to bring your Smithie to Williamstown.

Dress for your Smith road trip is usually tie and jacket. Curfew for the girls is one a.m., although you'll be pressed to find things to do until that time.

Vassar—Although it's located further away than most of the other schools you'll be visiting, in Poughkeepsie, New York, Vassar is well-worth the extra time it takes to get there.

Vassar girls are generally bright and up for good times, and the school itself has an enlightened attitude toward the presence of males on campus.

Unlike Smithies, most VC chicks would rather be out on a date than grind in their rooms, and the mixers are often crowded but fun.

One event to avoid is the annual all-college mixer, which usually features thousands of button-down Yalies who jam the place and make it impossible to meet anyone.

Dress for Vassar is usually tie and jacket. The girls' curfew on weekends is one a.m., with a limited number of late signouts to 2:30.

The following schools are not quite so popular with Williams men, but are worth looking over:

Bennett—Located in Millbrook, New York, about 15 miles from Poughkeepsie, Bennett is a two-year college for rich society girls who are looking for rich society husbands. Bennett girls aren't too intellectual, feel no compunction about giving up their studies for a date, and are generally interested in good times.

Green Mountain College—Green Mountain is generally the choice of Dartmouth men who don't want to travel far and don't care whether or not their dates can carry on an articulate conversation. Located in Poultney, Vermont, Green Mountain is colloquially referred to as "The Groin," a name which speaks for itself.

Mt. Holyoke—This is really an untapped resource for enterprising Williams men. Located in South Hadley, Mass., some 1400 Holyoke girls have to share some 1200 Amherst men with 500 Smithies, which means that they're practically waiting with open arms.

The only hitch in making a road trip to Holyoke is that South Hadley's nighttime attractions make Northampton look like New York City. But there are some good mixers in the fall, and the young ladies are intelligent, appreciative of male attention, and desperate to get out of South Hadley.

A few tips on road tripping—If you know any girls from high school who go to any of these schools, call them and ask them to set you up. Remember, they're just as anxious to meet your classmates as you are to meet theirs . . . A few drinks before a mixer can often put you in the right frame of mind . . . If you meet a girl you want to ask out again, get her phone number or extension, it will save you time and money later. Good luck!

1968 - Associate Philosophy Professor Daniel D. O'Connor, now Dean of the College.

Merchants

Liquor—Williamstown has a population of about 5,000 but nevertheless manages to support five liquor stores. The most familiar is King's, on Spring Street, but Allsop's (the Spirit Shop) on Cole Ave. and the Taconic Liquor Store on Water Street also get a lot of college business. Since you have to be 21 (officially) to drink in this state, it's a good idea to have an upperclassman get your booch for you. Liquor is much cheaper, by the way, in Vermont (about 20 per cent), so it's a good idea to get it there if you can.

Theaters—The College Cinema arose last fall like a phoenix out of the ashes of the old Walden Theater, and it offers good flics at reasonable prices. But the movie doesn't change very often (a few years ago, you could see four flics a week, if double features were playing) and the hard core skin flics of years gone by are fewer and fewer.

The Arts at Williams

Harpsichord

Griffin Hall Concerts at Williams College opens its eleventh season with a program of Bach Concerti. This concert marks tenth anniversary of the completion of the double-manual harpsichord custom-built by Rainer Schuetze of Heidelberg, Germany, for Victor Hill, founder and director of the series. Two performances will be given, on Saturday, September 16 at 8:00, and on Sunday afternoon at 3:00. Admission is free.

Hill will be soloist in the Harpsichord Concerti in A major, D minor, and F minor. He will be accompanied by a string quartet consisting of George Green, Lucy Joseph, Susan St. Amour, and Douglas Moore. Concluding the program, Janet Geroulo (flute) will join the ensemble for a performance of "Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major."

The Schuetze harpsichord is a "free copy" based on the work of the Flemish builder Johannes Daniel Duicken, who flourished around 1745. Although he has incorporated some modern materials such as Delrin plectra and a Reflon coating on the jack slides, Schuetze has executed the design as though he had been an apprentice in the Antwerp shop of Duicken. Other materials in the instrument include the case of Spanish cedar from Honduras, bracing of Sitka spruce from Canada, a sounding-board of Norway spruce from Rumania, and keys made of African pear and of Grenadill from Colombia. This harpsichord was exhibited at the triennial harpsichord festival at Bruges, Belgium, in 1968 and has since been heard in more than 130 of Mr. Hill's concerts in twelve states.

Victor Hill is Professor of Mathematics at Williams College and Organist-Choirmaster of St. John's Episcopal Church in Williamstown. He studied in New York and Amsterdam with the Dutch harpsichordist Gustav Leonhardt.

Theater

Williamstheatre, the production organization of the Department of Theatre, will hold auditions for its two Fall semester Major Productions this Sunday and Monday from 7:00 to 11:00 p.m. on the mainstage of the Adams Memorial Theatre.

The Fall productions are Euripides' Orestes, directed by Jean-Bernard Bucky and Brecht's comedy A Man's A Man, directed by Gregory Boyd. All productions will make use of original musical scores and both will be designed by Peter Gould (sets), Martha Hally (costumes) and Fred Penzel (lighting). Participation in all aspects of Williamstheatre productions are open to all members of the College community. Freshmen and new transfer students are especially encouraged to become involved.

Those wishing to audition may sign up for a time with the Theatre Department secretary at the A.M.T. (458-9228) between 12:00 noon and 5:00 p.m. Reading copies of the two plays are also available at the Department office on two hour loan.

Those interested in working on Set, Costume, Prop and Lighting crews or in Stage Management are urged to contact the A.M.T. Technical Director, Mr. Penzel, at 597-2242.

September 23rd home opener

Football team gears up for fall season

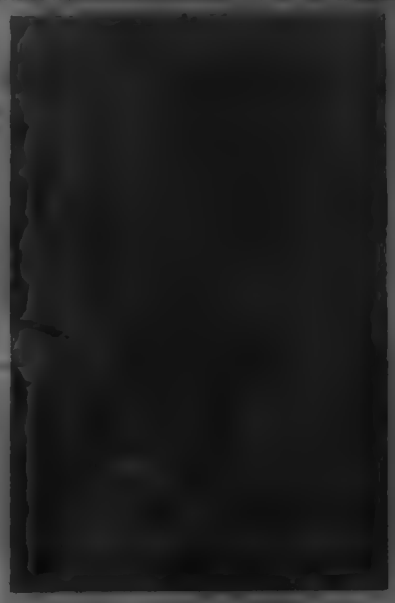
Many members of the Williams football players were the first students to subject themselves to college pressures when they returned to Williamstown for grueling pre-season practice in late August.

Team meetings and double daily workout sessions consumed the squad's time from 6 in the morning until lights out at 10 p.m. Only last Sunday were players able to ease into a more sane, in-school schedule. Their week of intense training will prepare them for two particularly tough pre-season scrimmages against Hofstra on Sept. 9 and Dartmouth on Sept. 16.

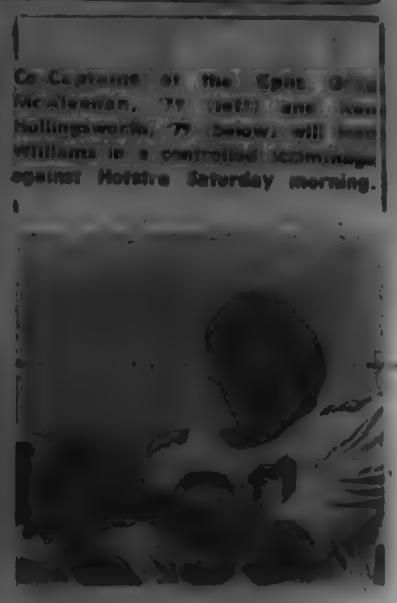
There's no question about who some of the key players will be. On defense, for example, is Greg McAleenan, a senior who was fourth in the NCAA statistics last season for punt returns and kickoff returns. He was a first-team UPI All New England selection as a defensive back.

On the offensive side, fullback Gus Nuzzolese (78.1 yards per game in 1977) a junior, has been a starter since midway through his freshman year. "Gus has all the qualities a good back should have," says head coach Bob Odell, "speed, quickness and balance. He thrives on competition."

Another key is the Williams offense is split end and senior co-captain Ken Hollingsworth. Only 5'1" and 160 pounds, Hollingsworth has the elusive ability to make things happen. Odell calls Hollingsworth "One of the finest clutch receivers I've ever worked with."



Other returning veterans include linebacker John Thiel, an All-New England pick last year; and halfbacks Greg Collins and Dave Massaro.



Williams comes off a deceptive 5-3 season last year. The losses came early in the year, but the three wins were convincing, including victories over Wesleyan (13-7) and Amherst (21-13). The Wesleyan and Amherst victories gave the Ephmen their sixth Little Three title out of Odell's seven seasons at Williams. (There was a three-way tie in 1976).

Early practice provides tests to see how well the players followed their summer conditioning program. Linemen and backs alike are expected to run the mile in six minutes or less. Under NCAA guidelines, the first three days of practice were in shorts and T-shirts.

The Williams coaching staff includes a few familiar faces, Dick Farley in the defensive backfield and Joe Dailey on the offensive line. A newcomer this season is Mel Rose, former offensive line coach at South Carolina State College, who will team up with Rich Turi in work with the defensive line.

Looking ahead to the 8-game season which opens at home against Hamilton Sept. 23 and closes against traditional rival Amherst on Nov. 11, Odell says he "hopes to start out where we left off," with an emphasis on the basic T-formation. "We'll build from that," says Odell. The basic T, used late in the season by Williams last year, was a departure from the wide-open game of previous seasons. Although Odell promises that "we'll throw the ball," he's looking toward an equally strong ground game for a more balanced attack in 1978.

Gridders prep for Hofstra

Williams College football team will see its first scrimmage competition of the season on Saturday, Sept. 9, as it faces the Flying Dutchmen of Hofstra University in a controlled scrimmage at 1:30 on Weston Field.

Hofstra coach Bill Leete's squad, which posted a 6-3 record last season, is a new addition to Williams pre-season schedule, and is something of an unknown quantity to the Ephs. Williams coach Bob Odell says the Flying Dutchmen will be big, "but we'll be ready for them."

Odell has been pleased with his squad's efforts since the players returned to Williams last week for pre-season practice. "We're working really hard," says Odell. "There is good enthusiasm and a good attitude among the players."

Several injuries have added to Williams already-troublesome depth problems. Senior John Thiel pulled a calf muscle, sophomore Bob VanDore injured his back during the summer, and seniors Steve Rogers and Bruce Wilson sprained ankles in the opening days of practice. Odell hopes to have the services of the players for the season opener against Hamilton on Sept. 23.

For the Ephs, the quarterback spot remains the big question mark at present. Three sophomores, Bob Lutz, Kevin Hinchey and Bob Stackpole, are vying for the position and Odell is anxious to see how they perform in Saturday's scrimmage.

"We've been hindered by depth problems among our linemen and size problems at the tackle spots," says Odell, "but we were quite pleased with the performances of freshmen Jeff Desmond, Brad Adams, and Joe Ross in a recent intrasquad scrimmage."

The Ephs will run a basic T-formation offense against Hofstra. Odell says, "We're running a pretty basic offense now so that we can continue to build confidence on offense. We won't use many formation variations this early in the season."

Williams defense, led by co-captain Greg McAleenan, has been enthusiastic and aggressive during the past week of practice, according to Odell. "Our defensive secondary will be extremely tough to throw passes against," says Odell.

Williams alums compose one quarter of national crew team

One-fourth of the U.S. National Women's Crew is composed of graduates of Williams College, a school where crew is a club sport and the training lake is 25 miles away.

Trials for the eight seats in the national boat were held in Philadelphia during mid-August. After the strenuous head-to-head competition by the best oarswomen in the country, Sue Tuttle, a 1978 Williams graduate and Nancy Storrs, a 1973 graduate, had captured two of the eight seats.

The U.S. crew, selected by the U.S. Olympic Women's Rowing Committee, will train together in Philadelphia until the world crew championships for women this November in New Zealand.

Storrs is no stranger to international crew competition. She has been a member of the U.S. crew since 1975 and was co-captain of last year's team. She rows for the prestigious Vesper Boat Club in Philadelphia. Tuttle, a native of Middletown, Conn., was a member of last year's national crew while still a senior at Williams.

At first glance, Williams College appears an unlikely place to be producing international-class oarswomen. Crew is a club sport, as opposed to varisty sports which are fully-financed by the college.

There is a two-seat rowing tank for practice in the basement of the college gym, but it's a lot more than a casual stroll to the crew's boathouse. The members drive 25 miles south to Onota Lake in Pittsfield for their daily and sometimes twice-daily workouts.

Purple booters return to action in tourney this weekend

Perry Nelson (above) and Chick Johnson are co-captains of the soccer team, which will face an alumni team here Sunday.

The men's soccer team heads back into action this weekend, competing in a four team round robin before taking on the alumni Sunday on Cole Field.

Four returning starters lend experience to the squad, as a veteran forward line takes charge of the Eph's offensive threat. Forwards Gregg Hartmann and Perry Nelson are back, along with middie Chick Johnson and Marcus Smith in the backfield.

Although the team is strengthened by experience new talent and a change in playing style should boost the team's record.

The booter's new look features a team-oriented game as veteran coach Jeff Vennell hopes to link the midfield and forward line with an effective passing game.

The Eph's, under the direction of co-captains Johnson and Nelson hope to improve last year's 5-6-1 record. Wesleyan now holds soccer's Little Three crown, capturing the title after Williams' 2-1 victory over Amherst, the team's defeat of the Jeff's in seven years. Team depth and experience may well bring Little Three honors back to the Purple Valley after a long absence.

Over thirty booters reported for a week of grueling double practices August 31, working for a spot on the 25 man roster.

Following Sunday's 1 p.m. scrimmage, the Ephs have three weeks to develop their game, as they head into a tough schedule which pits the kickers against University of Massachusetts in the opener September 27.

The Purple Key Society will hold an organizational meeting this Sunday night at 10:00 p.m. in the lounge of Driscoll Dining Hall. New members are welcome. Free beer and pizza will be served.

36th SALE

The First Congregational Church (in front of Baxter Hall) will sponsor a Vintage clothing, furniture and plant sale on Tuesday, September 12 from 10 until 4 o'clock. This sale is especially geared to students and their needs.

Chandler cites wide decline in popularity of liberal arts

by Eric Seaman

Urging a vigorous renewal of vitality in the liberal arts education and its effect upon American society, President John Chandler addressed a fall convocation audience Saturday morning in Chapin Hall.

Chandler mentioned the tremendous growth in education since World War II, but also singled out a sensitive problem facing liberal arts institutions today.

"Since 1970, there has been a shift to the vocational arts," Chandler said, "and the decline in the study of liberal arts is a sobering statistic, one which is due in part to our economic stagnation."

The technocrats in American society, according to Chandler, have greater influence over the nation's policymakers than do the liberal arts graduates.

"There is a diminished sense of national purpose of who we are and what our role is in the global scene," Chandler commented. This deterioration of influence Chandler attributed in part to "an erosion of religiously based morals" and "a rootless autonomy on the part of people, which has led to the 'how to look out for number one' attitude."

The president said the effect on the college itself is acute, noting the present concerns over the Winter Study program and certain specialized areas of the curriculum. He added that Williams now offers more demanding courses than ever before.

Liberal arts institutions, while currently under fire, are still vital in the American education system according to Chandler.

"There is a need for a renewed civic responsibility of the liberal arts person, and the residential liberal arts college is still the best place to inculcate that attitude," Chandler said.

Chandler ended the address on an optimistic note. "Society has a right to look to Williams for a disproportionate share of leaders," Chandler said, "and I believe the graduates will be able to meet that challenge."

Following the address, he presented honorary degrees to seven alumni college presidents: Beverly D. Causey, Jr. '33 of Hobart and William Smith (retired); William F. Enteman '59 of Bowdoin; Theodore Friend '53 of Swarthmore; Louis A. Haselmayer '33 of Iowa Wesleyan; Richard Pratt, Jr. '45 of Pratt Institute; the Rev. Michael Scanlon '53 of Steubenville; and Archibald M. Woodruff '33 of the University of Hartford (retired).

The proceedings began with the introduction of the undergraduate members of Phi Betta Kappa. Election to the society as a junior requires rank in the top ten per cent and a GPA of at least 9.00.

Panelists debate liberal arts

The liberal arts remain relevant in spite of a fast-changing world agreed seven college presidents, all Williams alumni, when they met with President John Chandler and College Marshal Fred Rudolph '42 Friday in Jesup Hall for the Convocation panel on "The Liberal Arts: Perspectives and Prospects."

Noting the decline in U.S. influence abroad, Theodore Friend '53 of Swarthmore focused on the utility of foreign languages and their importance in literature. Other panelists voiced concern over the decline of language study in high schools. William F. Enteman '59 of Bowdoin suggested expanding college "abroad programs" to encourage more interest.

Rudolph, though, rejected the notion of utility, arguing that the language itself deserves study. Chandler explained how multilingualism expandes one's knowledge of other cultures.

On the issue of institutional responsibility for guiding students, the Rev. Michael Scanlan '53 of Steubenville stressed the need for challenging students philosophical and religious beliefs. Such questioning, he argued, becomes most significant in later life.

In discussion of pre-professionalism, Beverly D. Causey, Jr. '33 of Hobart and William Smith, (retired) said, "I don't see any reason to castigate people for worrying about their future." He added that it does not matter why students come to liberal arts colleges, so long as they benefit from their experience.

Another question concerned the possibility of more global and socio-economic diversity among college students. Enteman explained that admissions offices are restricted by highly competitive applicant pools, but added that schools could recruit diverse students by wise use of financial aid and expanding minority programs.

Questions for the panel had been submitted earlier by students and faculty. Other panelists included Louis A. Haselmayer '33 of Iowa Wesleyan; Richard Pratt, Jr. '45 of Pratt Institute; and Archibald M. Woodruff '33 of the University of Hartford (retired).

A scene from a past convocation shows seniors marching towards Chapin Hall.

Committee vacancies appear

Student applications for membership on the College Council Finance Committee (Student Activities Committee) and the Computer Services Committee should be submitted to the Dean's Office no later than Monday, September 18th, at 4 P.M. Applications may be written on any sheet of paper, no form is necessary.

All applicants should be certain to list their specific goals and ideas for the committee, as well as related experience.

Freshmen are not eligible for membership on the Finance Committee. Members of all classes may apply for membership on the Computer Services Committee. Both committees have one vacancy each, and those selected for membership will serve through May, 1979.

Those students who submitted applications for the Finance Committee this spring, but were not selected for membership may have their applications reconsidered.

Faculty members complete books during summer

Professor of Chemistry Raymond Chang and his wife Margaret Scrogin Chang have written a book, "Speaking of the Chinese language" which was published in August by the W. W. Norton Company. According to the Changs, their book is not a guide to speaking and writing Chinese but rather "a study of the language itself."

"A lot of people are interested in the Chinese language," said Professor Chang, "but are not interested enough to spend a year or two studying it." Chang, who speaks five of the seven major Chinese dialects says that the book will help readers develop a feel for the language. "It explores how a language developed which uses pictures of ideas instead of the symbols for sounds which characterize western languages," he explained.

The book is a result of a Winter Study course on the Chinese language which Professor Chang had taught for several years. The course, and its enthusiastic reception by the students, said Chang, "gave us the idea for a book about the cultural and historical aspects of the Chinese language."

"Americans and Chinese have always been fascinated with one another," Chang explained. "There is a deep sense of kinship between the two."

Professor of Political Science James MacGregor Burns '39 explores the role of leadership in society throughout history in a recently published book, Leadership.

The study covers political and social leadership at various levels from the family to society as a whole, ranging across many different cultures and historical periods. He describes the various characteristics and types of leadership, reasons for its success and failure, and its role in social change.

Burns has been at Williams since 1941. He has written biographies of Woodrow Wilson, John F. Kennedy, and Edward Kennedy, as well as a Pulitzer Prize-winning biography of Franklin D. Roosevelt, "Roosevelt: Soldier of Freedom." He ran for the House of Representatives from Williamstown in 1958 and has served as a delegate to the last five Democratic national conventions.

Fellowship opportunity is open

Information about the Danforth Graduate Fellowships, to be awarded by the Danforth Foundation of St. Louis, Missouri in April 1979, is now available, according to the local campus representative, Professor Victor E. Hill, 205 Bronfman.

The Fellowships are open to all qualified persons who have serious interest in careers of teaching in colleges and universities, and who plan to study for a Ph.D. in any field of study common to the undergraduate liberal arts curriculum in the United States.

Approximately 60-65 Fellowships will be awarded to college seniors who are nominated by Baccalaureate Liaison Officers.

Applicants for the baccalaureate awards must be college seniors and may not have undertaken graduate level programs of study. The deadline to seek information about the campus nomination process from Hill is Monday, September 18.

The Foundation is currently making a special effort to bring qualified persons from racial and ethnic minorities into the profession of teaching. In recent years through vigorous recruitment of qualified persons, the number of Blacks, Mexican-Americans, Native Americans and Puerto Ricans in this fellowship program has been dramatically increased.

The Danforth Graduate Fellowship is a one-year award but is normally renewable until completion of the advanced degree or for a maximum of four years of graduate study. Fellowship stipends are based on individual needs but they will not exceed $2,500 for single Fellows, and for married Fellows with no children. Fellows who are married, or are "head of household", with one child, receive up to $3,500. There are dependency allowances for additional children. The Fellowship also covers tuition and fees up to $4,000 annually.

The Danforth Foundation, established in 1927, is a national, educational, philanthropic organization, dedicated to enhancing the humane dimensions of life. Activities of the Foundation traditionally have emphasized the theme of improving the quality of teaching and learning.

Currently the Danforth Foundation serves the following areas: higher education primarily through sponsorship of programs administered by the Staff, precollegiate education through grant-making and program activities, and urban education in metropolitan St. Louis through grant-making and program activities.

Mr. and Mrs. William H. Danforth, who established the Foundation, along with their daughter and son, Dorothy Danforth Compton and Donald Danforth, maintained active leadership roles in the affairs of the Foundation throughout their lifetimes. Family members continue to be involved in Foundation activities through participation on the Board of Trustees.

Applications due soon for overseas exchange

The 1979-80 competition for grants for graduate study abroad offered under the Educational Exchange Program (Fulbright) and by foreign governments, universities and private donors will close shortly. Only a few more weeks remain in which qualified graduate students may apply for one of the 500 awards which are available in 52 countries.

Most of the grants offered provide round-trip transportation, tuition and maintenance for one academic year; a few provide international travel only or a stipend intended as a partial grant-in-aid.

Candidates must be U.S. citizens at the time of application; hold a bachelor's degree or its equivalent by the beginning date of the grant, or in a few cases at the time of application; have language ability commensurate with the demands of the proposed study projects; and be in good health.

Application forms and further information for students may be obtained from the Fulbright Program Adviser David Tharp, who is located in 702 Stetson (7-2328). The deadline for filing applications on this campus is Friday, September 28.

There will be an informational meeting for interested seniors Tuesday, September 18 at 7:30 P.M. in Driscoll Lounge.

Editorial Policy

In addition to its job as a College information agency, the Williams Record perceives a role for itself as a forum for ideas of interest to the College community. To this end, we welcome opinions of students, faculty, staff, alumni, and other interested persons. In addition, we shall attempt to stimulate discussion through editorials and solicited commentary on controversial topics as frequently as the imagination of the staff permits.

Editorials, printed in large type on page two, come in one of two formats. If unsigned, they are written by the editor, have been approved by the editorial board (the editor, the executive editor, and the managing editors) and represent the opinion of the Record. Initialed editorials also represent the opinion of the Record and are approved by the editorial board, but are written by an editorial board member other than the editor.

The Record encourages its readers to submit material for publication. Although we will respect all requests to withhold names from publication, we require that all such material be typewritten and signed by the author. We prefer that it be double spaced with fifty characters per line.

The Record reserves the right to refuse to print unsolicited material, the right to respond in an editorial or editor's note, and the right to edit material for length.

Opinions expressed in letters to the editor and viewpoints reflect the opinion of the author, and do not necessarily reflect the opinion of the Record.

Viewpoint: Criticism and decision-making

by Chris DiAngelo

Of the many excellent points which President Chandler made during his convocation address, one in particular deserves to be singled out in respect to the relevance it holds for the College in its less complacent moments. The President, towards the end of his speech, courageously championed the right of the liberal arts students to begin to utilize the critical thinking processes developed at Williams while still a student here. Indeed, Mr. Chandler suggested that meticulous, critical reflection on the nature of the institution and the education it provides should be more than a hobby; it is the duty of the liberally-educated [illegible].

While all may have greeted his remark as being less than a revelation, the fact should not be neglected that this was the College President speaking—the same College President who last year dealt with the most issue-laden year in recent memory at Williams and did so to the dissatisfaction of many of the more critical liberal-arts students' voices. Chandler's remarks serve as an invitation to make the students partners in the decision-making processes, although whether they shall serve as full partners was left ambiguous. That ambiguity is one which is best cleaned up soon, it having never been resolved last academic year.

Perhaps unfortunately, the burden for clarifying this troublesome gray area lays not with the Administration, but with the students. Before the undergraduates are made full partners, we must prove ourselves competent to reason in a sophisticated manner, on topics which are by no means simple. If we are not able to do this, our influence will forever be limited to generating "Advisory Advice to Advise the Advisors to Advise the Trustees" reports, which will be all we deserve.

To have an effect, the students must rely less on moral axioms and the corollaries which appear to follow, and more on proofs, following the arguments, step by step. As students schooled in the liberal arts, we, by and large, are unwilling to accept (and we certainly should be unwilling) propagandizing by our professors, and the suspicion is undoubtedly mutual.

Thus, a serious charge is laid to the students, and obviously it is especially weighty to those chosen to propound the students' voice. The members of the College Council, the various committees, and Gargoyle, must be prepared not so much to act as crusaders, racing into many new issues unprepared, nor as prophets, racing into many new issues unprepared, nor as prophets, racing into a few old issues prepared with poor arguments, but as political optometrists, bringing a few important issues into clear focus.

The chief, indeed only recourse for the students in the wake of President Chandler's sincere challenge is to raise greatly the quality of their arguments. This will demand that such students as those involved in the aforementioned organizations put in grueling hours in a Socratic pursuit of step-by-step, question-and-answer, always-clarifying-but-ever-falling-short, truth. As Russell has said, "There are those who think that clarity, because it is difficult and rare, should be suspect." The complexity of issues, such as the African one, should not deter the liberal-arts student from coming up with answers; answers can and will be found, but the road is long.

Above all, those students not serving in positions of prominence must goad on those who do, serving as critical examiners themselves.

As for the President's end of the bargain, he knows his Russell far better than I know mine. "Sophistication" on the part of the students should not be a synonym for "coming around to the Administration's point of view." Certainly the President knows that, just as he knows that the collective wisdom of twelve jurors surpasses that of a single judge. Some degree of ambiguity will of course always exist; the question is not one of certainty, but of reasonable doubt.

To accuse the Administration of closed-mindedness would, at this time, be premature. Yet many upperclassmen may do so, emerging from the ordeal of last year. Yet, more and more students are becoming aware that our views must be presented in a more rigorous manner than previously. Just as we do not accpet our professors' insights a priori, they should not accept ours. Before full partnership is gained, respect must be earned. President Chandler has thrown to us, as liberal-arts students, an invitation, a challenge. As liberal arts students, it is our duty to accept.

by Peter Rintels

I am not by nature a superstitious person. (To those of you who have seen me burning candles and singing Gregorian Chants before exams, I must insist again that this is related to a treatment for a medical condition and has nothing whatsoever to do with my personal beliefs. I somehow seem to have trouble convincing people of this.) My return to Williams, however, was greeted by what I would like to consider a good omen, certainly an auspicious event, anyway.

What happened was that I opened my SU box without suffering the embarrassment of asking someone for the combination. I walked into the mailroom with some fuzzy numbers dancing around in my head—I believe they were dancing some variation on a waltz, but as I said, things were fuzzy and I'm not positive about this—and hoping that my memory would serve when it came time to dial the combination. Well I am happy to say that my memory served me well indeed, and so I left a big tip.

Since I've gotten back, unfortunately, not everything has been such a bed of roses (or for that matter, burgundies, pinot noirs, or white chablis). Perhaps the most aggravating thing is that I have been asked about a million times now about my summer. A million may be an exaggeration; in matter of fact I was going to try to make an exact count for this piece, but I had to give it up when after a hundred thousand my fingers got too sore.

Fortunately, though, I have this column at my disposal (I'm taking no bets on what other disposals this column will end up at) and in the interest of forestalling still more questions on my summer, I am simply going to offer the details here for anyone to read who cares to.

In some modest apologies at the outset because my memory is a little hazy at times and also because this might get a little boring, but I'm just an average college students, so what do you expect?

Anyway, the summer started out with Outing Club friends of mine and I toying with the idea of hopping a plane to Nepal and doing some mountain climbing. Soon we thought the better of it, though, and decided to fly the plane instead, and then better still to have someone skilled at flying to do it for us. We finally got to Nepal and set hurriedly about to scaling Mount Everest. We camped on the summit for a couple of days, but this quickly got boring as there is not a bar or movie theater within easy walking distance, so we made our way back down. We didn't see any abominable snowmen, although we did see some that were pretty bad. The whole thing was something of a disappointment; not at all like the travel brochure had said. I passed the duller moments by rreading from the complete works of Freud and keeping a journal—the journal of the American Medical Association as it happened, which I have proudly displayed in my room.

After we returned to the relative terra firma of Nepal, we all decided to go our separate ways and I managed to hitch a ride with a Turkish truck driver on his way back from delivering some speeches to the Katmandu Lion's Club. When we got to his home town, he introduced me to the local Sultan, the Sultan Pepper as I recall, who, upon noting that I was the first American in five years to appear before him without an alligator sewn onto my shirt, immediately offered his daughter's hand in marriage. The girl cut quite a striking figure—she was very handy with a paper and scissors—and I was on the verge of accepting the offer when I was warned to decline it by my friend the truck driver. It seems that the Sultan has but one daughter, and has the peculiar habit of offering various parts of her in marriage to people who won his favor. She and some thirty husbands had locally acquired a very bizarre reputation as a result.

Leaving the Sultan Pepper, I made my way to Istanbul where I bid farewell to Turkey, but it wasn't enough and they didn't sell it to me. I left by ship and by some accident of fate it happened to be a troop ship of the French Foreign Legion. (Fate may have done this on purpose. I am not really sure.)

Well, let me tell you what an amusing time I had brushing off my old high school French. It got me into some oddball scrapes, too, such as my agreeing to be inducted when I thought I was picking up the check for some tuna sandwiches.

What was the legion like? Frankly, the routine was very boring. Every night we would stop at a new Mediterranean port, get drunk, tear up a bar, carouse about the red light district and stumble back to the ship around 4:00 a.m. I suppose the price for being in the military is having to put up with these mindless, repetitious activities.

I soon got fed up and said so to my Commandant and partly because of my insistence and partly because, when once requesting a leave pass I had, on account of my bad French, accidentally asked him how come his head was the size of a blueberry, he obliged my desire to leave and ordered me thrown overboard somewhere en route to Algiers.

Luckily, I was soon picked up by a fishing boat heading for Casablanca and once there I quickly found the local youth hostel. To my surprise, I met an old Swedish girlgirlfriend whom I had known in Paris many years ago. We reminisced about old times and I toyed with the idea of trying to get something going again, but she had a boyfriend and, well, it was a touching scene when I had to bid them both goodbye. As a consolation, though, I think I started a beautiful friendship there.

After some time, or possibly before—I have trouble with the sequence of events here—we landed in Florida and I hitchhiked back up to Williams.

That, then is the story of my summer as best as I can remember, and I hope everyone will think better of asking me about it from here on.

Audette Exhibit

A small exhibition of nine drawings and one lithograph by Anna Held Audette recently opened at the Clark. Audette, Associate Professor of Art at Southern Connecticut State College, spent ten months in Egypt in 1977, during which time she produced the works now on view. A Smith graduate, Mrs. Audette holds an M.F.A. from Yale and has been with Southern Connecticut State College since 1964. She is represented in a number of public and private collections, including the Rosenwald Collection at the National Gallery of Art, Yale University, Mount Holyoke College, and the Print Room at the Rijksmuseum in Amsterdam. She has had several solo exhibitions, including one in Alexandria, Egypt, and has participated in more than fifty group shows.

The exhibition will be on view in Gallery 7 until October 15 during the regular open hours of the Institute, Tuesday through Sunday, 19:00-5:00.

Tissot Tour

The complete prints by the French nineteenth-century artist James-Jacques-Joseph Tissot are currently on view at the Clark. Before the exhibition closes on September 17, two public tours by the Institute's Curator of Prints and Drawings, Rafael Fernandez, have been scheduled:

Wednesday, September 13, at 3:00 and Saturday, September 16, at 3:00.

Reasons for the different states of various etchings, the background from which Tissot worked, his romantic and colorful life, and the sometimes intriguing meaning of some of the prints will be discussed.

The Tissot exhibition has over one hundred etchings, along with a number of Tissot's paintings and drawings, loans primarily from New England collections. The two tours will be free and open to the public.

CFM Announces Fall Schedule

With a tight budget and an unfilled need for new equipment, WCFM returned to broadcasting last week, and general manager John Svoboda announced fall program changes.

"Given the present condition of our equipment, we should have reduced our operating hours significantly to decrease the chances of a major technical casualty," Svoboda remarked. However, given the scope of events and music that WCFM feels obligated to broadcast, we would rather risk shutting down at some point to drastically reduce what we feel is valuable programming."

WCFM's 2 a.m. weekday schedule continues with programming beginning at 10 a.m. Saturdays and noon Sundays.

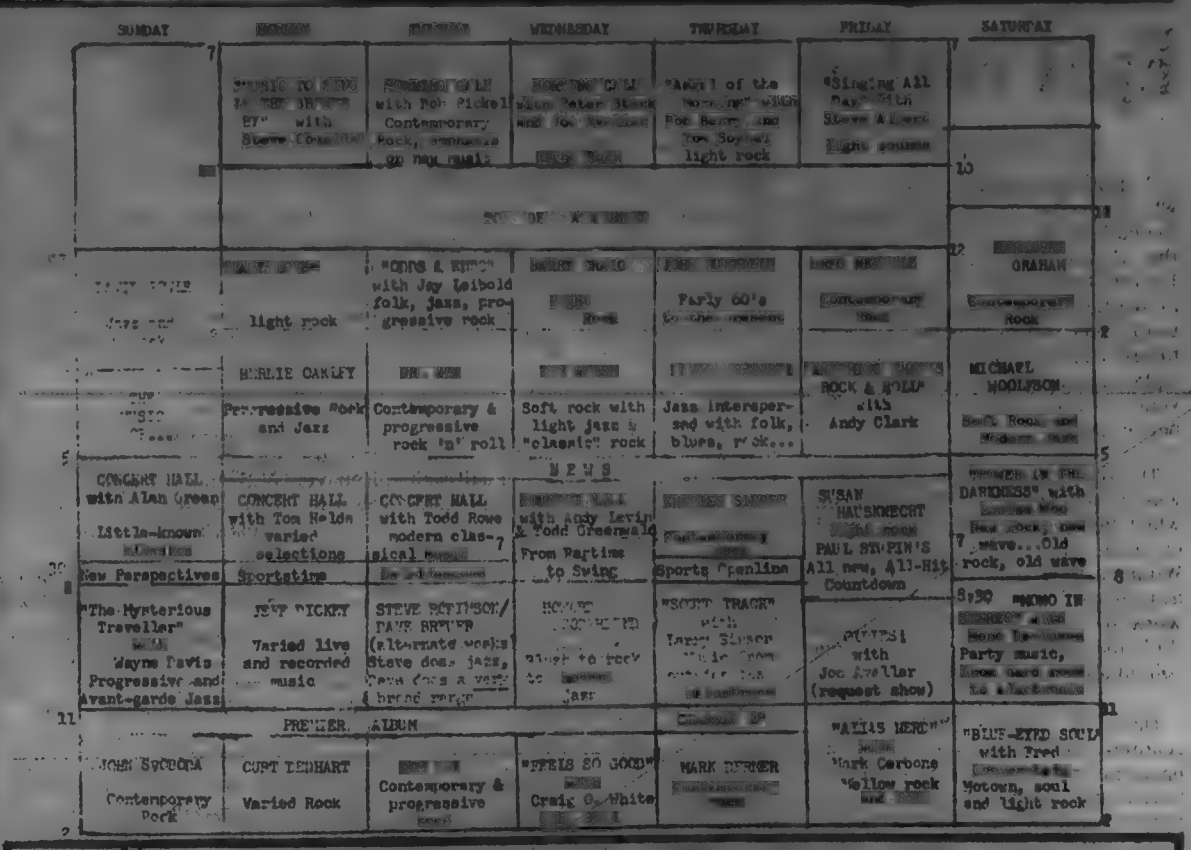
The station may be off the air during this schedule from 10:00 a.m. until noon on some weekdays to allow more training time for the large number of persons enrolled in the station's D. J. training program.

News will continue to be a focal point for the station. "News View 92" will be composed of two fifteen minute segments. The first will focus on national, international and commonwealth news while the second portion will be devoted to community affairs. A recap of the days major events will be broadcast at 10:50 p.m. every weekday.

Sports will be given increased attention this semester. "Sports Open-Line" plays Thursday from 7:30 to 8 p.m. Questions from the public will be fielded by a panel of experts from the station, campus and local sportswriters.

"Sportstime" moves to Monday evenings at 7:30 and will focus on what's happening on the Williams athletic scene. In addition to complete coverage of all home and away football games, morning and evening sports summaries will follow the 9:15 a.m. ABC News and the 10:50 p.m. nightly newscap.

Musically, WCFM will strive to bring a blend of rock, jazz, country, soul and classical music to its listeners. The Concert Hall series will provide classical music enthusiasts with four evenings of entertainment following the nightly news.



For those whose interest lies in more contemporary music, "The Music Of," a weekly special on a particular group or artist, will again be presented on Sunday afternoons. "The Premiere Album" will be presented Sunday through Wednesday at 11 p.m. as significant new releases will be featured in their entirety. Thursday nights at 11 one can enjoy the "Classic LP," an album which can be regarded as a landmark in modern music history.

Special programming will include "New Perspectives," a series focusing on current trends, issues and topics which will run on Sunday evenings at 7:30.

"Kaleidoscope" premieres on Tuesday evening as Craig White explores alternative perspectives to current domestic issues. Wednesday evenings, Whiteman Collection caretaker Karl Johnson presents "From Ragtime to Swing" which explores the roots of America's middle twentieth century music history.

Other projects include a daily entertainment review, time capsules on developments in the music world, foreign language serials, interviews with community action groups and possibly a sports trivia show.

"Our technical and financial troubles will give a few of us a lot of headaches," Svoboda said. "However we are fortunate to have a large number of dedicated and enthusiastic members who I feel will ensure that our programming remains top-notch."

Ephs control Hofstra in scrimmage

by Mary Kate Shea

A good-sized crowd turned out for what proved to be a fine afternoon of football as Williams College hosted the Flying Dutchmen of Hofstra University in a scrimmage Saturday at Weston Field. If pre-season action is any indication of what is to come in future contests, it appears that the Ephs could very well repeat last year's Little Three championship performance.

The first part of Saturday's action was a controlled scrimmage during which the Ephs were extremely tough on both offense and defense. As Williams head coach Bob Odell had anticipated, his squad's defense worked well together, even as Williams experimented with different combinations of players.

The Eph defense held Hofstra scoreless all afternoon and allowed its opponents no real long-yardage gains. Sacks were registered by linebackers Brian Benedict and Phil Shuman, tackle Jeff Desmond, defensive back Tom Hobert, and guard Bruce Kneur. For Williams, Bill Skelly and Donald Rice snagged an interception apiece.

For the Williams offense the scrimmage provided an excellent opportunity for experimentation with various combinations of players in the backfield and also gave a chance for the Eph coaches to see three of the four players vying for the quarterback spot. Sophomores Bob Lutz, Tim Connelly and Kevin Hinchey took turns running sets of plays during the controlled portion of the scrimmage. Fellow classmate Bob Stackpole was on the sidelines with an injury.

Williams scored early in the controlled part of the scrimmage on two well-executed pass plays. Lutz completed a 20-yard pass to halfback Greg Collins, who ran the remaining distance for the score. Under excellent protection from the offensive line, Lutz connected again during the same set of plays, this time hitting co-captain Ken Hollingsworth with a 25-yard touchdown toss.

The remainder of the controlled half of the scrimmage saw some fine running by halfback Dave Massucco and fullback John Dell'Erario.

During the second half, which was played under actual game conditions, the Ephs outscored the Flying Dutchmen 2-0.

Williams' first points of the half came on a touchback, the result of a strong rush by the defensive line. The touchback was the culmination of a fine afternoon for the Ephs' defensive line, as it fended off a much bigger and heavier Hofstra line to get to the opponent's quarterback.

The final scoring of the afternoon was the product of a drive led by quarterback Lutz. Once again, good protection allowed Lutz time to throw and he completed back-to-back passes before hitting freshman Barry Johnson for the touchdown.

The Ephs, who were 5-3 last season under coach Bob Odell, will take on Dartmouth on a scrimmage at Hanover, N.H. next Saturday before opening their season with a home contest against Hamilton on Sept. 23.

Williams gridders tackled the Hofstra Flying Dutchmen 8-0 in a preseason scrimmage at Weston Field.

Golfers Anticipate Driving Season

As summer fades into autumn and those hot muggy nights become cool and crisp, the stage is set for the return of the awesome, steel-willed Williams College Golf Team. With only one letterman missing from last year's squad, the team with the best winning percentage in Williams College history looks hungrily towards an undefeated season.

Leading the team onto the fairways of battle will be co-captains Dan Katz and Bill Upton. Upton finished second in the pre-season qualifying. After a fine summer of golf highlighted by a 69 at Yale, Dan Katz is expected to have a good year. The only question mark is the baffling disappearance of his once safecracker-like nerves on the putting green.

To borrow a phrase from Phil Rizzuot, "Holy Cow, Ed 'Big' Bousa is back." Big fired stunning rounds of 76-73 to wipe out all opposition in the qualifying. Embarking on what seemed to be a maniacal drive toward self-immolation, Young Bill Sprague, 1977 Williams College Golf Champion, clawed his way back to reality with some amazing putting pyrotechnics.

The long-awaited return of senior Mike Lynch seems at hand. His sturdy left arm has easily conquered the front-side of the ever-so-challenging Taconic Golf Club.

Marcel Oudin, 1974 Canadian Junior Champion from Cape au Breton, Quebec, built so many positive success patterns this summer that he qualified in spite of himself.

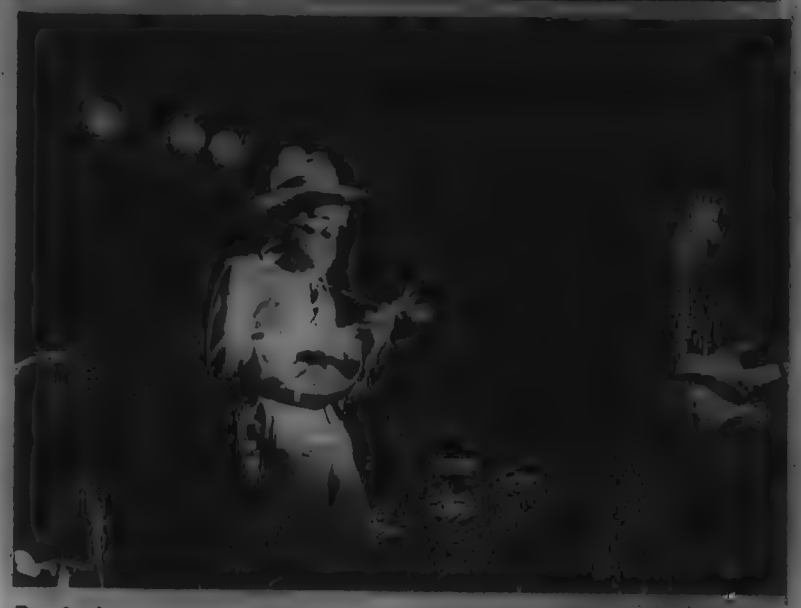
ACEC unable to use Chapin

by Tim Jones

The All-College Entertainment Committee finds itself in "an awkward situation this year," according to Chairman Steve Case '80. The Committee's concert options for 1978-79 have been sharply curtailed by limitations in facilities and funding. Case does anticipate four major concert events during this semester however.



Over the summer, the College Administration decided to ban ACEC rock concerts in Chapin Hall. Case says that he agrees with the decision in principle. In view of the damage to seating that occurred at the Pousette-Dart Band - Pure Prairie League Concert last spring," "I think they're right. No major concerts belong in that fragile building."

Case explained that his organization has conditional permission to use the Towne Field House and the Chapman Rink for concerts. He observed, however, that the Field House holds fewer persons than Chapin Hall and the skating rink will already be iced over by Homecoming Weekend in early November.

The ACEC plans to present four concerts this fall; tentatively scheduled for October 5, October 18, November 3—and one in early December at the close of classes. Case explained that the October 5th date is already in jeopardy because the Athletic Department has not yet granted him permission to use the skating rink on weekdays and the ACEC has been unable to locate a major group willing to perform at Williams on a weekend.

In spite of the College's restrictions on Chapin, Case does not foresee an increased number of jazz concerts this year. He cited last year's campus music preference survey which placed jazz fourth behind light rock, rock, and folk as one reason for not booking more jazz performances.

As for funding, Case finds little cause for optimism. The Finance Committee, in line with its goal of holding the Student Activities Tax constant, will not allocate the ACEC more than the $15,500 it received last year. At present, the Finance Committee has agreed only to supply funds for the October 18 jazz concert. No more money will be channeled to the ACEC until other groups can be contracted, which in turn hinges on Case's ability to locate adequate concert facilities on campus. Case says he is being forced to "play a wait-and-see game while time is running out."

Due to damage which occurred at the Pousette Dart Band - Pure Prairie League, Chapin Hall will not be available for future use for the ACEC.

WSP review group reports to faculty

Unless significant changes are made in the current Winter Study Program, a "substantial" number of professors would favor its abolition, Winter Study Review Committee Chairman William Grant told the faculty Wednesday afternoon.

Grant and the rest of his committee have conducted personal one-on-one interviews with 169 faculty members and four others associated with the Program since the Winter Study Review was commissioned last year. From comments made during the interviews the committee selected a number of basic individual viewpoints, then classified the results of the entire survey under these viewpoints. Grant explained that those opinions which were favored by 40 or more of the 173 respondents were qualified as "substantially" backed; those with 15-39 adherents were "moderate" and those with fewer than 15 received "slight" agreement.

A substantial number of the faculty agreed that the benefits of the Winter Study Program lie in its opportunities to explore new areas of academia, delve more deeply into single areas of concern and its timely change of pace. There was moderate agreement that independent study opportunities, additional free time for social and cultural activities and extended contact between students and professors were other beneficial aspects of Winter Study.

Drawbacks cited by a substantial number of the faculty revolved around the lack of academic rigor in Winter Study. Grant remarked that interviewees expressed their concern that, as student commitment waned, so did faculty involvement. A moderate number indicated that Winter Study left little time for faculty to prepare for their spring courses and tended, in its non-academic orientation, to undermine the standards of the regular semesters.

Although a moderate number of professors favored no change in the Winter Study Program while a substantial number felt that abolition might be necessary, Grant explained that the faculty was "not as polarized on this issue as it seemed to be." "All those who suggested one or the other did so conditionally," he noted. Among suggestions to improve Winter Study were institution of higher grading standards, making course offerings more rigorous and reducing faculty teaching loads.

"The committee has no preconceptions as to what recommendation it will make in the end," Grant commented. "Idle speculation on the matter would not be useful."

Grant went on to report on a poll his committee conducted among the graduating seniors last June. Although only 169 responded, Grant said he felt sure that the percentage proportions would have remained the same in a larger sample. Sixty per cent felt that Winter Study was a positive and major part of their Williams education. Thirty per cent felt the program was a positive but minor contribution. Forty-five per cent of the respondents indicated that the January term was not intense enough academically, while 34 per cent acknowledged this but did not feel it was a drawback.

"Students also perceived that Winter Study became progressively more difficult," Grant said. He speculated that this attitude was evidence of a growing intellectual maturity associated with Winter Study.

The student survey also revealed that Winter Study might possibly be of more value to students if two or three, rather than four, projects were required for graduation. Fewer students felt that grading projects would improve the quality of winter study, while an even smaller number favored abolition of the program.

Georges Pistorius, chairman of the Winter Study Committee, reported that last year 19 per cent of Williams students opted for their own special "99" projects during Winter Study. "There is concern," he said, "that perhaps departments are sponsoring student proposals much too readily." He cautioned against this.

In other Faculty business, Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor gave a progress report on the College's efforts to make its buildings more accessible to handicapped students. Along with Treasurer Francis Dewey, O'Connor has conducted a study of the physical plant, housing, and student services at Williams. Six Handicapped freshmen could be accommodated in Lehman Hall, while upperclassmen could choose from among Bryant, Wood and Garfield houses.

Plans to refurbish elevators in the science buildings and other adjustments in classroom facilities must be completed by June of 1980, according to O'Connor. He also said that although Williams has dealt with only 7 handicapped students in the last ten years, all of whom were blind, it remained Williams' responsibility to "fit any handicapped students into the mainstream of college life."

President of the College John W. Chandler announced that Williams received 200 applications for the newly instituted position of Affirmative Action & Government Relations Officer. John Stambaugh, chairman of the committee which has interviewed applicants, told the faculty that he expects the College to hire one of the four finalists in a short time. The Affirmative Action Officer will aid departmental chairmen and non-academic departments in interpreting current hiring practice and other government laws "regularly affecting the way we operate," Stambaugh explained.

O'Connor, Chandler hold walk-in hours

President John Chandler and Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor announced today that they will be available to students on a walk-in basis one day each week, in addition to their usual appointment hours.

Chandler will be available to students without an appointment on Tuesdays from 3:30 to 4:30. O'Connor will be available from 4:30 to 5:30 Thursdays. Both will continue to see students by appointment also, and at other times without appointment as their schedules permit.

O'Connor described the walk-in hours as "an attempt to be more accessible to students, and especially to those who would be reluctant to make a formal appointment." He emphasized that students should still feel free to make appointments to see Chandler and him at other times.

Now introducing . . .

President John Chandler announced the appointment of 20 men and 16 women to full-time and part-time faculty, staff, and administrative positions for 1978-79.

Campus phones are disconnected

Some one hundred students have been without telephone service since the start of school, despite the assurance in the student directory that "phones will be turned on in all locations during the day of Friday, September 1." Service should be instated sometime today.

Mrs. Charlotte Marlowe, coordinator of the student telephone service, said that there have been a variety of problems. Some telephones can call out, but cannot receive. Some can take incoming calls, but will not call out. Many just sit, totally inoperative. Some have never worked, but many worked normally for a few days and then stopped.

College business manager Shane Riorden observed that New England Telephone usually gives very good service and was at a loss to explain the problem. He said it was possible that students who have been without service would receive partial room [illegible]. Each student pays about $25 a year for telephones. He asked that students keep a careful record of the time their telephones were in and out of service.

Mrs. Charlotte Marlowe, hard at work, attempting to restore adequate phone service to the isolated Williams College community.

Although many areas of the campus have been affected, Currier, Fitch and Garfield hamlets seem to have been hit the hardest. In Garfield, where renovations last year created a number of new rooms, New England Telephone assigned the numbers, but apparently forgot to install the new lines.

Marlowe blames the slow service on increased mechanization. Machinery has replaced so many people that the telephone company has closed its North Adams service center. New England Bell has left only two men in North Adams to handle the territory between Great Barrington, Vermont, and Pittsfield.

Once a week

The Williams Record's editorial board concluded eight months of debate this week by deciding to initiate an experiment in weekly publication. Until at least fall break, the Record will discontinue the Friday issue. Although there are drawbacks inherent in the less frequent appearance, we have unanimously decided that the benefits far outweighed potential problems and that weekly publication deserved a trial.

The most obvious reason for the switch is Williams' environment. Each Record chronicles about four days of campus life. Not infrequently, nothing of great import happens. We print an issue anyway. When that occurs, the resulting four page issue probably was not worth printing. The new weekly format will enable us to combine a skimpy issue with a fuller one several days later, producing a substantial issue of the Williams Record.

The drawback, of course, is that the information that would have appeared in the earlier issue will be out of date when it appears. We can balance that, however, with more thorough analysis, and copyediting. And when the department editors spend more time working on articles with their reporters, the quality of writing improves. Of great importance to the staff, if not to our readers, is that the change will free Wednesday night. Production takes from 4 p.m. to anywhere from midnight to 3 a.m. Discontinuance of the mid-week deadline will allow staffers to study and sleep on Wednesdays, and leave them less bleary-eyed on Thursday mornings and afternoons.

Although less frequent, the Record will not reduce its coverage of events at Williams College. We intend to devote the same amount of space to College activities. Instead of, for instance, two short articles about a college council meeting, the extended time will permit one comprehensive article to include follow-ups, interviews, and analysis of its effects on the College community.

We are excited about the new Williams Record. We have some surprises for the next issue and would appreciate your reactions to the changes.

Course Guide

The student course guide has had an unfortunate history. Some faculty accused the first edition of libel, which led to its premature disappearance. Future editions either came out too late, reviewed too few courses or culled too low a response to be useful. Successvie failures led to fewer responses and poorer guides.

The new course guide committee under the direction of Rick Moog '79 threatens to reverse this unfortunate trend. In its first move this fall, the committee published a freshman edition covering most of the 100-level courses. It is timely and complete, an impressive change from the past.

If this group continues to provide useful information at critical times it may be able to establish itself as a credible committee and command student interest and support.

The course guide should and could be a valuable asset to the students. It could be a reliable guide to good courses and the most effective faculty members. It could give an accurate reading of student opinion on faculty reappointment decisions and lend students an authoritative voice we have long lacked. Maybe this year it will.

The committee has overcome the inertia that thwarted its predecessors. We hope that it can keep its momentum and provide a precise, accurate guide to student opinion on the courses of study at Williams.

Letters

Alums react

To the Editor:

President Chandler, in "It's Been This Kind of Year," (Alumni Review, Summer 1978), argues that non-economic concerns should not be introduced into the college's investment policy. We believe his argument falls short of Williams' commitment to principle and rigor.

The first part of President Chandler's position is this: The college's mission is education, "a pre-eminent social good." Pursuing that mission requires money. Any college activity which jeopardizes its financial security, specifically its investment returns, puts at risk the institution's viability and consequently its educational mission.

Here President Chandler appears to say that the existence of the college is an end in itself, to be preserved even at the expense of its vision of personal and social good. "To subject that objective (provision of financial means) to any other goals, no matter how worthy, would be to jeopardize an institution's future." (Our italics.)

Such logic translates into scenarios President Chandler would never accept:

1. Williams fires a highly respected economist because a powerful group of contributors objects to his or her theoretical analyses and threatens economic consequences if he or she is given tenure.

2. Williams fires a successful black in the college administration because a generous, racist contributor threatens to change his or her will regarding the college.

Further, President Chandler contradicts his own charge to the graduates at the Baccalaureate service. His remarks in that context stress the importance of principle. He speaks about "enterprises and goals that transcend your private self-interest," "a sense of purpose and greatness in which the quality of civilization will not be subordinate to the magnificence of power," and "a respect for all life, and a reverence for those forces upon which we draw for all truth, goodness and beauty."

President Chandler is disconcertingly fuzzy about the difference between principle and expediency. Equating the college's existence with its moral foundation is a case of losing its soul to gain the world.

There is a second part of President Chandler's argument: The college has a responsibility to support the free interplay of "information, ideas and opinions," while refusing to support any particular political interest. A moral judgment about the college's investments is a political point of view that the college should talk about, but not act on as an institution. He writes, ". . . a line has to be drawn between accommodating the political activities of groups within the college community and the use of the college itself as an instrument to serve the goals of any particular group."

As it stands, this argument is misleading. Many of the college's most important policies come down on one side or another in the political arena. If there was a debate on campus over white supremacy, would the college abandon its support of racial equality to avoid taking sides? If there was a debate on campus about the value of fascism, would the college abandon its liberal arts curriculum because it is prejudiced against militarism, nationalism and authoritarianism? Of course not. The college is not apologetic about serving the interests of racial equality and democracy.

President Chandler must acknowledge that the college does take sides on issues involving principle and must state the specific reasons for its decisions regarding investment policy. It would be more honest for him to say, for example 1) the college supports racial equality and justice for all races 2) the college believes South Africa's racial policies are immoral, 3) however the college does not believe the impact on South Africa of changing the investment policy is worth the financial risk and/or the difficulty of subjecting the investment policy to principled discussion.

It must be said that the college can reasonably remain silent as an institution, when there is debate about the best way to achieve a commonly accepted goal. It is often hard to know where to draw the line, but the college must address that problem when touched by the issue.)

Our points, in summary, are these:

1. Education at Williams exists to promote a vision of personal and social life. That vision is more important than Williams. To promote the institution at the expense of the vision is to betray Williams' central values.

2. The fact that Williams makes administrative and curricular choices with impact or implications in the political arena should not be hidden. A school that prides itself on free expression of information, ideas and opinions has a responsibility to be honest about the choices it makes.

Finally, we are surprised by President Chandler. On the one hand, there are sinister implications in his comments. Deception sloganeering and refusal to confront basic issues are repressive and the antithesis of liberal arts education. On the other hand, we have always heard the highest and most generous praise of President Chandler. We associate him with the best about Williams, and believe "the best" is impressive. We hope he takes a more forthright approach to an issue that deserves principled and rigorous treatment.

Writing problem

To the Editor:

Never known as a department particularly interested in the practice of using the language, the English Department has again made its writing courses an exclusive pleasure of select upperclassmen. The Writing of Fiction, taught this year by a new professor Richard Ford had at least thirty subscribers of which 15 gained admission. The Writing of Poetry, offered by Professor Larry Raab was equally oversubscribed.

There just wasn't any room. But why not? Every year eager minds with restless pens beg to do some writing and every year the English Department offers a bare minimum of courses and with lukewarm enthusiasm. In an institution supposedly wedded to literature, committed to articulation and constantly bemoaning student writing ability, this is a serious failure if not a crippling complaint. Perhaps we should take only expository writing boneheads our way to boneheaded papers? Isn't there a place for whimsy at Williams, nay, even imagination? If there are artists in our midst, shouldn't they be given room to survive and to read.

Peter Anderson

Phone books

To the editor of the Record:

I would like to extend my appreciation to the genius who thought of the one-piece folder cover design for this year's phone book. No more will I have to bear the frustration of the shrinking directory phenomenon, as first the cover sheet and then the interior pages peel off and disappear one by one.

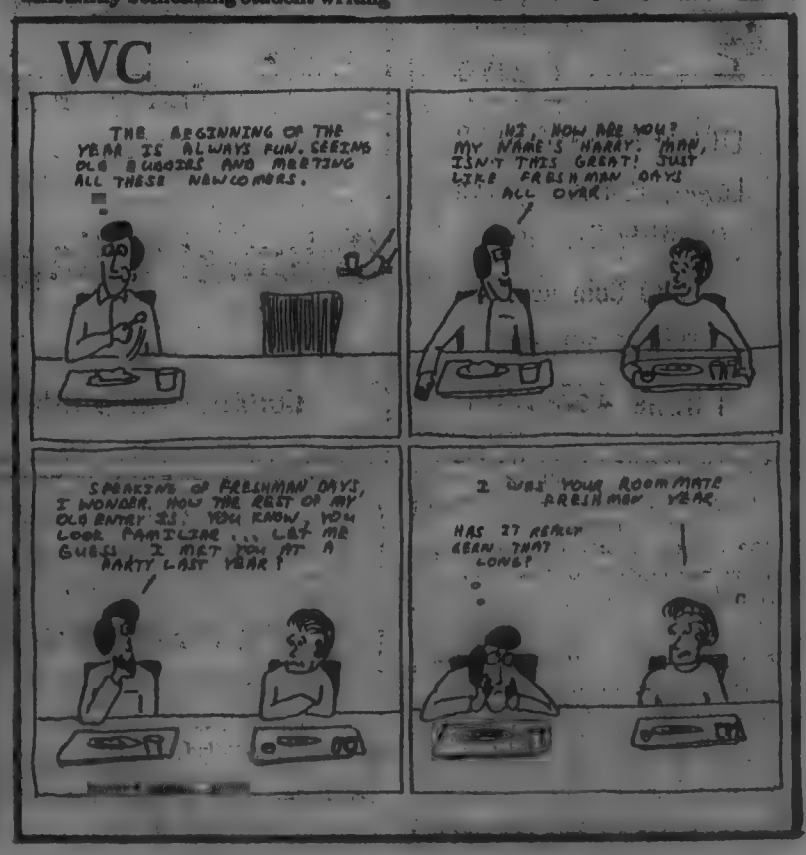
Log may reduce hoursdue to noise

The Williamstown selectmen debated midnight closing hours for Spring Street drinking establishments and relocation of the Log as possible solutions to the late evening noise problem on Spring Street.



The selectmen took no action regarding the Log at their meeting Monday, but asked the College to consider alternative ways to relieve the noise problem.

According to Log manager Mike Masi '78, College President John Chandler will propose to the town that the Log close at 12 a.m. If accepted, this would not go into effect until next week, however.

According to the Transcript, Williamstown Police chief Joseph Zoito recommended that all drinking establishments on Spring Street close at midnight on weekdays, relocation of the Log to the north of Route 2, closing of the Log at 11 p.m., an open container law, and a provision which would keep noise producing establishments from keeping their doors open to the street late at night.

Zoito conceded that noise problems continue during the summer, which are caused by townspeople, but attributed the majority of fall and winter complaints to the Log.

Operators of other drinking establishments did not object to the earlier closing hours, but were concerned that if the Log closed earlier than they did, they might face a rapid inflow of students immediately after the Log closed, straining their capacity.

These are just a few of the people you'll be likely to meet if you go to the Rocky Horror Picture Show tonight or tomorrow.

Rocky audiences whirl in eccentricity, hilarity

by Gerald Carney

The Rocky Horror Picture Show, the popular cult film, will once again devastate Images Cinema. Rocky Horror is a fascinating combination of camp, parody, pseudo-horror, and punk rock. It is quite funny most of the time, horris at others. But the real story of Rocky is not really the film itself, but the audience.

There are two scripts in Rocky Horror: the one acted out in the film and the one performed by the audience. The latter is by far the funnier of two. The audience must dress like punks and-or transvestites, talk to the characters, sing, light matches, and throw toast, rice, toilet paper and water (to name a few) in order that Rocky be fully appreciated. Images, for some strange reason, encourages such anti-social, pro-Rocky behavior.

The movie tells the story of a wild night in the castle of Dr. Frank N. Furter. Fiancees Brad and Janet inadvertently come to Frank's abode and meet the odd, incestuous siblings Riff-Raff and Magenta, the Time Warp Dancers, and Rocky Horror, whose vocabulary is limited to "Ugh!" There are many songs in the film, few of which are memorable.

Tim Curry is brilliant as Frank. His performance is a curious blend of Kiss, the Sex Pistols, and others. Meatloaf makes a brief appearance to do one song, and he is his usual, omnipresent, electrifying self. Barry Bostwick, as Brad, is a hole; Susan Sarandon, as Janet, smiles often. Charles Gray is boring as a criminologist who cannot solve the mystery of why he has no neck.

The Rocky Horror Show will be shown tonight and tomorrow night at 11:15. It is worthwhile for all to go see it; even if you do not like it, at least you will see the future of this country.

Support group opens center

by Fred Tays

"Universality" is a good word to use to explain the reason for the Student Support Group. The organization opened its center last year out of a belief that students can often best relate to the problems of other students. There is a certain universality to the concerns of many Williams students.

The group was formed last year to fill a gap in counseling services at Williams. Although many services were already available the group's founders felt that it was important to offer students a counseling service for non-health-related problems. They wanted to remove the stigma many people attach to a visit to a "counselor" such as a psychiatrist, while providing a more objective ear than a friend might be able to give. They wanted to offer students a group of supportive peers to whom they could turn.

The group counselors are not psychoanalysts and rarely provide answers. They believe in helping people come to their own conclusions. Although there is often a common element in the problems of students, the group seems to particularly insist on the listening skills of its counselors in order to preclude quick answers. This philosophy came out when the group participated in the orientation of Junior Advisors earlier this month.

Although each counselor deals with students on a one-to-one basis, the Student Support Group is not a mere agglomeration of counselors. A fundamental part of the group's purpose is to be exactly what it name implies. The counselors meet in mutual support groups on a regular basis. Without violating confidentiality they share insights in the hope of strengthening each other as individuals.

In addition to providing counseling services, the group will offer discussions on topics such as academic and peer pressure.

Although the group hopes to make students informed of possibilities for more formal counseling training and encourages its members to take advantage of these, its own requirements are not too formal. Each counselor must come to two role-playing sessions before starting and must be willing to try participating in a mutual support group. The present members seem most interested however in finding dedicated and sensitive people to form what will be this year's Student Support Group.

Purple Gridders face Big Green

by Mary Kate Sacs

Defending Little Three champions Williams College will take on the Big Green of Dartmouth College this Saturday in a scrimmage at Dartmouth's Memorial Field.

After a strong performance in a scrimmage against Hofstra last week, coach Bob Odell's squad is anxious to test itself against tough competition.

Although the Williams coaching staff was pleased with the team's play in the Hofstra scrimmage, Odell is certain that "Dartmouth will be tougher . . . We played pretty well against Hofstra considering it was our first scrimmage of the year," says Odell, "but we still have a long way to go before the start of the regular season." (Hamilton on Sept. 23)

Odell says the Eph defensive secondary will get a good workout on Saturday, since Dartmouth advertises itself as a team that prefers an aerial to a running attack. According to Dartmouth head coach Joe Yukica, his quarterback, Buddy Teevens, "has a fine throwing arm, and we plan to make use of it." It should be a good test for the defensive backfield led by standout Greg McAleenan.

In contrast to the Big Green's passing game, Williams will rely heavily on a ground attack led by junior fullback Gus Nuzzolese and halfbacks Dave Massucco, and Greg Collins. When an Eph quarterback takes to the air, he will most likely have Collins or co-captain Ken Hollingsworth as his target.

Sophomore Bob Luts, who threw three touchdown passes last week, will see most of the action at the QB spot for Williams. Backing him up will be sophomores Tim Connelly and Bob Stackpole.

Beyond any question the biggest thing that separates the two teams is size. "We have maybe a team-and-a-half," says Odell. "Our starters can probably hold their own. But we don't have anywhere near the depth of Dartmouth. It could go badly on us if we have to keep the top guys in while they shuttle fresh players back and forth . . . And we can't afford injuries."

The scrimmage will bring back memories of the old days of football at Williams for long time fans. Fifty years ago regular-season opponents included Columbia, Providence and Princeton. And 75 years ago the schedule was mostly Ivy League, schools such as Harvard, Columbia, Dartmouth and Brown. The realities of modern-day football have changed the schedules, although there are humorists who still suggest that it was the Ivy League which broke away from the Little Three.

After facing the Big Green at Hanover this Saturday, Williams will continue practicing in preparation for its season opener at home against Hamilton on Sept. 23.

Fall Sports Preview

X-country

The Williams cross country team shoots for its third undefeated season in the last four years and its ninth straight Little Three title for coach Tony Plansky, but the task will have to be accomplished without the services of three of last season's top runners. The 1977 Eph team finished the dual meet season with a perfect 12-0 record and captured third-place in the Easterns.

Graduation has taken a heavy toll on the Eph harriers, but Plansky's squad still has a core of fine runners returning for the 1978 season. 1977 captain Dan Sullivan and All-East, NESCAC All-Star selections Frank Carr and Joe Kolb will be notable absences as Plansky goes after his 19th career Little Three championship.

Senior Tom Schreck, an All-East and NESCAC All-Star team member, as well as a consistent top-two finisher among Williams runners during the 1977 season, will lead the Ephs.

The other co-captain, Steve Polansky who spent his junior year running rugged English cross country, will be hot on his trail along with junior Mike Behrman (All East last year).

Sophomores Phil Darrow (4:14 miler last year) John McCammond, and Pat Dobson along with other veterans and freshman talent will help the team on its chase for another winning season.

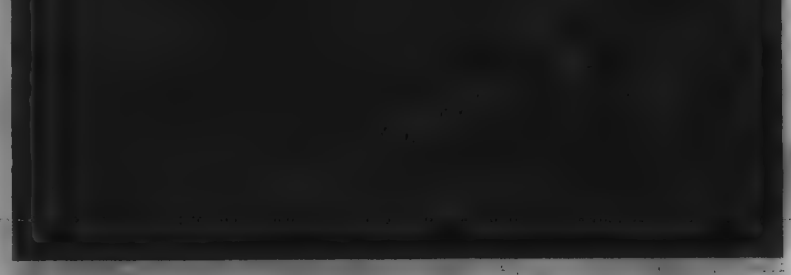
Trudie tenBroeke smashes a backhand versus Springfield.

Tennis

During the 1977 season, coach Curt Tong's women's tennis team posted an 8-4 season record, captured the Little Three title with convincing wins over Wesleyan (9-0) and Amherst (8-1), and capped the season with an eighth-place out of 46 teams competing in the New England Women's Tennis Tournament.

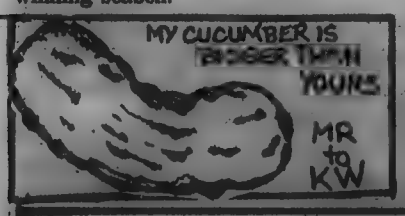
Last year's captain, Laura Carson, will be missed at the number one singles spot but there is a wealth of young talent available for Tong to work with. Key returning players include senior Amy Demorest and juniors Becky Chase and Trudie TenBroeke. Other 1977 team members, a year older and a year more experienced, are back again and Tong expects that singles players Anne Morris and Laura Goebel, along with the doubles team of Kristan Dale and Mary Tom Higgs (10-1 last season), will once again play a major role in determining the team's success.

Field Hockey



Field hockey Coach Linda Wilkins' squad has a tough act to follow if it hopes to better last year's fine 6-2-1 record. Lost from the 1977 team are six seniors and exchange student Sue Wright, who has returned to Wellesley after her year at Williams.

Despite the graduations, Wilkins has every reason to expect another solid season and perhaps a second consecutive Little Three title. The nucleus of the Eph attack that outscored its opponents by a 29-16 margin during a nine-game season returns in junior Monica Grady (12 goals, 1 assist) and senior Sally Kraft (7 goals, 3 assists).



The Williams midfield is virtually intact as captain Leslie Milne and senior Dawn Bedrosian will anchor two of the three halfback spots. Milne, who was selected as a member of the U.S. field hockey team during the summer, gives the Ephs excellent stick handling at midfield and provides a smooth link between the squad's forwards and defensemen.

Junior Lee Ash, a veteran varsity player, will be the backbone of the Eph defense.

In addition to the returning players, Wilkins has an abundant supply of talent at her command from last year's 8-1 junior varsity team.

Leslie Milne goes for a scoop backed by Lee Ash.

College agrees to sell Mount Hope

by Dave MacGregor

The College has agreed to sell the Mount Hope Farm property to a Missouri couple for use as a residence and occasional corporate headquarters. The transaction will close in late November, President John Chandler announced yesterday.

The purchasers, Mr. and Mrs. August Eugene Mansker of Macon, Missouri, intend to use the property primarily as a private residence, and secondarily as headquarters of their nationwide chain of health clubs. The property would house occasional conferences and sales meetings of employees.

The Manskers also will retain the open land for grazing cattle, buffalo, beefalo, elk, Texas longhorns, Japanese deer and Scottish Highlander cattle.

According to Treasurer Francis Dewey III, the Manskers may allow the College to continue to use the Elm Tree House for meetings if scheduling can be worked out.

The sale is "not a financial bonanza," said Chandler, who would not reveal the price at the request of the Manskers. "When the non-financial benefits of owning the farm are considered, however, the experience of owning the farm has been beneficial to the College.

The sale price, which the Manskers will pay in installments, will not change the College's income position substantially, said Chandler. The College's annual income from gifts is about $5 million. Any changes in the College budget to reflect the elimination of the annual $100,000 operating loss incurred by Mount Hope will be made this Fall. Chandler could not predict what changes might be made.

The sales agreement calls for the College to seek any necessary variances from the town of Williamstown to permit the Manskers to use the Mount Hope property as a corporate headquarters. Chandler did not expect this provision to be a problem.

The Manskers have agreed not to permit the construction of residences or of commercial or industrial buildings on the property. They have further agreed not to sell parcels of the property of less than 5 acres, and any property sold would not total more than 100 acres. The College would have the right of first refusal on any future sale of any or all of the property.

The current offer, said Dewey, is consistent with the recommendations of the 1974 Mount Hope Study Committee Report. The report recommended that, if the annual $100,000 operating loss incurred by Mount Hope since its acquisition could not be reduced, the College should seek other options for disposal of the property, including sale to a purchaser whose uses of the property would be consistent with the College's guidelines for the desirable use of the property. The 1974 report set as guidelines for use the preservation of "the general character of the area, the scenic vistas, the open agricultural land, and the low population density of the Mount Hope area."

According to Dewey, "It has always been our intention to dispose of Mount Hope when a purchaser could be found

WCFM needs money, seeks funds

by Tim Jones

"The College Council has been unable to afford WCFM for the last five years," Don Perry '79, the station's business manager revealed during a recent interview. For this reason, the College's FM station, which is heavily in debt, plans to kick off a $45,000 fund drive this fall.

WCFM's fund drive will be aimed at two specific sources of potential donations: the alumni of the College and several corporations and foundations. According to the station's president John Svoboda '79, a meeting has been arranged for late September with Robert Kaufmann, Assistant Director of Development concerning the station's planned solicitation of alumni. "If we get approval—and I'm sure we will—we can go to the alumni during the spring," Svoboda said.

However, the station needs money now. Svoboda has contacted the Lilly Babbit Hyde Foundation which contributed funds toward the FM board now being used. He has also met with officials from McDonald's Corporation in Chicago. These grants are most often offered to stations doing public service surveys and investigations. Unfortunately WCFM, in Svoboda's words, "can't do a great amount of special programing, since we don't even have the proper equipment to start with."

The station plans to collect nearly $45,000 over five years. For perspective, Perry estimated that the capital goods of the station are currently worth $85,000 including $20,000 in record albums alone. The revitalization of the WCFM studios is planned in three distinct phases. Due to organizational problems this summer the drive was prevented from starting on time. Thus the renovation of the studio facilities will have to begin nearly a year later than originally anticipated.

Phase one focuses on the reconstruction of the broadcasting studios next summer. The second phase will begin next fall. At that time most of WCFM's electrical wiring and equipment will be replaced. This includes new turntables, tape decks,

Morgan experiment in co-ed entries works

by Lorraine Driscoll

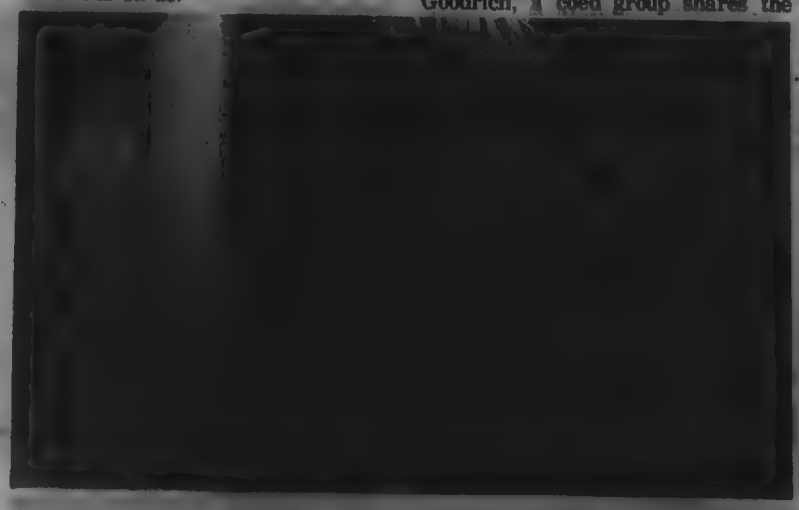
The Morgan experiment of freshman co-ed entries works well, but expansion of the program in the near future is unlikely. According to Dean Stevens, the other freshman buildings lack the bathroom facilities to accommodate both sexes on one floor.

Sally Brown '80 and Eric Scheye '80 introduced the idea last year, in response to a large sexism rally. "Everyone was saying 'do something, do something,' so this was something to do," Brown said. The two wrote the proposal and presented it to the school last winter. Morgan Hall was chosen for the experiment because it has more bathrooms per floor than any other freshman housing.

"Originally, we asked for just two entries, but we got four," continued Brown. "The administration has been pretty cooperative."

According to Dean Stevens, the project is both an experiment in coeducation, and an experiment in the freshman's ability to relate to Junior Advisors of a different sex. "The JA's as a group were not overwhelmingly excited about the co-ed housing last year," said Stevens. According to Brown, Morgan was one of the last to go in JA room draw. However, Stevens added that now the JA's as well as the students enjoy it very much. "People seem to be very enthusiastic about it," he commented.

Stevens was not optimistic about the possibility of expanding the program in the near future. "At this point, there are no other suitable buildings for it," he said. The eventual renovation of Williams and Sage, might include the addition of bathrooms and would make expansion possible.



Stevens explained that "each year we go a step further. We've progressed so that now all the freshman buildings include both men and women. It's been a gradual progression of creating more and more co-ed freshmen housing. However, we're rapidly reaching the point where we can go no farther. Also, we have the obligation to provide separate-sex housing for those who want it."

The Parent's Council, composed of a few parents from each class, have provided still another obstacle to expansion of the project. The Council has been petitioning the college for some time to retreat from the degree of co-ed housing now on campus.

The students involved in the project seem to be very happy with the experiment. "It's great!" is their usual reply to queries about it. Most feel very close to the people in their entry. Having Junior Advisors of the opposite sex does not seem to present any problems.

One Morgan freshman, Gerald Carney '82, says, "I think it's very good. I see no difference with having female JA's. They do a great job, and can help you with virtually all your problems, and if you ever have a problem you need to discuss with a male JA, they're always right next door."

Natalie Combemale '82, noted one problem, though, "It's hard for male JA's to handle girls' problems. I don't know if they knew girls could be so emotional, I think it's harder on them than it is on us."

Co-ed living has been a positive experience for freshman students such as Greg Jacobsen of Morgan East.

Co-ops offer advantages

by Stu Massad

Coop housing is thriving at Williams. After two weeks of settling in, 18 students in Goodrich and Lambert houses agree that coop living provides the advantages of off-campus housing with few of the problems.

The houses have evolved general similarities: in both everyone shares the housework but not the cooking. In Lambert, 7 women, close friends since freshman year, cook together, while the lone man cooks alone. In Goodrich, a coed group shares the cooking, and the three others each cook separately.

"It's a really nice feeling to come home and sit down in a relaxed atmosphere," said Sarah Thorne '79, a Lambert resident. Don Weber '79 of Goodrich agreed: "It's better not to have meals govern your schedule—if you aren't there to eat, it's waiting for you later."

Both houses had problems initially. In Goodrich, organizing the house from the groups and individuals who applied separately proved troublesome. In Lambert the problems arose because many residents were away from campus when the house was chosen last spring. Room draw took time, and many pots and pans are still on order through Food Services.

Members from both houses agreed that relations with the College administration have been good so far. Lambert residents plan to petition the Committee on Undergraduate Life for return of their house maintenance taxes to buy rugs and curtains.

"There are a lot of minor repairs that need to be made," Thorne said, "but I think they've been pretty positive about this."

Weber argued for a return of matron fees to coop house members. He noted that most of the improvements in the coop houses have been capital expenditures, and

Appointments made

Council holds first session

In its first meeting of the year, the College Council approved its Finance Committee's appointment of a bookkeeper to insure that student organizations do not overspend their budgeted sum.

John Simpson, treasurer of the C.C. and chairman of the Finance Committee, reported that last year a total of $13,500 was spent beyond funds that the Council had appropriated. The appointment of Finance Committee member Matt Heineman as bookkeeper will "insure that the intent of the student body responding the use of its funds will be carried out," Simpson said.

College Council president Bronson Fargo began the year with a promise to run meetings in a more orderly fashion than in the past. Apologizing for confusion that erupted last spring, Fargo said he hoped this year the Council could be "more representative, more open, and more visible."

To reinstate the "prestige" that was lost last spring, Fargo proposed the sponsoring of forums on issues of current student interest. He also stressed the need for increased communication, both between the Council and individual houses, and between the houses and their representatives.

Another possible source of confusion, the Council's rules of order, was also clarified by the introduction of a new set of parliamentary rules. Called as "simple as possible," by secretary Michael Lissack, the rules will be voted on at the next Council meeting. Lissack said that they follow Robert's Rules of Order closely.

Three new members were chosen to the Elections Committee, that body which appoints members to all committees not voted upon by students. Sophomores Janet Lavin, Darrell McWhorter and junior Susan Laidlaw filled the three openings. Representatives to the Committee on Educational Policy, the Committee on Undergraduate Life, and the Housing Committee were also chosen. The Council filled these vacancies with juniors Julia McNamee, Susan Leary, and Rusty Case, respectively.

The Council also discussed the question of a house representative who lives off-campus. Lissack argued that this situation prevented adequate communication between the representative and his house. Simpson, however, held that the Council had "no business" telling a house who it can choose to represent it. No action was taken.

In a brief report from the Winter Study Project Committee, Susan Laidlaw gave figures from a recently conducted survey. Although a majority of the faculty feel that the term should be abolished or radically changes, she said, 80 per cent of the responding students feel it should remain the same. Laidlaw asked the Council for any suggestions on how to improve the Winter Study term.

Editorial

Outlook

This issue of the Record introduces Outlook, an op-ed page conducted by Op-Editor Peter Rintels. It will, obviously, appear opposite the editorial page in each issue. Outlook will focus on issues and questions of particular interest to the community. This first weekly edition is in response to the Trustees' statement on shareholder responsibilities. Future installments may include student government, the curriculum, or anything else that comes to mind.

Although its primary purpose is to collect and organize the spectrum of opinion on specific topics into a readily digestive form, Outlook will, on occasion contain random contributions on a variety of issues, to survey current College concerns.

Since we hope to attract a broad range of opinion, the individual contributions do not, of course, necessarily represent the opinion of the Record. Not even we can vascillate that much.

We are very excited about this page and, as always solicit your comments and contributions.

Focus on Berkshires

Williams last year took a peek over the immense wall which separated it from the rest of the world for a long time, and found South Africa. To many, the compassionate interest in this last year's two other headliners, Gay Rights and Feminism, signaled an awakening in Williams' consciousness: the College is not an island, but part of a broader national and international order which deserves its participation in the issues of the day.

There is no doubt in anybody's mind that this awakening was a change for the better. Were he still alive, the late President of Williams, Tyler Dennett, would surely be proud, since it was he who in the mid-1930's decided that it was time to transform Williams from a "country club" school into one of the finest liberal arts institutions in the world. Williams has become more concerned with the type of people it is educating us to be.

The concern Williams students have shown for those abroad is not just commendable; it is terrific. But headline-grabbing issues aren't the only ones around. There are other concerns, much closer to home, that are no less demanding. These concerns are not national or international: they are local.

But the scale of some of the challenges Williams students are asked to meet shouldn't dissuade us by their apparent unimportance. There are many things that we, as relatively well-educated, enthusiastic, concerned, and relatively wealthy young people can contribute to the Williamstown and Northern Berkshire area, not to mention the campus community itself.

In the last-named arena, great progress has been made in such ways as the founding of the Student Support Group and the Peer Health Counseling Service. The fact that the junior advisor applications exceed the number of spots available by a factor of three is powerful evidence for the deep concern that most Williams students have for one another.

But even on campus more needs to be done. Race relations, although a quiet issue for the most part, may be quiet simply out of a hesitation on the part of many to bring the subject up. Other groups of students, such as exchanges, transfers, foreign students and Center for Development Economics Fellows too often feel like strangers on a campus which is as much theirs as anyone's.

Off-campus, the Williams student need not travel very far to find people whose problems effectively dwarf those of almost anybody here. The side streets off of Cole Avenue are lined with row after row of dilapidated, broken-down types of houses which most of us would rather not see, let alone set foot in.

The scene is repeated in multiple fashion in North Adams, Adams, Pittsfield, etc. It is, in fact, repeated in scores of towns in hundreds of miles in any direction from Williamstown, in an area as big as the whole Northeast. It is easy to speak of the atrocities being committed by man against man in many parts of the world from Cambodia to Nicaragua to South Africa, but it is also easy to forget about the suffering, and I mean the real suffering, of our neighbors.

It's as though in climbing over that very high wall which used to separate Williams and the world we can now only see 'way over the wall, to points which are large and which loom off in the distance. We in many ways seem to be oblivious to the "little" problems which might exist right outside of the wall. The Lehman Service Council, headed by Andy Masetti '79, is perhaps the best, though by no means the only way for Williams students to become involved in activities which can make a substantial contribution to the lives, not of millions, but of individuals.

In all of this I do not mean to suggest that we should abandon the "big" issues for the small ones. By no means. Rather, I mean to imply that the war against human suffering, persecution, poverty, and hopelessness may have many fronts on which it can be waged.

In all our forums, lectures, demonstrations, and vigils for the big issues we have, unfortunately, made only tiny progress relative to the size of the battle. Yet, in regard to these other, small-scale affairs, the degree of progress which can be made on the individual level is enormous. We may not be able to free a single political prisoner or lessen the persecution of the oppressed anywhere in the world, but we can measurably change the quality of life of those no farther away than North Adams, Cole Avenue, the Center, the room next door.

By Peter Rintels

Sometimes last year in Religion 304 when we were bandying about the usual small talk on Being, Selfhood, Relationality and so on (e.g. "How's your self these days?" "Oh, a little alienated in a backwater of ontological relativism, but otherwise all right," someone prefaced a point he was making by saying "I know it's not philosophically in fashion to say this, but . . ."

Suddenly I was asking myself, "philosophically in fashion? What could he possibly mean by that?" Well, it turned out that I was asking the wrong person because I didn't have the slightest idea. Intrigued by the question, though, I did a little research this summer and learned of the high stakes world of philosophical coiture, centered as you might expect in Paris.

My main source of information was Parisian acquaintance, a Mr. A. C. Akmed, whom I met when we were mercenaries together in the Sudan (this was two summers ago) and who, owing me a favor from the experience, agreed to cover the fall philosophical fashion shows in which the major houses bring out their new fall lines.

Herewith is the report he sent:

Dear Peter: I regret that I was not able to make it to all of the major philosophical expositions, but you know how busy things can get in the narcotics business. Nevertheless, I did get a good look at the Pierre Cardin and Yves St. Laurent stuff and as these seem to be the trend-setters, I think I can give you a good idea of what's in store for the '79 season.

The various shows are held throughout the Latin Quarter in modest sized philosophical parlors that are crowded with ideas wholesalers who bid on the best ideas and pass them on to publishers. The prevailing custom for presenting the ideas is to have appropriately clad models walk down a platform into the audience, do a few turns, read a synopsis of the philosophy, then go back into the wings while an emcee names some bibliographical references.

A Piere Cardin model presenting a neo-Freudian philosophy came out, for example, in a nice pleated maternity outfit. Another came out to recite a cute little "existential nothingness" number, and you can save yourself the trouble of trying to imagine what she was wearing.

So what's on the bill for this year? The big words it seems are phenomenology and consciousness, which admittedly are big words any way you look at them. Cardin's Hegelian line brought spirited bidding and the newer phenomenological stuff based on Ricouer was popular as well. The emphasis at the St. Laurent show was more toward psychological stuff with neo-Freudian and existential psychoanalytic lines moving well. A Freud-Neitzsche-Eastern mysticism exhibition was a real smash there. A big surprise was mysticism's popularity. Time was when nobody who wasn't wearing a turban would touch the stuff, but it's been gaining momentum and a lot of people are expecting it to be a hot item within five years.

In the classical stuff, Plato is holding his own, but Aristotle is being greeted with outright hostility. An Aristotle piece at the Cardin show brought hoots, hisses and cat-calls, the latter coming from a large number of cats which were strangely abundant at the back of the parlor. There's some talk of a pre-Socratic revival next year, but that's just rumor now.

Well that's about it for the fall philosophical fashions. Remember all those marvelous days in the Quarter? Sacre bleu. A. C. Akmed.

Now, if you readers will excuse me, I have to go remove some Aristotle references in a paper I'm working on now.

Coalition responds

To the editor:

The statement of the Trustees on the College's role as a socially responsible investor as presented to the students and faculty over the summer is shallow, ambiguous and inconsistent with the obligations of a moral liberal arts institution. The Trustees have failed to make the connection between the College's economic power and the ideals that a liberal arts education demands of us.

They have set up an investment "advisory" committee without specifying its powers or jurisdiction. They, by merely supporting the "Sullivan Principles", are committing the College to an ineffectual course which allows the administration a sense of "moral" self-congratulations while continuing to profit from and support a racist tyrann[illegible].

American corporations operating in South Africa contribute to the strength of this immoral economy and the survival of the present political system. By accepting the legal framework of Apartheid and paying taxes to the South African government, corporations participate in the perpetuation of the system. American corporations are responsible for 43 per cent of the South African petroleum industry and 23 per cent of its auto sales. American computer technology composing 70 per cent of the computer business is responsible for passbook systems controlling the movements of Blacks and Asians. U.S. corporations are required by law to convert their facilities to produce military materials when requested to do so by the Vorster government. Thus, although U.S. corporations employ only .05 per cent of the Black labor force, it is clear the U.S. corporate investment has significant influence in the stability of the Vorster regime.

The Sullivan Principles (calling for equal and fair employment practices) which the trustees have endorsed in their report were openly admitted, by the trustees themselves, in April '78 as being ineffectual in implementing change within South Africa.

The Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition, an organization of students concerned about the atrocities in South Africa, is asking that the college as a morally responsible investor introduce resolutions and vote proxies which call for withdrawal of American corporations from South Africa. If these corporations do not move toward corporate withdrawal within a stated period of time, we feel that the college is morally obligated to divest itself of its holdings in these corporations.

The Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition

Outlook

Outlook is a new feature of the Record which seeks to print commentaries on issues of interest to the campus. This week, in light of the Trustees' statement on investment responsibility, Outlook focuses on the issues surrounding the College's relationship with South Africa.

The Trustees' most recent statement on the College's responsibilities is a profound disappointment. In many other instances the position of the Trustees would be adequate and praiseworthy. Apartheid, however, by its very nature, embodies aspects which make the present proposal inadequate.

There are several blatant contradictions contained in the report. Under heading number two, for example, the Trustees state that, "The educational effectiveness of a college also requires that its policies and practices be morally grounded in such qualities as honesty, humanity, respect for facts and tolerance." This goal cannot be met as long as Williams supports the corporate presence in South Africa. Education by example is as powerful and essential as any classroom lecture.

Where is the honesty in the regime which murdered Steven Biko? Where is there humanity in a system which categorically denies the economic and political rights of the majority of South Africans? How can one imagine tolerance amidst the wholesale banning of dissident voices such as journalist Donald Woods?

Although clouded in vague and tentative language ("encourage," "advocate," etc.), the Trustees' support of the Sullivan Principles shows a concern for the well-being of black South Africans. What is absent, however, is a realistic apprehension of an effective means to attain the goal of racial equality. The reforms enumerated in the Sullivan Principles are not significant. The issue for black South Africans is not the use of the same drinking fountains, but determinism of their political and economic future.

Near the end of the report the Trustees state that, "American economic disengagement from South Africa would destroy the leverage now available to help bring about desirable social change." This is a myth. The laws of apartheid and the attitudes of its facilitators are steadfastly opposed to social change. Vorster has assured the world again and again that foreign corporations will not be able to change the system of government in South Africa. Any company operating in South Africa must adhere to its laws, under which it is a crime for a black man to hold a higher position that a white in a given organization. There is no leverage to be lost.

The Trustees' response, by virtue of its ineffectiveness, accomplishes a goal they themselves decry. The College remains in the position of supporting a social cause: South African racism. Only by voting its proxies for withdrawal can the College live up to the ideals of a liberal arts education. The lack of meaningful action is a tacit support of the status quo.

What is needed is a stronger position, one designed to solve problems, not just give them lip-service. The Trustees' responsibility to preserve the quality of education here is contingent not only upon the financial well-being of the College (which, even with a radical step such as divestiture, need not be endangered), but also on the consistency between its ideals and its actions.

"A profound disappoint-ment"

Observations on South Africa

The overwhelming impression I have of South Africa is a deep sense of tragedy. The society is potentially rich and vital, culturally and economically, the land is beautiful and fruitful. Yet, one feels a sense of impending disaster as the Nationalist Party unerringly chooses actions which further disintegrate the society and all its component parts.

The Nationalists, who have controlled South Africa since 1948, should be the focus of concern and pressure from abroad. While they have dressed up their objectives to appeal at a superficial level to mainstream Western religious, political and economic values, the sweep of Nationalist policy since 1948 is alien to human dignity and to democratic ideals. The policies seem designed to bring out the worst characteristics of human nature in all of South Africa's varied social groups.

The question for those concerned about South Africa should be how best and most effectively to bring about change there. This is a difficult question, in part because we are dealing with another country, and one separated by great distances. More important, however, the situation within South Africa is extremely complex, even though the basic and most visible fact of racial discrimination through "legal" devices is extremely simple. Let me list a few factors which I believe complicate the issues and make the choice of effective instruments of change especially difficult.

i) All racial groups are involved in an extremely interdependent and complex economy, especially in the modern urban secotrs, in industry and transportation, in mining and commerce. Even dealing with Apartheid through physical partition of the country could be accomplished only with very great disruption, movement of people, and violence.

ii) There are substantial regional differences in economic, social, and racial structures, which makes plausible solutions in one region not sensible for another.

iii) The several racial groups have competing interests and no changes will satisfy them all. There are also substantial economic, social and ethnic differences within each of the main identifiable ethnic groups, making generalizations other than those of the crudest sort difficult.

iv) The interim consequences of the Nationalist's "Homelands" policy which has created two "independent states" (Transkei and Bophuthatswana) are yet to be seen. The Nationalists did not anticipate some of the developments in these "states" and these could change the remaining options open to the govennment. In any case, the size of the populations involved (over 4 million in Transkei, over 2 million in Bophuthatswana) make the potantial effects of quasi-independence on the rest of the South African matrix substantial.

v) The white Afrikaaners who make up the backbone of the Nationalist support are extremely tenacious. For the most part, they have a deeply rooted religious conviction that they are a chosen people. They have been through extreme trials before, in the concentration camps of the Anglo-Boer war, and detainments during World Wars I and II when many supported the German cause in opposition to Union government policy. They believe they have been tested and not found wanting. Most calculations of the effects of external pressures give the factor of Boer tenacity much too little weight.

vi) The Nationalists have built within the government a tremendous control system, including an intelligence and information network that is almost palpable to a visitor to South Africa. They have all the elements necessary for suppression of individuals or groups at short notice. The willingness to use violence is accepted and established.

vii) Many typical roles are backward in South Africa. universities have been a major source of ideas for the oppressive mechanisms of Apartheid. Big business is often (belatedly and self-interestedly) a major advocate of dismantling Apartheid and elimination of discrimination. The English language press is almost universally an outspoken source of anti-Apartheid and anti-Nationalist literature—but they stay in business by peddling a lot of sex and violence on page one. Labor unions are among the most reactionary elements in society, standing firm for Apartheid. One could go on; the point is that analysis is complex.

viii) The churches play a major role on both sides—the Anglicans, Catholics and others seeking decency and social change, the Dutch Reformed Church as a bulwark for Apartheid. Religious fervor is mobilized on both sides of the issues—not a circumstance calculated to promote peaceful change.

It is difficult if not impossible to find someone who can "legitimately" speak for the disenfranchised. I have become skeptical of those who claim to do so. Any leader not acceptable to the Nationalists who stays in South Africa faces the prospect being banned, jailed, or worse. Any leader tolerated by the Nationalists is immediately suspect as a sellout. How should one judge claims to leadership under such conditions?

What of the prospects for change? Given the economic, demographic, and geographic facts of the situation—and the Nationalist's great physical power—change through force would inflict almost unimaginable lossses on all racial groups, especially on non-whites. Conventional warfare from the Front Line States is not likely for a long time to come—both because of the superiority of the South African forces and firepower, and because they have already made extensive preparations for defense along the existing, or about to be created, borders. Because the costs of trying to impose change through force are so great, it is essential to seek and to promote peaceful change.

How one might promote peaceful change, of course, is a most difficult issue. To do something about it will require sustained, well informed, deftly-handled pressure on the Nationalist government. It will also require carefully chosen measures of support to groups and individuals seeking to promote such change within South Africa. It is possible, and may even be likely, that such efforts, even if very well orchestrated, will fail. But a hit-or-miss approach, an occasional foray of heavy-handed intervention, will not succeed, and may even be detrimental.

I wonder if the United States has the collective will to undertake a sustained commitment of this sort? Small and symbolic measures, such as the withdrawal of bank credit, will not have much impact on the Nationalists. It certainly will not move them in the direction of being more sensitive to outside views. Less enlightened sources of finance from other areas, e.g. Western Europe, are standing by.

What steps should the United States or any of its institutions and instrumentalities take? Detailed suggestions would take a great deal of space, but let me briefly suggest some issues. It is important to maintain contact with and penetration of the South African society, at as many levels and through as many institutions as possible. On the question of corporate involvement, which is complex, it is interesting that a common criticism of multinationals is that they "de-nationalize" people working for them. Is that a bad thing in South Africa? The progressive business leaders and the liberal churches are in greater need of outside support than are the Nationalists. What is the most effective way of supporting their efforts for substantive changes in the Nationalist system? I think it is not in withdrawal, but increased contacts. Given the problem of discovering who can speak for South African society and its component parts, how can one learn what "South Africans" are thinking? Not by reducing the interaction of South Africa with the rest of the world. How can US government policy be more productive of peaceful change? A step in the right direction would be more contact of US citizens with the situation in South Africa.

Recognizing the complexity and difficulty of achieving peaceful change, staying informed and involved, avoiding simple "solutions", is more difficult, more demanding, more painful, in many respects. But, I think it is the only way one might begin to encourage any significant steps toward such change.

Motorola and its shareholders

At Motorola's 1978 annual meeting, shareholders presented a proposal calling for the corporation to end its South African operations. The following are excerpts from the management's statement opposing the resolution.

BACKGROUND: Motorola's business in the Republic of South Africa is conducted by Motorola South Africa (Pty.) Ltd. Motorola South Africa accounts for less than one per cent of the consolidated sales, net earnings and assets of Motorola and has less than [illegible] employees. Motorola South Africa was organized in 1965. At that time, Motorola owned 40 per cent of Motorola South Africa and a local South African company owned the other 60 per cent. It later became apparent to Motorola that Motorola customers in South Africa were not being supported and employees were not being treated in a manner consistent with Motorola's worldwide policies.

After negotiations extending over a period of several years, Motorola acquired the remaining 60 per cent and assumed, in September, 1974, operational control over the affairs of Motorola South Africa.

Since September, 1974, after assuming operational control of Motorola South Africa, several steps have been taken by Motorola to cause the practices of Motorola South Africa to conform to the formal statement of principles which governs Motorola's activities throughout the world.

The steps taken include the following:

(i) the operations of Motorola South Africa have been relocated to new, improved facilities thereby significantly improving the health, safety and working conditions of all employees;

(ii) the institution of an equal pay for equal work system which has resulted in the compensation paid to the non-white employees being significantly increased;

[Points iii-v refer to the introduction of a company-paid life and disability insurance, retirement benefit program and optional medical aid plan "for all employees regardless of race;"]

(vi) the establishment of a racially integrated internal management development program in which both white and non-white employees have participated in jointly.

As a consequence of the foregoing programs Motorola management believes that the non-white South Africans employed by Motorola South Africa are significantly better off economically and socially today than they were prior to the time when Motorola assumed control over Motorola South Africa.

POLITICS—NOT A PROPER CORPORATE FUNCTION

Management refers to a 1975 statement submitted to the United Nations Economic and Social Council by eleven Latin American countries calling for multinational corporations to end "pressure, coercion, or any political interference" in host countries.]

Motorola management agrees with the foregoing principles. Motorola management does not believe that U.S. based multinational corporations operating in other sovereign nations, may properly take or threaten to take overt action for the purpose of modifying the political or social systems of those nations. It is management's belief that foreign relations should be conducted on a government to government basis and not by multinational businesses. In this connection, the United States Department of Commerce, at the request of the President, recently issued new rules ... prohibiting sales of goods of any kind to military or police entities in the Republic of South Africa ... Motorola and Motorola South Africa will conduct their activities in the Republic of South Africa in strict accord with the letter as well as the spirit of the government regulations.

In conclusion management recommends that Motorola stockholder vote against the stockholder proposal.

[In a letter to the Motorola management, Treasurer of the College Francis Dewey III, speaking for the Trustees, said that the College agreed with management that corporate withdrawal would be a mistake, but that it also agreed with clauses in the shareholder proposal calling for an end to further investment in South Africa and to all sales to the South African government. Dewey, therefore abstained from voting Williams' 5,200 shares on this proposal.]

Bach heads bill

Hill launches Griffin series

by Kevin Hall

Well over two hundred enthusiastic listeners crowded the limited confines of the Griffin faculty room as harpsichordist Victor Hill launched the new season of Griffin Hall Concerts last Saturday evening. Joining him were violinists George Green and Lucy Joseph, violist Susan St. Amour, cellist Douglas Moore, and flautist Janet Geroulo. The all-Bach program consisted of three harpsichord concerti followed by the fifth Brandenburg concerto, all of which were performed as chamber music in the eighteenth-century tradition.

The elegant rococo lines of the A major concerto (BWV 1055) which opened the concert were delineated with flexibility and warmth. All of the participants exhibited the impeccable rhythmic sense requisite to this music—never was there a moment of flaccidity.

Curiously, the famous D minor concerto (BWV 1052) which followed did not fare as well. For the first and last time during the evening the balance between soloist and ensemble was not entirely happy. The strings seemed oblivious to the small sonority of Hill's baroque-style instrument, with the result that much important melodic material was obscured. In the slow movement Hill became overly-engrossed in detail of ornamentation, and continuity was lost. And surely he could have made more of the cadenza in the first movement, which was rather perfunctory considering the work's overall drama.

After intermission, however, the group regained its equanimity, and the little F minor concerto was full of dash. All the players made the most of the charming pizzicati effects and humorous pauses in the last two movements.

The performance of the Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 in D major (BWV 1050) which followed was one of absolute mastery on the parts of all concerned. Particularly to be commended were Green and Geroulo, whose verve and pristine beauty of tone were unequalled. Hill, too, was in top form as he tossed off the florid virtuoso cadenza with an aplomb which fully atoned for his previous reticence in the D minor concerto. These three made the tender dialogue of the central affetuoso movement deeply moving, bringing to it a wonderful variety of nuance. The high spirits of the gigue-like finale brought both the work and the concert to a most satisfying conclusion.

Let us hope that Victor Hill and friends will continue to bring such intelligent and idiomatic performances of baroque music to the Berkshires for a long time to come.

Fest features twenty cellists

A CELLO-BRATION, featuring up to twenty cellos in a variety of ensemble combinations, will take place on Sunday, September 24th, at 3:00 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. Admission is free.

Douglas Moore and Keith Fleming will be the principal cellists of the evening, performing duos by David Popper, Halsey Stevens, Luigi Boccherini, and Bernhard Heiden, all of whom composed the works with a special knowledge of the instrument. In the famous Requiem by Popper, Moore and Fleming will be joined by Ingrid Porter, cello, and Charles Joseph, piano. Highlighting the program is Villa-Lobos' Bachianas Brasilieras No. 5, with Jane Bucci, soprano, and Julius Hegyi, conductor, as well as eight cellos. Also on the program is Julius Klengel's Humnus, Op. 51, written for twelve parts.

Douglas Moore, principal cellist of the Berkshire and Albany Symphony Orchestras and cellist of The Williams Trio, as well as members of the Williams music faculty, has organized this concert to feature a wide selection of music for his instrument, played by a large number of his colleagues.

Keith Fleming is a PhD candidate in music at Catholic University in Washington, D.C. and a member of the Kennedy Center Opera Orchestra and Wolf Trap Orchestra. Jane Bucci is well known in this area as a singer who has appeared with The Williams College Choral Society, the Albany Symphony Orchestra, Music in the Round, and many other musical organizations. Charles Joseph is pianist of The Williams Trio, and Julius Hegyi is conductor of both the Berkshire and Albany Symphony Orchestras. Other cellists taking part in the concert are Zigurd Mielens, Adam Grabois, Robert Malison, Martha Rohrbaugh, Shirley LeFebre, Robert Forrest, Nancy Winn, Garth Rauscher, Yetta Lehovic, Julie Isaacs, Daniel Rowe, Elsbeth Merriam, Charles Hoffman, and David Fuqua.

Singer Michael Cooney will be performing in the Rathskellar this Sunday evening at 8:00. Admission is free.

Animal House satirizes college life

Animal House is exactly what one might have expected from National Lampoon's first cinematic effort: it is satirical, often crude, and uncompromisingly hilarious. If the final conclusion is in doubt, try seeing this movie in a crowded theatre—chances are that 20 per cent of the best lines will be drowned out by the audience's laughter.

"Animal House" is a film about love, about sex, about college fraternities, about toga parties and homecoming parades. It is totally irreverent; the editors of the Lampoon, true to form, don't seem to care much about whom they offend. Animal House is an outrageous, yet highly perceptive satire on the somewhat distorted world of the American college campus.

In the tradition of the Woody Allen comedies, Animal House is an episodic film. The plot is essentially non-essential—it acts more or less as a connecting vehicle for the various scenes. The setting is Faber College, a well-ivied institution presumably somewhere in Ohio. The year is 1962 (remember American Graffiti"?) We are in pre-Vietnam America, with the New Frontier (or was it the Great Society?) on the horizon, when college life was almost as sedate as it is today.

The film's satirical outlook is consistently maintained throughout. It opens to the pretentious strains of commencement exercise-type music, as two freshmen walk across a quintessentially collegiate green past a statue of the college's founder on which is inscribed the profound motto, "knowledge is good." The first scene sets the tone for the entire movie.

Animal House mocks the artificiality of the college campus: the fraternities, the pep rallies, the homecoming parades. It does so, however, in a way that only National Lampoon's team of excollegiates could. Their attitude is lighthearted. Despite its superficiality, college life is fun . . . and after all, who needs reality, anyway?

A number of low-profile performers make up the cast of Animal House, headed by John Belushi of Saturday Night Live fame. If any single actor makes this film, it is undoubtedly he. Probably the single most hilarious scene in the film is when Belushi, as the recklessly hedonistic Bluto, goes through the lunch line, in the process consuming an entire hanburger in a single mouthful and "snorting" a plateful of jello, among other things.

Despite his virtuoso performance, Animal House by no means depends on Belushi for its hilarity. Tim Matheson as "Otter" evinces beautifully the smooth-talking insincerity of the pickup artist; the scene where he poses as an Amherst student visiting his girl friend at "Emily Dickinson" College is masterfully done. Donald Sutherland deserves credit for his role as a disenchanted post-beat generation college professor. Other fine performances come from James Daughton as the cosmetically flawless class president, Gregg Marmalard; Mark Metcalf as Doug Neidermeyer, the sadistic ROTC leader; and Steven Furst as Kent Dorfman, whose name tells the whole story.

Animal House contains something to offend the sensibilities of just about everyone, and some will undoubtedly be put off by its somethimes excessive crudity. Don't make the mistake, however, of classifying this film with Mel Brooks style slap-schtick; it is far too subtle for that genre. With all its outrageous excesses, Animal House is a carefully produced and skillfully acted film, and clearly a precedent-setting effort in the field of cinematic comedy.

Singers delight Coffeehouse

Balloons danced, the sun rayed, voices rose and the band played. The Berkshires hosted some good music Saturday with the Pete and Arlo Lenox lawn picnic followed closer to home and free by our own Scott Lankford. A skellar full of cider-drinking donut dunkers heard an inspired if grovelly Colorado-bred junior with talent. Lankford's fresh repertoire of original songs and wit was followed by returning artists Mason Daring and Jeanie Stahl. They were French in comparison. No seeking friends and sure of what they've got, Daring and Stahl lost many listeners to the moon, but those who remained heard sustained inspirtation and a mean twang.

Rathskellar manager Paul Goren directs our expectant senses to a not-to-be-missed concert this Sunday, September 24th, when Michael Cooney is the featured performer. Sophomore Polly Morrow is the warm-up musician, with soda bread and Irish coffee to round out the Irish tunes of last year's favorite musician. Sunday night's Rathskellar Coffeehouse begins at eight in the basement of Baxter.

Coffeehouse Presents Michael Cooney

The Williams Coffeehouse is happy to announce the return of Michael Cooney in a special coffeehouse this Sunday evening, September 24 at 8:00 in the Rathskellar. Cooney, who sings traditional American and British folksongs, ballads, blues and sea songs and plays banjo, guitar and concertina has been pleasing Williams audiences for over 10 years. A review in the New York Times states that "few singers can convey the sheer fun of singing and still underline their singing with a story sesne of connection as skillfully as Michael Cooney ... a performer who has no problem projecting to an audience of any size. His style is personal, happy easygoing. He can turn a shole auditorium into a living room." This will be an evening of entertainment not be missed. Also appearing as the warm-up artist is Polly Morrow '81. As always, admission to the coffeehouse is free.

Rita Shane slates performance

Rita Shane, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, will open the Thompson Concert Series sponsored by the Music Department with a program of operatic arias Friday night, September 22nd, at 8:30 p.m. in Chapin Hall. Admission is free with Williams I.D. Accompanying Shane in songs by Handel, Faure, Thomas, Lehar, Bernstein, and both Richard and Johann Strauss will be William Glazier, pianist. She will also give a free studio discussion class Saturday at 11 p.m. in Chopin.

Rita Shane, a "dazzling singer with an extraordinary voice," made her professional debut in 1964 and since that time has progressed steadily through the music capitals of Europe and America to become the assured performer and supreme vocal artist that she is today. Shane's voice encompasses a titanic range, rising with ease to the F above the staff, yet with a warm legato cantilena usually unknown to specialists in the coloratura soprano repertoire.

Her triumphant Metropolitan opera debut in 1973, as the Queen of the Night in Mozart's Magic Flute, was followed by productions of the Magic Flute, and The Abduction from the Seraglio, staged with Shane at the Munich Festival, and Berg's Lulu, produced for her in Geneva. She has since sung many other roles across Europe and the U.S. In July of this year, Shane had a tremendous success in Israel, where she was guest artist with Zubin Mehta and the Israel Philharmonic in twelve concert performances of Fledermaus in Tel Aviv, Haifa and Jerusalem.

The Record will run classifieds at 20c per line. Deadline is 3 p.m. on Sundays. Total amount due MUST accompany this form. Mail or bring in person to Classifieds, The Williams Record, Baxter Hall, Williamstown, Mass. 01267.

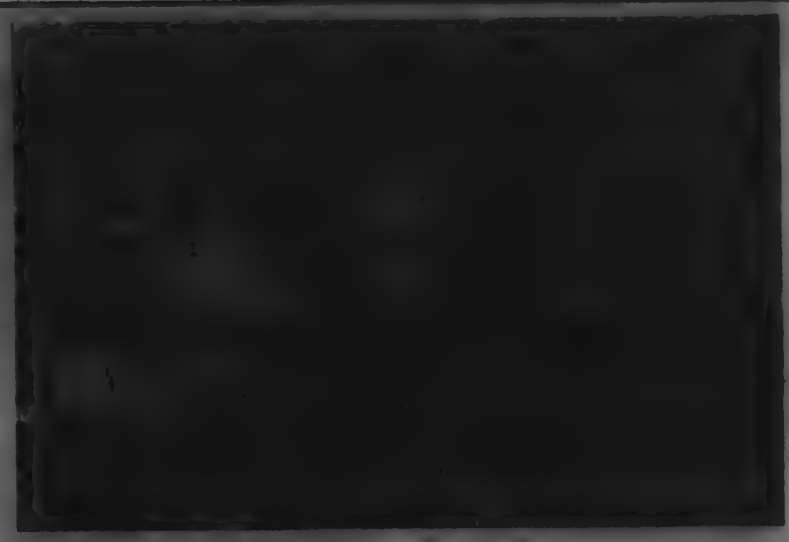
Latvians led summer meets

by Tim Wang

Williams hosted more than 14 different conferences and programs this past summer, according to Stanley Stanton Director of Conferences at Williams. Over 2000 persons participated in the programs which ranged in size from less than 25 participants to the annual session of the Massachusetts Teachers Association with about 1,000 persons.

A particularly unusual conference which met here in July was the Fourth World Latvian Youth Conference. Approximately 600 Latvians from all over the world met here to "exchange and cultivate aspects of Latvian culture, the arts and politics in an effort to continue the nationalistic heritage of a people with a cultural heritage, but no nation of their own," according to Manton Copeland, Jr., former Director of Conferences. This was the fourth in a series of conferences held every three years by the Latvian Youth Congress, and the first held in the United States.



Another program here during the summer was the Pre-Medical Program. Approximately 16 per-freshman were enrolled in the program, which included courses in chemistry, mathematics, and english composition. Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad, director of the program, emphasized that the program was not a "remedial program", but was meant to be a "small inducement for students that the school wants to select Williams." Director of Admissions Philip Smith selects the students, all of whom have been admitted to Williams or some other college, for the five-week long program.

One of the summer programs was the American Course for Executives Program which Williams has hosted every year since 1957. The program, according to Stanton, "offers humanities study to executives of large corporations."

The liberal arts approach of the program provides a broadening experience for executives, and helps them to "develop a background for examining the widening range of factors relevant to decision-making at executive levels." The program offers seven main courses in the areas of literature, art, philosophy, economics, political science and psychology. Approximately 24 executives enrolled in the six-week program this summer. Professor Fred Greene of Political Science directed the program.

Other programs held here during the summer included the Williamstown Theatre Festival, the Tennis Camp, the School of Banking and the Graduate School of Credit and Financial Management, a month long National Endowment for the Humanities Summer Seminar for Public Administrators, a three-week seminar sponsored by the American Mathematical Society, meetings of the Fellowship of Christian Athletes, National Audubon Society, Society of American Foresters, and the Massachusetts Teachers Association.

Many of the programs here each summer are "repeat programs." Stanton said that the fact that the programs return year after year is a reflection of the college's facilities, location, and staff." "People are pleased with the treatment that they get at Williams College," said Stanton.

Vandalism at Mission Park has been reduced since last year's inception of the student patrol group.

Student groups thwart vandalism

by Christine Ross

Damage to Mission Park has been virtually eliminated since the formation of a student monitoring squad last year after spring break. Incidences of kicked-in walls, smashed glass, and ripped bulletin boards had been common weekend occurrences.

David Corcoran '79, president of Armstrong House, illustrated, "On Sundays last year, you would have to sift through the debris to get to brunch." Since the squad's establishment, though, vandalism has been limited to one kicked-in wall, which happened when a team forgot to patrol one night.

Corcoran believes that the success of the student patrols over those by the campus Security officials is due to the fact that students are more inclined to respect suggestions from their peers than orders from uniformed guards. He explained, "The vandalism is not malicious. It's just drunken, stupid stuff, by kids rolling home late from a party. Just having someone stand there is a real deterrent."

Six students form the squad, which patrols on Thursday, Friday and Saturday nights between ten and four a.m. One pair each night provides escort service, monitors parties, patrols the lobby and checks suites. The group is on the Security payroll and has been approved through the Deans' office. All six are well-known, especially to students at the Park, and Corcoran emphasized that this is a major element in the success of the program. He maintains that students will respond when warned by a friend to stop being rowdy.

Corcoran explained that the effectiveness of the student patrols have helped the Park considerably in terms of their famage budget. Each house on campus receives an equal amount of the College's total funds for damages. According to Corcoran, the design of the building and the number of students who use it leave it especially vulnerable to vandalism. He pointed out that since the Park is covered with windows which cost $300 each, and it has a large hallway. "A lot of damage can be done," he said. The budget, in previous years, was quickly exhausted.

Platter places post profits

Williamstown's three record stores, outnumbering even the bookstores, each report that although business isn't booming this fall, they are doing fairly well.

After a slow summer, which one store owner characterized as the worst in recent years, the annual influx of students boosted sales even higher than expected.

Until last year, Williamstown sported only one record shop. In April, 1977, as the first store, Discoveries, changed hands, the Record Store and Toonerville Trolley opened almost simultaneously.

Record business in Williamstown is currently even more competitive than in Albany, because, as Toonerville Trolley owner, Hal March, pointed out, Albany has only two stores devoted exclusively to records.

However, the Williamstown entrepreneurs are apparently surviving the competition by finding their own niches and by filling different needs.

Discoveries, owned by two native Williamstown brothers, and located at 51 Spring Street, carries a large selection of used albums, as well as new singles and albums. Tom and Steve Burnham buy used records from students who have grown tired of their old albums.

Paul Garvey, owner of the Record Store, also runs a franchise of Radio Shack, a national chain which sells electronic and audio equipment and parts. Garvey, also a native of the county, says he likes his location: an alley on Spring Street. His store is adjacent to the only parking lot in town, and is in the path of students on their way to Cole field house.

Toonerville Trolley, at 129 Water Street, is a bit more out of the way than its competitors, but has a large stock of jazz, blues, folk and rock records. A substantial part of the supply consists of cut-outs—albums which are out of production or over-stocked and which sell at lower prices than most albums.

Working Group studies curriculum

by Erik Semmes

Alternative recommendations ranging from a comprehensive overhaul of the college's graduation requirements to a basic reaffirmation of the present requirements currently lie before the Working Group on the Curriculum, Chairperson Francis Oakley stated.

Oakley's ad hoc committee, a spinoff of the larger Committee on Educational Policy (CEP), began its investigation last spring on a CEP mandate with specific concerns relating to the breadth of courses to which Williams students exposed themselves.

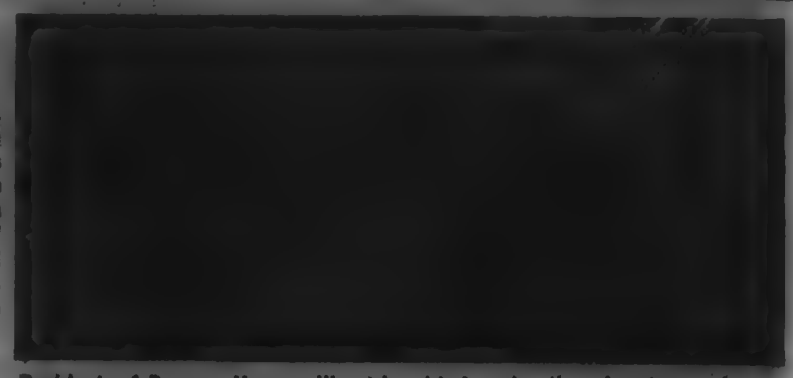
"There was worry among the faculty," Oakley saod, "as to whether students were sampling as broad a range of subject areas as they should. There was a particular concern in the field of foreign language as students just weren't taking as many language courses as they used to."

The review committee is nothing new in principle. In 1973-74, the CEP studied the distribution requirements among the three educational divisions. The committee, according to Oakley, reported a sense of inadequacy on the part of the requirements (the same as the current two semester course requirement in each division) and presented a proposal to offer students more incentive. A faculty vote defeated the motion.

Another committee reported in 1975-76 on freshman courses. Its findings reflected a tendency towards introductory courses rather than courses that, according to Oakley, would be helpful to students who wanted to spread out and sample other things. Experimental seminars conducted during the Winter Study Program failed because of poor enrollment.

The concern among faculty remained and while it was granted that the major or concentrated part of the curriculum was sound, the divisional requirement, particularly enrollment in division III (math and science), continued to be questioned.

Oakley said his committee, still in its initial stages of forming any kind of opinion, now intends to study data collected over the summer—data indicating which parts of the curriculum a sample class at Williams avoided and which parts it moved into readily.



"One part of the curriculum we are worried about," Oakley said, "is the foreign language department." The degree to which this problem stood out reflects a national trend. One worry is that high schools are cutting back their emphasis on foreign language. In a way, the colleges had moved away from language requirements on the grounds that the high schools were doing a better job than before. This trend is now changing, though.

Oakley stressed that the committee is just now beginning to take a serious look at the data and will need to conduct several faculty interviews before presenting any kind of recommendation. The six-person and hoc committee hopes to present its proposal in as early as February to the full 16-person CEP.

The proposal, if approved by the CEP, would become a joint set of recommendations and would then need a two-thirds faculty approval for implementation. Oakley anticipates many open meetings before the initial proposal to acquaint both students and faculty with possible recommendations.

Wallace did agree with Oakley on the foreign language issue, and added that he thought a language requirement would make Williams "a better place."

Many alternatives are available to the committee. The college required a two-year equivalence of courses in each division prior to the transition to the 4-1-4 alignment in 1967. Competency requirements and core programs in subjects are other possibilities. Any recommendations, Oakley said, would not go into effect until at least 1984 so as to gear up for the changes.

Residents of Bascom House will not be able to enjoy the advantages of co-op living this year.

Savings on board substantial added, "even with all the stuff they've given us, I don't think it adds up."

The groups which cook collectively in the coop houses also purchase food collectively. In Lambert the seven women draw on a joint checking account to which they contribute equally. In Goodrich the coed group buys food when needed and pools receipts. They plan to distribute cost in proportion to consumption.

Many of the coop members are vegetarians, and they buy bulk goods from the Williamstown Food Coop. Consequently, according to Thorne, weekly food bills are much lower than the College board plan—only $10 to $15 a week.

Residents agree that so far the chores of cooking and cleaning have not cut into deeply into caused conflicts with academics. Work schedules are posted early in the week, so students can plan their activities to fit, and many members enjoy the chance to experiment with cooking.

The social atmosphere in the houses is different. Lambert, with its larger kitchen and a living room, has already sponsored parties and pot luck dinners. Goodrich has more limited facilities. Originally members there considered charging guests at meals but decided to request food donations instead.

"When people go into coop housing, they really have to have a commitment to each other and to making it work," Thorne said. But while the house members all seem compatible, they do not conform to any mold. For most, the only regret is that they didn't have the chance for coop housing earlier.

Even Cowgirls Darkness at the Edge of Town

Bruce Springsteen unfurls again his thoroughly American brand of melodrama on Darkness At The Edge Of Town, his fourth album and three-year delayed follow-up to Born To Run. As ever, themes of defiance and desperation intertwine themselves with a tautness which usually makes the two indistinguishable from one another.

"Badlands" is a definitive case in point, a song that rips open side one the way Born To Run's title track did. Tearing out the top of his gritty lungs and backed by a thumping barrage of guitars and sax, Springsteen grandly, but sadly becries, "I don't give a damn for the same played out scenes - I don't give a damn for just the in-betweens - Honey, I want the heart, I want the soul - I want control right now."

In a word, Springsteen's blood 'n' guts, heart 'n' soul approach is paradoxical, paradoxical because the tremendously compelling moments on this record become tainted by the overall pattern of romantic bombast. One minute he is yanking his sprawling, unhappy voice to emphatic extremes, only to try to tighten the choking knot tighter in the next. Once the songs have accumulated, the overkill erupts. One listens to the music, forgets the lyrics, forgets the anguish, taps his toes. As Blake put it, "Excess sorrow laughs." The essence of melodrama.

Criticism aside, Darkness is nonetheless an excellent album, and at his best Mr. Springsteen is still a griplingly terse street poet.

Murkier, more manic, more resigned than Born To Run, Darkness's locale remains the same as its predecessors, perhaps even more so. Everywhere images of entrapment and uncertainty abound. "The mansions of glory" have delapidated into "mansions of fear of pain." The night or darkness is alluded to in every one of the ten songs here. Add the numerous other references to driving, state lines, "dusty roads" and "rattlesnake highways", the radio, the land, and the girl, and the scene is set. This is timeless Americana Springsteens writes and sings about. His narrow, yet intense portrayal of the broken dreams of the James Deans who drive, love, and cry in the Utah desert aboard their hot Chevies in a sense make him the William Faulkner of rock 'n' roll.

WOOLF expands

This year the Williams Organization for Outdoor Living for Freshmen (WOOLF) expanded its program, sending out fourteen groups on three trips during the first weeks of the semester.

Each group had at least two leaders and two groups had three leaders.

Three professors also went out on Woolf trips this year. David Langston of the English Department, David Park of the Physics Department, and Hugh Criswell of the Psychology Department all joined the students.

Last year's WOOLF founders, Tom Black, Paul Goren, Mike Hill and Sue Conley, all '80, acted as the administrative committee for this year's program. Four sophomores, Ted Wolf, Donna Vallas, Judy Beck, and Pete Didisheim, formed the coordinating committee. This year's coordinating committee will become next year's administrative committee and in this way leadership for the program will be passed from class to class.

Different groups were taken up the Taconic and Appalachian Trails, and into the Mt. Greylock Reservation.

The WOOLF trips act as an extension of, not an alternative to, the regular Freshman Days program.

whose uses of the property would be consistent with the College's original purposes in acquiring it in 1963 — namely, the protection of the College and the town against the possibility that the property would be developed in undesirable ways."

The property first became available when its former owners, the Prentisses, bequeathed the property in 1962 to the Lenox Hill Hospital in New York for use as a rehabilitation site. The new owners found the property too far from the hospital for effective use, and began to sell parcels of it. When some prospective purchasers became interested who intended to "develop the area intensely," said Chandler, the College acquired the property to avoid development of the area in undesirable ways.

In 1977, the College seriously considered selling the property to many duals for development as private residences on large parcels of land, provided the openness and scenic quality of the property was preserved. This plan was frustrated by the impossibility of installing proper sanitation systems in the underlying rock. The College has used the property to host conferences.

The College acquired the property with the aid of a foundation grant, so the capital investment by the College in the farm has always been small. The financial problem created by the property has always been the operating expense, said Chandler.

The Manskers presented their offer to the College on July 20. Representatives of the administration and the trustees visited the Manskers and investigated their business operations in California. The trustees and the Manskers agreed on mutually acceptable terms in September.

Mount Hope Farm, which the college acquired in 1963 has been sold to a Missouri couple, who plan to make the estate a private residence.

WOC reroutes trail

Outing Club members spent the weekend re-routing the Pine Cobble Trail to avoid a steep and swiftly eroding section which Club directors felt was both a danger to hikers and an insult to the environment.

The new section of trail branches from the old just below Bear Spring. It runs up a long ridge through a young oak forest, through sassafrass and wintergreen. It parallels the old trail at a steady but moderate grade and rejoins the present route after about a third of a mile.

The trail was set out last spring. The final marking, as well as the cutting and clearing of the trail, were done this weekend. The new section is now open, marked with red tape, though more cutting remains. This week trail crews will blaze it with blue paint and build erosion-control devices.

The old stretch of trail will be filled in with brush and fallen timber to discourage use and promote healing of the scar.

Station seeks cash

and an FM broadcasting board. Plans for the final phase call for new AM studios and production rooms to be installed by spring 1980.

When WCFM increased its broadcasting power in 1973 from 10 watts to 44 watts, its operating costs began to rise substantially. During the next few years, Perry said, the station ran annual deficits in the range of $2,000. In 1976 WCFM's finances worsened to the extent that a $3,500 budget overrun occurred. Last year the trend continued, producing $7,000 in red ink. The station's Student Activities Tax allocation was $8,800 for 1977-78.

These budget imbalances, Svoboda hopes, are a problem of the past. "The fiscal irresponsibility that's been an element at the station for the last three years," WCFM's president said, "will not happen anymore." Many stations hire specialists, who insure a degree of continuity of experience, in contrast to the student managers who are in office only one year. WCFM is not financially able to bear this luxury. Svoboda pointed out this problem with annual personnel turnover, calling it a source of "inherent instability in scholastic media."

A twentieth anniversary celebration for WCFM is being organized to commemorate the inauguration of FM broadcasting at Williams in 1958. WCFM was one of the first college FM stations in the country.

In February 1978 WCFM hired Radio Systems Design of Philadelphia, a firm of college broadcasting experts, to analyze the station's problems. These specialists estimated that $25,000 would be necessary to equip the station with new AM and FM studios and a news and sports broadcast studio. "In addition," Perry said, "they completed a study telling us where we could move our radio antenna to get better reception and better signal reach. The site they proposed was Berlin Mountain, near the College ski area." Perry referred to Radio Systems Design as a "terrific firm," but cautioned that their recommendations may prove too expensive to implement.

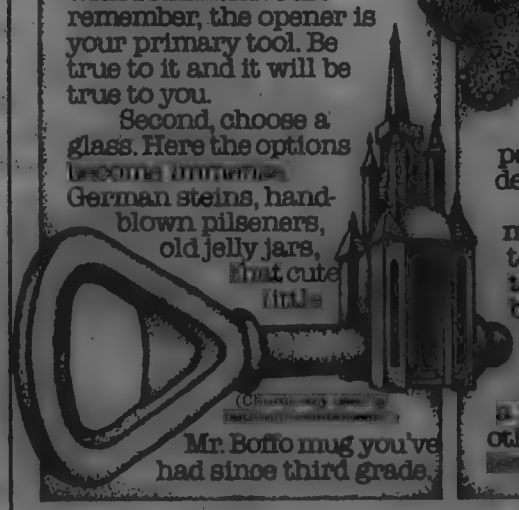
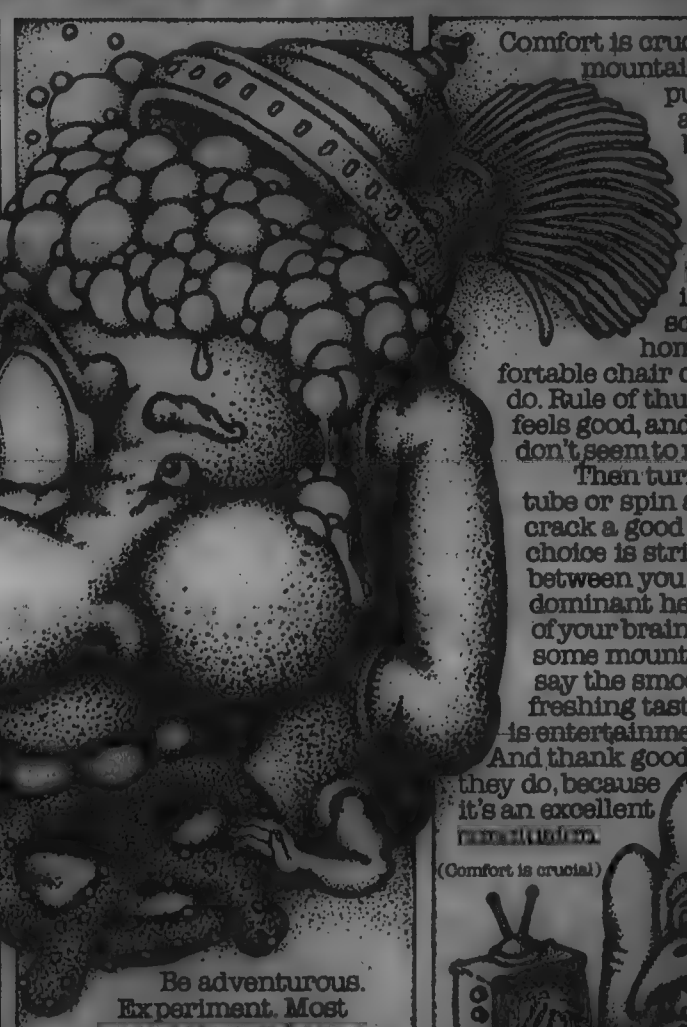
Mountaineering #2.

SELECTING THE PROPER GEAR



The Busch label is where it all begins. Note the snowy, craggy peaks affixed thereto. They are the mountains.

You are the mountaineer. And this is an ad. The subject of which is selecting the proper gear for mountaineering. (It all fits together so nicely, doesn't it?)



First and foremost, you'll need to pop the mountain top. For this task, faithful mountaineers use a church key. Secular mountaineers use a bottle opener. Don't be confused by these antics with semantics. Just remember, the opener is your primary tool. Be true to it and it will be true to you.

Second, choose a glass. Here the options become immense. German steins, hand-blown pilseners, old jelly jars, that cute little

(Chocolate Easter bunny [illegible])

Mr. Boffo mug you've had since third grade.

Be adventurous. Experiment. Most mountaineers have a personal preference. You'll develop one too.

Food is next. Proper mountaineering, not to mention proper nutrition, requires a smorgasbord selection of snacks. Some mountaineers have suffered from a potato chip deficiency, a pretzel imbalance or other serious dietary deficiencies. Plan ahead.

Comfort is crucial. If you mountaineer in public, pick a padded bar stool, preferably one that spins (to facilitate admiring the scenery). At home, a comfortable chair or sofa will do. Rule of thumb: if it feels good, and the police don't seem to mind, do it.

Then turn on the tube or spin a tune or crack a good book. The choice is strictly between you and the dominant hemisphere of your brain. Of course, some mountaineers say the smooth, refreshing taste of Busch is entertainment enough. And thank goodness they do, because it's an excellent [illegible].

Don't just reach for a beer. BUSCH® Head for the mountains.

The Williams soccer team had a successful preseason record of 4-2, including victories over central Connecticut, RPI, Castleton, and the Alumni.

Eph gridders demo Dartmouth 34-7

by Mary Kate Shea

For at least the next few days, the coaches and players of the Dartmouth College football team will be trying to figure out just what hit them last Saturday afternoon, when the Ephmen outplayed and outscored them 34-7 in a scrimmage at Dartmouth's Memorial Field.

The Williams team really "came to play," and led its opponent in virtually every category.

The Eph defense got off to a quick start when sophomore Brian Benedict snagged an interception on Dartmouth's first set of plays on offense. Four plays later, a long Rick Walter punt put Dartmouth deep in its own territory and super-tight defensive play forced the Big Green to punt from their 20-yard line. Williams then started an offensive drive that led to its first points of the afternoon.

Junior halfback Dave Massucco ran for seven yards on the opening play of the series, then gained another three for a Williams first down. Greg Collins' eight-yard run and John Dell'Erario's 15-yard gain secured another first down for the Ephs. The scoring drive was completed by Massucco when he romped 13 yards for a touchdown, rushing the ball he started four plays earlier. Williams first extra point attempt was unique, if not successful. The kick was fumbled, recovered, and rescued by placekicker Ken Hollingsworth, who then launched an incomplete pass to Massucco in the endzone.

An interception by defensive back Greg McAleenan on a first down pass attempt abruptly ended any Dartmouth hopes for a long series and initiated an 80-yard scoring drive.

Sophomore quarterback Bob Lutz orchestrated a ground attack led by the running of the Williams backfield of Collins, Dell'Erario and Massucco. The drive, which started on the Williams 20-yard line and saw the Ephs reach the first down marker three times, culminated when Collins plunged the final yard through the Big Green line on a fourth down situation. Hollingsworth's kick on the extra point attempt split the crossbars, as did his next three tries during the scrimmage.

Several sets of downs later, Dartmouth rallied with a combination of running and pass plays that took the Big Green 70 yards for its only score of the afternoon. Quarterback Larry Margerum threw a six-yard pass, the extra point was good, and Dartmouth was on the scoreboard with five minutes left in the half.

Throughout the second half, the Williams defense stifled Dartmouth's ground and air attacks, while the Eph offense continued to grind.

Following Williams' tight defensive play, including a sack by junior Jim Reimer for an eight-yard Dartmouth loss, the Ephs offense took over on the Dartmouth 37-yard line. The drive, which consisted of just four plays, included short runs by Collins and Dell'Erario and featured two pretty passes from Lutz to Hollingsworth. The first pass produced a 14-yard gain and the second, a 23-yard toss, found Hollingsworth in the endzone with less than five minutes gone in the third quarter.

The Ephs's tight defense once again held its opponent and allowed the Williams offense yet another chance to score. A sack by sophomore Mark Deuschle and tight pass coverage by senior Don Rice on three separate occasions thwarted the Dartmouth attack, and the Ephs took possession on their own 31-yard line.

Led by the running of junior Vernon Davis and freshman George Wheatley, and the pass combination of Lutz to junior Rick Walter (14- and 16-yard completions for first downs), Williams ended the third quarter in possession of the football and resumed its attack in the opening minute of the final stanza. Davis took a handoff from Lutz with 13:54 remaining in the game and slipped into the endzone. The extra point kick by Hollingsworth made it 27-7 Williams.

The Ephs final touchdown was a product of a ground attack sparked by the bulldozer-like running of sophomore fullback Bill Novicki. The key plays of the series followed back-to-school illegal procedure penalties against the Ephs. On a 2nd-and-16 situation, Novicki ran for seven yards; then, on fourth down, sophomore QB Bob Stackpole completed a nine-yard pass for a first down, allowing the Williams drive to continue. Wheatley then carried the ball for a nine-yard gain on first down. Novicki and Wheatley were both stopped up by the Dartmouth defensive line before Novicki finally took a handoff from Stackpole with just inches to go and plunged through for the touchdown. Hollingsworth completed his perfect extra point-kicking performance with his fourth good kick in an many attempts.

Defensive back Tom Hobert grabbed the Eph's fourth interception of the afternoon with a little less than six minutes remaining in the scrimmage. The Ephs ran four plays, only to be held at the one-yard line by the Big Green defense.

Following two strong pre-season scrimmage performances against Hofstra and Dartmouth, coach Bob Odell's gridders will continue practice this week in preparation for their season opener at home against the Hamilton Continentals this Saturday (Sept. 23) at 2 p.m. on Weston Field.

Booters shutout Conn

by Dave Barra

Williams soccer cruised to four victories against a pair of losses in this year's initial stages.

The Ephs' goaltending was spotless against Central Connecticut Saturday as the team overpowered the Blue Devils 2-0. Doug Orr and Doug Cobb split the assignment in the net and kept their opponents off the scoreboard. Gregg Hargman powered a free kick past Central Connecticut's diving keeper midway through the second period and junior Jeff Coombs provided the insurance goal by heading a Neal McLaughlin cross into the corner of the net.

Wednesday the Ephmen rolled unhampered to a 4-1 victory over RPI's Engineers. Gregg Hartman scored twice and assisted on a third goal with co-captain Perry Nelson. Williams' final tally came when senior Henry Lee set up freshman Marty White for a clean breakaway.

The squad opened its preseason schedule a week ago Saturday at the annual Albany tournament. The Ephs quickly dropped a pair of games 1-0 to Colgate and Albany State, finally untracking its offense to beat Castleton State 3-2. The defense looked strong in all three games, but Williams' opponents capitalized on restarts converting two penalties into game-winning goals. At half-time during the Castleton game, Coach Jeff Vennell had some words for his sluggish booters. Within minutes they took effect, as Hartman exploded for two goals to break the 1-1 halftime deadlock.

The Williams team continued in its winning ways against the alumni the next day, beating its elders 4-3 in a hard-fought contest. Junior Van Townsend had the day's prettiest goal on an unassisted corner kick.

Netwomen drop opener to Tufts 8-1

In their first match of the season, the varsity women's tennis team suffered a tough 8-1 loss to Tufts University. The sole victory belonged to the third doubles team—a sturdy freshman duo of Melanie Thompson and Ann Johnson with a score of 6-4, 6-

Four of the six singles matches were very close and possibly could have fallen in favor of either team. Junior Becky Chase, leading up the singles play, fought with determination throughout her three set match, but finally lost in a 5-2 tie-breaker. Another Junior, Trudie tenBrocke, won her first set 6-2, but lost the remaining two sets, 6-1, 6-3. Sophomores Laura Goebel and Mary Simpson both lost in close 6-3, 7-5 matches. Other singles players were Ann Morris and Mary Tom Higgs, both losing in two sets.

Captain Amy Demorest and Laura Katz, combining efforts to form a strong doubles team in the top position, lost to a more aggressive team, 6-3, 6-2. Kristin Dale and Barbara Ernst also took a two set defeat, 6-2, 6-1. Freshmen Thompson and Johnson handled their opponents with ease to take a strong 6-4, 6-0 win. Two other freshmen, Jamie Harris and Kate Downey, won a 6-4, 6-3 exhibition doubles match.

This is the first time ever that Tufts has defeated Williams in women's tennis. Now a relatively young team, the Ephwomen are playing without five of last year's seniors; but the frosh are quickly filling the positions. The team is further strengthened by senior Barbara Ernst, who returns from a school year abroad in Germany.

This coming Tuesday the women will travel to Vassar for a match which was postponed last Friday due to rain. It will be a good opportunity for them to re-affirm and sharpen their games before they meet Mt. Holyoke at the home courts on Thursday.

Ruggers prepare for season start

For twenty seasons the Williams Rugby Football Club has battled opponents with spirit on the field and spirits off the field. The ruggers may face a challenging year due to the loss of almost an entire side's worth of players at graduation.

A new crop of freshmen and upperclassmen have joined the ranks, and under the guidance of club president Steve Werble '79 and captains Peter Brooks '79 and Jeff Dunn '80, the WRFC will prevail.

In the home opener on the 23rd, the ruggers meet Springfield at 11:00 on Cole Field. Later in the season, rugby alums, otherwise known as The Olde Farts, return for the annual game, this year in commemoration of the sport's twentieth anniversary on campus. The Club will also meet Colgate, Union and Amherst this fall and hopes to tour Europe in the spring.

Women's Rugby will kick off a new season on Saturday, also against Springfield. Both men's and women's teams always welcome newcomers. Practice is at 4:00 on Cole Field.

Cross country season opens

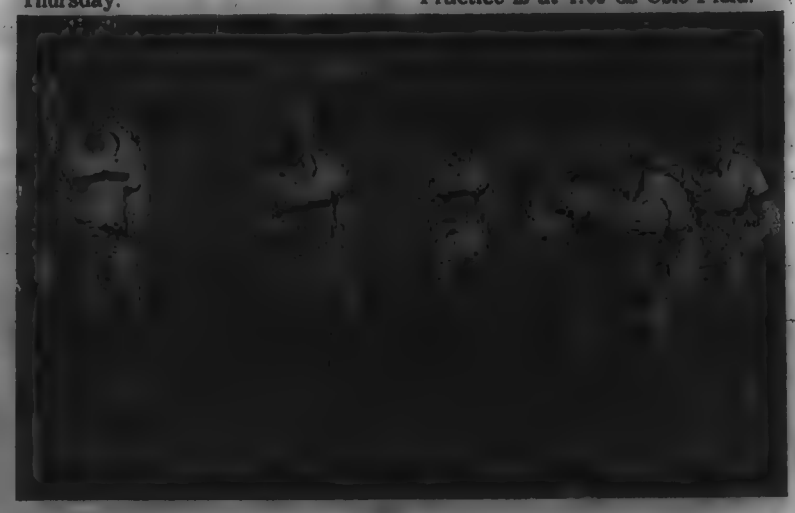
Women surprise...

The women's cross-country team, in its first race of the season, finished a strong third in a field of seven teams competing in last Saturday's Williams Invitational meet. The University of Vermont won the race, held on Williams' 3.2 mile home course.

Senior co-captain Mary Hakala provided the team's best individual performance, placing fourth. Freshman Sue Marchant was next for Williams in 14th place, followed by seniors Corrie Johnson, 17th; and Tannis Fox, 21st; and freshman Brenda Mailman, 28th. Stephanie Carperos, Liz Martineau, Meg Washburne, Tammy Shea, Mary Ann Sandrini, Alexis Hamill, and Annie Ko rounded out the Williams squad. Sixty-one women competed in all.

It was the first collegiate meet for most members of the team. Coach Doug Armstrong, also in his first year with college-level women's cross-country competition, was pleased with the results of this early race. The team will travel to the University of Massachusetts campus in Amherst for a dual meet Friday.

The Williams men's cross country team suffered its first dual meet loss dropping a 25-35 decision to R.P.I.



Men shocked

The men's cross country team suffered its first dual meet loss in two years in the season opener at R.P.I. on Saturday. The Engineers surprised the Ephs 25-35, while Williams managed to salvage a narrow 27-29 victory over Siena College.

Heading the effort for Williams were senior co-captains Tom Schreck and Steve Polasky, who tied for second place. Still, each echoed the other's disappointment with both individual and team performances. "The whole team was very tired today. Everyone is a little out of shape, and this means the first meets have to be secondary to our training." Tired or not, both easily outdistanced R.P.I.'s first man, and lost only to Siena standout Tom Dalton.

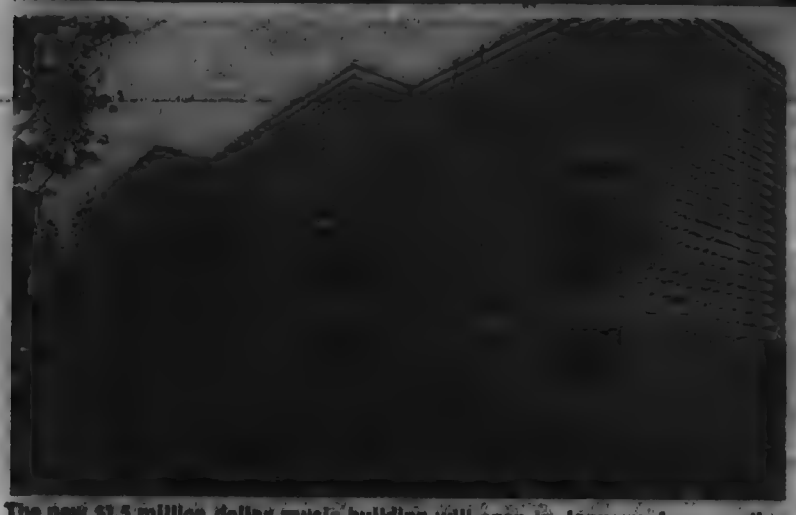
Unfortunately, the Ephs behind the co-captains fell apart. Sophomore Phil Darrow faded on the hills in the middle of the course and could manage only eleventh place behind six Engineers. Soph Cam Virrill and junior Mike Behrman wrapped up the scoring for Williams, placing fifteenth and sixteenth, respectively.

Though somewhat dejected, the Ephs hope to bounce back when junior Garrick Leonard and soph John McCammond rejoin the team this week after nursing various ills. This boost, plus the continued development of some of the slow starters, should give more support to Schreck and Polasky and toughen the Ephs for the coming big meets.

Rugby Football Club president Steve Werble '79 and captains Peter Brooks '79 and Jeff Dunn look forward to a successful season.

Golfers ace opponents

On a windy Wednesday afternoon, a smooth-swinging Williams College golf juggernaut drubbed Albany State and RPI. Firing a dive man total of 397, the Eph linksters crushed Albany State by 21 strokes and the RPI Engineers by 41. The squad stands at 2-0 for the year, and looks optimistically toward an undefeated season.



Like good wine, co-captain Bill Upton seems to get better with age. Inspired by the irrepressible Dick Tiddy of Arnold Palmer's Bay Hill Club in Orlando, Upton subdued Mother Tarsons with a fine 78. Three strokes behind Upton, Marcel Oudin used his tremendous upper body strength to block out the effects of a ravaging hook.

Tying for third with 80s were Ed "Big" Bousa and senior co-captain Dan Katz. For some reason, Katz decided to play three pin-ball while groveling his way to pars in a manner beneath the integrity of former greats like 1976 captain Doug Chumbley. Bousa ran into double-bogey trouble late in the round. "Big's" 80 was still a respectable score, and no doubt he will gear up his patented shotmaking talents to produce more good numbers.

Bill Sprague '81, 1976 Exeter golf captain, returned the fifth counting score of 82. Sprague began the day smoking his drives and staking iron shots on the flag, but the talented sophomore faded badly on the last nine.

The new $1.5 million dollar music building will open in January, four months behind schedule. (photo by Prasad)

January means music

by Tim Wang

The 1.5 million dollar music building will open this January, four months behind schedule, according to Kenneth Roberts, chairman of the Building Committee and professor of Music.

Roberts noted, though, that construction costs for the music building have stayed "pretty much within what we had settled upon." He added that while these costs of the building have been met, the college has not yet raised the endowment needed for its maintenance.

The builders encountered many problems during the summer construction. Roberts cited the fact that one of the subcontractors—the roofers—went bankrupt, resulting in a long delay until a replacement was found. Several strikes during June and July also resulted in temporary work stoppage. Finally, Roberts explained that the unusual construction techniques associated with an all-concrete building contributed to the slow pace of the construction.

Strikes over the summer resulted in temporary work stoppage

Although Roberts is "appalled at how slow the construction is going," he nevertheless emphasized that he would be "happy to get a well made buiding late rather than a shoddily constructed one on time."

In January, the Music Department's annual Young Artists Series in the new facility. A series of three concerts—a brass ensemble, a woodwind quartet, and a solo singer—will be held in the new 300 seat recital hall, "in order for us to test out the accoustics of the recital hall before holding our own performances in it" Roberts explained.

Beethoven's string quartets will be performed during April and May

The opening ceremony for the new music building has not been completely settled upon. However, Roberts mentioned that two have tentatively been planned.

The first is an informal open house that will be held on some Saturday at the start of second semester. Different activities will be held in each room, such as choral rehearsals, instrumental practice sessions, and so forth. "The public will be invited in and allowed to wander around the building," explained Roberts.

The second half of the opening celebration will be more formal and will involve a series of concerts by a string quartet from Oberlin College. The New Hungarian Quartet will play the complete cycle of Beethoven's string quartets in a series of five performances during April and May. Roberts added that there will also be two free lectures on the quartets by "a distinguished guest from Berkeley."

The College plans to host a special affair for individuals who have donated money for the new music facility. According to Roberts, President Chandler has invited the families of approximately one dozen donors to attend a tour of the building, dinner, and a performance of Beethoven's music.

Finance Committee tightens reins on student organizations

by Priscilla Cohen

Fifteen student organizations overspent more than $10,000 last year. The Finance Committee has taken several steps to prevent this from happening again. The College Council remains in the black by $3100, however, since many groups had money left over.

Among the groups most heavily in debt are WCFM by $4700, Back Talk by $1047, ACEC by $748, and Lehman Service by $639. "Overspending is a disturbance to other groups and each student at Williams," said Mark Lanier '80, member of the Finance Committee. The Finance Committee has voted that no group can be granted money until its unpaid debt has been "satisfied." The means of satisfying the debt may vary with each organization, and does not necessarily require repayment.

Twenty-four out of the 39 organizations on campus that were granted allocations did not spend all their money. The Lecture Committee finished the year with $1430, the Gargoyle Society with $553, and the Coffee House with $149. These groups will probably receive less money this year.

A new system to prevent student organizations from overspending their budgeted sum has been devised by John Simpson '79, chairman of the Finance Committee. Whenever an organization wants to issue a check, it must fill out a voucher form indicating for what it plans to use the money. A monitor from the Finance Committee, who has been assigned certain groups, must approve this form. It is only after Matt Heineman '79, the bookkeeper, checks the account that the business office can make the funds available.

"This new program won't give groups as much leeway as they want, but this is necessary," said Heineman. In the past, groups could go directly to Rita Gardner, the Business Office's handler of student organization accounts. The FinComm had no record of how this money was spent.

The Committee will now be doing the bookkeeping for every group. "Organizations will always know their balance and will not go in the red," said Darrell McWhorter '81, secretary of the Finance Committee.

WSP changes probable

by Ann Morris

A respresentative from the Winter Study Project Committee (WSP) told College Council Wednesday night that changes in the January term are "probable."

Committee member Susan Laidlaw '80 explained that the committee, composed of students and faculty, is in charge of making a recommendation to President Chandler this fall concerning the future of the program. The prevailing opinion on the committee, Laidlaw said, is that the program be made more rigorous while keeping in mind student demands for courses which are not purely academic.

In an attempt to recover funds owed to the Council, the Finance Committee has distributed notices to those student organizations which overspent their last year's budget, Council Treasurer John Simpson '79 reported. These organizations' debts, he said, must be "satisfied" before their 1978-1979 funding will be considered. Organizations may set up a payment schedule for their debt, choose for it to be deducted from this year's allocation, or prove that the debt was accumulated by an "unavoidable" bookkeeping error, Simpson explained. The Finance Committee also voted to allocate $400 to the Williams Coffeehouse for the presentation of folk singer Michael Cooney. David Schwartz '81, recommended by the Elections Committee, was approved by the Council as the new Finance Committee member.

College Council Vice-President Chris Jenkins '80 announced the procedure for electing the two additional student members to the Shareholders' Advisory Committee. Interested students will submit applications to the Dean's Office. The Elections Committee will recommend four of the applicants to the Council,

College respects community perogatives

by Eric Schmitt

New Log closing hours of midnight on Monday through Thursday became effective last Monday in response to complaints from town residents, Log manager Mike Masi '78 said.

Citizen complaints of excessive noise from the Log brought the matter before the selectmen, who in turn asked the College, which operates and maintains the Log, to respond to the issue.

Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad, a member of the Log supervisory committee, said that after a discussion with College President John Chandler and Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor, the College decided to permanently change the Log's closing hours from 1 a.m. to midnight Monday through Thursday. Friday and Saturday night closing time will remain at 1 a.m.; the Log opens at 9 p.m. Monday through Saturday.

Masi said things have quieted down considerably since the first week of school, and he does not anticipate any future problems. The new closing hours, according to Masi, may inconvenience a few students but will not hurt business.

The Log committee will meet Wednesday to review the present situation.

In another town-college related issue, the fourteen women currently living in Dewey House will move to other buildings by the beginning of the second semester Roosenraad said.

Roosenraad explained that a five-year zoning permit granting student dormitory status expires at the end of the year, and with additional newly-removated rooms in Garfield House, the maintenance of an extra building would not be economically feasible.

"We hadn't intended to use Dewey at all this year," Roosenraad said, "but with the unexpectedly large upperclass enrollment increase in freshman class, the lower level of attrition of upperclassmen and loss of two floors (of upperclassmen housing) of West College, it was necessary to use Dewey until other rooms became available through attrition"

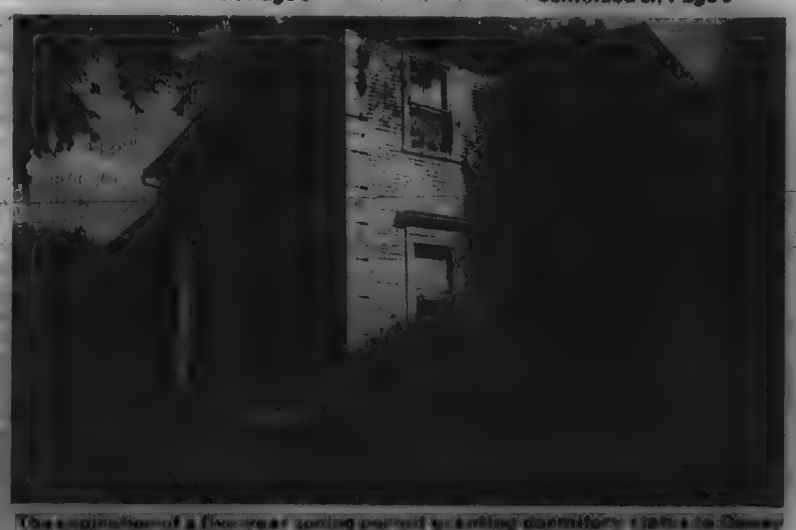
CEP opens meetings

In its first meeting of the year, the Committee on Educational Policy agreed to open its meetings and documents to the campus press.

In the past, CEP meetings have been closed, although the CEP often exercised its option to open individual meetings to the press. Professor William R. Moomaw, chairman of the CEP, noted that the committee would go into closed session when the discussion centered on specific individuals.



Some of the members of the CEP objected to opening the meetings to the press on the grounds that, in the past, preliminary discussions had been reported by the press as being final decisions. Moomaw added, "I hope to have open forums from time to time to prevent some of the problems that occurred last year when the campus community was not aware of what the CEP was doing."

Joel Smith '79, at-large representative to the CEP, commented, "The idea of forums is a good one but only scare tactics seem to bring people out. Maybe if students aren't responding that indicates where students' interests are. I hope not."

Both Moomaw and Smith agreed that many of the big educational policy issues will come from outside the CEP. Moomaw said, "Although the Winter Study Committee reports to President Chandler, the CEP will be involved in what goes to the faculty. Working with the Ad Hoc working Group on the Curriculum will be an important part of our year." Smith added that he was extremely interested in a general education program that would work positively, by creating incentives for students to broaden their course selection rather than a proposal that would act negatively, by enacting additional requirements. Smiths aid, "I don't want to put people in classes in which they don't want to be."

The CEP will review the Contract Major program and will report to the faculty. The faculty will have the options of changing resuthorizing, or terminating the program. The CEP will also look at grade inflation. Moomaw emphasized, "We first have to find out what 'Grade Inflation' really is and then we can decide what, if anything, needs to be done about it." The CEP will also discuss the use of the grade point average, bearing in mind that the third digit is

by Lorraine Driscoll

Folk-rock musician Livingston Taylor will kick off this year's ACEC concert season on Thursday, October 5 in Chapin Hall. Admission will be $3.00 for students, and $5.00 for others.

In an agreement reached between the administration and the ACEC, Chapin Hall will be available for concerts on a limited basis for "low energy" types of concerts, says co-chairman John Svoboda '79. The administration is worried about using Chapin Hall for large concerts. Often, a great deal of equipment is involved that requires the construction of sound wings; the lighting equipment interferes with the fire code.

"I'm in total agreement with the administrative decisions. They've been more than cooperative; they've gone out of their way to meet our needs while protecting their own interests. They have a legitimate grievance," said Svoboda.

The ACEC plans for another concert to be held for the weekend, on either November 2 or 3 in the fieldhouse, but no band has been booked. Svoboda expressed concern over the College Council appropriation ACEC received. He speculated that they are reluctant to allocate more funds because of the "limited external benefits students receive from concerts." However, the committee now plans to expand into alternate forms of entertainment on campus.

Weston Uber Alles?

The College Council began the year bravely intending to re-establish its credibility among students. Unfortunately, it has chosen to accomplish this by ignoring a long list of important issues and instead attacking a two-foot wide section of Weston Language Center.

The object of the council's opposition is a section of brickwork on the west wall of Weston in the shape of a broken cross. In 1902, when the building was constructed, the symbol represented a Navajo peace symbol. More recently the German National Socialist Party adopted the mirror image of this symbol as the party emblem, the swastika.

The current plan calls for the College to replace the brickwork to erase the symbol, at College expense.

Although we applaud the council's concern for the sensibilities of students who might be offended by the symbol (or its mirror image), we wish that a more rational means to efface the symbol, such as covering it with ivy as is the east wall of the building, were selected.

We fear, however, that while the CC concerns itself with a relatively minor issue more important things will escape its attention. For instance as energy prices rise, the cost of attending Williams escalates; why does the council not tirade against student and faculty wastefulness? The executive committee meets with the trustees on Thursday, why has the council as a whole not contributed to the creation of the committee's presentation?

Department recommendations for faculty reappointments and tenure decisions go to the Committee on Appointments and Promotions next month; why is the council not soliciting, compiling and transmitting student opinion on the faculty being evaluated? (Vandalism in Mission Park was so serious last year that Buildings and Grounds had to hire student monitors to patrol the halls; why has the council ignored an opportunity to do something constructive towards prevention?) CC President Bronson Fargo '79 has said he wants to sponsor a series of open forums on College issues; why has the council not discussed topics, or begun to set dates, places or times for them?

Apparently the Council wants a quick victory to enhance its own prestige. Attacking brickwork is easier than going after real substantive problems. Unfortunately, the substantive problems, as well as student scorn of the CC, will remain.

Log hours

To the editor:

Few things are as disheartening as the recent news concerning the proposed shortening of the Log's business hours from 1 A.M. to 12 A.M. For most students who frequent the Log, along with visitors from other colleges similar to Williams, even one o'clock is extremely early. It would be one thing if Williams was located in an urban environment, where other drinking establishments could be substituted for the Log to continue the intellectual discourse and good cheer. But in a rural environment this change will do nothing but emphasize the many disadvantages of the lack of variety and choice in the social life of a Williams student.

In the short run—before any monumental change such as moving the Log north of Route 2—I wonder if the residents of Spring Street will be aided by hearing the slight noise at 12:15 A.M. rather than 1:15. As a resident of Spring Street myself (Morgan East) I doubt it.

Bascom's dilemma

To the editor:

We of Bascom House would like to extend our appreciation to ghe genius who exposed our social dilemma. We were shocked, nay, truly "boneheaded"-out (Thanks to Belle Anderson. We will dispense with ringing you further) to discover that we misunderstood the issue—we thought we had voted for co-op. We were jolted to find that we had voted for co-ed.

As an aside you might be interested to know that we have agreed upon the aesthetic qualities of the paper clip and that steps are now being taken to construct one in front of Bascom House.

Sour Pickles

by Peter Rintels

I have just concluded a Purple Key freshman seminar on the philosophy of humor and present here, for the curious, the results of our meditations:

BEING: Being is a very good thing, except possibly in certain neighborhoods of Cleveland. Being stands in a dialectical relationship with Non-Being, but seeing as that's Being's problem, what do we care? The next best thing to Being is Becoming, and the next best thing after that is a good pastrami sandwich. People who are having trouble with their Being should see a doctor, or take Ogilvy's "Consciousness" course.

AESTHETICS: Beauty may or may not be in the eyes of the beholder. We can say definitely, however, that it is not in his pockets. We can only know beauty in the presence of ugliness, which is why Baxter Hall was built. On the question of whether we innately recognize beauty, we propose the following experiment. Place a six week or so old baby in the middle of a room. On a record player to the baby's right, play Bach. On a record player to the baby's left, play chess with a good friend. What will the baby do? We predict that the baby will begin to cry and ruin the whole experiment. Babies are not the best friends of philosophers.

SOCIETY: Society was created for the good of mankind, not mankind for the good of society, but we think it's a good idea to pay your taxes anyway. Without society, men will act like animals. Even with society, many men will act like animals. Some people just like to be difficult like that. Languages are man's most important social tools, but you still can't find them in a hardware store. According to Emil Durkheim, "society is a synthesis sui generis of particular consciousnesses." We have no idea what Durkheim is talking about; we just thought we'd add class to this discussion by quoting him.

EPISTEMOLOGY: We believe that certain knowledge is impossible to attain, but we do not know for certain. A little knowledge is a dangerous thing, and too little is especially dangerous, particularly during exam periods. While it is impossible to experience reality directly, you can get reliable second hand information by calling (212) 413-2525 and asking for Vito. No matter what you believe about epistemology, knowledge cannot be gained by reading the Boston papers.

JUSTICE: Justice is better than injustice and injustice is better than justice. That makes no sense at all, but it was getting late. We do not understand why people holding forth on justice must wear black robes, although we agreed that it's better than their wearing pink robes with flowers on them. Justice is not blind, but it is very nearsighted. If you want a definition of justice, read Plato and leave us alone.

Beneath The Peaceful Shadow

In the Religion Department a good deal of emphasis is placed on what is known as "The Myth of the Eternal Return". Under this th eory, primitive man is said to be so scared of the prospect of the future that he re-creates the beginning of the world once a year. Thus, the archaic man never allows time, and the events in it, to progress to a point where they have not been before; when he cannot control them, or understand them.

The other day I picked up a folio of old Record-Advocates (the forerunner of the Record) for the academic year 1974-75. I chose that period since it was the most recent year since which an entire turnover in the student body has occurred.

While leafing through the old papers, I jotted down what seemed to be the important stories. They included the following: co-ed housing in general, CEP discussions on more requirements, problems with Winter Study, advising troubles, the question of diversity, funding of the ACEC, an experiment in co-ed entries in Morgan, stories citing a lack of student activism, apartheid in South Africa, JA selection, grade inflation, proposed changes in the College Council

In other words, the issues seem to be pretty steady throughout the years: the same questions are discussed by each "generation" of Williams students. But of course, that is to be expected, and is certainly not surprising in itself. What is surprising, though, is the amount of action taken, the number of decisions made on the basis of all the discussing which has been going on these four long years.

I mention all this only because the College Council is about to become engaged in sponsoring a series of forums on various campus issues, with (I believe) the first one dealing with diversity. Other forums, I would guess, will take up other of the above-mentioned topics.

No doubt such forums are a useful sort of thing to conduct, especially since these issues—which are actiaully quite old—are new to so many of the students. Every entering class should be familiarized with the topics which, over the years, have proved themselves to be worthy of the ongoing attention of the College community.

But it would be a shame if these forums were not—as so many of the past—followed up on. If indeed the forums to serve the function of "consciousness raising" and general "talking things out", then they have achieved a useful purpose. But having discussions serve as ends in themselves would be to ignore another, perhaps more useful purpose: that of serving as an impetus to act on these matters which have been around for longer than we remember.

Even though one might assume that I am needling the Council unnecessarily, I think that past experience has shown that the College has a long history of piling up evidence on certain matters for years on end without ever acting on the basis of that evidence. Due to the complexity of so many issues, it often seems like the only way to go is to continue to hold forums, panel discussions, workshops, etc., ad infinitum. Just like the primitive, we are never afraid of advancing up to a certain point, but are always afraid of going beyond it.

Once again, I repeat, just holding these discussions is no doubt useful, and the Council should be praised for its wisdom. However, flushed with the success of raising the issues, the Council, or whoever, should not overlook the possibility of trying to settle some issues. I really want to emphasize that word "trying": obviously, we will never all be satisfied with whatever decisions are made, but we should also not be afraid to weigh the evidence and make the decisions.

Convocation Panel: Languages and the Liberal Arts

At the convocation panel earlier this year, eight college presidents, including our own John Chandler, along with Professor Fred Rudolph, the college marshal and a historian of education gathered to discuss "The Liberal Arts: Perspectives and Prospects." While the panel ranged over a large number of issues, many of the key questions were dealt with in the context of a discussion of the role of language study in the liberal arts. The following are excerpts from the panel's remarks.

CHANDLER: We turn now to the question of language study . . . (Some of the questions submitted to the panel were), "What do you see as the causes of the present state of linguistic ignorance? . . . What responsibility do language teachers bear? What should college presidents do to combat pandemic monolingualism?" . . . "Should colleges encourage interest in languages, or should they simply respond to the desires of the students who may or may not care for them?" Related to that, "Should there be a language requirement for graduation?"

PRESIDENT THEODORE FRIEND (Swarthmore College): We do not have a language requirement for graduation at Swarthmore. The reason why we don't is that, I think, the faculty lost faith or nerve a little bit over that in the sixties and early seventies . . . My own idea would be to have the young persons of the late twentieth century educated to speak Russian, Chinese, Japanese, Arabic . . . in addition to a few Western European languages, and maybe a little Greek and Computerese, but you can't get it all into four years, so what are you going to do? I think we probably ought to tone ourselves up and do a little more, and probably get a little more back into the requirement. I do believe it's terribly important in living in a close packed world in which we are less of a power than we were—and things aren't going to change to make us more of a power . . . to entreat ourselves to think of ourselves as more like Scandinavians in the future, because they have to learn those languages to live and get on in the world, and I think we will too.

PRESIDENT BEVERLY CAUSEY JR. (Hobart and William Smith Colleges): . . . well I think on this question of the language requirement, that we ought to think a little about why colleges rather generally have dropped the language requirement that they had say ten or fifteen years ago. And I suppose that it's because the idea of a student who is taking elementary French or intermediate French just to meet the requirement, why should he get college credit for this? I think there's a certain reluctance on the part of college faculties to give students credit for courses they take in a foreign language at the literature level, but there's some reluctance to give credit for learning the elementary and intermediate stages of a language and of requiring that. I don't know exactly how we are going to get over this hurdle. My own experience was that I found that when I was at Williams . . . the thing that was important for me was that I began German, and if I hadn't taken German for three years it would have made a great difference to me in my later career . . . One of the things I try to encourage in students at the colleges where I have been is the importance of language study and how it opens vistas for you that you wouldn't otherwise have. . . . I studied Chinese for less than a year, and I really don't know much, but that has changed my life, and the interest and the knowledge, even very elementary, of not only the spoken language but of the Chinese characters . . . it begins to open your mind and expose you to something which is quite different from anything in your previous experience. Therefore I think language is a very broadening thing and it has a very important place, I think, in the liberal arts curriculum.

CHANDLER: . . . at Williams there is under consideration now the question of whether a language requirement should be reinstituted . . .

PRESIDENT LOUIS HASELMAYER (Iowa Wesleyan College): . . . I would say that colleges that have had a long, long tradition of foreign language study as a requirement, and even when it wasn't a requirement had a substantial elective enrollment, and who still have a selective admissions policy, and who keep a curriculum that is still fairly traditional certainly should do everything conceivable to place foreign language study in a position of the utmost priority. I think anyone who gives any kind of service to the concept of liberal education would feel that the monolingual person . . . is a person who is blind to many, many things about language, people and communication.

PRESIDENT WILLARD ENTEMEN (Bowdoin College): I think . . . (there is a) problem that we have with requirements in general and that relates back to the American high school system . . . which tends unhappily to imitate the colleges rather than do what they need to do to counteract the colleges. Perhaps the only good argument that I've ever heard for reinstating college requirements is to force these standards back into the high schools. . . . The high schools, when we gave up requirements, instead of saying, "if they're not going to have required English courses in college, if they're not going to have required language courses in college, then we'd better give it to them" said "We'll do the same thing too," and in a kind of mindless way simply imitated what they thought was going on in colleges, which they didn't understand. . . . They left us now, in many cases, in a really kind of desperate situation with students whose minds are closed, not by their own choosing . . . but simply closed by an inability to break out of a kind of provincialism, which after all is in some sense what liberal education is up to overcoming. . . . And it's very difficult now if you are increasingly being delivered students who have simply smatterings of funny little stuff in strange courses in high school, but who never had any serious work on which you can build. So I think it's a more general question than just language requirements . . .

CHANDLER: One of the ironies of a place such as Williams is that enough students are privileged enough to travel even prior to coming to Williams that they discover that they can get along quite well in English almost anywhere in the world, and that undercuts the motivation for foreign language study . . . But that situation is not going to last . . . More and more, as the technological inventions of the world come from other countries and cultures and as our economic and political influence wanes, knowledge of other languages is going to become a very practical necessity, so that there is a lot of pure self-interest of that kind, it seems to me, that should be involved in the calculations and decisions that students are making today as to whether to study foreign languages.

PROF. RUDOLPH: . . . it seems to me that the tone of this discussion has had to do with the utility of language, the usefulness of it. I'd like to hear the argument in terms of its significance as a liberal art, as an aspect of the experience of the college where people learn who they are . . . We haven't been talking about the literature, we've been talking about whether you can talk French or Chinese. Good God, that's not what we're here for . . . It seems to me that languages have been put into a rather strange category. Latin and Greek were two useless languages all through the 19th century. The history of what happened to Latin and Greek was that people said that German and French were more useful, . . . and finally none of them was useful at all, and all you needed was English, and you didn't need that because you had a television set. That's what's really going on, isn't it?

CHANDLER: . . . as one who spent six years studying Greek, one of the useless 19th century languages, I think the principal educational benefit and the enduring one, and the basis of my own strong conviction that students are missing out very badly in the liberal arts if they don't take a foreign language was the lesson that a language is a kind of a set of conceptual spectacles, and that language opens up a particular way of looking at the world, self-understanding, and so forth, and therefore I came to appreciate my own language, and I think anybody who doesn't come to see a language in that fashion is missing out a great deal in his perception of reality . . .

Outlook ON THE LIBERAL ARTS

Divisional Structure, Course Requirements

A liberal arts education can be neither too narrow nor too diffuse. Its main principles should be distribution and concentration within a major, but it should preserve the student's right to determine his own educational goals and the means to achieve them. Yet while a liberal arts institution cannot prescribe specific courses for the development of the liberally educated individual, it is nonetheless responsible for devising a reasonable plan of study which requires a basic knowledge of diverse disciplines from the student.

Unfortunately, the divisional requirements at Williams do not, in this sense, foster all that a traditional liberal arts education implies. Many students who meet all of the College's academic requirements are in no way liberally educated. They lack knowledge of any area, at best, outside their division, and at worst, outside their major. The current division of departments into three overlapping and somewhat artibrary divisions, fuzzy distribution requirements of at least two courses from each division, the immaturity or unfamiliarity of many Williams students with the principles of liberal arts, or a combination of all three, may be causes.

Williams can produce more liberally educated individuals two ways. First, it could institute more specific course requirements. Second, it could redefine its academic divisions. Without curtailing the students' choices entirely, the College could require courses in areas—not divisions—appropriate to the liberal arts ideal.

Such courses would include at least one class in English literature, justified by the well-rounded individual's need to understand and express himself in his own language. Sensitivity to other cultures is fostered in the study of at least one other language; unless the student can demonstrate speaking and reading proficiency in a foreign language, he should be required to take one year of a foreign language at Williams. Beyond that, he should be urged, if not required, to take a further course in the literature of that same language.

The study of an older civilization provides the student with a different perspective on his own civilization. A liberal arts student should be required to take at least one course in religion, philosophy, classics, or history of any kind.

The social sciences;—economics, anthropology, sociology, psychology—attempt to explain some of the complex factors affecting not only American society, but other cultures world-wide. A liberally-educated student would have a basic understanding of at least one of these areas.

The logic of mathematics can be applied in almost any area of concentration. So, too, can the experimental method developed in the study of any of the so-called "hard" sciences. A Williams student should be required to take at least one course in each science department.

In addition, if Williams wishes to live up to its reputation as a haven for some of the most cultured students in the nation, the college should require at least a taste of the fine arts in the form of an art or music course.

Within a four year, 32-course structure at Williams, these requirements would fulfill the liberal arts aim of diversity without sacrificing time for concentration. If winter study courses could also be applied towards such requirements, the opportunities are increased by four.

The present two course per division requirement allows a student tehnically to complete his Williams education without being exposed to many of the aforementioned subjects vital to the liberal arts tradition.

If the college prefers to retain the nebulous "two course per division" requirement, it might consider redefining the divisions and adding the single stipulation that courses receiving distributional credit come from different departments within a division. Right now the divisions are designed such that a Division II major can receive Division I and III credit for essentially Division II courses. Certain history courses from example, can fall into any of the three categories. To eliminate overlaps, the college could create at the least one more division so that all are better defined. The new Division I would include language and literature, both English and foreign, both ancient and modern; division II, all those departments related more or less to the history of world culture; (art, art history, history, history of science, philosophy, religion, and music); division III, the social sciences (economics, anthropology, linguistics, political science, and the like); and division IV the hard sciences and math departments.

Another step in strengthening the liberal arts background of Williams graduates would be to deny divisional credit to those taking "non-major" Division III courses. Such courses are good bridges between divisions and should continue to be offered. At present, however, they seem to be contrived for the purpose of avoiding the more rigorous Division III courses.

The college unfortunately, cannot rely upon its students' initiative to improve the "liberal-mindedness" of their education at this time. Pressures, including grades and graduate school requirements make the sacrifice of a good Division I student's GPA to a basic understanding of multi-variable calculus virtually impossible and highly unlikely if no one else is required to do likewise. A college-wide implementation of more specific course requirements, new divisional structure, or any combination thereof would begin a gradition of liberal arts quality which would perpetuate itself in the mature attitudes of its students.

Soprano notes problems in the opera

by Sally Kernbluth

Students who attended Miss Rita Shane's concert on Friday night may have expected to see a huge, heavily made-up soprano floating across the stage. Instead, they were greeted by an attractive soprano, who was far from the stereotype of an opera singer.

Shane proved herself to be congenial as well as talented on Saturday morning as she fielded questions on a wide range of subjects. Although she seemed to be enjoying herself immensely, Shane was quick to note that opera is "a terrible business." She said that singing itself is wonderful, but that getting onto the stage can be a problem. The people in the business are not always fair, she noted. To withstand the subterfuge and dealings in a business like opera, a singer must be devoted to her voice and performing. Shane commented that, "I vocalise every day, at least three hours a day."

In addition, a vocalist cannot abuse her voice. Although an instrumentalist can work 150 to 200 times a year, "a singer can't grind it out that way." Shane commented. She advised all prospective singers to avoid "pounding on their voices."

The care for the voice must persist throughout a singer's career. Though obviously an accomplished singer, Shane still has a voice coach and teacher. "I have a teacher because I need my teacher's eyes and ears." She laughed as she said that a teacher can detect "jaws that wobble in the breeze and tongues that flap." Any change in a singer's mouth position can easily influence her sound.

Shane noted that hours of practicing and work may not always lead to huge salaries. Some singers do make a great deal of money, adding that, "people will pay an unbelievable price for names." A singer who earns a decent fee must pay a tremendous amount for expenses. According to Shane, a singer must pay for publicity, a manager and a teacher. A manager receives twenty per cent of a singer's fee for a concert and ten per cent for an opera even if he was not responsible for booking

The degree of a singer's fame and therefore the amount of money she will make is largely influenced by recordings. Just as in the rock world, a recording star is always wanted for concerts. "If you have someone around who has made a lot of recordings, the demand to hear them will be greater," Shane said. But since many of the companies who produce operatic records are based in Europe, recordings feature a large number of European artists.

Shane, like many other American singers, feels that American singers are "shafted." "When I was at La Scala, every one of my collegaues said 'Oh, I've been to the United States—I've been to Dallas and Chicago and I'm going to the Met in two years.' " This is particularly interesting because it takes many American signers a lifetime to get to the Metropolitan Opera.

A singer who must deal with problems, practicing and memorizing roles is under a lot of pressure. This is compounded by the limits an opera house places on a singer. Shane revealed that she has done eight leading roles at the Metropolitan Opera House with one rehearsal. "For my Met debut, I had been on the stage only for a fall guild rehearsal." A Guild rehearsal is tantamount to a performance since guild members are in the audience.

Shane may say that opera is "not a nice business," but her love for the profession is evident in both her performance and in her attitude.

Mimists combine fantasy, music and comedy

by Tracy Jennings

Bob Lawson and Jerry Prell performed their 'Illusions of Fantasy' last Friday night at the Adams Memorial Theater. A combination of energy, skill and imagination worked to make Cap and Bells' premiere production a successful and enjoyable event.

The first act contained a series of skits based on children's fantasies. Much of the mime here was original, but, to a lesser degree, the company depended on conventional mime acts. One act was particularly outstanding in both content and rendition, based on Shakespeare's seven ages of man, the act was outstanding especially in its interpretation of old age. Facial expression, an all important part of mime, was used very well to portray the old man's emotions.

Music played an important role in the production as it helped to set the moods of the acts. Ragtime was the predominant form, but a computer type of musical accompaniment provided a haunting background for an act dealing with human fears. Technically, the only type of noise in a mime show is this musical background. In the second act however the mimists occasionally used their voices.

The second act was entirely comedy. The use of voice was carefully done and did not detract from the mime. Based on the deepest fantasies found in mankind, this act was successful in creating an extremely favorable reaction from the audience. "Dr. Jeckyl and Mr. Hyde" —a series of blackouts requiring audience participation—created a high degree of hysterical laughter. But "Black Bart", "The Flasher" and "Gynecologist" were all very well received, too.

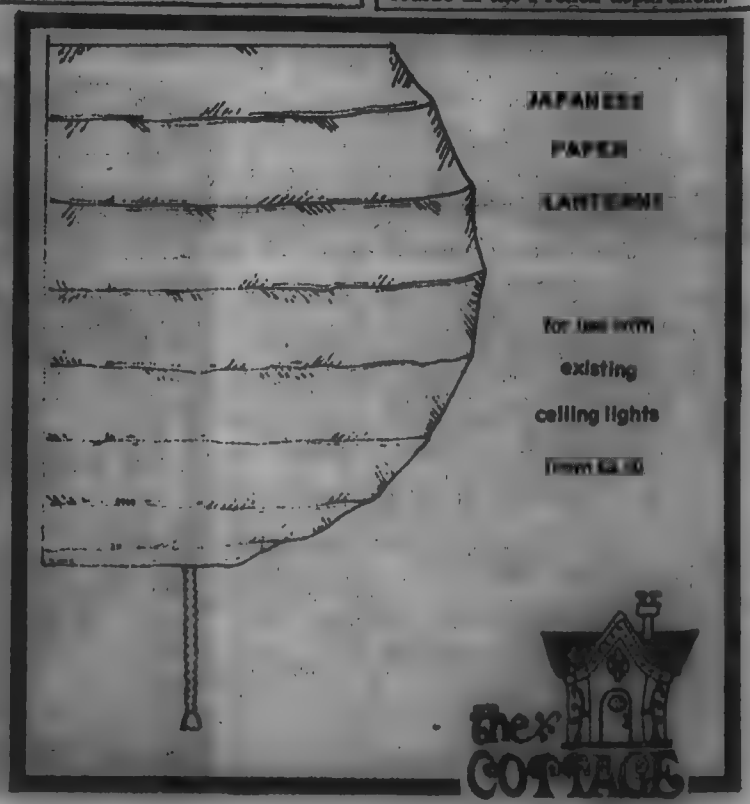
Though the first act may have contained the more interesting mime, the second act left the audience with their sides hurting. All said, Bob Lawson & Jerry Prell presented an excellent show.

Rita Shane shines in varied concert

by Jackson Galloway

The proximity of Williamstown to such major cultural centers as Boston and New York gives Williams students the opportunity to hear great artists through The Thompson Concert Series. This year's opening featured Rita Shane, soprano, in concert with William Glazier, piano.

The program emphasized Shane's versatility. Despite sloppy runs and tempo in the Handel, Miss Shane made an effortless transition into a Faure sequence of five songs which were followed by a spectacular aria from Hamlet by Thomas. This selection especially showcased the excellence of her voice and technique.



The second group of selections was characterized by lighter works not usually included in serious concert repertoire. Four Richard Strauss lieder, intended to be sung without interruption, were marred only by untimely applause from the audience. Miss Shane easily overcame this hurtle to highlight the concert with her interpretation. Three selections from operettas by Franz Lehar and Johann Strauss led into an exuberant finale, "Glitter and Be Gay" from Bernstein's Candide. Added to her talent, Shane's winning smile and ingratiating style captivated an enthusiastic audience. Her performance was met with cheers and loud applause.

Students interested in doing a Winter Study project in France on contemporary French culture are asked to attend a meeting on Thursday September 28, in Room 10, Weston Language Center, at 7:00 P.M. Participants must (1) have at least an intermediate knowledge of French and (2) have taken or be taking a course in the French department.

Malle films premiere

For the next six weeks on Friday and Sunday afternoons, the Clark Art Institute will be featuring a documentary series produced by Louis Malle and entitled Phantom India. If Part I is any indication, the film is well worth seeing. It is a deeply moving and sensitive portrayal not only about India but also about the problems that confront documentary film-makers.

Malle has made what he calls "a film of chance encounters." We see weddings and ceremonial dances and political demonstrations. We also see a number of things that are disturbing to our own sensibilities such as the monotonous spectacle of a man placing large bricks side by side. In another sequence, we watch a group of vultures descend upon the carcass of a water buffalo and gouge out its eyes. "For us it was a tragedy," Malle explains, "but for the Hindu, it was an everyday occurrence."

Malle attempts throughout to be conscious of his western outlook and he successfully avoids the ethnocentric orientation which seems to pervade most documentary films. "The seven films take the viewer on an epic journey, crammed with sights and insights, on not only basic topics like the caste system, religion, the city, poverty and the impact of modernism, but also on those aspects of life in India that seem to illuminate the whole." The movie industry, a dancing school and a red light district are among those things that are spotlighted in the film series.

Each of the seven parts of Phantom India will be shown twice, on Fridays at 1:00 and the following Sundays at 3:00 p.m. The Friday showing are free but there is a fifty cents admissions fee for Sunday. The series is being held in conjunction with the major fall exhibition at the Clark, "The Grand Mogul: Imperial Painting in India 1600-1660, which will be open until Sunday November 5.

The titles of each segment of the film are as follows: Part One: The Impossible Camera, Part Two: Things Seen in Madras, Part Three: The Indians and the Sacred, Part Four: Dream and Reality, Part Five: A Look at the Castes, Part Six: On the Fringes of Indian Society, Part Seven: Bombay—The Future India.

Youth Holding Narcissus, c.1610 by Farrukh Beg, on loan from the collection of Edwin Binney 3rd, is featured in the exhibition "The Grand Mogul: Imperial Painting in India 1600-1660" opening September 26 at the Clark.

Indian Art show opens at Clark

The Clark Art Institute's major fall exhibition, 'The Grand Mogul: Imperial Painting in India 1600-1660, began today after a public opening yesterday. The exhibition will continue through November 5. Admission to the exhibition and the Clark is free.

The Indian paintings in the exhibition, created in a period of extreme opulence and wealth, are of enormous artistic sophistication and refinement. They were produced for manuscripts and albums belonging to the Emperors Jahangir and Shah Jahan, the latter best known for his construction of the Taj Mahal. Mughal painting in the early seventeenth century is an exploration of the physical world, its forms, textures, and personalities.

The seventy-one paintings shown include works by the major painters of the period. One intention is to provide means for the identification and definition of the individual styles of each of these men through direct comparisons. As well, many pages dispersed from albums formed by the emperors have been reassembled for the exhibition and will provide direct evidence for the interests and taste of the Mughal rulers, and for their activity as patrons.

Thirteen American museums and six private collectors are lending to the exhibition, which has an extensive, fully illustrated catalogue by Milo Cleveland Beach, with contributions by Stuart Cary Welch and Glenn D. Lowry. Included in the catalogue will be annotated checklists of works attributed to each of the major artists discussed and lists of known pages from dispersed albums and manuscripts. The catalogue will be on sale for $12.95.

The exhibition is supported by a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts in Washington,

Wolff, Gluck to read from works

Authors Geoffrey Wolff and Louise Gluck will be the first writers to read from their works in a new Contemporary Writers Series at the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute on Wednesday, September 27, at 8:00 p.m. At each of the eight Wednesday-evening sessions scheduled from now through April, 1979, two writers, one of prose and one of poetry, will read for about forty-five minutes. They will also appear on local college campuses to discuss their work.

Geoffrey Wolff, nonfiction writer and novelist, is author of Black Sun, a biography of Harry Crosby; his novels are Bad Debts, The Sightseers, and Inklings. His essays, stories, and reviews have appeared in Newsweek, The New York Times, Saturday Review, Atlantic Monthly, Esquire, New Republic, American Scholar, and other periodicals. He has held fellowships from the National Endowment for the Humanities and has twice been a Guggenheim Fellow.

Louise Gluck, poet, is the author of Firstborn and The House on Marshland. Her awards include grants from the Rockefeller Foundation and the National Endowment for the Arts. Her work is represented in such anthologies as The New Yorker Book of Poems, Contemporary American Poets, and New Voices in American Poetry. She has taught at Goddard College, the University of North Carolina, and the University of Virginia, and is a member of the visiting staff of the Fine Arts Work Center in Provincetown, Massachusetts.

Five area colleges—Berkshire Community, North Adams State, Simon's Rock, Southern Vermont, and Williams—are co-sponsoring the series with the Clark Art Institute. On Thursday, September 28, Geoffrey Wolff will discuss various aspects of writing at Williams College.

ARTS

the art of Escher

The adaptation of the fantastic graphic art of M. C. Escher (1898-1972) to solid geometric figures will be the subject of the opening IBM Lecture in the 1978-79 series at Williams College. Professor Doris Schattschneider of Moravian College in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, will give a nontechnical presentation on the nature of her adaptations and will show slides of the models, many in color. The public is invited to attend the program, which will be given in Room 111 of the Biology building at Williams tonight at 8:00.

Prof. Schattschneider explains that the Dutch artist Escher "was an ingenious planner of many surprises; his graphic art fairly bursts with cunningly planned visual effects." Much of his graphic work involves interlocking patterns of human figures, animals, or fantastic creatures. "His art combines imagination and ingenuity and shows his mastery of the mathematical laws which govern all such patterns." The talk will discuss the natural evolution of the solid figures decorated with Escher designs.

Prof. Schattschneider will also give a workshop on making Escher "kaleidocycles," rotating geometric forms she has invented to show the interlocking patterns in continuous motion. The workshop will be held in Room 104 Bronfman at 2:00 Wednesday afternoon; those attending should call 597-2438 for a list of the common materials they should bring.

The events are sponsored by the IBM Lecture Grant in conjunction with the Williams Department of Mathematics.

alphabets and images

The Chapin Library of Rare Books is now sponsoring a major exhibition, "Alphabets and Images", continuing through October 16. The manuscripts on view, which have been selected from the library's collections to show how the letters of the alphabet have changed over the years, range from as far back as the 9th century up to the present day.

According to Wayne Hammond, a staff librarian who selected many of the exhibits, the title for the display was chosen for two reasons. "First, because the letters [illegible] are entities in themselves and can be studied as such. But letters can be arranged to form pictures—words sentences, and so forth—images which can be artistically executed with imagination and variety."

Some of the items in the exhibition have never been shown in the library's history, including two early [illegible] century French chronicles. The works reflect all major styles of printing used throughout the past and present. Works by eminent European and American calligraphers are all on view.

The Chapin Library is located on the second floor of Stetson Hall and is open Monday through Friday from 9 am - noon and 1 pm - 5 pm. Everyone is welcome and strongly encouraged to view the exhibition.

Class of '42 and Williams changed by WW II

by Kevin Keim

The year was 1938. Nazi Germany had united with Austria and would soon invade Czechoslovakia. Japan had started open war with China the year before. Roosevelt was in his second term. A bottle of Coke cost a nickel and the 1 6th freshman class entered Williams College.

The college opened officially on Saturday, September 17 in Jesup Hall with an introduction by President James P. Baxter. A busy orientation week was to follow. War was far from everyone's mind.

Freshman week was spent like many before. Meetings with administrators and advisers filled odd hours. The library offered a three-day course in learning how to study in the library. The college's literary magazine Sketch even compiled a questionnaire designed "primarily to discover the attitudes of freshmen on controversial political, economic, educational and current matters." Rushing was the main event of the week to come.

But there was a hint of the war. President Baxter advised freshmen in an article in the Record, "We aren't here to teach you the techniques for making money, but to help you understand and enjoy life, with or without money. The world you will enter after four years . . . is an uneasy world in large part because its peoples have not learned the lessons we hope you will learn here: self-control, tolerance, a readiness to live and let live, humanity and a just appreciation of the importance of the individual. They have failed to develop what a good democrat recently defined as a democracy of the right sort, an aristocracy of the sensitive, the considerate, and the plucky."

The first four weeks were over. 131 freshmen pledged themselves to fraternities. The results of the Sketch poll revealed that the class of '42 was monopolized by men belonging to the "upper crust." The typical Williams freshman was an urban product with conservative views but an "unexpected liberalism in anti-fascist views." What did the new students know? Very little, concluded Sketch. Most read only the sports page of newspapers and many showed a poor knowledge of historical figures and fictional characters.

The year progressed and mention of the war became more frequent in the Record. In an interview in the October 14, 1938 issue of the newspaper, Dr. J. Fitch King, professor of Chemistry and an Oberlaender Fellow returned from Germany, stated, "The German financial structure is precarious and the Nazis have a heavy national debt . . . Hitler is an opportunist and plays a game of diplomacy simply because Germany cannot risk war. She lacks the credit and raw materials." Dr. King predicted, "The Nazis don't want war."

But was was hardly the leading news story. The Record continued to write editorials urging freshmen to be diligent in their studies. Most were; only 50.9 per cent received a D or an E in the first semester, a drop of 2.8 per cent from the previous year.

However, senior year for the class of '42 brought the war closer. A survey in October of 1941 showed that 43 per cent of Williams students favored immediate declaration of war against the Nazis, while 27 per cent wanted a repeal of the neutrality act.

American entered the war shortly after the October survey. Within a week after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, the U.S. was at war with Japan, Germany and Italy.

Changes came quickly to the campus. Five seniors joined the armed forces in January. New courses in Astronomy and Electronics were added to the curriculum. An accelerated program was proposed but since it would be approved for the summer of 1942, it would not affect the class of '42. This was the last class to go from Williams to the war without special programs; it was the in-between class.

The class of '42 had difficulties trying to justify the continuation of schoolwork while peers were fighting. Support for their efforts came from all sides, however.

David Maclay, an ex-Williams student and an ensign in the U.S. Naval Reserve, stated in a special "Williams in the War" column, "Exactly what good are two or three years in a 'dusty town beneath old Greylock' going to do if you're called into active military service before graduation? . . . This solid intellectual background is what even one year at Williams has to offer . . . To be a first class fighting man we have got to have a mental equilibrium—an active faith in our way of life."

An editorial in the same issue offered more advice to the soon-to-graduate student: "While Williams men learn how to be soldiers at Camp Devens and Fort Dix . . . it would be rotten for us not to buckle down to doing our work with sacrifices and determination equal to theirs."

Their sacrifices came quickly. A mock air raid was planned; in March the college held a practice blackout. Athletics were curtailed and thrift became the message behind every Record editorial.

But for the class of '42, the first WW II class, none of these changes mattered; they were planned for the coming classes. The "aristocracy of the sensitive, the considerate and the plucky" was faced with the task of entering the war without the special training the future Williams classes were going to receive.

On May 15, 1942 gas rationing was introduced in 17 eastern states. On May 17, 134 members of the class of '42 graduated. By September 44 were in the armed forces, including Prof. C. Fredrick Rudolph, currently a professor of History.

By the end of the war, 3055 Williams men had served in the armed forces, and 101 had died, among them at least 8 from the class of '42.

Roosevelt was dead, the Nazis had fallen and Japan was recovering from the atom bomb. But a bottle of Coke still cost a nickel.

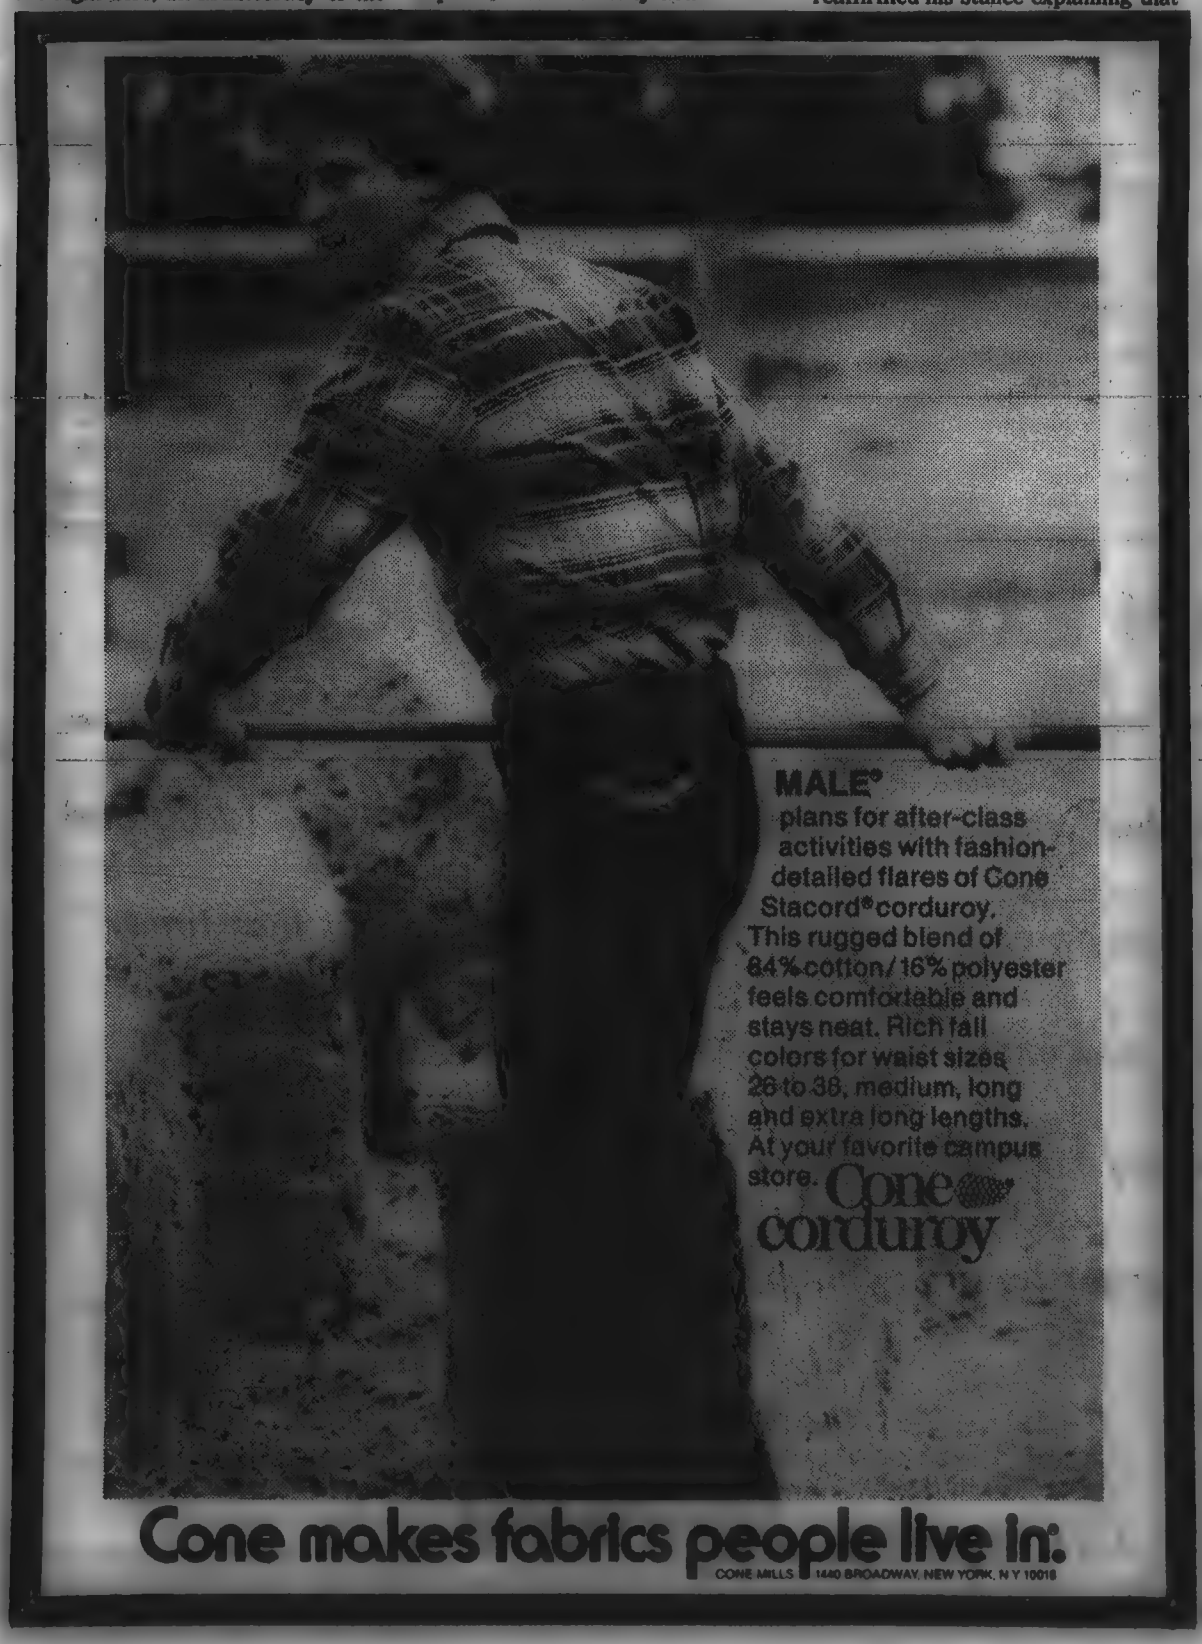
Food Service policy might change

The outcome of an inquiry by Mission Park House presidents into Food Service's party policy could benefit all houses which use large dining halls for parties.

Presently, Ross Keller, Director of Food Service, requires that a Food Service employee be present at such parties. The houses must pay the employee $60 for eight hours overtime (last year $50) in addition to security ($21 each).

In a letter replying to house presidents Dave Bennett (Pratt), Dave Corcoran (Armstrong), and Katherine Phillips (Dennett), Keller reaffirmed his stance explaining that the employee can give access to the broom closet, ice machine, and walk-in cooler, is ensured that tables and chairs are "handled properly", and watch the beverage area.

The presidents, in a letter sent September 16, suggested that security officers and or student monitors could handle the duties of the food service employee. Three security and two student monitors patrol large parties in dining halls. Besides the security to prevent malicious damage to equipment, the presidents also feel that the new iron gate which encloses the kitchen acts as a substantive deterrent. They argue that security officers could give access to the walk-in cooler and closet since they carry master keys.



The employee does not assist in clean-up; a B&G employee routinely cleans the cafeteria every morning. Food Service maintains jurisdiction over the kitchen area while B&G oversees the dining area.

Dodd residents can be heard reminiscing about the "good old days." Over the summer Dodd became a "regular" dining hall, i.e., ID's must be shown, portions controlled, no left overs left out at night.

Keller explained that Dodd "never really has been considered a row house by the college. He stressed the casualness of the present ID system which he feels must be tightened. Every year the college loses an estimated $35-40,000 to off-board students and visitors who phenagle meals. The system is complicated by the facts that people can eat any in any one of 15 places and that many state driver's licenses resemble this year's IDs.

The blue chit is to accept the fact that some people legitimately forget their IDs not to accommodate those who do not feel like carrying them, said Keller. Students can cancel the chits at Food Service's Baxter office within 48 hours, weekends exempt.

Dodd also lost its chef, Pete Brazeau, to Baxter. Pete Mantello, formerly at Mission, replaced him. About 17 such changes occurred over the summer, said Keller.

Dodd holds the only student gallery

by Mollie Rockefeller

Williamstown is justly famous for its two major art centers, the Clark Art Institute and the College's Museum of Art; but unknown to the public is treasure trove hidden away in Dodd House. The Dodd House Student Art Gallery serves as a center for exhibiting various art works of Williams Students. Many different exhibitions are on view during the year, and the Williams community is strongly encouraged to attend.

The Gallery, located in an all-too-small room off the Dodd living room (on the right as you enter the house), contains real indications of the talent latent in Williams students. Co-director Jody Harrison '79 commented, "Since the conversion of the Goodrich Hall gallery to professional artists, this is the only art gallery on campus open to works by all students." She and co-director Laurie Jones '79 intend to broaden the scope of the bi-monthly exhibits to include samples of the Decorative arts (needlework & quilting), works by art historians, and Conceptual or Interpretive art. Also lined up are one-man shows by Andy Yang, Barb Ernst, Jeff Murray and Hyla Smith. Both directors emphasize that they welcome ideas and material for display by anyone in the Williams community.

"Watercolors", the current exhibit, is the product of last spring's studio course. Although the exhibit will end tomorrow, several works are worth the trip to Dodd House. Joe Radick, in an experiment in perspective and dimensions, has created a vision of a barn as seen from everywhere at once. And there is a remarkable abstract work in joyous colors by Hyla Smith. The opening of the next exhibit, complete with wine and cheese, will on Wednesday evening, and should not be missed.

One lives in Infirmary

Crowding still afflicts Ephs

The housing shortage continues to be a problem on campus, although several people have moved out of Mission Park living rooms. Presently seven women, all exchange students, remain in living rooms, according to Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad.

All of the men who had occupied living rooms have been relocated, except those who chose to remain in place. Several openings in housing exist for men, but none for women. Unless someone drops out or changes rooms, the seven women cannot move.

One male student lives in the infirmary, according to Charles Jankey, Director of Student Housing, in a room, once used for student housing. Jankey does not know how long the student will remain there.

Roosenraad expects that one or two rooms should open up, but feels that most of the girls will have to remain in the living rooms this semester. Next semester, he explained, everyone will be in living rooms.

Anti-war priest to speak tomorrow

The Williams College Newman Association will focus on Catholic activism and Christian theology this semester, opening its annual speaker series with a talk tomorrow by anti-war priest Fr. Edward Murphy S.J.

Fr. Murphy, who was arrested twice for his opposition to the Viet Nam War, will speak on "Signs of Hope" tomorrow at seven p.m. in the Makepeace Room, Greylock.

Since the war's end, Fr. Murphy has been active in anti-military and anti-nuclear groups. His special interest is "examining the religious roots of resistance to secular authority."

Fr. Joe Kane S.J. will speak Oct. 18 on his experiences as chaplain of the New York City prison on Riker's Island and on the relation of his work to "Christian lifestyles."

On Nov. 8, Sean Sammon will discuss integrating religious dimensions into everyday lifestyles. He is a Marxist brother and psychologist from the House of Affirmation, New Haven, Conn.

In January, Fr. Frank Scallen will talk about his work as a "street priest" with the Worcester Urban Ministry Commission. There he "ministers to oppreseed people both by concern for them and by advocating change in the structure which keeps them in misery."

Also in January, Fr. Ed Zogby S.J. will speak on the works of S. S. Lewis. Fr. Zogby is chairman of the philosophy Department of LeMoyne College.

CUSTOMER INFORMATION FROM GENERAL MOTORS

HOW TO SAVE ON AUTO INSURANCE

A GOOD DRIVING RECORD CAN LOWER YOUR PREMIUMS. SO CAN HIGHER DEDUCTIBLES.

In many parts of the country the average cost of car insurance has risen over 50% in the past five years.

Liability insurance protects you against the claims of others. Its cost, like that of any insurance, is based on what the insurance company has to pay in claims plus its overhead. And the cost of everybody's individual liability insurance is inflated by large court settlements and exaggerated claims.

Although liability insurance is required by law in many states, in light of the trend toward higher settlements, you should be sure that your coverage is adequate.

But in the "voluntary" parts of your car insurance—collision and comprehensive (fire and theft)—that cover physical damage to your own car, there are some things you can do to lower your insurance bill.

Safe drivers pay lower premiums for both liability and collision coverage. Insurance rates are set that way because drivers with a good past history are less likely to have accidents in the future. Many insurance companies define "safe drivers" as those with two or less moving traffic violations and no "chargeable, at fault" accidents within the past three years. Their premiums may be as much as 25% lower.

You can often cut your premiums for collision and comprehensive by 25% to 50% by raising your deductible. Many people still choose full-coverage comprehensive and $100 deductible collision coverage. That means they pay the first $100 on collision-related damages and the insurance company pays the rest. But just look what happens when you increase the deductibles to $200 on comprehensive and $500 on collision: In Los Angeles, for example, the typical annual premium for a safe driver will drop from $358 to $197. The higher the deductible, the lower the premium. (See the chart for more examples.)

Of course, you assume more of the risk by choosing higher deductibles. It's a personal decision that should be based on a thorough evaluation of the age of your car, the value of your car on the used-car market, and your own financial situation. If your car is more than five years old, it may not pay to buy any collision insurance. If you do have an accident, casualty losses over $100 that are not reimbursed by insurance coverage are tax deductible, in many instances, providing you itemize your tax return.

TYPICAL INSURANCE PREMIUMS FOR A FULL-SIZE 4-DOOR MODEL CAR:

	Full coverage comprehensive and $100 deductible collision		$500 deductible comprehensive and $500 deductible collision
	Standard	Safe Driver	Safe Driver
ATLANTA	$267	$201	$111
CHICAGO	$947	$711	$395
LOS ANGELES	$476	$358	$197
SANTA FE	$412	$311	$172
WINNETKA, ILL. (suburb of Chicago)	$372	$280	$154

Insurance premiums are based on many factors, including your age, the kind of car you own and where you live. Rates vary from company to company. The figures above do not include liability coverage.

We believe that if you have enough information you won't have to spend as much money to own and maintain a car. And that'll be good for you and good for us.

But was was hardly the leading news story. The Record continued to write editorials urging freshmen to be diligent in their studies. Most were; only 50.9 per cent received a D or an E in the first semester, a drop of 2.8 per cent from the previous year.

However, senior year for the class of '42 brought the war closer. A survey in October of 1941 showed that 43 per cent of Williams students favored immediate declaration of war against the Nazis, while 27 per cent wanted a repeal of the neutrality act.

American entered the war shortly after the October survey. Within a week after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, the U.S. was at war with Japan, Germany and Italy.

Changes came quickly to the campus. Five seniors joined the armed forces in January. New courses in Astronomy and Electronics were added to the curriculum. An accelerated program was proposed but since it would be approved for the summer of 1942, it would not affect the class of '42. This was the last class to go from Williams to the war without special programs; it was the in-between class.

The class of '42 had difficulties trying to justify the continuation of schoolwork while peers were fighting. Support for their efforts came from all sides, however.

David Maclay, an ex-Williams student and an ensign in the U.S. Naval Reserve, stated in a special "Williams in the War" column, "Exactly what good are two or three years in a 'dusty town beneath old Greylock' going to do if you're called into active military service before graduation? ... This solid intellectual background is what even one year at Williams has to offer ... To be a first class fighting man we have got to have a mental equilibrium—an active faith in our way of life."

An editorial in the same issue offered more advice to the soon-to-graduate student; "While Williams men learn how to be soldiers at Camp Devens and Fort Dix ... it would be rotten for us not to buckle down to doing our work with sacrifices and determination equal to theirs."

Their sacrifices came quickly. A mock air raid was planned; in March the college held a practice blackout. Athletics were curtailed and thrift became the message behind every Record editorial.

But for the class of '42, the first year II class, none of these changes mattered; they were planned for the coming classes. The "aristocracy of the sensitive, the considerate and the plucky" was faced with the task of entering the war without the special training the future Williams classes were going to receive.

On May 15, 1942 gas rationing was introduced in 17 eastern states. On May 17, 134 members of the class of '42 graduated. By September 44 were in the armed forces, including Prof. C. Fredrick Rudolph, currently a professor of History.

By the end of the war, 3055 Williams men had served in the armed forces, and 101 had died, among them at least 8 from the class of '42.

Roosevelt was dead, the Nazis had fallen and Japan was recovering from the atom bomb. But a bottle of Coke still cost a nickel.

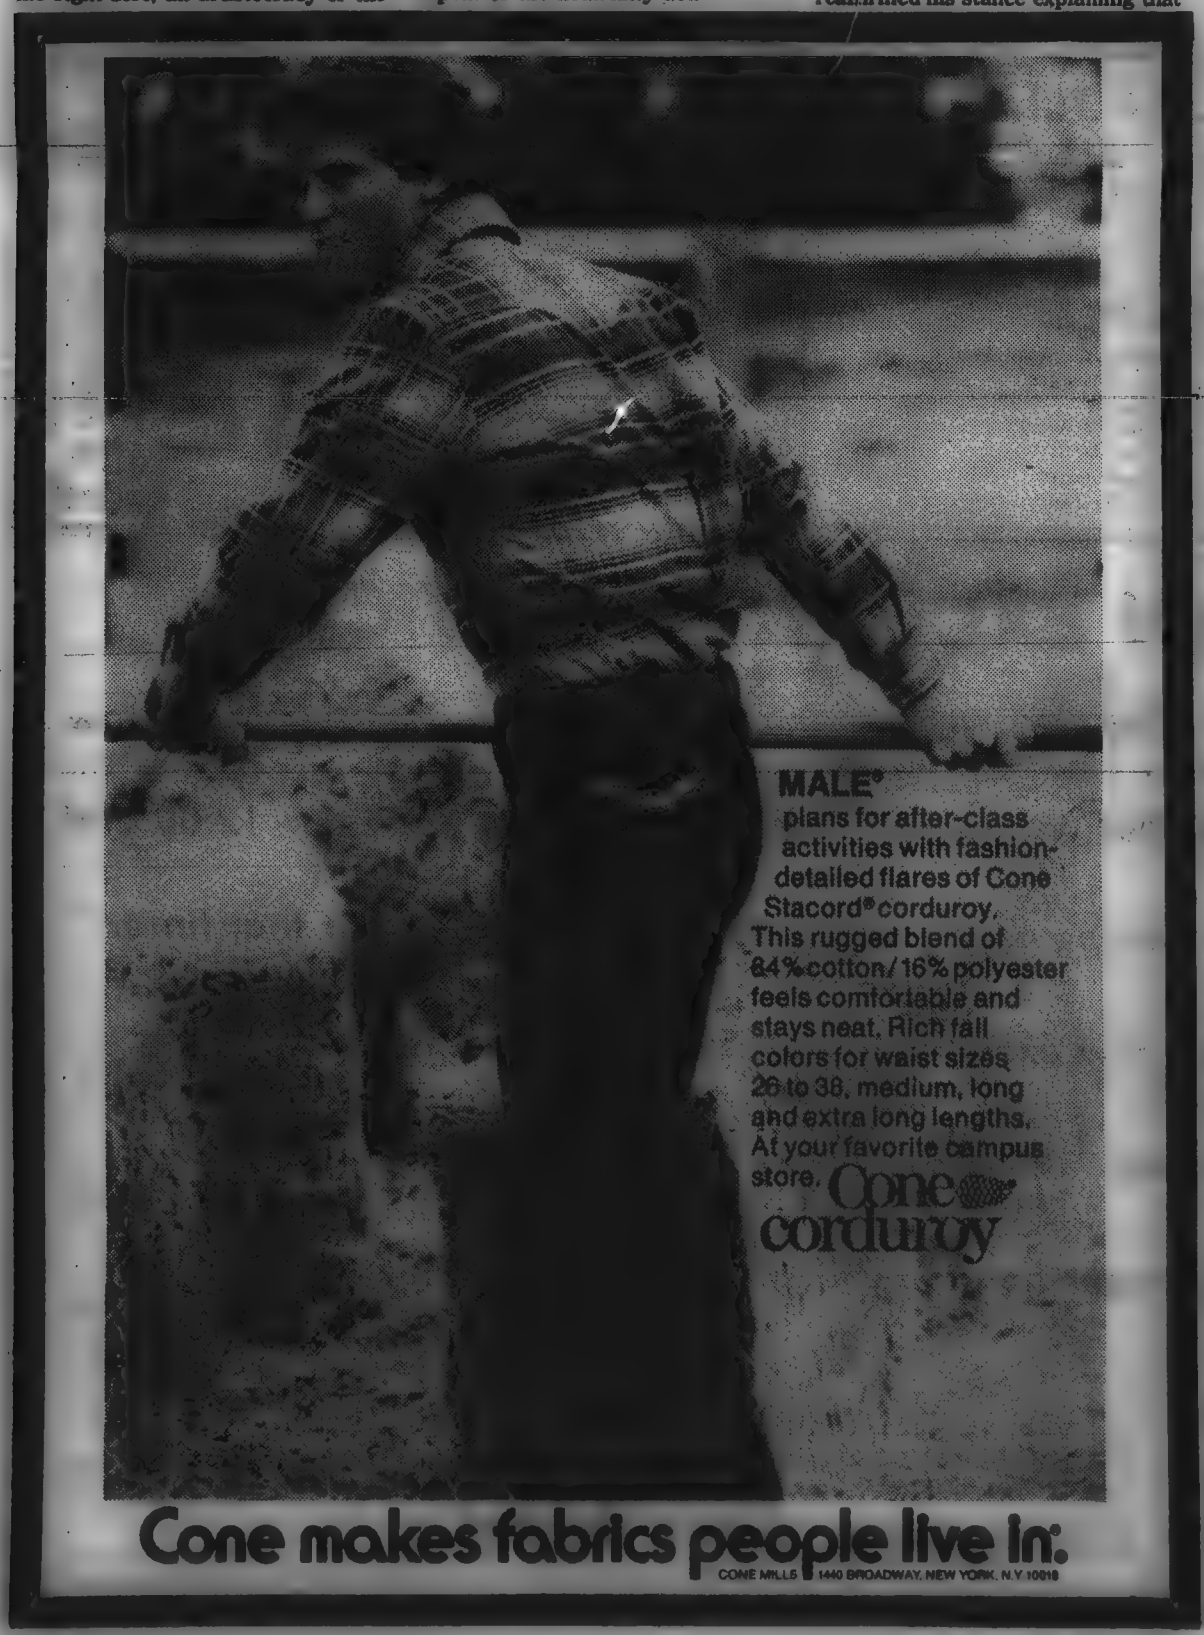
Food Service policy might change

The outcome of an inquiry by Mission Park House presidents into Food Service's party policy could benefit all houses which use large dining halls for parties.

Presently, Ross Keller, Director of Food Service, requires that a Food Service employee be present at such parties. The houses must pay the employee $60 for eight hours overtime (last year $50) in addition to security ($21 each).

In a letter replying to house presidents Dave Bennett (Pratt), Dave Corcoran (Armstrong), and Katherine Phillips (Dennett), Keller reaffirmed his stance explaining that the employee can give access to the broom closet, ice machine, and walk-in cooler, is ensured that tables and chairs are "handled properly", and watch the beverage area.

The presidents, in a letter sent September 16, suggested that security officers and or student monitors could handle the duties of the food service employee. Three security and two student monitors patrol large parties in dining halls. Besides the security to prevent malicious damage to equipment, the presidents also feel that the new iron gate which encloses the kitchen acts as a substantive deterrent. They argue that security officers could give access to the walk-in cooler and closet since they carry master keys.



The employee does not assist in clean-up; a B&G employee routinely cleans the cafeteria every morning. Food Service maintains jurisdiction over the kitchen area while B&G oversees the dining area.

Dodd residents can be heard reminiscing about the "good old days." Over the summer Dodd became a "regular" dining hall, i.e., ID's must be shown, portions controlled, no left overs left out at night.

Keller explained that Dodd "never really has been considered a row house by the college. He stressed the casualness of the present ID system which he feels must be tightened. Every year the college loses an estimated $35-40,000 to off-board students and visitors who phenagle meals. The system is complicated by the facts that people can eat any in any one of 15 places and that many state driver's licenses resemble this year's IDs.

The blue chit is to accept the fact that some people legitimately forget their IDs not to accommodate those who do not feel like carrying them, said Keller. Students can cancel the chits at Food Service's Baxter office within 48 hours, weekends exempt.

Dodd also lost its chef, Pete Brazeau, to Baxter. Pete Mantello, formerly at Mission, replaced him. About 17 such changes occurred over the summer, said Keller.

Dodd holds the only student gallery

by Molly Rockefeller

Williamstown is justly famous for its two major art centers, the Clark Art Institute and the College's Museum of Art; but unknown to the public is treasure trove hidden away in Dodd House. The Dodd House Student Art Gallery serves as a center for exhibiting various art works of Williams Students. Many different exhibitions are on view during the year, and the Williams community is strongly encouraged to attend.

The Gallery, located in an all-too-small room off the Dodd living room (on the right as you enter the house), contains real intimations of the talent latent in Williams students. Co-director Jody Harrison '79 commented, "Since the conversion of the Goodrich Hall gallery to professional artists, this is the only art gallery on campus open to works by all students." She and co-director Laurie Jones '79 intend to broaden the scope of the bi-monthly exhibits to include samples of the Decorative arts (needlework & quilting), works by art historians, and Conceptual or Interpretive art. Also lined up are one-man shows by Andy Yang, Barb Ernst, Jeff Murray and Hyla Smith. Both directors emphasize that they welcome ideas and material for display by anyone in the Williams community.

"Watercolors", the current exhibit, is the product of last spring's studio course. Although the exhibit will end tomorrow, several works are worth the trip to Dodd House. Joe Rudick, in an experiment in perspective and dimensions, has created a vision of a barn as seen from everywhere at once. And there is a remarkable abstract work in joyous colors by Hyla Smith. The opening of the next exhibit, complete with wine and cheese, will on Wednesday evening, and should not be missed.

One lives in infirmary

Crowding still afflicts Ephs

The housing shortage continues to be a problem on campus, although several people have moved out of Mission Park living rooms. Presently seven women, all exchange students, remain in living rooms, according to Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad.

All of the men who had occupied living rooms have been relocated, except those who chose to remain in place. Several openings in housing exist for men, but none for women. Unless someone drops out or changes rooms, the seven women cannot move.

One male student lives in the infirmary, according to Charles Jankey, Director of Student Housing, in a room, once used for student housing. Jankey does not know how long the student will remain there.

Roosenraad expects that one or two rooms should open up, but feels that most of the girls will have to remain in the living rooms this semester. Next semester, he explained, everyone will be in living rooms.

Anti-war priest to speak tomorrow

The Williams College Newman Association will focus on Catholic activism and Christian theology this semester, opening its annual speaker series with a talk tomorrow by anti-war priest Fr. Edward Murphy S.J.

Fr. Murphy, who was arrested twice for his opposition to the Viet Nam War, will speak on "Signs of Hope" tomorrow at seven p.m. in the Makepeace Room, Greylock.

Since the war's end, Fr. Murphy has been active in anti-military and anti-nuclear groups. His special interest is "examining the religious roots of resistance to secular authority."

Fr. Joe Kane S.J. will speak Oct. 18 on his experiences as chaplain of the New York City prison on Riker's Island and on the relation of his work to "Christian lifestyles."

On Nov. 8, Sean Sammon will discuss "integrating religious dimensions into everyday lifestyles. He is a Marxist brother and psychologist from the House of Affirmation, New Haven, Conn.

In January, Fr. Frank Scallen will talk about his work as a "street priest" with the Worcester Urban Ministry Commission. There he "ministers to oppreseed people both by concern for them and by advocating change in the structure which keeps them in misery."

Also in January, Fr. Ed Zogby S.J. will speak on the works of S. S. Lewis. Fr. Zogby is chairman of the philosophy Department of LeMoyne College.

HOW TO SAVE ON AUTO INSURANCE

A GOOD DRIVING RECORD CAN LOWER YOUR PREMIUMS. SO CAN HIGHER DEDUCTIBLES.

In many parts of the country the average cost of car insurance has risen over 50% in the past five years.

Liability insurance protects you against the claims of others. Its cost, like that of any insurance, is based on what the insurance company has to pay in claims plus its overhead. And the cost of everybody's individual liability insurance is inflated by large court settlements and exaggerated claims.

Although liability insurance is required by law in many states, in light of the trend toward higher settlements, you should be sure that your coverage is adequate.

But in the "voluntary" parts of your car insurance—collision and comprehensive (fire and theft)—that cover physical damage to your own car, there are some things you can do to lower your insurance bill.

Safe drivers pay lower premiums for both liability and collision coverage. Insurance rates are set that way because drivers with a good past history are less likely to have accidents in the future. Many insurance companies define "safe drivers" as those with two or less moving traffic violations and no "chargeable, at fault" accidents within the past three years. Their premiums may be as much as 25% lower.

You can often cut your premiums for collision and comprehensive by 25% to 50% by raising your deductible. Many people still choose full-coverage comprehensive and $100 deductible collision coverage. That means they pay the first $100 on collision-related damages and the insurance company pays the rest. But just look what happens when you increase the deductibles to $200 on comprehensive and $500 on collision: In Los Angeles, for example, the typical annual premium for a safe driver will drop from $358 to $197. The higher the deductible, the lower the premium. (See the chart for more examples.)

Of course, you assume more of the risk by choosing higher deductibles. It's a personal decision that should be based on a thorough evaluation of the age of your car, the value of your car on the used-car market, and your own financial situation. If your car is more than five years old, it may not pay to buy any collision insurance. If you do have an accident, casualty losses over $100 that are not reimbursed by insurance coverage are tax deductible, in many instances, providing you itemize your tax return.

TYPICAL INSURANCE PREMIUMS FOR A FULL-SIZE 1978 [illegible] CAR:

	Full-coverage comprehensive and $100 deductible collision		$200 deductible comprehensive and $500 deductible collision
	[illegible]	Safe Driver	Safe Driver
ATLANTA	$267	$201	$111
CHICAGO	$947	$711	$395
LOS ANGELES	$476	$358	$197
WINNETKA, ILL. (suburb of Chicago)	$372	$280	$154

Insurance premiums are based on many factors, including your age, the kind of car you own and where you live. Rates vary from company to company. The figures above do not include liability coverage.

We believe that if you have enough information you won't have to spend as much money to own and maintain a car. And that'll be good for you and good for us.

Enrollment in language courses at Williams has improved this year, despite a national trend of shrinking enrollments.

College fulfills town's requests

Dewey House members will remain affiliated with their present social grouping, which for twelve of the women is Dodd House.

The college intends, to sell Dewey House, Roosenraad said, which in the past had also been used for faculty residence.

Exhibiting a gesture of cooperation between the town and college, Career Counseling Officer Jeffrey Wood enforced the college's policy of student noninterference in competing with a town business over that business's major line of merchandise.

Bill Childs '81 and Matt St. Onge '81 had planned to begin a Boston Globe delivery service until notified by Wood that their venture would be in direct competition with The Newsroom (Spring Street).

Wood said it was an academic question as to whether or not Childs and St. Onge would put The Newsroom out of business, but did cite a similar incident four years ago when students started a New York Times delivery service. Subsequent Times purchases at The Newsroom dropped 25 per cent.

"The college wishes to encourage student businesses for student recognized groups," Wood said, "but when it involves private ones we have to watch closely."

statistically insignificant.

The committee may also discuss the College's policy towards giving Advanced Placement credit to entering freshman. Moomaw said, "If Williams has a policy of not giving AP credit that could have a serious impact on admissions. On the other hand, if we give too much credit, we may be undermining our educational mission and our curriculum."

Moomaw added, "The committee is prepared to discuss any burning issues of educational policy. Smith stated, "it should be a busy fall for the committee.

Language enrollments increase in spite of trend

By John Pavsic

Foreign language enrollments appear to be improving this year, according to Weston Language Center Coordinator Dorothea Hanson.

Hanson, in her first year as coordinator, said the rise was a distinct reversal of the trends of the 1960's when enrollments dropped in response to the abolition of foreign language requirements. Some sections this semester were so large that "we had to move two classes out of (Weston)," she said. New languages will not be offered, Hanson said, because present classes are relatively "small."

David Booth, Associate Provost, said he did not have this year's enrollment figures, but had a pessimistic view on foreign languages at Williams. He said the "overall enrollment for the past seven or eight years has been bleak." Booth cited the small size of Williams, financial problems, and lack of student interest as reasons for the poor development of foreign languages on campus.

Booth said that course offerings in foreign languages were fewer in number than those of other schools. The size of the foreign language faculty, he added, is "frozen." An increase in either of the above, however, would lead to higher tuition for students and greater costs to the College. Student interest in present courses is weak, Booth asserted. Even if the department offered attractive and unusual languages like Chinese or Arabic, he questioned whether student interest would be sufficient to warrant offering them.

George Pistorius, Chairman of Romanic Languages, said enrollment in his department was remaining steady. He noted that there has been a shift from high enrollment in upper level literature courses to higher enrollment in introductory and intermediate courses this year. Pistorius said it was the "first time in ten years we were obliged to open a second intermediate section." However, new students are currently "less advanced in their language preparation prior to entering Williams."

He said the Romantic Language Department has "outstanding teachers and outstanding students" who have a devotion to the language. Pistorius added that his department was forced to offer less variety than similar Romanic language departments at Smith, Wellesley, or Mt. Holyoke, for example, because of its smallness."

The Acting Chairman of German and Russian, Michael Katz, said that German enrollment is now beginning to improve after a series of upheavals in the department's teaching staff. He noted a large rise in Russian enrollment, though fewer students were entering the program with a high school background in the language. Katz, who twelve years ago was one of two graduating Russian majors at Williams, attributed the increase in interest to the use of the popular new Lipson text, individualized instruction, and the fact that the Russian Club is the most active of the clubs on campus.

College Council hears committee recommendations whose names, if approved by the Council, will be submitted to President Chandler. The Council can only recommend, however; President Chandler makes the final decision on the two additional members.

The issue of College investments in corporations operating in South Africa appeared again when members of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC) spoke renouncing the Trustees' summer statement on the College's shareholder responsibilities. Jackie Wilson '79, representing the WAAC, called the statement "inefficient and ambiguous." Fellow WAAC member Steve Magee '79, in an effort to "get people thinking again", urged continued student activity on the issue, saying that such activity is "good for the College in that it broadens its focus." To educate freshmen about the apartheid situation and the issue on campus, Magee reported, members of the WAAC will be visiting freshmen entries for informal discussions.

The Council voted, on the recommendation of Housing Committee member Rusty Case '80, to add two positions to the Housing Committee, one to be filled by an exchange student, the other by either an exchange or transfer. This would create a new social co-ordinating committee composed of house presidents andCouncil representatives, rather than simply house social chairmen, as in the past. The committee would study house social calendars and try to resolve conflicts of parties and other events. In an unrelated vote, the Council passed the new rules of order which were proposed last week.

"Many students feel they aren't getting a true liberal arts education at Williams," David Schwartz '81, a member of the Working Committee of the CEP, told the Council. The Committee, he said, is reviewing the non-major part of the curriculum, hoping to bring possibilities for change to the faculty. The CEP has been very receptive, to new ideas, Schwartz reported, but as yet all proposals remain vague.

The next College Council meeting is Wednesday, Sept. 27 at 9:00 P.M. in 3 Griffin. Everyone is welcome.

Finance Committee keeps track of cash

The Committee is now working on a list of proposed allocations which it will present to Council by November 1. At that time, the Council will vote on each grant. More than $109,000 from the $56 tax paid by each student will be distributed to campus organizations.

In the next few weeks, each group will fill out a grant application indicating how much money it wants and on what it plans to spend it. The monitor, after examining available information about the group, will present the application to the Finance Committee. Each organization will not have to meet with the Committee. According to Darrell McWhorter, this will probably save a lot of time.

Individuals, for the first time this year, may also request money from the College Council for projects that would benefit the college. A student has already applied to decorate the lounge in the basement of Sawyer library. Persons interested should contact Bronson Fargo, President of C.C.

The Record will run classifieds at 20c per line. Deadline is 3 p.m. on Sundays. Total amount due MUST accompany this form. Mail or bring in person to Classifieds, The Williams Record, Baxter Hall, Williamstown, Mass. 01267.

Come all ye sons of Williams and Mary . . .

by Brad Adams

The problem with Williams is that it does not have the name recognition of Harvard. Williams is as fine as any school in the country, but it does not have the name that anyone would give a lot of respect to and think, "Geez, he must be a brain!"

One night I showed up at a semi-formal party (in quarter-formal fashion). I had not bothered to change my clothes after mowing the lawn. However, I did scrape the wet grass that had caked into the treads of my P. F. Flyers.

There were many people at this party which was held in a very elaborate parlor. About half the crowd consisted of "When-I-was-your-age" adults who thought that they had made it. The other half were high school graduates who were constantly comparing board scores.

Feeling a little uncomfortable, I slipped into a small circle of guests with mixed drink glasses cocked and ready to tilt when they could not think of anything intelligent to say. A red-faced man next to me was talking about his killing on the stock market, and everyone else was listening with polite boredom. My eyes wandered and looked at the kid across me. He was dressed as if he already owned Fire Island Manhattan.

The boring man finished his story and everyone sighed. He looked at his drink, took a stiff sip, and looked casually over at the junior banker. "Where are you going to school, Christopher?"

"Princeton," the young banker replied in a haughty tone.

"Oh," the red-faced man said with great respect, and took another sip of his drink. Thinking of another question, he leaned back and asked, "Christopher, what are you going to do with your life?"

"I'm going to be a biomedical anthropromengimologist, majoring at college in everything," he replied in one breath and lifted his ginger ale to his lips. He had answered this question to similar people several hundred times. His eyeglasses were so thick that he often used them to start fires.

"Oh," said the red-faced man wanting to know what that occupation was, but not wanting to show his intellectual inferiority. Instead he looked for someone else whose future he could plan and his eyes hooked onto my grass-stained clothes.

"Where are you going to college?"

"Williams."

"Do you mean William and Mary?"

"No, Williams."

"Where exactly is this school?"

"It's in the northwest corner of Massachusetts."

"What city is it in?"

"Williamstown."

"What are you going to major in?"

"I don't know yet, but possibly English."

"Are you going to take any Economics?"

"I wasn't planning on it."

"Well let me give you a little piece of advice. English is fine for your spare time, but if you're going to make it in this world, you had better take something practical, like Economics." He paused a few seconds to let it sink in. "What are you going to do with your life anyway?"

"I don't know."

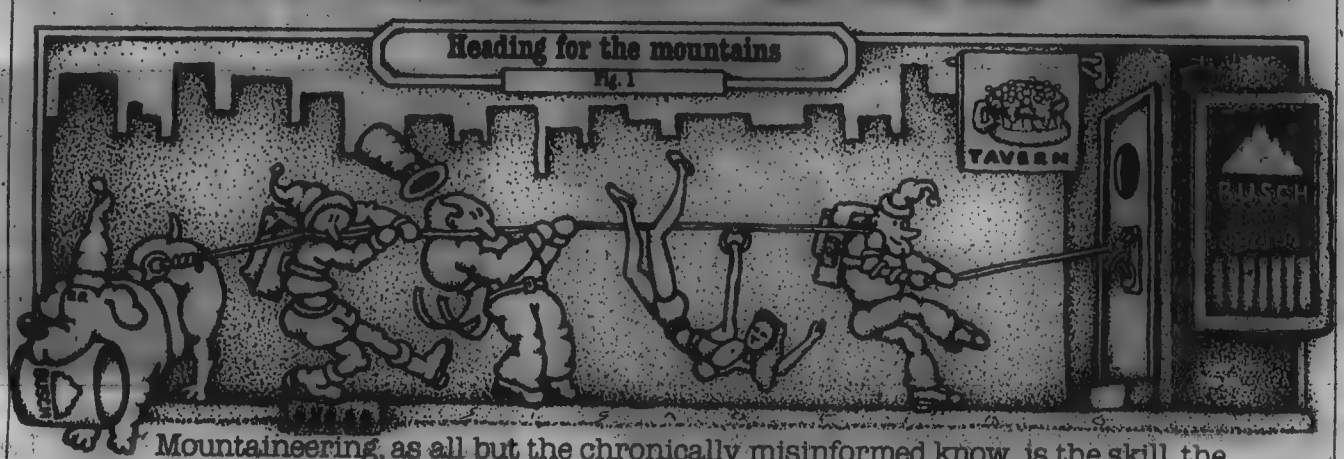
The red-faced man's face turned redder and he looked away with obvious disgust. The Ivy league junior banker was snickering. I was seriously contemplating transferring to Yale.

"What are you called? The Williams whats?" Mr. Princeton giggled.

"Ephs," I replied.

"The ephs!" the boy broke into hysterical laughter. Everyone was coughing up their drinks and their ice cubes clanked against the sides of their glasses. "What's an eph?"

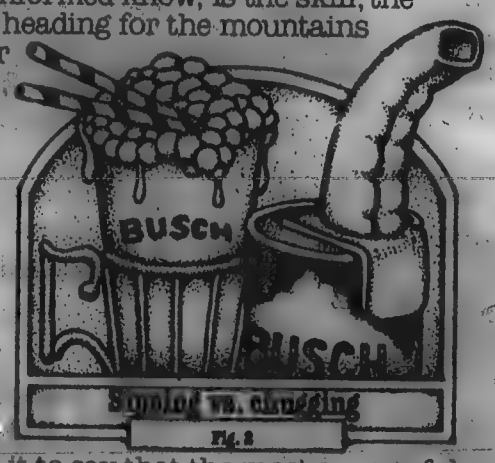
"You don't know what an eph is?" I asked in amazement. Everyone shook their heads. "Does anyone know what a snipe is?" The response was the same. "An eph is very similar to a snipe. It's a white bird with green glowing eyes. It can't fly but it runs faster than a roadrunner. They are great to hunt."



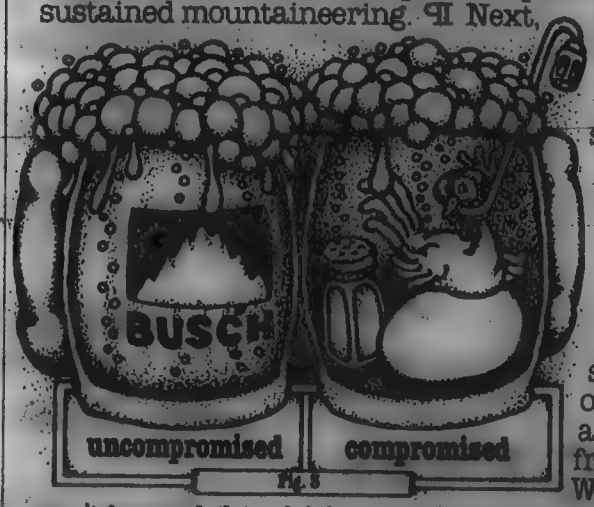
"You hunt these birds?" the red-faced man demanded.

"By all means. You go in the middle of the night. I'll give you a paper sack and you wait while I drive them towards you out of the bush. Once you catch them, they make great pets. As a matter of fact, I was planning to go eph hunting tonight. Would all of you like to come along?" Everyone agreed and the plans were made. I left the party trying to contain myself.

The red-faced man finished his drink and looked over the group, stating in his wisest voice, "You watch that kid. He's the kind of person that people take advantage of."



Mountaineering #3.



METHODOLOGY

Mountaineering, as all but the chronically misinformed know, is the skill, the science and the art of drinking Busch Beer. It begins by heading for the mountains (i.e., a quick jaunt to your favorite package emporium or wateringhole) and ends by downing the mountains (i.e., slow slaking swallows of the brew that is Busch).

¶ However, between those two points lies a vast area of personal peccadilloes sometimes called technique and sometimes called methodology (depending on your major). Hence, this ad. ¶ Sipping vs. chugging. Both have their merits, of course. But generally speaking, except for cases of extreme thirst or a leaking glass, sipping is the more prudent practice for serious, sustained mountaineering. ¶ Next, the proper position. Some swear by sitting; others by standing. Suffice it to say that the most successful mountaineers are flexible, so you'll find both sitters and standers. (Except on New Year's Eve, when it's almost impossible to find a sitter.) ¶ Which brings us to additives. Occasionally a neophyte will sprinkle salt in his Busch; others mix in tomato juice; and a few on the radical fringe will even add egg. While these manipulations can't be prohibited (this is, after all, a free country), they are frowned upon. Please be advised that purity is a virtue, and the natural refreshment of Busch is best uncompromised.

¶ Finally, there's the issue of containers. Good taste dictates a glass be used. But bad planning sometimes prevents that. If you find yourself forced to drink from the can, you should minimize this breach of etiquette. Be formal. Simply let your little finger stick out stiffly (see Fig. 4). Happy Mountaineering!

Don't just reach for a beer. BUSCH® Head for the mountains.

Students resurrect activism at the College

By Bill Masaad

Activism at Williams, which came alive last winter after a seven-year sleep, continues to spread through the student community this fall, as evidenced by the spate of new organizations which have formed on campus this fall.

The new groups—the Northern Berkshire Alternative Energy Coalition, the Williams Environmental Action Group, and a local chapter of Amnesty International—fill gaps in the matrix of radical or alternative action organizations that existed last year.

The Alternative Energy Coalition consists of students and town residents who plan to work with New England's anti-nuclear Clamshell Alliance and the Williams Action Coalition. The WAC plans to focus its activities this year on nuclear power and alternative energy.

The town-gown mix reportedly has caused strains in the group. Townspeople recently formed the group, and sought students early this month. They also have formed Clamshell affinity groups. While some 20 to 30 students have joined the group, many are wary of the commitment and tight organization forming a third affinity group would require.

Still, the WAC plans to bring several speakers and films to campus this fall exploring the risks of nuclear power plants. Many students also plan to participate in a blockage of the unfinished Seabrook nuclear power station when the power company attempts to ship in the heavy reactor core by sea later this year.

The group will meet tonight at seven p.m. in 106 Bronfman to plan further strategy.

The Environmental Action Group, formed two weeks ago, is focusing on both national and campus issues. Members are planning to revive the campus recycling program, as well as work with other groups against nuclear power. They are working to influence legislation in Congress—primarily the Endangered Species Act—by urging letter-writing campaigns among students and faculty.

Applying the same strategy to the U.S. Forest Service, the group hopes to press for the creation of more wilderness areas in national forests under the on-going Roadless Areas Review and Evaluation (RARE II), especially for protection of areas in the nearby Green and White mountains of Vermont and New Hampshire. The group meets tomorrow at seven p.m. in the Dodd House Living Room.

Also tomorrow at seven p.m. will be the organizational meeting of a local chapter of Amnesty International. The group is expected to spotlight violations of human rights in the U.S. as well as abroad. It is meeting in Greylock A.

The Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition, a group which last spring brought some national attention to Williams, has resumed its work. Members have already staged a vigil march on the second anniversary of Steven Biko's death.

WAAC organizers plan to contest the decision of the trustees on Williams investment in businesses operating in South Africa through campus opinion. To this end they have begun a re-education campaign with all-campus leafletting and talks in freshman entries. The group meets Sundays at 7:30 p.m. in Mary Hubbell House.

The Thursday Night Coalition, which last year was the focus of debate between most of the activist groups on campus, has lost members to the separate organizations. The remaining 15 to 20 members hope to coordinate information sessions for visitors during Freshman Parents' Weekend next month.

The Williams Feminist Alliance (WFA) and the Williams Gay Support Organization (WGSO) have both retreated from last semester's confrontations with the College administration, at least for now. Both seem initially to be working as support groups for members and as sponsors for cultural and informational events.

Still, the WFA continues to press for women's rights and affirmative action, especially as the new Affirmative Action office takes shape. The group holds open meetings on alternate Mondays in Driscoll Lounge.

Gay rights at Williams remain an issue with the WGSO after the partial compromise which led to inclusion of a sexual orientation clause in the College Handbook. The group holds open meetings by announcement.

Environmental action group forms here

In any large institution, conflicts between apparent ideals and actual practice, although frequent, are often excellent ones. One such conflict exists between the justifiable pride the college community takes in its physical surroundings and the current state of a recycling program on campus. Although "I hear the mountains are doin' fine," any effective recycling program is virtually non-existent at this point.

With regard to this specific problem and other related discrepancies, the Williams Environmental Action Group has been formed to foster awareness and promote action on environmental issues both within and outside of the College community. Meeting every Wednesday at 7:00 p.m. in Dodd House living room, the group found the recycling issue to be one of the first points raised at their initial meeting.

The general feeling of group members is that it should be the College's responsibility to create a workable and permanent recycling program that will make use of Williamstown's own channels for recycling bottles and newsprint. Last year, the Committee on Campus Environment published a booklet on recycling but has subsequently dissolved. Furthermore, the three bins previously used to recycle glass are currently filled with debris including cans and newsprint. Not only does this illustrate the current state of the problem, but this points to a larger aspect, namely that students generate comments, change, and progress on all by the wayside.

And yet, with the College adding some 1800 individuals to Williamstown's population each year with proportional increases in recyclable waste products especially green bottles which, from what I hear, are currently being recycled only on Mission Park stairwells), it has a clear-cut responsibility to integrate its waste production with the pre-existent town facilities for recycling.

Towards that end, the WEAG proposes that depositories for all glass as well as newsprint be set up in each house for Buildings and Grounds to process through the town's facilities (which, incidentally, are located immediately behind B and G's plant). At press time, several group members were meeting with the foreman of B and G as well as the Head of Student Housing and President Chandler to discuss the possibility of such a system.

Sophomore Charles Kubert, a co-leader in charge of investigating the recycling issue for WEAG, said that if such a proposed system gained a large response, it could eventually become feasible to set up large central bins, like those the town uses, on campus for direct pickup by recycling firms. Kubert has also said that WEAG will look into the possibility of recycling cans from dining halls and selling food waste to local pig farmers, as was once done.

But finally, on a more general note, the WEAG is currently becoming involved in a wide variety of environmental issues including the RARE II wilderness preservation bill, the Alaskan Coalition, the Endangered Species Act, and will join with the Williams Action Coalition on the nuclear power issue. Interested students are encouraged to attend the weekly meetings or to contact Grant Parker, '81 for more details on any specific subject. Bruce J. Palmer '81

Local Amnesty chapter will be established at Williams

A local chapter of Amnesty International the worldwide human rights movement which won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1977 for its work, is going to be set up on the Williams College campus.

Amnesty International is an independent, apolitical organization which works through the mobilization of world public opinion to effect the release of "Prisoners of Conscience," and the complete abolition of torture and the death penalty. Prisoners of Conscience are individuals imprisoned by reason of their political, religious, or other conscientiously held beliefs, or by reason of their ethnic origin, color, language, or sex, provided they have neither used nor advocated violence. Today, in more than 100 countries, well over half a million Prisoners of Conscience are being punished, often tortured, solely for their race, religion, or ideas.

Amnesty's success rests on its ability to mobilize its world-wide membership to write letters on behalf of these Prisoners of Conscience. The effectiveness of this massive letter-writing campaign can be measured by the fact that in almost 50 per cent of the cases undertaken by AI, the prisoner's situation has definitely improved (torture stopped, visits allowed, outright release, etc.)

There will be a short organizational meeting for all those interested in Amnesty International at 7:00 P.M. Wednesday night in Room A of Greylock.

Eph gridders open season . . .

A polished running attack, led by Dave Massucco, Gus Nuzzolese, and Greg Collins, highlighted the Williams victory over Hamilton.

. . . and maul Hamilton

by Mary Kate Shea

The Williams College football team lived up to the promise it had shown during pre-season drills and scrimmages, handily defeating Hamilton College 48-6 in the season opener played Saturday afternoon on Weston Field.

The Continentals gave the Williams defense a scare when they mounted tow drives early in the first quarter, with one drive producing the first points of the game. Hamilton's touchdown came on a one-yard plunge by halfback Jack Koebl. Koebl was the leading rusher for Hamilton in the game, carrying eight times for 49 yards and the Continentals' lone touchdown.

As the Ephs defense made some adjustments and successfully held Hamilton scoreless for the next three quarters, Williams got its offense on the track and exploded for 20 points in the second quarter and 21 more in the third.

Williams got on the scoreboard with a 37-yard drive led by the running of juniors Gus Nuzzolese and Dave Massucco. Quarterback Bob Lutz' six-yard pass to co-captain Ken Hollingsworth on a 4th-and-3 situation kept the drive going, and five plays later Nuzzolese went over the top of the Hamilton defensive line for the one-yard score. Hollingsworth's first extra point attempt went wide to the right of the uprights, but he regained his form to convert his next six attempts during the contest.

Five minutes later Williams struck again on a series of plays featuring the pass combination of Lutz to Hollingsworth (nine and 16-yard completions) and again the running of Nuzzolese, who carried the ball four times and finally slipped over the Hamilton right guard for six yards and the touchdown.

With four minutes left in the first half, the Ephs tallied again on a 62-yard drive initiated by an interception by defensive end Jim Holmes. Lutz' passing sparked the Williams offense on the drive; he completed tosses to sophomore Kirt Gardner for 18 yards, to Hollingsworth for 11, then to Hollingsworth again for the score on a 10-yard play action pass. The Eph defense continued to hold the Continentals scoreless in the second half, while Williams' offense more than doubled its point production.

Williams set the pace for its 21-point performance in the third quarter with a touchdown on the opening set of plays in the second half. Freshman Jay Wheatley ran the Hamilton kickoff back 30 yards to start the Eph drive at their own 34-yard line.

Key runs in the series were made by Massucco, while his backfield partners, Nuzzolese and senior Greg Collins, continued to grind out yardage. Massucco ran for 20- and six-yard gains before Lutz found him in the end zone for the touchdown on a well-executed play action flare pass.

Following Massucco's touchdown catch, Williams' defense allowed the Continentals just eight yards in three carries, forcing them to punt from their own 41-yurd line and giving the Ephs the ball once again. After a 13-yard run by Collins, Massucco scooted around the left end and streaked 49 yards for his second touchdown and the longest run of the afternoon by either team.

Continued pressure by the Williams defense yielded an interception by co-captain Greg McAleenan on Hamilton's first play after Massucco's touchdown run. However, the Ephs could not get anything going and punter Rick Walter had to be called in.

Walter's punting, which proved effective in the pre-season scrimmages, continued to be a big plus for Williams. He punted six times for an average of 39.3 yards against the Continentals.

Another Williams interception, this time by senior Mark Eckert, was to no avail as the Ephs could only manage 18 yards on four plays. The combination of Walter's punt, followed by the tenacious play of the Williams defensive line, held Hamilton in check and Williams resumed possession with several minutes remaining in the third quarter.

Two runs by junior Vernon Davis (nine and 12 yards) and a five-yard pass from Lutz to sophomore fullback Bill Novicki took the Ephs 26 yards for their sixth score of the game. On just the third play of the drive, Davis put on a few moves and dashed the final 12 yards into the end zone.

Williams final points of the game came on a series initiated by a fumble recovery by senior Don Rice. The running of freshman backs Vern Johnson, Mark Brown and Jay Wheatley, combined with passes from sophomore quarterback Tim Connelly to Gardner and Walter (nine and 11 yards), produced a 50-yard drive and another six points for the Ephs.

Wheatley ran six times for 17 yards during the series and finally ran over the Hamilton left guard for two yards and a touchdown.

Coach Bob Odell's Ephmen, now 1-0 on the season, travel to Middlebury, Vt. next Saturday for what could be Williams' toughest game of the season. The Ephs hope to avenge last year's 27-0 loss to the Panthers.

WUFO soars over UMass 31-16

Playing under ideal weather conditions, the Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization (WUFO) opened its second fall season Sunday afternoon at Gladden Field, with a decisive 31-16 win over the Amherst Frisbee Group (UMASS).

Crafty Veterans Nob Rauch, Guido Adams, Andrew Julien, and Al Blakey worked a short, crisp, passing game complementing the long bombs of Drew Porth, Greg Smith, and Peter Glidden, and opened up an early 7-1 lead.

Substituting liberally so that all twenty-six members of the co-ed team would be well-rested, WUFO containued its domination and extended its lead to 17-6 by the half. Many of the points were the direct result of the excellent defensive work of Tom Albert and Jamie Speyer. On several occasions they broke up sure goals with diving blocks.

During half-time, members of both teams and members of the crowd got together for informal frisbee freestyle tossing.

At two P.M. on Sunday at Gladden Field, WUFO takes on its traditionally toughest opponent, Middlebury, who has won all three previous meetings. This year's WUFO squad has improved a lot since the spring season and has high hopes for a successful year.

Soccer kicks off season

Williams soccer ended its preseason schedule with a 4-0 victory over Berkshire Community College last Wednesday. The shutout lifted Williams' record to 5 wins against 2 losses.

Quickly building a 3-0 lead, Williams coasted through most of the muggy afternoon before sophomore Dan Friesen provided the final goal. Gregg Hartman, preseason's scoring sensation, again chipped in a pair of goals, and junior Jeff Coombs contributed his third preseason score.

Fullbacks Tad Roach and Jas Dembinski led an outstanding defense which allowed the confused BCC squad only one shot.

Commenting on the season's prospects, senior co-captain Seth Johnson noted: "With the schedule we play, one of the region's toughest, we have to play well week-in and week-out to reach our goal of high New England ranking."

Tomorrow Williams opens its regular season at home against a powerful UMASS squad. The Minutemen finished 4th in New England last year, and are currently ranked sixth. The game should prove to be fast-paced and hard-hitting as both sides rely on team quickness and hustle to power their offenses. The [illegible] on Cole Field.

Womens' tennis team smashes Wesleyan, 8-1

The Women's tennis team maintained its winning streak—now at three games—be defeating Wesleyan, 8-1, on Saturday.

As all nine matches were played simultaneously on Wesleyan's asphalt courts, only two matches turned into close competition. The other eight were each won in two straight sets.

As a consistent competitor at fifth singles, Ephwoman Laura Goebel won her first set 6-0, but played all the way to a tie-breaker at six games all in the second set—as her opponent scrambled for all returns, and rallies became tests of endurance. Goebel, however, was the victor without having to go to a third set. She claimed the tie-breaker 5-4.

The other close match, at second doubles, became the longest match of the day. Though a comeback was almost gaged, Williams lost the match, 6-2, 7-6 (5-4).

Coached by Curt Tong, the tennis team has a '78 standing record of 3-1. The women's only match in the next week will be played Wednesday at 4 P.M. against Trinity College, on the Williams home courts.

Cross country teams face first foes

Alumni sweep eight

Former running greats from three decades of Williams history assembled on the science quad last Saturday and proved to the Eph varsity men that old dogs can be tricky. A solid alumni team led by Joe Kolb '77 swept eight out of the first ten places in the traditional aluminum bowl to upset the varsity for the first time ever.

The victory was slightly tarnished, however, since three of the Eph's top seven stayed out of the practice event to improve their health. Though co-captains Tom Schreck and Steve Polasky again ran well, their efforts were somewhat in vain.

Returning to the Purple Valley, nine alumni dashed to top finishes: Kolb, Jay Haug '73, Ken Leinbach '77, Bob Clifford '76, Mark Sisson '75, Peter Farwell '73, Scott Lutrey '75 and, with a fine effort, Spike Kellogg '62.

In other cross country action last week, the Williams freshmen showed great promise by crushing Hotchkiss 24-32. Placing for the Ephs were Dan Sullivan, Gordon Coates and Eric Schmitt, second through fourth, Jay Hellmuth in sixth, Jim Hoch in ninth, Steve Bellerose in tenth and Joel Richardson, fourteenth. Coach Tony Plansky felt the team was "off to an excellent start."

Women second at UMass tri-meet

The women's cross-country team ran a strong race Friday to finish second in a three-way meet at UMass in Amherst. The home team won the meet, and Springfield College was third.

Individual performances already showed good improvement over the results of last week's first race. Senior co-captain Mary Hakala placed second on the three-mile course with a fast time of 17:46. Freshman Sue Marchant was Williams' second finisher in 12th place, followed by senior co-captain Corrie Johnson in 13th, and senior Tannis Fox in 19th. Also contributing to the Williams effort were freshmen Liz Martineau, Brenda Mailman, Stephanie Carperos, and Alexis Hamill, sophomore Mary Ann Sondrini, and juniors Meg Washburne and Annie Ha[illegible].

The team will be competing on their own course Wednesday, September 27, in a dual meet against the perennially tough Middlebury women, beginning at 4:00 p.m. in the Science Quad.

Former CFM official charged with embezzlement, expelled

by Peter Schmitt

[Editor's note: The RECORD has voluntarily agreed to honor requests from parties involved with this story that the name of the student concerned be omitted.]

A former official of WCFM was expelled from the College last Tuesday on the basis of allegations that he embezzled funds from the radio station. The management of WCFM brought the charges before the Honor and Discipline Committee after "intense scrutiny of the financial records of the radio station" revealed that the former official had been siphoning off station money for personal use and that he had been taking commissions on sales of equipment to the station for which he had acted as a middle man.

The implicated official, who left school at the College's request last Friday, denied all charges in a telephone interview.

Responding to the denial, WCFM General Manager John Svoboda said, "If we believed (the denial) to be true, we would not have approached the Deans with this matter." In a statement released to the Record, Svoboda added that he was "99.9 per cent confident" of the truth of the allegations.

WCFM officials refused to say exactly how much money was involved, but it has been reported from a number of sources that the figure is in the neighborhood of a thousand dollars.

College Council Treasurer John Simpson said that he did not anticipate the charges of CC fund abuse would have any adverse effects on this year's WCFM allocation. "These allegations do not concern anyone currently on the radio station staff," said Simpson, "Therefore I would not expect that it would affect the Council's consideration of WCFM funding in any negative way."

The alleged embezzlement was discovered by WCFM Business Manager Don Perry and Production Manager Peter Stark as they reviewed the station's books to determine why the station ended up in debt so regularly at the end of each year. According to Perry, the missing funds represented only a small portion of the debt.

After approximately two weeks of intense scrutiny of the financial records of the financial records of the radio station, as General Manager of the radio station I felt that there were a number of unanswered questions regarding ways in which radio station money was spent. After consultation with the station's faculty advisor, Mr. Jim Hodgkins, we decided that the situation was of such a magnitude that we needed outside guidance. We conferred with Dean Rooseman who then constituted his colleagues in the Dean's office and a decision was made to bring the case to the Honor and Discipline Committee. Having served as a member of the Honor and Discipline Committee for two years, I was aware of the implications of such action and would not have brought such allegations to the Dean in the first place unless I was 99.9 per cent confident that we had a reliable factual basis for doing so and that we could support our allegations.

Because of what we intended to be the confidential nature of this matter, and given the good faith and intentions of the several parties involved, any article which now appears in the Record can necessarily be based only on individual speculation and conjecture. Our understanding is that except for a very small handful of people, no one person has the "full story" about any issue in question.

The reason for this statement is to explain as fully as we care to the details of this matter which we are sorry to see the Record reporting.

John Svoboda
General Manager, WCFM

CC acts on Forum, Weston symbol

by Ann Morris

The College Council will sponsor a forum on "Diversity and Life at Williams", Council President Bronson Fargo '79 announced Wednesday night. The forum is scheduled for 8:00 Oct. 12 in Dodd House.

The forum, Fargo said, will deal with the many different aspects of Williams, and how they interact or conflict. The topic, approved by the Council, was selected from Council suggestions by a committee chosen last week to study forum possibilities. Fargo explained that the panel will consist of one administrator, two or three faculty members, and four or five students, all of whom will make five minute presentations. A question and answer period is to follow.

The Council will select panel members at its next meeting, Fargo said, while stressing that any student suggestions are welcome. This will be the first of several forums the Council plans to sponsor throughout the year. Topics for potential future forums include Winter Study, the JA system, political apathy on campus, and the emphasis of alcohol in campus social events.

Weston

Acting on a motion made by Council Secretary Michael Lissack, the Council voted 14-12 to erect, or ask the College to erect a plaque explaining the symbols on the sides or Weston Language Center. The symbols, which resemble the Nazi swastika, are actually Navajo peace symbols built into the brickwork of Weston when it was constructed in 1908. The College Jewish Association, as well as many other members of the College community, have expressed opposition to the symbols because of their resemblance to the swastika. The Council will decide on the wording for the approved plaque, which will explain the true nature of the now controversial symbols.

In a related vote the Council elected to make a formal request to the editors of the Record to correct their editorial of September 28. The editorial, which Council Public Relations member Ted Tucci '79 called "a very unfortunate case of misrepresentation" attacked the Council's deliberation over the swastika question as an attempt to gain a "quick victory", rather than going after "real substantive problems".

Finances

Calling the amount of time spent on last year's budget "inordinate", Finance Committee Chairman John Simpson '79 assured College Council that it "will not happen again this year." He announced tentative allocations already made for four organizations, which are subject to change by both the Finance Committee and the Council. Tentative allocations for seven more organizations were to be decided at the meeting of the Finance Committee on Monday. Once allocations are credited to the books, groups may begin using the funds.

The final budget will be completed in November after groups allocated more than $1000 or unhappy with allocations have appeared before the Council. An allocation of $600 to the Lecture Committee, to be used for a Russian poet contracted last year, was approved by the Council on the recommendation of John Simpson.

WGSO becomes GPU

by Tim Jones

With a new name and revised objectives, the Gay People's Union has clearly begun the academic year with a fresh outlook.

The GPU, formerly the Williams Gay Support Organization, "has decided," said one member, "that we will not be as political as before. We're not thinking about the gay movement on a national scale. Instead our focus will be on gay people at Williams and our goals will be educational." The GPU also hopes to promote an image of openness as a group.

By adopting a new name, the Gay People's Union wishes to "broaden its appeal to everyone who is questioning their sexuality." The group's old name made it "too easy for people on campus to say there are no gays here, only supporters of the movement."

At its meeting Tuesday, September 26, the GPU formulated plans for the events it will sponsor this year, including a coffee house, dances, and panel discussions. During the fall semester the Union hopes to assemble a panel of representatives from the administration, faculty, and student body as well as legal and theological experts to evaluate the implications of homosexuality today. In addition, the group intends to distribute a publication similar to the one that was printed on campus in 1976 dealing with homosexual concerns. To cover these and other expenses, the organization's leaders will seek a $900 allocation from the College Council.

Last year the WGSO strongly supported the inclusion in the College Bulletin of a clause stating that the College does not discriminate on the basis of sexual preference. Though the Trustees refused to endorse this proposal, the members of the GPU were pleased to note that a similar statement did appear in the Student Handbook this year.

This will be the first year that a campus gay organization has published in advance the time and location of its meetings. Explained one member, "One thing we can do for this campus is be as open and available as possible."

In terms of the atmosphere on campus, several of the 20 members attending the meeting suggested that people now have more tolerant attitudes than in the past. "It's easier to come out, although the size of the campus still makes doing so difficult. The people here are positive, we're not worried about any kind of abuse."

Committee considers new WSP options

by Lorraine Driscoll

The Winter Study Review Committee plans to make its recommendations for a revision of the program to President John Chandler by November or December.

The committee is considering several options based on a survey of the faculty or about the Winter Study Program last year, conducted by committee chairman William Grant, professor of biology.

According to the 169 faculty members, who responded, one fourth would like to see more consistent standards. One fifth would like a reduced teaching load; one fourth would prefer more stringent academic standards; one fourth would like to see the entire program substituted or abolished. One third of those surveyed feel that there is a lack of rigor and seriousness displayed by students and one fourth feel that the same is true of the faculty.

Chairman Grant stated that, overall, the faculty exhibited significant concern over the deterioration of standards within the program.

According to committee member Joel Smith '79, the major complaint the group must deal with is the minimal workload requirement of many Winter Study projects. "There is an even split in the committee between those who want a major change and those who want a minor change. However, there are no specific plans on the table," said Smith. Many faculty members believe that unless some changes are made, they would like to abolish the program. According to Smith, the committee is attempting to provide some alternatives.

One alternative is to reduce the minimum number of January's which the faculty must teach. At present, faculty members must teach two years out of every three on Winter Study. The committee is considering reducing this to one out of every two years.

Other considerations include looking into distribution requirements for the program, or requiring that students take only three Winter Study courses instead of the original four. Another possibility might be evaluating more strictly the independent study 99 proposals. The committee might also consider a revision in the grading system for Winter study.

Graduating seniors, polled last year concerning their Winter Study programs, stated that their freshman

Winter Study projects which are not academically oriented have become the subject of Committee and Faculty disagreement.

Microwave radiation poses health problems

by John Pavacic

Paul Brodeur, an investigative reporter for New York magazine, warned of a national health crisis stemming from the harmful effects of microwaves in a lecture last Tuesday on "Microwaves: The Risk to America."

"I believe we are living on the brink of disaster," said Brodeur as he recounted a cover-up of the dangerous effects of microwaves by the American government, the "military-industrial complex," and American scientists. Brodeur noted that since World War II, microwaves have been known to cause sterility, blood abnormalities, cataracts, major behavioral changes, and chromosome damage. In addition, he said, microwaves have increased the amount of radiation "naturally emitted by the sun" by one hundred to two hundred per cent.

Microwaves are very short wavelength radio waves which cannot be directly perceived by the human body. They are emitted by radar, radios, televisions, microwave ovens, citizens band radios, and diathermy heaters used to treat aches and pains.

Brodeur said that soon after World War II, Russian and Eastern European researchers discovered blood alterations and behavioral regrettable errors

To the editor:

The Public Information Staff of the College Council wishes to inform you of some "regrettable errors" in last week's editorial entitled "Weston Uber Alles".

The Council listened to a concern expressed by a student regarding the symbols on the language center. Yet, listening doesn't mean, as your editorial stated, that we approved a plan that called for the College to remove anything. Indeed, the Council had tabled the matter and sought the advice of the art department. After due consideration, at our last meeting (post editorial) we voted to erect a plaque explaining the historical significance of these Navaho peace symbols.

While we appreciate the sentiment of "Let's start doing something" that appeared between the lines of the editorial, we regret that you chose to write without seeking the facts and without acknowledging what has been done in other matters. An important part of the Council's function is to actively respond to expressed student concerns.

Constructive criticism helps, and your sentiments were constructive. But, our image and, even more importantly, the Record's image are not enhanced by blatant misrepresentation of the facts.

Sincerely,
Michael Lissack '79

Ted Tucci '79

report rejection

To the editor:

We join the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition in rejecting the Trustee report on Williams College's responsibilities as a shareholder on the grounds that it is "shallow, ambiguous, and inconsistent with the obligations of a moral liberal arts institution".

The advocation of the Sullivan Principles is only one small step towards the improvement of conditions for Blacks in South Africa. They do not affect the primary means by which American corporations in South Africa contribute to the system of apartheid: the payment of taxes to the white South African government.

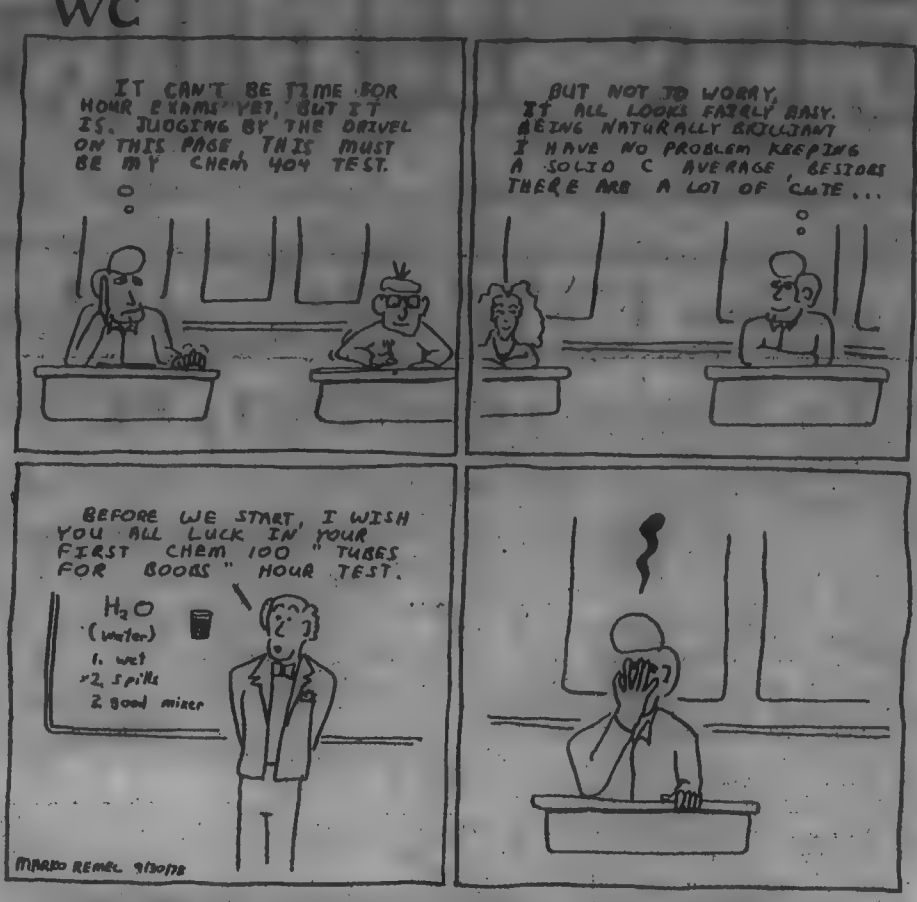
For this reason, we urge the Trustees to continue to evaluate the role of United States corporations in South Africa and reconsider the recommendations set forth by the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibilities, including divestiture.

Respectfully,
—Members of the Williams Feminist Alliance

Wednesday Night Coalition?

To the editor:

We, the Wednesday Night Coalition, are an unrecognized, prolific and, we believe, too important organization to be overlooked. Founded as long ago as September 27 of this year, we are adamant at the disrespect allotted our distinguished gathering. Our purpose: the re-escalation of the Vietnam War to expunge the ubiquitous ennui permeating the Williams community. Not only would such action fill the all too apparent void of political activism at Williams, but we might also ship a few students off to the 'Nam which would be a damned good experience for the preppy little bastards.



Ensconsed here in the languor of the late 70's, the Northern Berkshire Alternative Energy Coalition, as well as the Williams Environmental Action Group, rarely raises heads. Amnesty International is too far removed to gain sincere membership, and the Williams Action Coalition consists of impotent guilty liberals. However, when one is presented with the prospect of an early demise halfway around the world, he is deft to don hand-wrought footwear, a wool poncho, and molotov cocktails.

Our cause is a relevant one because it deals with the apathetic psyche ever in need of stimulation. Our end, should it be realized, would be magnanimous in itself, overpowering in the response it would occasion.

At what time will something be done to get the Williams community off its ass, to concern itself with matters of immediate consequence to the student? We, the Wednesday Night Coalition, will make that time now.

An alternate point of attack is New Hampshire.

Thank you for this recognition,
The Wednesday Night Coalition

Anti-nuclear activist says hope can survive

by Mary Agnes Sheehan

Fr. Ned Murphy, an anti-military and anti-nuclear activist, spoke Wednesday night about "Signs of Hope in Today's World." By stressing one's personal involvement, he asserted that hope can survive.

Murphy, who has been a Jesuit for the last ten years, became involved in the anti-war movement in 1968. He worked with draft resisters and deserters, and was active in the legal aspects of the anti-war effort. Indicted twice, first for conspiracy against the United States Government, and later for the destruction of property of a foreign government. In both cases, he had the charges dismissed. He now works at the Center for Justice and Peace in New York City.

In his talk, sponsored by the Newman Club, Murphy asserted that it is hope which helps him continue his work. He enumerated several specific signs of hope he sees in the world. First, the woman's movement, which he considers truly revolutionary, is an encouraging trend. Second, he feels that the way people have begun to deal with the problems of living in urban environments is a promising sign. He also feels that the anti-nuclear efforts of some people are reassuring.

Murphy stressed, as well, that it is risky to become involved in endeavors such as these. By taking the first step and joining with people who are trying to change a certain aspect of society, a person jeopardizes his security. However, once that step is taken, there are always people willing to help and a community which offers support.

Finally, Murphy emphasized that anyone who truly acts out of hope and takes other people seriously must be a revolutionary. This is because Murphy feels that the government we now live under is corrupt. Consequently, anyone who seriously looks at society, will rebel against it.

Sour Pickles

The weather being what it's been lately (and I can state with considerable certainty that the weather has been what it's been lately; no less than three sources have independently confirmed this to me), I have been using what excuses that I can find to get outside. So I thought that for the column this week, rather than spend all my time behind a typewriter, I would poke about the campus and see what I could learn of some of the more interesting, unlikely and fictional events that are coming up around here.

A brief catalog of my findings:

Religion Professor John Eusden is bringing an entourage of Zen musicians to campus for a concert in Chapin. In the classic tradition of Zen, the program calls for the musicians to "sit quietly and do nothing." Audience participation is encouraged. The concert will last for two hours with a fifteen minute intermission.

The History Department is all agog (it's quite a sight, believe me) over an upcoming lecture by a Mr. Fernando Tuitsie di Fruitsie, who has been described by one member of the department here as "one of the few true Renaissance men I have ever met." Mr. di Fruitsie, who is 500 years old and knew the Medicis personally, will be speaking on "The Lire: It Sure Won't Buy What It Used To," in which he promises to regale his audience with wonderful old romantic, and entirely phony, tales of the high life centered about Florence in the sixteenth century.

According to Mr. di Fruitsie, in the seventeenth century the high life was centered around Gertrude and no where near as much fun. An otherwise obscure figure in the Renaissance di Fruitsie insists that his major claim to fame is having persuaded da Vinci not to paint a mustache on the Mona Lisa.

The people down at the Slippery Banana will be giving lessons in T'ai Shu (pronounced T'ai Shu) which is the oriental martial art of flighting with sacks of granola. The clerk who gave me this information said that all of the instructors will be first degree black granola or above. The clerk himself said he was also familiar with Kung Fu, T'ai Chi and seven other Chinese words.

The Lecture Committee will be sponsoring a talk by a Mr. Simon Twit on "How to Make Big Money on the College Lecture Circuit." Mr. Twit, who is nobody to anything or anybody, will give a free demonstration of his proven technique.

Of particular local interest is a series of lectures being given by Professor Karelis in the Philosophy Department on the mind-body duality. On Tuesday, October 11, Professor Karelis's mind will speak and the following Thursday we will hear from his body. Karelis says that the basic theme of the lectures will be that the mind-body duality is a fiction, although he is not expecting the view to immediately gain wide acceptance.

Finally, the Dean's office has asked me to dispel a rumor that there will be an alien landing on top of Mount Greylock sometime next month. According to my source, Dean O'Conner has always enjoyed playing with his mashed potatoes and there is nothing for anyone to be concerned about, except possibly wise-ass humor columnists.

Well, that's all I was able to find out. Now you'll have to excuse me while I tiptoe quietly back to the real world while, I hope, no one is looking.

experiences were not as "good" as their next three years. The committee is looking into the reasons for this problem.

Committee member Gary Jacogsohn, Assoc. Professor of political science, said that the level of interest and commitment in Winter Study is not as high as it could be. "We've gone lax," he said.

Those committee members interviewed emphasized that at this early stage of discussion they cannot predict what the outcome might be. While the recommendations will not take effect this year, they might be instituted next year.

Microwave dangers haunt Americans problems in test animals caused by low-level microwave irradiation. Immediately, these countries lowered their standards of exposure for citizens.

The American government and the military refuted the Russian test results, even though fact naval radar technicians complained about "headaches, aching eyes, fatigue, and sterility." Brodeur asserted that this "quintessentially stupid" behavior on the part of the Americans was based on Cold War hatreds, blind trust in American medical science and "fear of reprisals" and litigation from citizens, particularly soldiers exposed to microwave radar emissions.

During the 1950's and 1960's American scientists determined that microwave radiation can cause cataracts, Central nervous system damage, blood disorders, chromosome damage, and precancerous conditions, the reporter said. The results, he cahrged, were suppressed by industry and the military.

Release of the report was prevented by a court injunction obtained by the Howard Hughes Corporation "for national security reasons." The corporation, he emphasized, employed the doctor.

Although Congress passed the 1968 "Radiation Control Act" to help alleviate the problem, the Defense Department found a major loophole that circumvented it, Brodeur charged.

Brodeur emphasized that despite a few community action bans on radar installation and New York City's proposal to reduce City-wide microwave radiation standards, much more has to be done. "The solution will be political, not biological," he said, and believed the first move, though highly expensive, would be to relocate radio transmitters away from communities and to install microwave filtering screens in buildings.

The American people must be alerted to the problem and protected immediately, Brodeur said, at any cost.

Stronger Financial Aid Programs: Needed Relief

by Henry Flynt

The proposed Tuition Tax Credit Legislation clearly has broad appeal whether one considers it politically or democratically. Approved in principle by substantial margins in both the House and Senate, with a final version currently being worked on in joint committee, this legislation would provide income tax credit of up to 50 per cent of tuition and fees with a maximum set at $500 for every child a parent is supporting in college. Advocates of tuition tax credits emphasize the relative ease with which the IRS can institute the measure. No additional forms or personnel would be needed.

Although President Carter a year ago announced that he would not sign two particular bills pertaining to financial assistance for college students, the House and Senate, never-the-less are now considering in committee similarly inspired legislation with the heading of "The College Opportunity Act of 1978". This legislation would bolster significantly the complex of programs now designed for student financial aid. The six-year-old and best known of these, the Basic Educational Opportunity Grant program, would receive the greatest attention. Not only would more federal funds be appropriated for BEOG, but also the present maximum grant of $1600 would be raised and, more importantly, the family income level for eligibility would be increased above present limits. The proposed expansion of BEOG could conceivably affect 1.5 million additional students, most of whom would be from families earning between $15-25,000 a year.

Most financial aid officers at colleges across the country favor the type of legislation embodied in the College Opportunity Act. Even though Williams has not made an "institutional" stand on this matter, I feel that the interests of students as well as of the College are served more effectively when each student case can be considered on an individual basis. The College Opportunity Act, originally proposed by the Carter Administration, focuses on this concern for case by case analysis at both the federal and institutional levels. On the other hand, the Proposed Tax credit plan, however, it does so, only superficially. It would bring no relief to those families who have either very little or no tax liabilities. Similarly, even for the very high income families there is the question of whether it would have the desired effect of offering real "relief," consideration quite aside from the question of equity or fairness.

If the Tax Credit plan becomes law, I do not believe we need fear that all institutions will automatically raise tuitions by $500, although this has been a concern expressed in some circles. Somewhat the opposite institutional response is quite possible. The manner in which Williams, for example, analyzes a financial aid application includes among many factors the question of federal tax paid and the amount of "effective" family income. Admittedly $500 in tax relief by itself is a significant figure, but this amount of change in "effective" income has a negligible impact on what the Williams system might determine parental contribution should be in a given case. It is unreasonable to expect that if the Tax Credit plan materializes, all of the financial aid students at Williams would receive an additional $500 in support from home—or, by the same token, that Williams would reduce all of its scholarship grants by $500. Taking these considerations into account, I see no way that such legislation would materially broaden the Williams program so that it might assist more students.

On the other hand, expanded federal support of already existing financial aid programs would benefit Williams and its students in two important and obvious ways. First, more amply funded Basic Grants would reach up into additional middle-income families and at the same time provide more federal dollars to those lower income students already in the program. With its students receiving more substantial federal assistance, Williams could extend the coverage of its own funds over a greater number of undergraduates. This would have an impact particularly at the incoming freshman level where limited resources inhibit a concerted effort by the Admissions Office to interest and attract a larger number of candidates from lower-income families.

A second institutional benefit is also possible. Williams tuition costs have been increasing more rapidly than the increases in annual income from our own scholarship endowment and from gifts earmarked for this purpose. Consequently, in order to maintain a constant level of assistance to 30 per cent of the students enrolled, we must expect more dollars each year from the general operating funds of the College. Even though our program has had an approximate 14 per cent slice of the annual Williams operational budget for the past several years, such general or unrestricted support of financial aid students has risen from $322,000 five years ago to $483,000 two years ago.

There are competing demands from many deserving quarters for such general funds, so the question remains of how much longer the financial aid program can increase its dependence upon such a source and not inhibit other areas of the College's operation. Such competing demands range from providing more adequate faculty and staff salaries as well as we can the amount of the inevitable increase in tuition from year to year. Even though federal support of campus-based student aid programs will not, in itself, resolve our financial problems, the Tuition Tax Credit plan effectively does nothing in this area.

The Williams experience in assisting families with the constantly increasing costs of higher education shows a not surprising need to deal with an ever-widening range of family incomes. One often reads, or hears, that a family has to be very poor or very rich to send a son or daughter to a college like Williams. Without in any way discriminating against the very low income levels, Williams has yearly advanced its financial aid coverage well into the so-called middle and upper-middle income families. The profile of families within our financial aid program shows a widening spread comparing last year with three years ago. We feel, however, that the Carter aid package will more effectively help us do more.

The median income of the families receiving Williams assistance has increased from $15,675 in 1975-76 to $19 235 in 1977-78. In 1975-76 28 per cent of the families were found above the $20,000 income level compared with 44 per cent in 1977-78.

Lawrence Gladieux, writing from the Washington Office of the College Board, concludes with this analysis of the issue of relief for middle-income families in financing higher education. The College Opportunity Act "(1) is more sensitive to the variety of financial circumstances that are glossed over too casually in discussions of the 'middle-income squeeze,' (2) would direct far larger individual benefits and a greater proportion of new monies to middle-income families than would tax credit schemes, and (3) is more consonant with national policy objectives of equalizing opportunity established during the past decade.

"The politics, the procedural possibilities, and the element of timing are all quite intricate. In short, it remains a guessing game as to what this year's highly charged debate on the middle-income issue will ultimately yield—tax credits, student aid expansion, both or nothing at all that can be said with certainty is that assistance to middle-income students will continue to dominate discussions about higher education this year and will clearly influence the process of reauthorizing student aid programs when the Higher Education Act comes up for renewal in 1979 . . ."

Tuition Tax Credits: Needed Relief

by Jeff Nelligan

Few events in Washington directly affect the average college student. We may, depending upon our viewpoint, become wildly indignant over the Defense budget and CIA excesses or mildly pleased with peace talks and human rights gestures. Yet we often don't feel the concrete results of Congressional performance and decision-making. This is all about to change. In a House-Senate Conference Committee, the final provisions of a tuition tax-credit bill, sponsored by Senators Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D. New York) and Robert Packwood (R, Oregon) are being hammered out. The Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1977, will provide tax credits of up to $250 per student to parents with children in public or private schools.

The Moynihan-Packwood bill is the strongest and most appealing tuition-tax bill to emerge from the 95th Congress. Over 100 such bills were submitted to Congress but were either bottled up in committee and allowed to die or withdrawn. The present bill, similar in part to an earlier proposal by Senator W. Roth (R. Delaware), allows tax credits equivalent to 50 per cent of the tuition and other fees paid per child in public or private school. The credits would initially be $250 per child but would rise to a maximum of $500 by 1980. Though the bill passed the Senate virtually intact, opponents of the measure in the House were successful in defeating portions of the bill extending credits to include elementary secondary school costs, this provision was considered unjustifiably supportive of parochial schools and inflationary, as well.

President Carter remains opposed to the bill although he remarks that he is, "... firmly committed to finding ... acceptable methods of providing aid to parents," whose children attend public and private colleges and universities. Carter favors instead a massive $1.45 billion increase in present grant, work-study, and loan programs for college students. Essentially, this would expand the Basic Educational Opportunity Grant (BEOG) program. It would make funds available to more than 5 million students. Basic grants would be raised to $1,800. and the ceiling on parents' eligible income levels would rise from $16,000 to 25,000. In addition, it would provide 176,000 new jobs to the College Work-Study Program.

If one examines both the executive and legislative proposals, it is clear that the Congressional measure is wisest. First, the Moynihan-Packwood tax credit bill would not raise taxes and this is an important factor to consider in a period of acute voter resentment over government spending. The Carter recommendation calls for a huge sum, and the impact will be felt alike by those with children in school, and those without. The tax credit proposal on the other hand affects only those with school-aged children. As Timothy Healy, President of Georgetown University and an expert on educational financing states, ("It is far easier to cut back an abstraction like a budget than it is to raise people's taxes.") Second, administering Carter's program would enlarge the massive Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, which is already so big that many of its officials as well as all of the educational lobbies, are in favor of creating a separate Department of Education. The legislative proposal requires minimal HEW interference. Finally, the Moynihan-Packwood bill would strengthen the shaky foundations of non-public schooling. Parents who send their children to private schools pay costs on both fronts, taxes for public schools and tuition for private institutions. This bill would allow and encourage more parents to send their kids to private schools. In extending his proposal, Senator Moynihan argues that private schools, "... provide diversity to the society, choice to the student and parents, and a rich array of distinctive educational offerings that even the finest of public institutions find difficult to supply, not least because they are public and must embody generalized values."

Probably the most legitimate criticism of the Moynihan-Packwood bill is that there is no ceiling on income eligibility to prevent the rich from receiving tax credits. Hence, Senator Moynihan has made it known that he will not oppose a clause inserted in the bill establishing a maximum income for receiving tax credits. Written into the bill however is a measure designed to remit the amount of the tax credit to low income citizens who do not pay income tax.

The tuition tax credit issue hits home to most college students and their parents. A proponent of the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1977 remarks, "The public senses that (the bill) is an American issue." In a time of citizen tax revolt, a tax rollback is appealing. The Moynihan-Packwood tuition tax credit bill soon to emerge from the Conference Committee promises to ease some of the parental heartbreak of sending children away to school.

Outlook

ON TUITION TAX CREDITS

Editor's note: A House-Senate conference committee last Thursday approved a compromise Tuition Tax Credit bill that ought to be on President Carter's desk sometime this week. According to the Washington POST, Carter is expected to veto the legislation and it is uncertain whether Congress will sustain the veto.

The compromise bill would allow parents to reduce their taxes by 35% of the tuition cost for each student, up to a maximum of $100 this year, $150 in 1979 and $250 in 1980. The House had originally set the figure at 25% of tuition costs, the Senate at 50%. The Senate had also originally established the maximum credit at $500 per student. The new bill additionally, extends tax credits only to parents of college students.

Even cowgirls . . .

Three years ago the Who put out the powerful album The Who By Numbers, and now Keith Moon, the most notorious drummer in the history of rock 'n' roll, is dead.

In the grimmest of ironies, the back of the chair he straddles on the cover of their newest album, Who Are You reads, "Not to be taken away."

And this is what the hardened and thirtyish Who soldiers have always been about. More than ever on Who Are You they defy any critic to take away any of their glory from their music, their history, and their exalted status. "Who Are You" as a question is the Who's assertion of their supreme confidence and defiance, and Townshend's determination to keep the group going despite the death of Moon (which he revealed in a recent interview) underscores the point. The Who know who they are, and to hell with you if you don't.

Musically, Who Are You confirms the use of synthesizers and elaborate production as a Who staple—a style which first flourished in Who's Next and perhaps had its pretentious moments during Quadrophenia.

The Who By Numbers recaptured the anguish and rawness of earlier days, Who Are You is in many ways the most abstract of all Who albums to date, displaying considerable musical creativity.

"New Song" kicks out the vinyl with Daltrey in full command of his assaulting bravado, and Townshend's words hammer out a knowing cynicism that is positively acrid: "I write the same old song with a few new lines and everybody wants to cheer it."

"Music Must Change" likewise flaunts the cocky swagger of a group unafraid to question their own integrity. "Have I done this all before?" is the theme, and the answer lies in Townshend's old allies, the kids, now the punks of London.

"Guitar and Pen" stands on vaguer and shakier Aesthetic ground. A personal testament to the integrity of the artist, its pomp is mirrored by more of the aloof synth and loosely tailored piano arrangements.

Its companion piece is "Sister Disco", a song reaking typically of the damning Who sensibility, and which by implication waves the flag of rock 'n' roll the way "Long Live Rock" blatantly did: "Goodbye Sister Disco - My dance has left you behind - Goodbye Sister Disco - Now Your're so Low - Like Plastic, Deaf, Dumb, and Blind."

The old, young at heart Who fan, however, should find "Trick Of The Light" the superior song on Who Are You. A rocker in the loudest, most impassioned and condescending sense of the word, "Trick" is the only song here in which guitars fully direct the music into immediate gut responses. Townsend rounds off his solos perfectly. Moon pounds.

Yes, hated the Who are, and they revel in it. John Entwhistle's composition "Had Enough", another solid synth plus guitar effort, catalogues various hardassed poses, only to ring out, as if in relief, "Here comes the end of the world."

The Who have sung more tunefully, but their musicianship, intensity, and awareness are still as compelling as ever.

Space Exhibit

The fall show of the Milham Planetarium will be "The Legacy," a bicentennial history of American space research opens Friday, Sept. 29. The show includes a fanciful look back from the future at the current NASA efforts to explore the outer planets.

Specifically, the Planetarium provides a look at how a person living in the future might look back on our first steps to other planets.

The United States currently has two spacecraft, en route to Venus. An additional one has been sent by the Soviet Union. All three will arrive at Venus in December. Three other spacecraft have been sent to Saturn and in 1979 will begin sending back photographs of the planet's rings.

The Williams students who present the shows are Judy Beck '81, John Duffield '80 and John Segal '82.

ARTS

Indian Music

Sushil Mukherjee will present a concert of Indian music Wednesday, Oct. 4 at 8 p.m. in the Cluett Room of Lawrence Hall. Mukherjee, who sings as well as plays the bamboo flute and harmonium, will be accompanied by a small group of musicians. Admission to the concert is free.

Folk-rock musician Livingston Taylor will present a concert Thursday, Oct. 5 in Chapin Hall at 8:30 p.m. Also appearing in this ACEC sponsored concert will be Scott Langkford '80. Admission to the concert is $3.00 with Williams ID and $5.00 for others.

The Music Dept. will sponsor its second Studio recital Thursday afternoon in Thompson Chapel at 4 p.m. The Studios offers Williams students the chance to perform in front of a public audience. Admission is free and everyone is encouraged to attend.

Violist To Play

Michael Ponder, violist, will be joined by pianist Myrna Nachman, who was Visiting Assistant Professor of Music at Williams College last year, in a concert at the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute in Williamstown tonight at 8:30. Admission is free with Williams ID.

The first half of the program will include a sonata in G minor by Henry Eccles (1652-1742) and the Arpeggioni Sonata by Schubert, one of his most popular instrumental works. Schubert wrote this sonata in 1824 for the arpeggioni, an instrument that was a cross between a cello and a guitar. It is performed today on either the viola or the cello. The music of the second half of the program will include the Sonata Movement in D minor by the Russian composer Glinka (1803-1857) an early work left unfinished. It will be followed by Romance, which comes from a suite of pieces for viola and orchestra by the English composer Benjamin Dale (1885-1937), a contemporary of Beethoven and Mozart.

Michael Ponder studied at the Royal Academy of Music and has since played with the London Mozart Players, the London Philharmonic, the Royal Philharmonic, and other London orchestras. Mr Ponder is a frequent visitor to recital halls in the United States. Myrna Nachman is on the music faculties of SUNY-Stony Brook and of Brooklyn College. She will complete a Doctor of Musical Arts degree in piano from Yale University School of Music this fall. She is an active chamber and solo musician.

Engraver Lecture

England's leading contemporary engraver of fine letters in wood and copper will lecture tonight at 7:30 p.m., in Griffin Hall. The illustrated slide presentation by Leo Wyatt of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, England, is being sponsored by the Chapin Library, which is also featuring a display of Wyatt's work in its exhibition hall on the second floor of Sawyer Hall.

Wyatt has enjoyed a number of one-man shows in Britain, and examples of his work have been included in major national and international exhibitions of calligraphy and book design in Europe and the U.S. In his talk tonight Wyatt will demonstrate how lettering we use every day in labels and bookplates, on stationery and greeting cards, in adverstisements and notices can be made much more beautiful when artistry and technical virtuosity work together. Entitled "Forms and Letterforms: Leo Wyatt and His Engraving," the lecture will also permit enquiries from the audience. Says Robert Volz, Custodian of the Chapin Library, "this is an event that one cannot duplicate by reading books, and it is unlikely that such a notable and accomplished artist-engraver will come our way again in many years." A public reception will follow Wyatt's lecture in the Chapin Library located in Statson Hall, just a few yards behind Griffin Hall and Thompson Memorial Chapel. The public is cordially invited free of charge to both the lecture and the reception.

Physicists convene at Williams fall meeting

by Sue Maxard

Physicists from across New England met this weekend at Williams, when the Department of Physics and Astronomy sponsored the fall meeting of the New England Section of the American Physical Society (APS).

The conference, organized by Ballard Pierce of Physics and Jay Pasachoff of Astronomy, brought together leading astronomers and physicists from the region to share the results of recent investigations into subjects ranging from other galaxies to sub-atomic particles. One APS member added controversy to the conference by challenging the theory of relativity.

Astrophysics led off the conference, as three participants from M.I.T. and Harvard gave a tutorial session on X-ray astronomy and black holes Friday. They described uses of data from NASA's new satellite observatory and discussed new advances and applications of their work.

Professors and students from New England colleges and universities convened on Saturday to present a series of papers. They were grouped in four sections, each headed by a Williams faculty member. Prof. David Park opened the session on particle physics. Dale Dickinson the one on astrophysics and cosmology, Gary Keeler the fusion neutron physics, and Jay Shelton that on environmental and biophysics.

Leonid Sokolov, author of the new book A Dual Ether Universe, attacked the theory of relativity, as formulated by Einstein and still central to modern physics. He gave two papers, one challenging the assumption that the speed of light is a constant, the other arguing for a modification of the accepted law of gravity, F equals Gmm/r2.

Solar heating led off the environmental section of the conference, with a presentation of the data collected during research of one college's solar-heated residential house. Shelton gave a paper on measuring fireplace efficiencies, and other papers included discussions of the mechanics of vision.

John Lathrop and M. S. Orsene of Williams argued for an alternative interpretation of the structure of the universe in their paper during the astrophysics and cosmology section. Dickinson and others gave a paper on the existence of methanol between suns. Later on Saturday Park chaired a tutorial session dealing with quark dynamics. Quarks, which have never been identified experimentally, may be the smallest building blocks of matter, components of electrons and protons, etc. Prof. Stephen Blatt of Williams made a presentation on quark proliferation during the session.

Physicists from New England listen to Professor Blatt explain quark proliferation.

"The real break came about the eighth of September," according to Perry. "I had been repeatedly asked about certain equipment ordered from the radio station and I began to try 'to track down where the equipment was." The allegations of embezzlement stemmed from what Perry and other radio station members discovered when they succeeded in tracking down the documentation for the purchase of the missing equipment. "I made one phone call," said Perry, "and it was 'Oh my God.' I couldn't believe it." The investigation revealed that the piece of equipment had been ordered by the accused official and never delivered and that the money to pay for it was missing.

Perry and other radio station managers then began an intensive review of the station's financial records in order to verify their preliminary findings. As a result of the review, according to Perry, "a consistent pattern (of abuse) began to emerge that went deeper and deeper and further back in time." Perry refused to elaborate on what the "pattern" was, but said that "hard data" on financial wrongdoing went back as far as January of 1977, and that "suspicious" entries go back to January of 1976. After their review of the station's books appeared to confirm their preliminary suspicions, a group of high ranking station officials, in consultation with Station Faculty Advisor Jim Hodgkins, took their evidence to Dean Roosenraad a week ago last Friday (September 19th). The Honor and Discipline was convened the following Tuesday to hear the radio station's charges and that evening the accused official was informed of the decision for expulsion.

The student met with President Chandler on Thursday and asked him to overturn the Committee's decision. Chandler refused and the student left school the following day.

Perry said that revised accounting procedures at WCFM are being instituted to protect its funds from future abuse. Specifically, charge accounts with various suppliers of radio station equipment have been closed to prevent station personnel from ordering items without the authorization of the business manager. The old charge accounts "offered a large potential for abuse," said Perry. In addition, a monitor from the College Council Finance Committee must now OK all station expenditures to prevent abuses by the faculty committees, the Council approved a motion to encourage greater flexibility in scheduling committee meeting times. "Student-faculty committees discriminate against athletes," Council member John Ballan '79 charged, explaining that for athletes with daily practices a 4:00 p.m. committee meeting time is impossible.

Fifty seven per cent of the student body participate on an athletic team at some point in the year. The Council suggested the scheduling of more noon and evening meetings, or that at least the problems of student athletes be considered in establishing times for a committee to meet.

Gluck and Wolff read poetry

On Thursday night the Clark Art Institute sponsored the first presentation in its contemporary Writers Series. Louise Gluck read poems both from Firstborn and The House of Marshland as well as from her newer work. Geoffrey Wolff read excerpts from his latest novel, which is entitled the Duke of Deception.

Gluck prefaced her readings by reminding us that at a poetry reading, one hears either the cadence of the poem or the idea; one cannot, she said, grasp both at once. What follows are works by both writers.

Nancy Willard and Stanley Elkin are scheduled to read here on October 18.

"Fear of Burial" and the world she saw was as fragile as breath
as permanent as the tomb.
Never has a child died so gracefully
as in her pond.

Louise Gluck

TRUTHS

"I stammer and blush,
my father would stammer
and grin 'what the Hell'
His voice caught the first "S".
His words were bitter with humor and we laughed with crying.
His father was a confidence man.
His son was innocence.
He was caught between.
"I think I hated my wife that night.
I know I hated my wife"
He read, and she recoiled
in the front row having heard him before still hurting to hear the words again.

Water changes from hot . . .

by Eric Schmitt

One of the College's latest energy conservation measures, the conversion of all washing machines to cold water use, has dismayed some students.

Cold water washing does an effective job in cleaning clothes and conserves energy, Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor said in response to criticism from the Student Life Committee over the College's decision to discontinue hot water usage in campus washing machines.

O'Connor said allegations that the College forced the change upon students are false, citing a report conducted last spring by the Energy Conservation Committee which specifically recommended "the use of cold water only in clothes washing machines (on) campus."

The issue gained attention after the Student Life Committee that claimed the administration allowed for no student input in the decision. According to second-year committee member Steve Davidson '80, the administration "did it without student knowledge over the summer, and informed us only after the fact."

The major initiative behind the energy conservation drive came from students, O'Connor said, pointing out that two members of the eight-person Energy Conservation Committee are students. The Committee announced the decision with a report released last April; the washing machine recommendation was included in a category of energy-saving measures.

Davidson questioned the cleaning effectiveness of cold water and, more important, its capability to kill germs.

O'Connor said that after talking with the College's science and health experts, he was convinced that cold water would do a satisfactory cleaning job and, with detergent, kill as many germs as the hot water, which according to the Dean wasn't hot enough to sterilize the water anyway.

He's the bold one, he's the bright one, but the colors don't come clean in the cold like they did in the hot water washers. (photo by Johnson)

Energy Coalition holds "no nukes" rally

Members of the Northern Berkshire Alternative Energy Coalition staged a "Rally for a Non-nuclear Future," last Wednesday in front of the Williamstown Methodist Church to raise awareness among area residents of the nearby Rowe nuclear plant and of alternatives to nuclear energy.

The rally included a handful of students among the townspeople who make up the coalition. The rally did not draw as many people as expected. Coverage by area newspapers increased the group's visibility. The group plans further rallies, an alternative energy fair in North Adams and non-violence training workshops on campus with trainers from Clamshell Alliance.

Donna Psiaki improves Food Services

Food Service, to heighten nutrition awareness and plan more varied menus, haired nutritionist Donna Psiaki this summer. Psiaki, who was once Baxter Hall cook, established the vegetarian line in 1975.

To achieve these goals, she plans to invite speakers and begin an advertising campaign using WCFM and the Record. "I want to get people to think about what they're eating," she explained.

Psiaki hopes to curtail meat consumption by improving the quality of vegetarian dishes. Her job entails planning the menu for the entire college. Working within the limitations of what can be purchased, Psiaki tries to vary the menus and come up with new recipes.

How well does Williams prepare freshmen?

by Sarah Austell

Each fall at Williams is characterized by observation and fascination with the absorption of the new class into college life in general and the Williams community in particular. The freshmen, set apart from the rest of the college, are shrouded in an aura of mystery which for most of them is a welcome form of security. But there are some who feel it is unnecessary and even demeaning. Just how successful is Williams' handling of its freshman class? Are Williams frosh unnecessarily pampered? The reactions of the Class of '82 are varied, but for the most part, favorable.

The majority of the freshmen say they approve of freshman entries. They feel it is important to meet their classmates and develop class unity before they try to go out to meet upperclassmen. As one freshman pointed out, this unity is easily established since all the members of the incoming class are feeling "lost and helpless" together. Another remarked that freshmen will be conspicuous regardless of the dormitory set-up, so separate housing facilities are advantageous until they get their bearings.

A number of people who support the entry system did raise questions concerning the varying sizes of the different entries. For instance, West has two Junior Advisors for an entry of nine, while Williams E has three JA's for almost forty students.

The most often voiced criticism of the entry system was that the freshmen are not integrated into the Williams community and are unable to meet upperclassmen easily. Those objecting to the entry system did not like being treated as a novelty, and argued that unity is not a strong enough reason for separating them from the rest of the community.

One freshman suggested that a conceivable compromise would be the affiliation of a particular entry with an upperclass house. During a meeting with the JA's for the class of '82, last year's JA's suggested introducing upperclass friends into the entires so that freshmen would know some other upperclassmen besides the JA's.

The various dorms within the freshman housing system presented another topic of concern. One JA who lived on the Quad during her freshman year and did not mind it at the time now looks back on it with some hesitations. She felt that people on the Freshman Quad tend to have an attitude that "anybody who's anybody" lives on the Quad," and that there might be a disadvantage in the Quad as a self-contained unit. Another freshman argues, however, that this apparent snobbery is not snobbery at all, but just a good, healthy rivalry between dorms and entires. There was also some concern expressed about the advantages and disadvantages of living in rooms centered on a stairwell instead of a floor. Those who live on a floor argue that the stairs, separating them from their entry mates, would tend to discourage them from socializing.

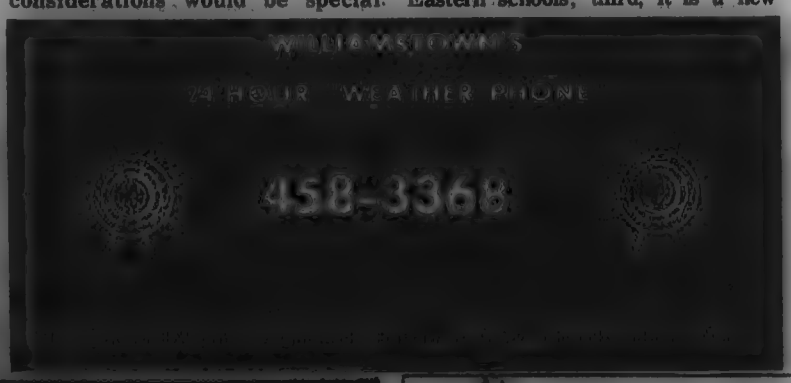
Bakke case does not affect Williams policy

Last summer's Bakke decision has no immediate impact on the College's admissions process, according to Philip Smith, Director of Admissions. Smith worries, though, that it might have a "chilling effect" on the number of minority students applying to colleges in general.

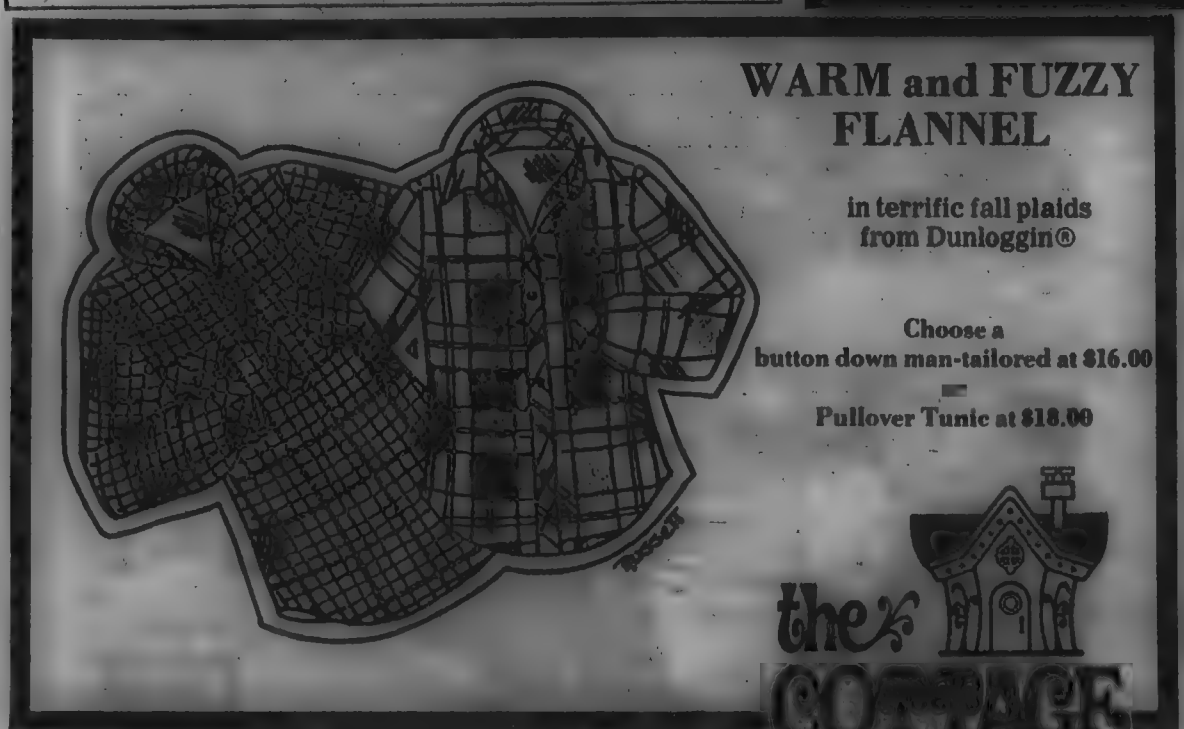
The U.S. Supreme Court's ruling arose when the University of California at Davis Medical School rejected Allan Bakke. The school had a quota policy to admit ten minority students to their class of one hundred. Justice Lewis Powell, providing the "majority opinion" allowed race to be a factor in admissions policies, but only as one out of many factors. Other considerations would be special talents, geographical origins, alumni connections, and so forth.

Smith cited a study from the "Chronicles of Higher Education" that noted a straight line trend of black students attending colleges near their homes. A larger percentage of black students are going to college than white students; the study continues, but the number of blacks applying to better schools is declining.

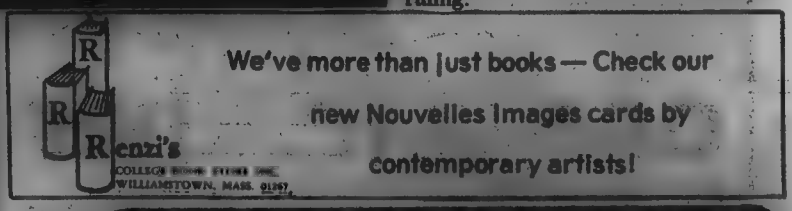
Smith liked the Bakke decision, given the case, but calls it the "wrong case." He gave four reasons; first, there was a specific quota; second, the Davis Medical School had an "unsophisticated" admissions process, unlike those of Stanford, or Eastern schools; third, it is a new school, with no historical pattern of discrimination to justify compensatory policies; fourth, there was no way to make a case for training more physicians for minorities.



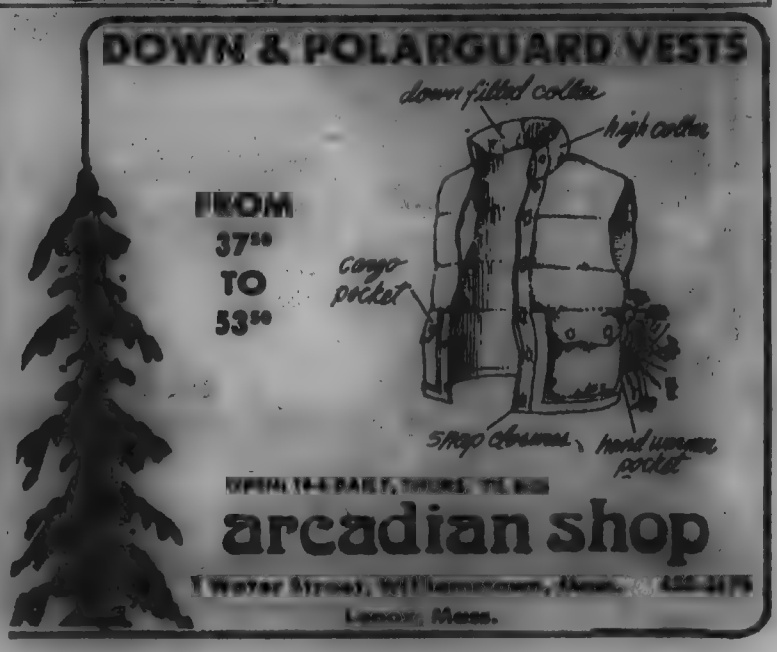
Williams admits a range of students, giving no special weight to a particular characteristic, according to Smith. He added that desirable factors change from year to year, depending on the applicant pool.



Gary Jacobsohn, Assoc. Professor of Political Science, finds the decision "not completely satisfactory." Politically, it was a "statesmanlike" ruling he feels, allowing flexibility in non-educational admissions areas.



He emphasized that the Court should strive for consistency. At present, he feels, the ruling provides an "adequate" framework for the myriad of future decisions that must be made.



He cited a union case in the South that indicates a lot of room for affirmative action. The Bakke case removed quotas in a very narrow setting. Jacogsohn noted that there are several cases in the near future that should further refine the Bakke ruling.

Everything you never wanted to know about studying at Williams

by [illegible]

Studying should be a four-letter word. It is rarely convenient to stop playing Frisbee and drinking beer. It is never fun to bury oneself in an intellectual bathtub of basically boring books. Yet almost every Williams student finds it necessary at one point or another in his/her college career, to settle down with a scintillating set of study material. The question is where.

"I feel too much like a mole if I study in my room," said one light-loving student. There are those, of course who disagree.

"My room is quiet, the seating is adequate, and the lights don't flash on and off at 11:00 p.m.," commented one experienced junior, who prefers to neglect the nocturnal niceties of the library. Still, not everyone on campus wants to work in his room. A list of some of the other viable places to study on campus follows.

SAWYER LIBRARY: This is the library, or "the libes" to some. Its excruciatingly dull facade conceals a multiplicity of morally supportive studying sites.

Starting at the bottom, the Reserve Room is perhaps the most popular place in Sawyer. It is important to mention at this point that the phrase, "I'm going to go study in the library," is not the equivalent of, "I am going to go to the library and study there continuously until I leave." People go to the Reserve Room—or to any other floor in Sawyer for that matter—to swap stones and chit chat as frequently as they go there to tackle texts.

Regardless of the purpose of library attendance, the key question for Reserve Room studiers is whether to sit on the top or the bottom row of the individually-lit cubicles. The Psychology Department has come to our aid. "If you choose to sit in the top row," said one expert in Locational Psychology, "it is plain that you are attempting to overcome feelings of inadequacy by placing yourself above the real of the world and looking over them from your lofty seat."

"If you sit in the bottom row," our sage consultant continued, "it is obvious that you are attempting to return to a womb-like environment to compensate for feelings of inferiority."

The secure reader may wish to explore the other floors of the library. The second floor is much smaller than it looks; the third is moderately quiet and moderately social; the fourth is very quiet and rarely social.

In summary, Sawyer is the place to go for a mixture of studying and socializing, of quiet and querulousness, and of mice and men. If you have a twenty-page paper due the next morning, however, it might be wise to go elsewhere.

BRONFMAN SCIENCE CENTER: This area is usually quiet, but unfortunately, it is also frequently crowded. Limited table space makes it a poor place for preparing papers, but Bronfman can otherwise be a good place to work. There are some distractions however. "I love looking out the big picture window," said one freshman, who obviously doesn't study much at night.

THOMPSON SCIENCE LIBRARIES: Nestled within the Biology, Chemistry, and Physics buildings are perhaps the quietest conventional studying places. One of the reasons that they are so quiet is that they are almost impossible to find. The biology library tends to be a little hot, and is currently being painted. The Chemistry library is nice, but don't go there the night before a major Chemistry exam. The Physics library is isolated enough to be contra-indicated for students with heart trouble.

Some of the people in these libraries are serious. Pay no attention to the dirty looks they give you when you breathe too loudly. Do not punch the buttons on your calculator with too much force. Most importantly, do not make any pre-medical jokes. Some of the students already carry scalpels.

MISCELLANEOUS INDOOR SPOTS: The adventurous may wish to study in unsanctioned areas. Like steam tunnels. Those of us who dislike various effluents may want to go somewhere else. The Geology building always seems to have some empty rooms—often including the Geology library. Poking around in Bronfman may reward the wanderer with a suitable cloister. On the other hand, some of the rooms contain radioactive stubstances or packs of escaped gerbils.

In general, empty rooms are nice because they are peaceful and quiet. You can concentrate in them. You can toss sheafs of paper about with abandon. You can talk to yourself if you want. But you can get locked in if you get too wrapped up in your work late at night.

MISCELLANEOUS OUTDOOR SPOTS: "Studying under a tree is a bit too college-catalogueesque, don't you think?" The above quote may be correct, but there are those who prefer to forsake the consistency of the library for the sunshine of the outdoors. If they go to school in Williamstown, they had better get used to consistency. Still, history has recorded times when the weather was suitable for outdoor study.

Part of the [illegible] we hear so much about is learning about different modes and methods of studying. The above locations are the most traditional studying spots on campus. The imaginative Williams student, however, will certainly find other desirable places to pour over the books.

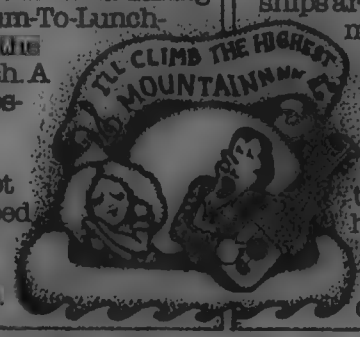
Mountaineering #4.

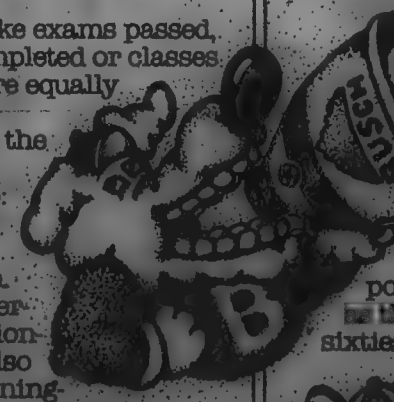
THE OPTIMUM MOMENT.



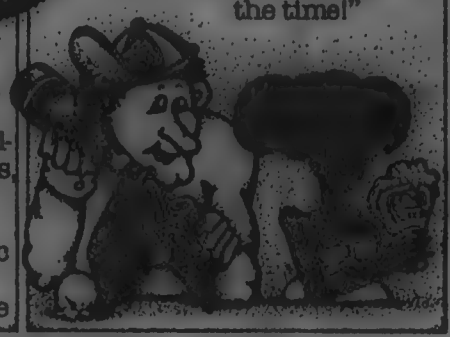
Mountaineering[1] is a skill of timing as well as technique. The wrong moment, like the wrong method, marks the gap between amateur and aficionado. So the key to successful mountaineering is to choose the occasions wisely and well. When, then, is it appropriate to slowly quaff the smooth, refreshing mountains of Busch Beer?

Celebrations, of course, are both expected and excellent opportunities to test your mountaineering mettle. Indeed, on major holidays it is virtually mandatory to do so. Imagine ushering in the fiscal new year or commemorating Calvin C. Coolidge's birthday or throwing caution to the wind during Take-A-Sorghum-To-Lunch-Week without the benefit of Busch. A disturbing prospect at best.

On the other hand, not every event need be as significant as those outlined above.



Small victories like exams passed, papers completed or classes attended are equally acceptable. Remember the mountaineer's motto: matriculation is celebration.



Interpersonal relationships are also meaningful times. There are few things finer than taking your companion in hand and heading for the mountains, transcending the ho-hum and hum-drum in favor of a romantic R & R. Naturally, couples who share the pleasures of mountaineering run the risk of being labeled social climbers. But such cheap shots are to be ignored. They are the work of cynics, nay-sayers and chronic malcontents.

Similarly, the ambience of an athletic afternoon (e.g. The Big Game) is another ideal moment. Downing the mountains elevates the morale of the fan and, hence, the team. Therefore, if you care at all about the outcome, it is your duty to mountaineer.

When should one not enjoy the invigoration of the mountains? Here, you'll be happy to learn, the list is much briefer.

Mountaineering is considered [illegible] with dessert, improper during judicial proceedings and just plain foolish while crop dusting around power lines. Otherwise, as the free-heads of the sixties used to say, "Seize the time!"

[1] Mountaineering is the science and art of drinking Busch. The term originates due to the snowy, icy peaks sported by the label outside and perpetuates due to the cold, naturally refreshing taste inside. (cf. lessons 1, 2 and 5.)

Don't just reach for a beer. BUSCH® Head for the mountains.

Footballers crush Middlebury 33-12

by Mary Kate Shea

Middlebury, Vt.—The Williams College football team spoiled Middlebury College's Homecoming game with a 33-12 victory Saturday afternoon at the Panthers' Porter Field. The win, which makes the Ephs 1-0 on the season, was Williams first victory over Middlebury since 1975. Williams hosts the Bantams of Trinity College next Saturday at 1:30 p.m. on Weston Field.

Junior halfback Dave Massucco ran for two touchdowns and caught a Bob Lutz pass for a third, bringing his touchdown total to five in the Ephs first two games. Lutz completed 11 passes for 131 yards in leading the Williams offense against a Panther defense designed to stop the Ephs' running game. Lutz's favorite target was co-captain Ken Hollingsworth. Hollingsworth collared five passes for 86 yards, and had even the Middlebury fans oohing and ahhing over several of his spectacular off-balance catches.

Middlebury got on the scoreboard first with a two-yard touchdown run by halfback Dave Howell midway through the opening quarter. The Eph defensive unit tightened up, allowing the Panthers another touchdown with one minute remaining in the first half, then holding them scoreless for the remainder of the contest. Middlebury's final points of the afternoon came on a 16-yard strike from quarterback Matt Winslow to Bob Yeadon.

Throughout the second half, Williams defense came up with big plays to stifle the Panthers scoring drives. In the opening series of the third quarter, the Eph defense displayed excellent pursuit that cost Middlebury a loss of 17 yards on the fourth down play. Williams took possession on the Panthers' nine-yard line and three plays later, Lutz connected with Massucco on a nine-yard pass for the score.

Interceptions by backfield members Mark Eckert, Mark Gerry and co-captain Greg McAleenan thwarted Middlebury scoring attempts just in the nick of time or stopped them before they even got started. Eckert and Gerry snagged errant Winslow passes destined for Panther receivers in the end zone. McAleenan's interception and 15-yard return gave Williams the ball on Middlebury's five-yard line and set up the Ephs final score of the game.

Massucco finished the drive McAleenan had started, as he scampered seven yards around the left end for his third touchdown of the afternoon.

Williams first two scores in the game came on short runs by fullback Gus Nuzzolese with no time showing on the clock at the end of the first quarter and by halfback Greg Collins just five minutes into the second quarter.

A key factor in the Ephs win against Middlebury was the stellar punting of junior Rick Walter. Panther players fumbled Walter's punts on several occasions, allowing the Ephs to launch yet another offensive drive. Walter punted nine times for an average of 41.2 yards, and five of his punts carried over 45 yards.

"The kids were high emotionally for Middlebury," says Odell. "We did a good job on offense facing an intense defense that stopped our running attack effectively, and our defense came up with big plays at the right time."

LINE SCORE: Williams vs. Middlebury

	1	2	3	4	Final
Williams	7	11	6	7	33
Middlebury	6	6	0	0	12

Individual scoring:

Middlebury—Dave Howell, 2-yard run, 6:43 left in 1st quarter (kick failed)

Williams—Gus Nuzzolese, 1-yard run, 0:00 left in 1st quarter (Hollingsworth kick good)

Williams—Greg Collins, 1-yard run, 10:09 left in 2nd quarter (Hollingsworth kick good)

Williams—Dave Massucco, 2-yard run, 5:54 left in 2nd quarter (kick failed)

Middlebury—Matt Winslow to Bob Yeadon, 16-yard pass, 1:14 left in second quarter (kick failed)

Williams—Lutz to Massucco, 9-yard pass, 12:42 left in 3rd quarter (kick failed)

Williams—Massucco, 7-yard run, 2:36 left in 4th quarter (Hollingsworth kick good)

The Eph booters reversed a 5-2 loss to UMass, last Wednesday, with a thrilling 1-0 overtime victory over Middlebury on Saturday.

Booters nip Panthers in OT; lose to UMass

Williams soccer scored a dramatic overtime victory at Middlebury College last Saturday. The win, the first in five years against the Panthers, lifted the Ephs' record to 1-1.

The play sharply illustrated the contrasting styles of the two schools. Middlebury was wide-open, constantly running and constantly kicking long to crashing wings. Williams was more deliberate, passing short and under control waiting to exploit an opening. The outcome was a tense standoff. Each side created several opportunities to ice the game, but the ball stayed out of the net throughout the regulation ninety minutes.

Senior Tad Roach, lead fullback, played an outstanding game for Williams as the key to the defense Middlebury could not crack. Roach frustrated the Panthers' attack by winning and clearing the high scrosses Middlebury relied on to power their offense. Without the cross Middlebury could not complete an offensive drive.

The goal, when it finally came late in the first overtime period, was a sight to behold. Gregg Hartman took a pass from Marcus Smith at midfield, turning past one defender, faked a pass and went by another. At top speed, another take, another defender, and Hartman faced only the Panther goaltender well out of the nets. Keeping the ball under control, he softly pushed it by the sprawling keeper. The score brought the large Homecoming crowd to its feet and spoiled a part of Middlebury's Homecoming weekend.

Last Wednesday UMASS came to Williams College ranked second in New England. They left 5-2 victors and well on their way to the top spot. The early action was marred by rough play and many blatant fouls. Several players were injured; two were forced to leave the game. UMASS's Mark Vassington capitalized on the confusion by blasting a 30-yard shot over Williams' keeper Doug Orr.

The goal woke Williams up. Slowing the pace to suit their style, the Ephmen dominated the play and co-captain Perry Nelson made it look easy by scoring the tying goal unassisted. Williams kept the pressure on and threatened to go ahead until Vassington sent Tasso Koutsoukos in close for the go-ahead goal. The half ended 2-1 UMASS.

Williams again attempted to control the flow in the second half but were forced back into a faster pace by the hard-hitting Minutemen. The Ephs made several defensive mistakes and the score was quickly 4-1.

The Ephmen rallied briefly. Gregg Hartman brought Williams back within two by putting in a penalty kick. But Vassington ended the Ephs' hopes of a comeback by scoring the day's last goal.

Volleyball team sweeps first four

Williams' newest varsity team, the Women's Volleyball squad, extended its record to 4-0 with a decisive victory over the University of Vermont last Saturday.

Although UVM overpowered the Ephwomen 15-12 in the first game, Williams thundered back to take the next two and the match, 15-3 and 15-9. Setter Catherine Gernert characterized the team's play as "sloppy in the beginning," but said that the squad "came through in the tight spots." Williams was also slated to play Greenfield Saturday, but Greenfield failed to field a team. The Ephwomen count the forfeit in their win column.

Last Tuesday Williams opened its premiere season with two wins over Smith and Russell Sage. Coach Sue Hudson-Hamblin attributed the team's excellent outing to the setting talent of sophomore Gernert and the good offensive play of co-captains Lisa Marder and Sue Jacquin. Spiker Laurene VonKlan led the team in play near the net.

The squad's next opponents on an 18-game schedule are Western New England and A.I.C. at home on Tuesday. The first game will begin at 4, to be followed by a second at 6:30.

Golf team drubs Middlebury

Victimized by three merciless drubbings in their last three outings against the Williams College Golf machine, the Middlebury Panthers anxiously awaited the opportunity to lure the Eph linksters into the womb of their newly constructed eighteen hole golf course. Alas, visions of a Middlebury victory were snuffed out by some fantastic individual performances as the golfers racked up their fourth consecutive victory without a loss. The final tally: Ephs 407, Middlebury 418.

After some early season disappointments that would have humbled a lesser man, Greg Jacobson has come fighting back with murderous vengeance. He riddled the flagsticks with spectacular iron play en route to a 75.

Tying for second with scores of 79 were junior Ed "Big" Bousa and senior Mike Lynch. Coach Rudy Goff is especially pleased with Bousa's solid play as the enigmatic veteran has shed some of the wild inconsistency that has plagued his game in the past. Representing the influence of Jack Nicklaus on the youth of America, Michael C. Lynch methodically dissected the rocky Middlebury Course. His round was highlighted by an incredible string of the spheres eagle two on the too demanding, third hole.

After a brief hiatus away from the game, Marcel Oudin clawed his way back to near semi-respectability with an 84. Hopefully this was a sign of recovery, a sign that miracle worker Marcel is on the way back.

By this time an informed golf reader should be asking "What happened to Young Bill Sprague, Bill Dick, Tiddy Upton, and Dan Katz?" These three stalwart performers were dealt crushing setbacks by the fickle Middlebury Golf Course.

The next home match is against Springfield College on Wednesday, October 4.

Williams Sports Briefs

Cross country

The Williams Women's cross-country team finished in a solid second place out of seven teams in the Amherst Invitational at Amherst, Mass. Saturday. Middlebury won with a low score of 22 points. Williams was close behind with 37, followed by Amherst with 108, Holy Cross, 111, and Mt. Holyoke, 147. Hampshire and Fitchburg State could not score because neither had a full team.

Middlebury's Karin VonBerg won the three-mile race with a time of 17:00. Mary Hakala of Williams was the next finisher in 17:43. Williams' Sue Marchant, a freshman, placed fifth, seniors Corrie Johnson, seventh and Tannis Fox, 10th, and freshman Brenda Mannan, 13th.

Earlier last week the team was defeated on their home course by a strong Middlebury squad in a dual meet. Wednesday's score was 23-32, the team with the fewer points winning.

Senior co-captain Mary Hakala was Williams first finisher, placing second. She ran the 3.2 mile course in 20:28, despite having run a ten-mile road race just three days earlier, which she had won. Freshman Sue Marchant was fifth, seniors Tannis Fox and Corrie Johnson seventh and eighth, and freshman Stephanie Carperos 10th.

Rugby

The Williams Rugby Club did their part in running Middlebury's Homecoming this past weekend defeating up Panther sides 13-0 and 3-0. Improved scrum play was decisive in both wins as an especially narrow field limited linework. The games were especially well played by Williams, considering the number of rookies in the lineup.

Tries by Jeff Samson and Yoshi Belash and kicks by Dave Weyerhauser and Vic Zerbine accounted for the A-side scoring, while another Weyerhauser kick was the margin in the second game. Williams also won the party, keeping a longstanding undefeated streak alive.

The Middlebury win evened the team's record at 1-1 after dropping a game to Springfield last weekend.

Field hockey

The Williams Varsity Field Hockey team was edged out 3-2 by Yale University on Saturday in New Haven, CT. Senior Sally Kraft scored on an assist from junior wing Nancy Fillmore to make the score 2-1 in favor of Yale at the half.

Midway through the second period, Williams tied it up on a goal by forward Monica Grady assisted by Andy Hawkins, the team's second leading scorer. Despite strong defensive performances by senior back Dawn Bednosky and Williams goaltender Blythe Miller (17 saves), Yale tallied again within the last three minutes of the game to grab the victory.

The Williams Junior Varsity Field Hockey team defeated Yale by a score of 3-1. The Varsity Ephwomen, with a season record of 2-3, travel to play Springfield College on Wednesday evening.

Students petition CC for college referendum

Two students presented a petition for a proposed constitutional amendment to the College Council last Wednesday night, seeking to have the Secretary and Treasurer directly elected.

Met by strong opposition, the presenters, Bruce Goerlich '80 and David Beardsley '80, plan to postpone a referendum by the student body on the amendment until next semester—despite 250 accompanying signatures.

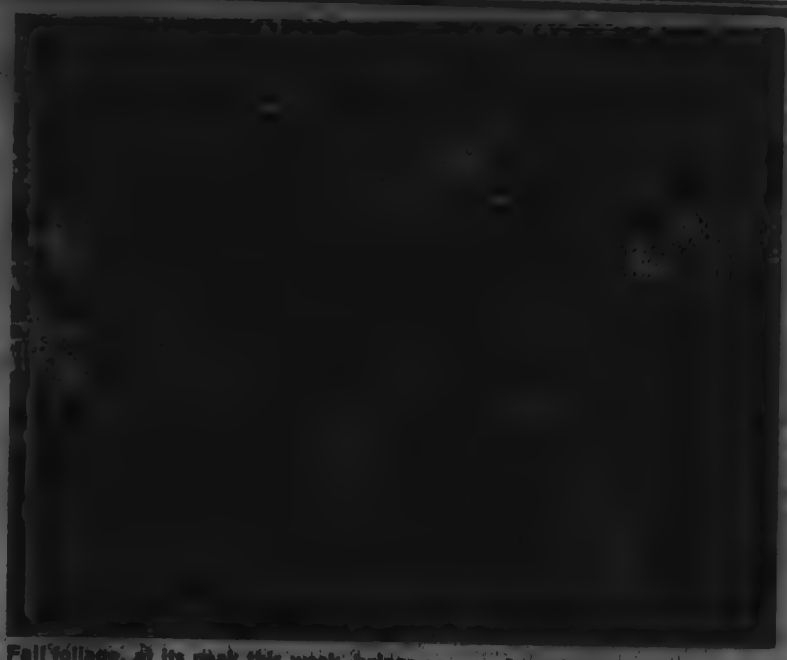
"We were 'babes in the woods' in dealing with the Council," said Goerlich. "The members live in a rarefied atmosphere of political intrigue that leads to an inflated sense of self-importance and large divisions between views of the Council and those of the student body as a whole."

The Council could only discuss the petition but not alter it, given the signatures of ten per cent of the student body. However, the council's response prompted the postponement. To deal with the evident concern with the officers, president Bronson Fargo '79, plans instead to present an impeachment clause at tomorrow night's meeting. Presently the Constitution lacks such a clause.

Simpson recommended some modifications of the original proposal to Beardsley and Goerlich before the council meeting. While emphasizing his opposition to the entire proposal, he suggested that they insert safeguards to ensure only qualified candidates were elected and that the council be able to veto the nomination of a candidate with whom it could not work. Beardsley and Goerlich then attempted to answer those concerns in a new petition. Simpson however, remained opposed to the entire proposal.

Council objections to the petition took several forms. Members questioned the legality of clause d of Article III, Section 2. Calling for new elections for the two offices, the clause might not necessarily unseat the present occupants.

Others construed the particular clause to be a personal attack directed towards either one or both of the officers. Some also felt that clause d threatened to seriously disrupt this year's budget allocation—the job of the Treasurer, Simpson, and the Council's, administration—the job of the Secretary, Michael Lissack '79.



Asst. Dean Dean Chandler, advisor to the Council, questioned the efficiency of the referendum, offering instead an impeachment clause. The objection raised the question as to whether officers can be "unelected." Others saw clauses b and c of Article III, Section 2 as inconsistent.

Since Goerlich and Beardsley sought to have the student body vote on the offices, Bill Baldiga '80 wondered why the Council should have any veto power. The two presenters said they wished to offer the option should someone be nominated whose personality clashed with the Council's.

To amend these problems, Ted Tucci '79 proposed striking the first sentence of d, striking c, and—in line with a suggestion made by Simpson—rewriting b, to allow anyone to run for the offices, provided that no "qualified" person presents himself. This proposal, never voted on last Wednesday, would have to be offered as a separate option to the students.

Disturbed by the Council's attempts to revise the petition, and to put off until later a student body vote,

Student-faculty ratio increases

by Tim Jones

The student-faculty ratio jumped this year from 12:1 to approximately 13:1. After tallying the last of the student notices of withdrawal, the Registrar discovered that approximately 35 more students than usual had opted to remain on campus for fall semester.

"The number of students we predicted would withdraw to participate in exchange programs or take semesters off dramatically declined," explained Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor.

Aggravating the situation, the incoming freshman class, the biggest in the history of the College, entered with 501 members. Thus the September enrollment of 1978 students "was the largest ever." This figure is 110 higher than last spring when 1868 students registered in classes.

As a result, O'Connor continued, "the teacher-student ratio is out of whack." "We don't intend to let this continue," the Dean stated. "We advertise as being at 12:1 and that's where we want to be."

To obtain a fraction relating the number of students to faculty, a variable called Full Time Equivalent faculty (FTE) is used. Each department is granted a certain number of FTE's. If that number is six, for example, the department in question can have either six full-time faculty or a larger number of part-time professors whose combined course loads equal six FTE's. To obtain the ratio, the average number of students for both semesters is divided by the total number of FTE's for all departments. The FTE total this year is about 150.

"It is certainly true," Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad said, "that some departments have large classes. Introductory mathematics is very, very large. Similarly, Political

CFM checks money after allegations

by Ray Dellea

Business managers with "no concept of cost structure" have been a prime factor in prolonging WCFM's record of chronic deficit spending, according to Doc Perry '79, currently in charge of business and advertising for the station.

Accumulated debts have persistently cut into budgeted expenditures, causing an annual deficit to become "almost inevitable."

Perry explained that past business managers never systematically audited the station's finances to discover what costs were fixed and what expenditures could be safely cut. Total expenditures were never calculated until the bills began to arrive. Deficits, which have plagued the station since it increased its wattage output in 1970, were merely passed on to the following year. Failing to account for the payment of old debts in its budget requests to the Council, the station exhibited a pattern of overspending and ever-increasing annual deficit.

WCFM's total deficit in the fiscal year ending July 1978 was approximately $3,800, which Perry called a "normal" figure. The figure for the previous year was $7,000. Perry claimed that when he took charge of business and advertising in January, 1978, the station's liquid assets amounted to slightly under $200. The majority of the station's allocation had already been used to pay off its back debts.

Under a more carefully organized system, Perry hopes to break the pattern of deficit spending and maintain tighter control of station financing. In the future, each of the station's departments will submit a "subsistence" budget to the business manager for review. This will consist of those items "absolutely vital" to continued broadcasting, according to Perry. The compiled budget, which will include in its expenditures the paying off of the previous year's deficit, will then go to the Finance Committee for review. The station will also budget for additional "non-essential" purchases in its allocation request.

Perry also detailed a new process which he hopes will prevent a repetition of WCFM's recent embezzlement scandal, which ended in the expulsion of a station official. Beginning this year, all equipment purchase orders must contain the signatures of two station officials. In the past, the business manager alone signed the orders. In addition, all orders must be approved by WCFM's board of directors, and no official may receive a sales commission from the company with which he negotiates a purchase.

Religion thrives at Williams in spite of doubt

by John Parrish

A lack of great involvement and an atmosphere of doubt and self-reflection characterize the major elements of religious practice on the Williams campus.

Michael Henderson, one of the Williams chaplains, admitted he was not yet familiar with the total religious picture at Williams, but expected it to be similar to his experiences on other campuses. "I see less and less of the exotic," Henderson said, and it seems that more students are searching for the historical "roots" of their religion. He said college provided an atmosphere of freedom to search for one's background.

Still most students "have difficulty relating to the assumptions they were brought up on as children," as they begin to question them. Henderson said the student wants to "change his status from drakee to volunteer" in his pursuit of religion by exercising the "garbage" and discovering its true historic foundations. He believes Williams students would like alternatives to present styles of religious practice.

Henderson feels students are less involved in religion because of their "exaggerated preoccupation with future careers." He hopes students will worry less about jobs and turn more toward the college experience itself.

Father Gus Graap of the Roman Catholic Newman Society believes that the majority of students who attend the Newman Sunday mass refrain from total involvement in the services and other Newman activities. He feels religion is "an anchor for them" and that they are disturbed by the innovations common to Newman Services. Students want an unquestionable traditional base of security, he said, especially at a time of uncertainty. The Newman Society is attempting to turn from an "academic-spiritual mix" to a more social one in the hopes of attracting more student participation, Graap said.

The Reverend Robert Moore of the Williamstown United Methodist Church said that besides the 20 to 25

The Proposed Amendment

Article II, Section 1e:

The Secretary and Treasurer shall be voting members of the College Council.

Article III, Section 2:

a. The Secretary and Treasurer shall be directly elected.

b. No person shall be a Treasurer who shall not have served on the College Council Finance Committee for one year.

c. No person shall be nominated Secretary or Treasurer who shall have received a two-thirds vote of noconfidence by the College Council.

d. Elections for Secretary and Treasurer shall be held within two weeks of ratification of this amendment. Henceforth, elections for Secretary and Treasurer shall be held concurrently with those of the President-Vice-President.

Groups fight nuclear power

by Mary Agnes Sheehan

Nuclear power has become an important issue in the Berkshire Mountains. Several groups in Williamstown are actively involved in the controversy surrounding the existence of nuclear plants in the Berkshire area.

The Williams Action Coalition, a campus activist group involved in many varied issues, is bringing films and speakers to campus to educate the student body on nuclear power. Both sides of the issue will be addressed, a WAC spokesman said, although the WAC holds a decisively anti-nuclear position. Many of its members belong to the Clamshell Alliance, a regional anti-nuclear group. The WAC plans to sponsor a non-violence training workshop, a prerequisite for participation in Clamshell demonstrations later in the year.

The Northern Berkshire Alternative Energy Coalition (NBAEC), a Williamstown anti-nuclear group, is fighting nuclear power plants in the immediate Berkshire area. The plant in nearby Rowe, Mass. has been the object of much of their effort. On Hiroshima Day they held a large demonstration at the Rowe plant. With the recent purchase of a Geiger counter, the NBAEC is planning tests to determine the safety of the Rowe operation.

The coalition holds a demonstration each Wednesday in front of the Methodist Church at the corner of Water Street and Main Street. This week it will be a candlelight vigil beginning at 5:30 p.m.

College Council

The College Council, much to our delight, spent its time last week displaying an interest in a referendum of clear concern to students. We were, on the other hand, distressed to learn that some of the representatives claimed the right to pass upon the legality and advisability of the student proposed constitutional amendment. Fortunately, most of the Council members, in recognition of their constitutional responsibilities, discussed the practical implications of the proposal instead.

The Council's constitution requires that it automatically recognize as legal any referendum proposed and-or endorsed by at least ten per cent of the student body. The mere thought that the Council member might think he has the authority to overrule, declare illegal or otherwise invalidate a referendum thus sanctioned is deeply disturbing.

Luckily, however, wiser voices prevailed over those who sought to usurp the students' power. The Council has appointed a committee to arrange the referendum. We applaud the action and hope that the CC will handle other important considerations as well.

(The Record will comment on the substance of the referendum next week.)

Silence is golden?

Last week the Record printed a story concerning an alleged embezzlement and the resulting expulsion of a former WCFM station member. As a result of the ensuing questions directed at the Record editorial board, we feel it would be valuable to state publicly our reasons for running the story.

Our duty as a newspaper requires that we inform the student body of developments in its interest. That the Discipline Committee found evidence of the mishandling of College funds so compelling as to expel a student is newsworthy. That the radio station and the Finance Committee have taken steps to prevent future abuses is newsworthy. That the College has chosen not to condone this behavior is newsworthy.

These, however, were not our only considerations. Others took the form of questions. How much harm would an article do to the person involved? Will the benefit to the College exceed the cost to the student? Must we worry about the student at all?

The final, compelling argument was for rumor control. The previous editorial board chose not to print anything relating to disciplinary matters. As a result, an account of the "library incident" never appeared in print. The rumors spread and stories grew until fantastic versions of "the facts" made their way across New England and appeared in other college papers.

This rumor machine serves no one. Whereas an innocent party can refute an inaccurate printed story, an errant rumor keeps on rolling. We understand that members of the Discipline Committee perceive silence to be in everyone's best interest. We are forced to disagree. Secrecy protects not the student before the Discipline Committee, but instead protects the Discipline Committee from outside questions. Furthermore, we urge the College to re-examine the tradition of silence. Until such time as it does, the Record will continue to present the facts of newsworthy events as they pertain to life at Williams.

Keep it quiet

To the editor:

As a student and as a member of the Honor and Discipline Committee, I deeply regret your decision to print the article about the former WCFM board member who was asked to leave school. That the Record omitted the name of the student involved was but a superficial concession; the article clearly violates the individual's privacy. In addition, your decision breaks with a long-standing tradition of confidentiality in honor and discipline cases. Your decision to print what you had no right to even know was most insensitive and unfortunate.

Music monopoly?

To the editor:

Does anyone find it unusual (improper? suspicious? coincidental?) that Scott Lankford has been the student opening act for the last two ACEC concerts? Maybe Scott's suite-mate, Steve Case, of the ACEC, could shed some light on the matter.

Case could at least make an effort to not appear to be practicing gross favoritism. After all, as the "Steve Case's Best of Williams Volume I" album shows, there is a wealth of student talent to be exploited.

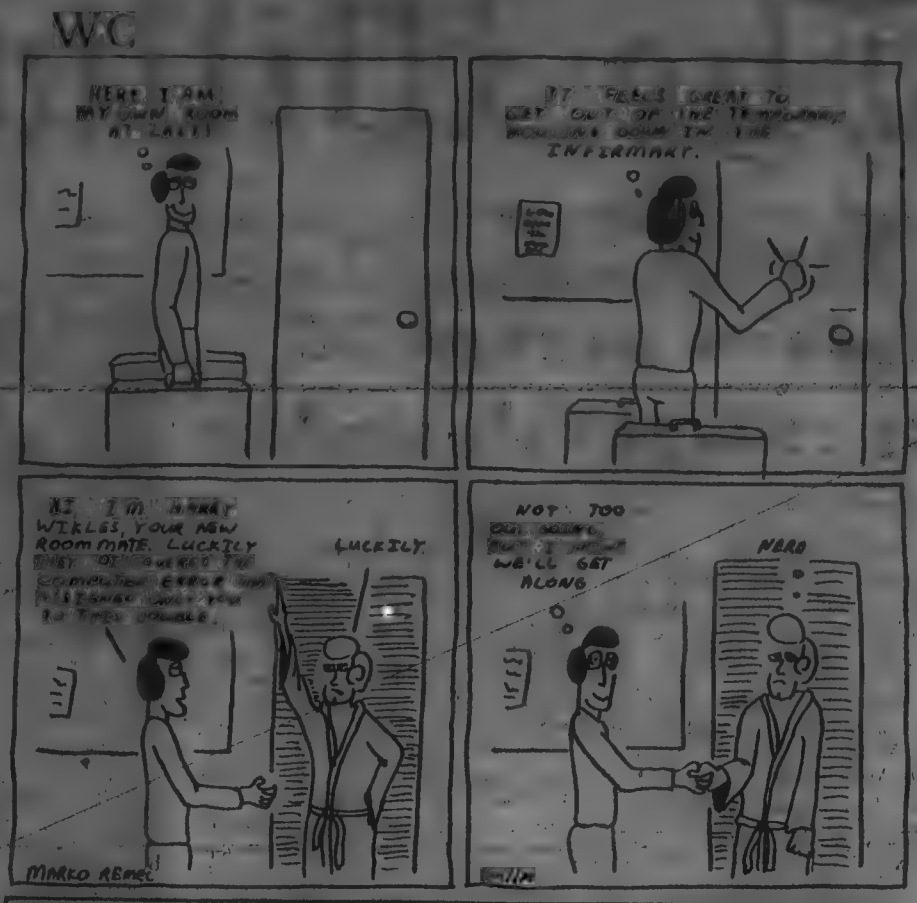
Williams wastes

To the editor:

Sometimes I wonder at the downright ridiculous uses that the College puts its money to. Last week a caterpillar tractor and a dump truck were busily employed removing a large elm stump near the SE corner of Sawyer. And the whole area was manicured and smoothed over so that no one would realize that the tree had lived and died there. Off the other end of the Library, workers were pouring concrete foundations for a series of absolutely worthless and ugly gray steel railings. Strong enough to ward off an elephant stampede, and I shudder to think at the cost. And we're also sanding down the cement on old Chapin so it'll look as raw as that of the addition.



I'd be willing to wager that these three enterprises alone cost Williams at least $5000, money which could have gone to much better use: wind-power, for instance. The administration tells us that the capital expenditure required to erect a windmill atop Berlin Mountain would be exorbitant. The return on this investment they claim, would come in much too slowly. I don't think the College has seriously considered the wind alternative; it hasn't compared this and other innovative investments to the many no-return expenditures it makes daily on this campus.

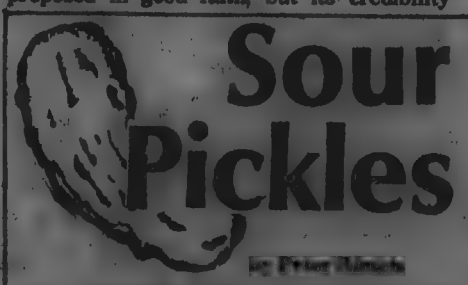
Beneath Their Peaceful Shadows

by Chris DiAngelo

Isn't it interesting that last week's Record story on the WCFM embezzlement case omitted what to many people's minds was the most important fact: the name of the offender? Doesn't the student body have the right to know the identity of "Mr. X?" I spoke about this with Peter Rintels, '79, who wrote last week's article. We discussed not the Mr. X incident per se, but rather the broader question of the general unwillingness of this community to consider personalities in any form. There is, Rintels said, "an unwillingness to attach names to deeds at this [illegible]."

Mr. X is not the only example of this "policy" in work recently. The proposed amendment to the College Council Constitution which would, among other things, make the present Secretary and Treasurer face a campus-wide election within a few weeks has been cited by some as a devious, roundabout way to remove either Mike Lissack '79 or John Simpson '79—or both—from their respective offices.

If the motive behind the amendment is indeed geared to the personalities involved, it is rightly called devious, and an amendment which would lay the cards out on the table, such as one inserting a clause to impeach officers, would be superior.



The point is that because personalities are rarely addressed at Williams, we are suspicious of this otherwise harmless amendment. Isn't it unfortunate that some assume that others are simply trying to avoid pointing the finger at certain individuals? It may very well be that this amendment was proposed in good faith, but its credibility suffers because people are aware that issues such as personality are not supposed to be directly addressed, and that the devious method is in fact the proper one. The problem is this: if things are left ambiguous, people are bound to search for answers, and in the absence of finding them, are bound to make them up.

The lesson of Watergate has yet to reach Williams College: there not only may be costs in telling everything; there may be even more severe costs in not telling everything.

But back to the question of why Mr. X's name should not have appeared. According to Dean O'Connor, it is because Williams College is a voluntary society into which we were not born, and from which we are free to leave. Thus, even though Mr. X's name would appear in a real newspaper in the real civil society, that is not a reason for doing it here. In short, Williams is not the real world, and it is dangerous to draw parallels between the laws and rules of a civil society, by which we are forced to live, and a voluntary society, by which we choose to live. Thus, we can make up any rules we wish, and live by them.

Philosophy Professor O'Connor's insight, however unacceptable it may seem philosophically (what we declare here at Williams to be right is right, here at Williams,) is certainly true. We don't have to do things as they are done in "the real world," if we have good reasons not to. We may determine College rights in addition to those of the city, state or nation.

Yet, whenever these rights which the College grants, enforces, and interprets run counter to its other objectives, such as imparting knowledge to its students to interpret for themselves, those rights should be suspect. The failure to make generally known all available knowledge does not further the abolition of ignorance; it encourages rumors, mistakes, suspicion, mistrust and false accusations (such as in the case of the College Council amendment). Is the benefit of the supression worth the cost?

by Peter Rintels

As I was haranguing over in Outlook that the Record should be more like the New York Times (Ed note: You could start by being as funny as Russell Baker. Writer's note: "We deplore vigorously the action of the College Council at its last meeting." Ed note: All right, all right. We apologize. Keep writing.) and as the New York Times is wreaking havoc in some quarters of this campus, I suggested to the editors that they might want to pick up the slack by expanding the Record's foreign coverage. I for my part have generously offered to entertain a French Riviera bureau. I'll tell you what becomes of this offer. (Ed note: "We'll tell you what's become of it now. You can forget it, Rintels." Writer's note: Thanks you puny ugly-eyed apologists.)

Even if the Times finds it doesn't need me at the major European outposts it's already having its effects around here. With no national news coming to the campus people are finding no alternative but to talk about College Council politics as if they really mattered. Recently one political science professor was holding forth to me. "Fargo has got to veto some of those FinCom appropriations. It's just pork, pork, pork. They're all after money for their pet projects. If the president doesn't do something, we're going to see another round of double digit inflation on this campus."

I tried explaining that Fargo is only the CC president and can't veto anything, and it wouldn't have any effect on inflation on campus, but it's no good. People here have engrained habits.

Fargo, for his part, is sitting idly in the face of this. Word is out that he is planning on inviting crucial swing votes on the FinCom to a White House breakfast to exert appalling pressure. Later on he is expected to breakfast with the rapture, blues and dixieland jazz votes provided he can find a White House to do it in.

Fargo summed up the whole situation to me by saying "The path ahead will be a difficult one, but at least there is a firm prospect for peace in the Middle East."

New York Times, where are you?

The Williams Record

By Peter Rintels

All newspapers, aiming at some measure of respectability, have something of a dual relationship to the organizations that they cover. On the one hand, they must be close enough to their subject to report on them accurately and in depth; on the other hand they must be "distant" enough to insure that their objectivity is not marred. The ideal newspaper is, as the Hindus like to say, in the world but not of the world."

For a college newspaper such as The Record distance presents a very perplexing problem. The question basically is whether the emphasis in the phrase "college newspaper" should be on college or on newspaper.

The paper has a special relationship to the campus because it is funded by students and staffed by students. It is not independent by any stretch of the imagination, but if it is to be a truly legitimate news organization it must act independent. There is a difficult paradox here that causes Record editors and writers to have more than the usual journalistic quota of soul-searching sessions in which they try to determine the paper's various responsibilities and liabilities on sensitive stories. Cases which would be crystal clear for the New York Times and the Washington Post are not always crystal clear for the Record.

As self-appointed enfant terrible of student journalism here, I have interpreted, with modest concessions, press questions as I expected the New York Times would, anyway. This means that the paper will not always be covering what the Administration or the students will necessarily find convenient, but it will establish its legitimacy as a news organization to the greatest extent possible given the conditions under which it operates. I feel strongly that the emphasis in college newspaper should be on newspaper, not college.

In saying this, I am not simply arguing for freedom of the press. Experience has taught me that journalists can be insufferable when they start waving around the first amendment, and the dangers of doing so blindly were well illustrated in the final scene of "The Lost Honor of Katherina Blum." The scene depicts an editor of Germany's notorious yellow journal the Bild, using a perverted freedom of the press argument to extol one of his reporters and defend his paper's practice of destroying people's lives through sensationalistic reporting.

Likewise at Williams, for newspapermen simply to tout freedom of the press as a licence to print anything they want is too facile a way of looking at the whole issue. If a budding Rupert Murdoch takes control of the Record and begins splashing news about the sex lives of CC members across the front page, the CC, acting as agents for the students, should demand a change in editorship. The CC has the power to do this, too. Since it funds the paper, it has the option of withholding funding until the offending editor is removed and a more agreeable one put in his place. It goes without saying, I hope, that the CC should never use this power except under the most extraordinary of circumstances, but I think it is important to note that the power exists. The paper staff is, and should be, accountable to the college.

A paper based on a New York Times model, however, should never run into such problems because the New York Times does not sensationalize. It is a responsible newspaper which is very self-conscious about maintaining its reputation of accuracy and ethical journalistic conduct. What it prints in its news columns, it prints because it believes that the long term best interest of its readers—or in broader terms, society—lies in its doing so. The Times, like any responsible newspaper, does not see its first amendment protection as a license to smear, sensationalize, or use underhanded tricks to get information. Rather, it uses those protections to uphold the highest standards of journalism, which often means exposing to public view the seamier aspects of events, aspects that those involved would rather see concealed.

And here, if you will forgive me, is where I start waving the first amendment around for real. The framers of the constitution considered New York Times style journalism so important to the health of the country that, in drawing up the Bill of Rights, they wasted no time in protecting it. It sits right up there in the first amendment.

It is my firm belief that Williams has as much interest in encouraging that kind of journalism as does society as a whole. In many ways, Williams is a microcosm of that society. We have public officials (CC officers, house officers and in a loose way the faculty and administration) who spend public funds (the student activities tax, house dues and, again in a loose way, tuition) and there can I think be no question about the necessity of holding these officials accountable for their handling of these funds, and more generally for all of their public acts. Insuring such accountability is the function of newspaper in the "real" world and I think it is a function that the Record should be encouraged to perform here as well.

In expressing these feelings to other people, I have commonly met with two replies to which I would like to respond.

First is that "the Record is not the New York Times." This is certainly true. I see three major differences: 1) scope, 2) experience of writers and editors and 3) the financial and staff relationship of the paper to the College, i.e. the "distance" problem I referred to earlier. None of these, I think, make the Times an improper model for the Record.

The scope difference is a very obvious one—the Record is dealing with a much smaller community, but as I maintained earlier, this community is a microcosm of the larger one covered by the Times in many key respects. The basic relationship of the two papers to their respective arenas should, I think, be the same.

The experience question addresses a more serious difficulty, which is that the Record is not composed of a staff of professional journalists. Most of the paper staff worked on high school newspapers and possibly a couple have worked on local papers at various times, but this is nothing compared to the kind of training and experience that most professional journalists have, especially of New York Times caliber. But is to say that we are not professionals to say that we should not aim for professional standards? If not, for what other standards should we aim? And if so, should we not aim for the highest standards in the newspaper business, those of a paper like the Times? I think so.

The distance problem is one that is inherent in the way the paper is set up, but if the paper is to be a truly legitimate news organization, it should act as if distance were not a problem. In one key respect, the Record, along with WCFM's news organization, already do. Although both are CC funded, neither has been scared out of criticizing the CC for fear of losing its appropriations, and as long as Chip Buckner and Mark Cerbone are around, I am sure that neither will. There is a clear conflict of interest in supposing to report on the organization that gives you money, but the paper, the radio station and the CC have dealt with the conflict by pretending as if it did not exist, much to the credit of all of them. Likewise, the students on these news organizations should, I believe, report on student affairs "as if" they were not students. The Record took essentially this stance in its decision to cover the Tyler House Pot Club story last year and I supported that decision strongly.

The second common argument against the Record practicing New York Times style journalism is that "Williams is not the real world." I find this argument not only bad but dangerous. It is usually used to justify the secrecy surrounding College disciplinary proceedings, but it has had some unfortunate consequences. Last year, for example, when the library incident occurred, the Record observed this secrecy arrangement and declined to print an account of it. That incident later became the focus of a storm of campus debate, but because no newspaper account was ever printed, that debate was based on hearsay and rumor and not on what actually took place. That is not a healthy situation, but so long as the College insists on maintaining its secrecy rules, and campus news organizations insist on going along with them, we can expect more like it to crop up.

I do not see the secrecy question as a "real" world versus Williams world question at all. I look upon responsible journalists in both worlds having certain ethical obligations, in particular: 1) to gather facts legitimately, 2) to present them fairly and 3) to avoid printing information that hurts innocent people. To illustrate the last point, if I were a reporter in my newspaper's Moscow bureau and I knew who the local CIA agents were, I would not callously assume a public "ought to know" such things because it would needlessly jeopardize lives. Journalistic principles can never be elevated above such practical considerations of who gets hurt by what one chooses to print. The real question regarding the secrecy of disciplinary matters, then, is not whether Williams journalists are any different from "real" world journalists, but whether their reporting on disciplinary matters does more harm than good. There is no need to establish a separate set of standards for college journalists. In the case of the library incident, the Record certainly had a greater interest in seeing that future discussion of it be informed discussion than it did in hushing the business up for the obscure reasons of the college.

The secrecy issue came up again last week in connection with the paper's handling of the WCFM embezzlement story [Ed note: see letter and editorial on page 2].

Space does not permit me to offer as complete an analysis of that case as it deserves, but I do wish to state my disagreement with Eric Bjornlund's contention that the Record's coverage was an invasion of privacy. As a radio station officer, the person involved was a public official handling public funds and I do not look upon his actions in that capacity as private. Public officials, I believe, should be publicly accountable, even when it is inconvenient. Insuring that accountability is the job of newspapers such as the Times and ideally of the Record as well. Moreover, the issues here go beyond the particulars of what happened at the radio station. The CC Finance Committee is instituting new safeguards to monitor the spending of FinCom allocated money. The events at the radio station bear quite directly on the issues of how necessary those safeguards are and how strong they ought to be.

I also think that the paper has performed a valuable service in printing a story in the face of rampant rumors. As should have happened with the library incident, any future discussion of this event should be based on the facts as established by the newspaper, not on rumors. In addition, the expelled student has no opportunity to reply to these rumors, but he did have a chance to reply to the newspaper story and significantly he denied the charges. While most of the people connected with the case who have spoken to me about it consider the denial perfunctory and not especially meaningful, I do not see how the paper could have ethically withheld the story and denied the student his only chance to publicly declare his innocence.

To return to the broader question of the role of the press at Williams, I think it a healthy sign that the paper has in this case looked to a higher good than that embodied by the College's tradition of secrecy. Granted that the paper printed only an abridged version of the story—minus the name—but only on the presumption that by doing so, it would be hurting the person implicated more than he deserved to be. In other words, the majority of the paper's editors felt that an innocent person would be hurt by the story, and while I do not agree, I sympathize with the position and recognize it as a valid reason for withholding information. The main thing, however, is that it has not merely noted as a propaganda organ for the College.

In all cases in which the Record finds itself dealing with sensitive topics, I hope it continues to hold true to the highest standards of journalism as embodied by those "real" world papers that practice them. Williams will, I think, be a better school for having an independent and legitimate newspaper since it is not as unreal as so many people seem to feel.

Peter Rintels '79 has at various times in his RECORD career written news, features and jokes. Most recently he covered the WCFM story for the paper.

Outlook on the College media

WCFM

In the light of recent revelations of personnel shake-ups and financial problems, WCFM, Williams College's radio station, has become a focal point for queries of both the students and administrators of the College. Questions such as, "Why does such an organization have such a large deficit?" and "What is the significance of a College radio station to the community and to the campus?" are ones which deserve some attention.

Why is WCFM in debt several hundred dollars to the College? Why is a good deal of the equipment on the brink of expiration? Can Williams College afford to subsidize a radio station? Do benefits from such a radio station accrue to a large number of Williams students? As the FM portion of Williams radio enters its third decade, such questions demand attention before the College decides what level of investment it feels appropriate to inject into WCFM.

Beginning with financial matters, in terms of operating expenses, WCFM's College Council allocation is relatively close to that of the Record. Though this may seem reasonable given that both are media sources, an important difference exists in that the capital equipment for the Record amounts to a few typewriters, pencils and printing costs, which are substantial yet easily calculable, while the radio station maintains close to $100,000 worth of equipment and material directly connected with our operations.

Given that WCFM has no capital fund for purchases of new equipment or a depreciation allowance, our recent financial problems appear somewhat justified. We need to replace several components which have served well beyond their life expectancies, yet we have no monies to purchase such items.

Given the large amount of capital needed to maintain a reasonably equipped radio station, which happens to be the second non-commercial educational radio station in the nation to operate in FM, can Williams College afford to subsidize WCFM? Personally, I prefer to re-phrase the question to ask, Can Williams College afford to operate without WCFM?

Just what does WCFM offer the Williams community? With more than 100 participating undergraduates, WCFM is one of the largest extra-curricular organizations on the Williams College campus. The diverse programming of the station includes a plethora of music, local as well as national news reports, live coverage of over fifty Williams athletic contests per year, and outstanding special programming features which include foreign language serials, originally produced documentaries and Karl Johnson's "From Ragtime to Swing."

In addition, the immediacy and dependability of the station has helped keep the college and surrounding communities informed of important events and also offers one of the few mediums in the area for expression of alternative viewpoints. For example, our community related programming has held interviews with and-or promoted the following programs: HELP Line, Williamstown Boys' Club, Red Cross Bloodmobile, VISTA and BUCKO. Furthermore, weekly serials such as "New Perspectives" and "Third World Report" offered viewpoints which are too often unheard in dominantly white, small town communities.

That WCFM provides valuable training and experience in broadcasting and media management is unquestionable. Dave Marash '64 anchors the CBS evening news in New York, Phil Walters '64 is a correspondent for CBS in Washington, Chris Witting '75 is production manager at WBZ in Boston, Tom Pierce '68 is general manager of KCBS in San Francisco, Gordon Sacer '65 is vice president of John Blair TV advertising in New York, and Bill Sweney III is vice-president of Borden Productions motion pictures in Concord, Mass.

The above suggests that WCFM is a very useful educational device. Our listeners (from both the campus and the community) are assured diverse programming which attempts to fulfill (at least to some degree) everyone's interest in the realms of music, news and special programming feature. Hence, WCFM aims to entertain and at the same time educate both our listeners and station members.

Williams College radio has over fifty years of experience and development behind it, and by continuing to invest in student initiative, while attempting to serve all elements of the community WCFM should remain as a forceful voice and a free public servant to the College and to the Berkshires.

The occasion for this extraordinary drawing is well documented in the Tuzuk-i-Jahangir(during the thirteenth regnal year (AD 1618-19):

"On this day news came of the death of Inayat Khan. He was one of my attendants. As he was addicted to opium, and when he had a chance, to drinking as well, by degrees he became maddened by wine. As he was weakly built, he took more than he could digest, and was attacked with the disease of diarrhea and in this weak state, he two or three times fainted."

"By my order Hakim Rukna applied remedies but whatever methods were resorted to give no profit. At the same time a strange hunger came over him . . . He would also throw himself like a madman on water and fire until he fell into a bad state of body"

"At last he became dropsical and exceedingly low and weak. Some days before this he petitioned that he might go to Agra. I ordered to come into my presence and obtain leave. They put him in a palanquin and brought him. He appeared so low and weak I was astonished . . . As it was a very extraordinary case, I directed painters to take his portrait . . . The next day, he travelled the road of non-existence."

The Mughal rulers were fascinated by European painters and their works and would often commission their own court painters to copy the European models and adapt them for inclusions in the Imperial manuscripts and albums. No specific source can be identified for this painting, but we have evidence that there were a number of European prints in circulation in India at the time. Mughal painters were interested primarily in studying how their western contemporaries rendered a sense of physical substance to their portraits of individuals.

Middle and lower left: 5 Verso; Calligraphy (1537); Margins (L604) 41 x 23.8 cm.
The calligraphy on this album page is exceptionally intricate. However, the sensitive portraits in the border areas are of special interest. The faces, the poses and the striking relationship between the elder and the younger man are eloquently expressed in this minute portrait. The figures are less than an inch in height. The gold brocade background is characteristically used in Mughal manuscript illustrations. It too was rendered painstakingly by hand which may help to account for the fact that a miniature painting often took over two years for the painter to complete.

Clark sponsors an exhibition of Imperial Painting in India 1600's

by Karin Best and Nancy Richman

One of the most fascinating portraits in "The Grand Mogul" exhibit at the Clark is only an etching—a study for a later painting entitled "The Dying Inayat Khan". An emaciated man lies on a couch, propped up with large sensuous pillows. The vacant look in his eyes is jarring. This opium addict of the early seventeenth century seems real and immediate to us today. The sketch depicts the very nature of sentient existence and in this respect, it compared more than favorably with a number of contemporary works—most notably, Duane Hanson's "Heroin Addict. Because of its concern with naturalism and with portraiture, "The Dying Inayat Khan" is a prime example of Mughal art at the height of its mature style.

The exhibit traces the development of Imperial painting in India from 1600-1660 and focuses on the exploration of naturalism as the central achievement of the genre. As Art Department Professor Milo Beach explains, it was during the reign of Akbar that a recognizable Mughal style was formed. The earliest paintings done for the Emperior were somewhat eclectic in their method—drawing extensively from Iranian, Hindu and Muslim sources. But as Akbar himself grew older and more purposeful, the types of paintings that he commissioned evolved along similar lines.

According to Beach, the "invention of portraiture and the shift of subject away from the religious and poetic texts common to both Hindu and Moslem traditions and towards the historical scenes and natural history subjects are major innovations of Akbari painting.

By refinements of physical materials, Mughal painters were able to investigate the natural world in ever greater deatil; by experience with new techniques of modelling, they were able to give physical substance and verity to forms; and by breaking into new ideas of the human being as a unique individual (by far the hardest development, for it involved the recognition of a completely different weltanschauung), they brought painting out of other-worldly realms."

Painting had a practical purpose in that it served to legitimize Mughal rule. As Stuart Cary Welch explains, "a virtual army of freshly recruited painters were set to work carrying out Akbar's ambitious artistic programs. Always reflections of the emperor's fertile imagination and insatiable curiosity, most of these were intended to further his imperial aims. Inasmuch as the empire's unity was threatened by India's two major religious groups, Akbar commissioned illustrated translations of Hindu epics and ordered Muslims to read them. To record the noble deeds of his and his ancestors' reigns, lavishly illustrated histories were composed."

Successive emperors would continue to compile manuscripts and albums but as the exhibit shows, each reign had an artistic flavor of its own. Jahangir was, for example, a much different kind of a patron than his father Akbar had been. "An eager aesthete and connoisseur, Jahangir commissioned paintings as personal pleasures rather than as state documents." The painters in his court were directed to concentrate more intensively on fewer miniatures.

Painters would often spend up to two years on a single work. Welch writes that although Akbar's innovative portraitists had caught overall spirits and gestures, Jahangir's probed, more deeply, with a psychiatrist's concern for human motives and emotions." And indeed, a walk through the galleries shows an astonishing range of artistic sensibilities.

Though a few pieces of sculpture and decorative art are interspersed in the exhibit to provide visual relief, the show consists almost entirely of paintings, arranged variously by time period and by artist. Created for inclusion in albums, each leaf is only approximately 8X11 inches in size, consisting of a painting placed off center, to allow for binding, and an elaborate border. Noted for their bright colors and heavy use of gold, the works contain exquisite detail—often times only appreciated upon magnification. As Welch explains, "compared to most paintings, they are excessively small; but their littleness is that of diamonds, a Chopin etude, or Buddhist mantras—great power compacted."

The concern for detail is yet another indication of how the Mughals viewed their world with wide-eyed appreciation. "Through the eagerly curious eyes of the painters," Welch writes, "we can meet the rulers and their royal households and inspect their thrones, jewels, wine cups and [illegible]."

Milo Cleveland Beach has every reason to be pleased with his exhibit of Indian Mogul painting at the Clark. It reflects admirably the nearly four years of planning and organization invested in it. The show is distinctive in its coverage of such a limited time span in Indian art history and in the fact that its works have been gathered entirely from American collectors and museums. According to Beach, the exhibit was envisioned and executed out of love as well as out of a concern that his student be exposed to actual paintings as opposed to slides. The exhibit is partially supported by a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts, and will travel to Baltimore, Boston, and New York after leaving the Clark.

An entire series of supporting lectures, films and cultural events is accompanying the exhibit.

Liv. Taylor livens Chapin Hall

by Andy Clark

The All College Entertainment Committee (ACEC) opened its 1978-79 concert season in a clearly successful if unspectacular fashion Thursday night at Chapin Hall, presenting Livingston Taylor and Scott Lankford. Not only did both acts show up, but so did some six or seven hundred people who were treated to two and a half hours of low key, but high quality entertainment—well worth the three dollar ticket price.

Chapin Hall, though not a practical site for rock and roll, was ideally suited for Liv Taylor who performed as did Lankford—without a backup band. Looking dapper in a three piece, navy blue suit which he claimed to have brought in lieu of his band, Taylor played for about an hour and a half, his set consisting of numerous stories and about twenty songs, rendered in a voice not unlike that of famous brother James.

Coming off the release of his first album in five years (entitled Three Way Mirror) and a recent concert tour opening for Linda Ronstadt, he appeared confident and self-assured.

Surprisingly, his choice of material included only one number ("Gonna Have a Good Time") from the new album, and much of it was from none of his three earlier efforts either. In fact, the evening's biggest crowd response was elicited by his brief rendition of "Foggy Mountain Breakdown" on the banjo.

On stage, Taylor projected an image of almost clandestine sincerity which was at once both endearing and absorbing, and he was well received by the Chapin audience which brought him back for two encores.

Well-known opener Scott Lankford also met with a warm reception from the audience which was made up mostly of his student peers. Through appearances at the Coffee House and the Log, and as opening act for Don McLean last year, the talented junior has built up a steady following among Williams Students, and it is likely that many of those in attendance at Thursday night's show were more familiar with both him and his material—particularly the lighter numbers like "Smart People" and the "Vassar Hygiene Song"—than they were with Liv Taylor.

What's more, Lankford has already proven himself a capable show stealer, pulling such a feat only a few weeks ago at the Coffee House, where headliners Mason Daring and Jeanne Stahl watched the packed house he had left behind him dwindle to only a handful new before their set was half over.

That this did not occur Thursday night is more a tribute to Liv Taylor, however, than a sign of weakness on Lankford's part, for his own one hour set was typically strong: a well paced collection of original compositions, mixing his more tuneful and reflective songs with humorous ditties and novelties.

The evening on the whole, while not overwhelmingly exciting, ran smoothly and professionally and could signal good things ahead—wiping out memories of last year's frustrating succession of cancellations.

Wyatt presents retrospective

Leo Wyatt, noted artist and engraver, spoke last Tuesday night in Griffin Hall, presenting a retrospective view of his long and varied career. The lecture, sponsored by the Chapin Library, marked the beginning of a nation-wide tour.

Wyatt studied at The Central School of Arts and Crafts in London; but his most important training came from a master engraver in copper-plate engraving to whom Wyatt was apprenticed. Rapidly becoming a lost art, copperplate engraving is no longer done by hand in any quantity. Wyatt now does the bulk of his work in wood engraving.

Wyatt explored many different areas before deciding to specialize in letterforms. His work has ranged from stock certificates, bank-notes, and letterheads to etchings of many varied subjects; but he is perhaps best known for his bookplates. Designing a bookplate is very challenging for Wyatt, as he tries to incorporate many disparate interests of the customer into the relatively small area of a bookplate.

Examples of Wyatt's bookplates and other works can be seen in the Chapin Library, in Stetson Hall, through October 16 in conjunction with the exhibition "Alphabets and Images."

Julius and Charlotte Hegyi rehearse for the Berkshire Symphony's opening concert this Friday.

Symphony readies for thirty-fourth season

The Berkshire Symphony opens its thirty-fourth season this Friday, October 13 at 8:00 p.m. in Chapin Hall. The program includes Berlioz' A Roman Carnival; Tchaikowsky's Symphony No. 3, "The Polish"; and Hindemith's The Four Temperaments for piano and orchestra. Julius Hegyi will conduct. The piano soloist for the Hindemith will be Charlotte Hegyi. Admission to the concert is free with Williams ID.

Mrs. Hegyi is a regular performer in the Music in the Round Chamber music series at the college. She has appeared with the Berkshire Symphony a number of times in the past as well as with other orchestras across the United States. She is also an accomplished violinist and composer.

The Berkshire Symphony is composed of professional musicians as well as Williams students. Several members are from local high schools. These students have consistently contributed high quality performances, complementing the professionals' work. Interested student musicians are welcome to inquire about auditions for membership.

Readers recite at Clark

Stanley Elkins, novelist, and Nancy Willard, poet and author of children's books, will be featured in the second program of Wednesday-night readings by contemporary writers at the Clark Art Institute at 8:00 p.m. on October 18. Willard will open the session, reading from two of her children's books. Willard has indicated that her stores are for youngsters from about fourth-grade level up. In addition to her children's work, she will be reading some poems from her books Household Tales of Moving People, A Naked Poet, A New Herball, and Carpenter of The Sun. Willard teaches at Vassar College.

The second half of the evening's program, after a short intermission, will feature Stanley Elkins, novelist and short story writer, who teaches at Washington University in St. Louis, reading from his works. A Guggenheim Fellow, he has received grants from the Rockefeller Foundation, the National Institute of Arts and letters, and the National Endowment for the Humanities. His novels are Boswell, A Bad Man, The Dick Gibson Show, and The Franchiser. He has also published a collection of short stories, Criers And Kibitzers, Kibitzers And Criers, and a book of novellas, Searches And Seizures. He is currently working on a new novel, George Mills.

Part of Freshman Parents' Weekend
All Welcome

Sunday, October [illegible]
at [illegible] P.M.

Members of this year's Freshman revue have been working just as hard as last year, attempting to perfect their show for the upcoming Parents' weekend performances.

Southside Johnny and the Ashbury Jukes, well-known for spectacular showmanship and energetic rock-Rhythm and Blues, will appear at the Towne Field House at 8:00 p.m. on Thursday October 19.

Frosh prepare for revue

by M.Jack Ruch

The 1978 version of the freshman review will open in Jesup Hall this Friday and Saturday at 8:30 p.m., as well as Sunday at 3:00 p.m.

Pertinent facts aside, the revue is now in its final and most gruelling week of rehearsal. Light cues are set, costumes are tried on for the first time, and timing is honed to near perfection.

This year's four directors, Rob Baker, Fred Barr, Jim Stone and Kevin Weist, answered questions about the show with enthusiasm.

The format of the revue is what Weist calls "direct simulation" of old vaudeville, including dramatic readings and incidental music. Baker added, "Although there is no single permeating idea, there is a consistent spirit which seems to us to recall the spirit of early 20th century American Music Halls."

Stone said the idea for the vaudeville-style revue developed over the summer, when he and Baker accumulated old vaudeville material from texts and biographies. "We then narrowed down the mountains of material to an interesting variety," he said. "In this way the revue has actually become a review."

Due to the nature of the material, the cast in this year's revue is smaller than it has been in past years. The directors' comments about the quality of their fifteen-member cast include adjectives such as "very impressive," and "exuberant."

With four directors as well as a choreographer and a music director, several problems arise. Baker pointed out that, "trying to direct a show in 5 weeks with 6 upperclassmen trying to coordinate conflicting rehearsals with 15 freshman can be difficult."

Weist cites the difficulties that result from having to tie together small routines which have been rehearsed separately. However, the past few rehearsals have proven that the problems were not as severe as might have been expected. The cast and directing corps have seen the play coalesce.

Tickets for the performance may be obtained in the AMT box office Monday through Friday between 1:00 and 4:30, or one hour before performance in the Jesup box office. Williams students with ID will be admitted free; tickets for all others will cost $3.50.

Myrna Nachman on the piano, and Michael Ponder violoist, performed the works of Henry, Eccles, Schubert, Glinka, and Hummel at a concert on October 3.

Nachman and Ponder play well at Clark

by John Libertine

The Clark Art Institute sponsored a concert of viola and piano duet music last Tuesday, Oct. 3. Michael Ponder, viola, and Myrna Nachman, piano performed works of Henry Eccles, Schubert, Glinka, Hummel, and others to a disappointingly small audience in the Clark Auditorium.

Ponder and Nachman began very well with Eccles' Sonata in G minor. The playing was very smooth and the two instruments blended nicely. The piano especially was in strict control at all times. Schubert's Arpeggioni Sonata followed. The constant interweaving of the piano and viola was handled easily; the rapid transitions in tempo posed no threat for the two players. Unfortunately, Ponder seems to have a problem with pizzicato notes. He was too timid, allowing the piano to drown them out; and at times, the two instruments were not quite together.

Ponder redeemed himself very well after intermission, however, with Glinka's Sonata Movement in D minor. This piece allows the violoist the opportunity to go a bit "wild" with its rapid changes in tempo and volume. Even his pizzicato improved tremendously. The two performers ended the concert with the Sonata in Eb by Hummel, a thoroughly delightful piece played with verve and a dash of panache that brought an end to very good concert.

It is unfortunate that the audience was so small. Concerts like this are rare and should be looked forward to eagerly. Perhaps as more people become aware of these concerts, they shall take advantage of the opportunity.

Even Cowgirls . . . . . Heaven Tonight

Cheap Trick consolidates their status as America's "mass cult" band of the Seventies, and The Cars display moments of promise on their epynonimous debut.

Heaven Tonight, the Trick's third glossy package of delicious irony and facetiousness, quite simply keeps the hope alive that American audiences will, in point of fact, finally "wake up" from their desensitized slumber of callow sentimentality and shallow machismo. At present, Cheap Trick is for practical purposes solely unfurling the banner of unfettered rock 'n roll against the overwhelming odds of Linda Rondstadt, Jackson Browne, Foreigner, and Disco. The Ramones complete rejection and overt parody of American life via inanity doom them to critical acclaim and sparse fanatical devotion. The "arty" side of the American New Wave, led by Talking Heads, Television, and Pere Ubu, meantime paint too bleak and inaccessible a landscape.

And so in the middle struts Cheap Trick's pop-rock sensibility. Music that began with the Beatles and died in America with the Raspberries has been reincarnated and thoroughly rejuvinated. What Cheap Trick accomplish is the proof that to be "dynamic" does not perforce risk pretention, that "good music to dance to" (what could that be?) can be great music to listen to as well.

Side one is easily the most compelling collection of froth since Raspberries' Best. Add the band's leery sexual frankness (whose purpose is pure parody), their quirky sense of humour, and their mirky undercurrents (as on the seductively suicidal "Auf Wiederschen"), and we hear music being played on many levels. Coyly simple in form, but not in content (the band quips about everything from religion to Kiss), this is music to keep the innocent deb queen innocent, the cynic cynical, and the dancer dancing. From the expansive Who-like windmills of "High Roller" to the falsetto insolence of "On Top Of The World" to bouncy insistence of "Surrender" and an ezquisite remake of early ELO's "California Man", Cheap Trick transcends into realms of timeless "pure pop" ecstasy.

By virtue of the "hard act to follow" principle, side two automatically falls short. It does, however, contain the album's only weak link, "On The Radio", a burlesque of the vapid AM DJ that annoys more than it amuses. Nonetheless, the hedonistic "Heaven Tonight" tantalizes with breathy elegance and the underlying ambivolent tension loony lyricist Rick Nielsen revels in, while "Stiff Competition" outrocks, outclasses, and mocks any hard pose Foreigner has contrived.

The Cars, at their best, are a precise, streamlined rock 'n roll band too. Like Cheap Trick, they know how to exercise restraint for a sense of proportion and clarity. "Just What I Needed", "My Best Friend's Girl", "Good Times Roll", and "You're All I've Got Tonight" all skillfully build to an infectious chorus and climax after taunt intros and resemble the snarlingly provocative intonation of another Boston band, The Standells, one-hit wonders from the mid-Sixties famous for the rivetting "Dirty Water".

Unfortunately, the Cars are ambitious, which means they are not content with sticking merely to the garage band approach. Instead they apply polish with the "aid" of producer Roy Thomas Baker (Queen), combining syntheaized effects with a self-conscious "Neo Wave" attitude. The results are, as one song is entitled, "all mixed up." At times they sound like an unlikely cross between Styx and Talking Heads or Jonathan Richman And The Modern lovers ("I'm In Touch With Your World").

The Cars then are an amalgam whose parts are greater than their whole. Together with Cheap Trick, though, they represent the seeds for the rebirth of American rock 'n roll in the 1980's.

Baseball fever catches Eph students

By Jane Barkey

Ask a Williams student what is the fiercest sports rivalry, and he (or she) would probably answer: Williams-Amherst. Williams 21, Amherst 13.

Last Monday, though, you might have gotten an entirely different answer. For Monday afternoon was the date of the play-off game to determine which baseball team from the American League's Eastern division would have the privilege of challenging the Kansas City Royals for the A.L. pennant. Having finished the season in a dead tie, the New York Yankees and the Boston Red Sox met in Boston's Fenway Park to battle it out for that coveted position.

To any lover of the national pastime, the mere mention of the words "Yankees" or "Red Sox" generally ignites a feeling of intense love or hatred. The Boston-New York rivalry dates back almost to the beginnings of organized baseball, but this 1978 season saw the most dramatic clash ever between baseball's two most powerful teams. The second half of the summer saw New York gradually erase a 14-game Boston lead. By the end, it all hinged on the last day of the season. That Sunday, New York lost, Boston won, and we were on our way.

Granted, Sunday night is not the most common time to road trip. But with the game the next day, and only 3 hours away, how could one Yankee [illegible] five Red Sox fans resist?

We left Williamstown in the all but vain hope of getting tickets for the playoff duel. By the time we arrived in Boston, around midnight, there were already 500 or so fans camped out on the side-walk outside Fenway. Surely, we thought, others wouldn't be doing the same thing we were if there weren't tickets to be had. Not to be outdone, we took our places in line and spent the night on cold, wet pavement. What wouldn't you do for baseball?

It took about 10 hours for us to be disappointed. By 9:30 the crowd had swelled into the thousands, and we found ourselves in the midst of a writhing mass of fanatical baseball groupies. Suddenly, a voice announced that the game had been sold out. However, the crowd spoke baseball, not English, and it was 10:00 before people started taking the hint. A few of the more determined formed a human battering ram to convince the management that they intended to see the game, but the appearance of riot police bent their thoughts in other directions.

We were about the last to leave—save the few who had fallen in a drunken stupor—as the game (it was obviously a long night). Like Lancelot, disappointed in our Quest, we pondered the alternatives. Turning down a suggestion to break in, we at last turned our gaze to the famous left field wall. In desperation, four of us attempted to scale the outfield [illegible] which tower above the Park. But alas, others had beaten us to the privilege of sitting on a wooden plank 100 ft. above the ground for 8 innings. What wouldn't we do for baseball?

So there we were, 89 yards from what promised to be the most exciting game of the season, and completely at a loss as to how to see it. What does one do in such a situation?

Sit the bars.

Apparently, we Williams students were the first to be inspired along these lines, as we managed to find a table right in front of a big 7-ft. TV screen, not unlike the Log's. Why, you ask, did we give up real beds and food (after cement and Doritos, even Currier and Baxter seem hospitable) just to watch the game on TV? Don't. Just call it dedication.

This was 10:30, and the game started at 2:00. We didn't dare leave our seats, of course, because by this time, hundreds of other frustrated Lancelots had converged on the Sports Lounges on Yawkey Way, to either watch the game or scalp tickets, which were going for as much as $85. So we spent the afternoon in a room with 300 other Red Sox fans, and a small, but vocal (and therefore suicidal) group of Yankee adherents, singing "Take Me Out to the Ballgame," "The Fenway Park Song," and taking turns to run out to the liquor store (beers at the bar were $1.00 a bottle).

The rest is history. Yankees 5, Red Sox 4, though whether it matters is open to debate. The point is that there is an alternative to visiting Sawyer on Sunday nights. If anyone's interested we're thinking about the World Series.

Trustees discuss fund-raising policy

At a press conference following their fall meeting at the College, President John W. Chandler said that the trustees met to review "various policies and events." Discussion touched on the budget, fund raising, building priorities, minority admissions, and a variety of other issues.

The College showed a minor surplus of about $40 thousand in its operating budget for the year ending June 30. On that same date the market value of the endowment had risen to $77 million. These figures do not include the sale of the Mount Hope Estate, which was not formalized until this meeting.

The trustees "spent a good deal of time discussing fund raising," Chandler said. For the first time they met with the Development Committee to discuss strategies for doing so. Although he did not go into details, the President termed the meeting "very successful."

Art will take precedence over physical education facilities in future construction at Williams, said Chandler. The art case was "clear and compelling." The trustees also saw the demand for both a new basketball court and a new swimming pool, Chandler continued, but the means of satisfying those needs had not yet been thoroughly studied. The President said he had been authorized to appoint a committee to examine athletic needs.

The board agreed to maintain its policy of requiring that funds be "in hand or pledged" for both construction and maintenance of new facilities before beginning to build. Chandler stressed that the trustees did not want to "let construction needs throw other important things out of balance." In the meantime, however, he said that he would authorize an architect to produce working drawings for new art facilities. Building costs, he said, rise about 12 per cent each year. The advance availability of plans will speed construction and therefore, he said, save money once the funds become available.

The trustees had no recommendations concerning the low and falling levels of minority application and matriculation, but asked for more information and ideas from the admissions department. The major theme that the board picked up from the students, the President said, was the concern with overcrowding. The trustees urged the administration to take measures to ease the student population back down to 1960 over the course of a year.

The Committee on Campus Life (CCL) reported on the Williams Organization for Outdoor Life for Freshmen (WOOLF) program to the whole board. Chandler said that the trustees listened with "sympathetic interest" as CCL chairman Dr. Wayne Wilkins termed WOOLF "a wholesome part of Williams' life."

NEWS BRIEFS

Hunger Walk will run October 15th

A Hunger Walk is being organized for October 15 in an effort to raise funds for various community service organizations in the Berkshires. Registration for the event will be held the day of the walk from 12 noon to 1 p.m. at the Methodist Church on Main Street in Williamstown. Sponsor tally cards can be obtained from Esther Wynne at 458-3246.

Women's Center opens for browsing

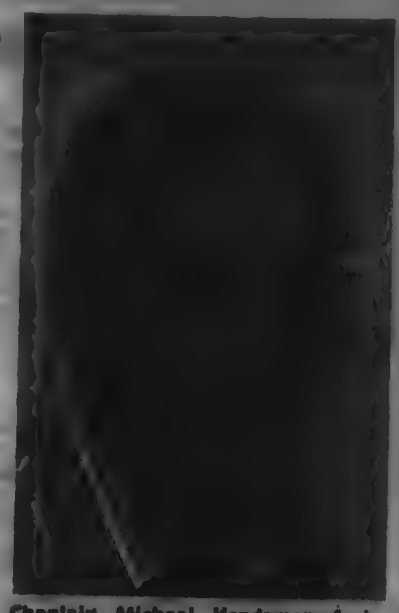
The Women's Center (Room 6, Mears House) is now officially open to all students, faculty, and staff. The Center will be open for use from 9-5 Monday through Friday and 9-12 on Saturday. Feel free to browse through books, periodicals, and filed materials. We are also collecting any material that you may wish to donate. Any questions, call Sarah Wilson, 6729, Nancy Shapero, 6722, Elise Waingort, 6397, or Kathy Schwartz 2750.

Professor breaks leg in car accident

Romuald Misiunas, asst. professor of history, broke his leg last Monday in a "very bad car accident," said Dudley Bahlman, chairman of the history department. Bahlman thought that Misiunas should return to teaching sometime this week.

Heading west on Rte. 2 near Greenfield, Misiunas' car met head on with another car going east that swerved into the west-bound lane. Both cars were demolished, said Bahlman. The driver of the other car was not seriously injured, he added.

Misiunas spent last week in the Wesson Unit of the Bay State Medical Center.



Fellowships go for English study

Williams offers two fellowships for study abroad at Emmanuel College, Cambridge for the coming year. Williams will award one for study in arts-social sciences and one for study in physical science. Applications, are available in Henry Flynt's office, and are due October 16.

For the first time the College has been asked to recommend students for the Rhodes Scholarship.

Interviews for the Emmanuel fellowships and the Rhodes will be held concurrently at the end of the month.

Students with questions should contact Associate Philosophy Professor Charles Karelis.

Chaplain Michael Henderson feels that students at Williams are searching for the historical "roots" of their religion, and are less concerned with the exotic.

Religion still lives students who attend occasionally. There are about six students who hold key positions in the church. These include seats on the Admissions Committee, the choir, the Worship Committee and the chairmanship of the Council of Ministries.

"Students are either really eager to be committed to a church or are on the periphery," Moore said. He felt that the involved students were attracted by the Methodist church's "openness to reason and its acceptance of a wide variety of theological beliefs. Moore cited the recent "No Nukes" demonstration held on the church's front lawn as an example. The church also gives students a chance to "mix with real people and real families." The services represent an escape from the ivory tower, he said.

The Reverend Jerry Heslinga, leader of the Williamstown Baptist Church, said roughly six students were "fairly involved" outside of church services. The overall attendance rate has remained at about 20 to 25 students each Sunday, he said, many of whom are not Baptists. Heslinga noted that some of the students come with questions about faith, life, and the search for religion. But the others, "solidified" in what they believe," are more concerned with how to apply their beliefs to their daily lives.

Many of the students are hostile to the "institutional" church, Heslinga said, and would like to transform it to a more "living" one. Heslinga believes that Williams is too narrow in outlook and tends to distance students from senior citizens and children. He feels students get a "healthier exposure" by coming to the church.

In the past, the Baptist church has also given financial support to the Williams Christian Fellowship. In turn, many members of the fellowship attend the Baptist church.

Scott Walker '79 of the Christian Fellowship says that membership is remaining steady at about 30 to 40 students. The group is very flexible, he says, and though it does not formally adhere to one faith, it believes the Bible is a "historical document we can trust as being the word of God." The interpretations and innovative "conversational prayers" held by the group center around this base, Walker said. He added that the fellowship offers a situation of mutual support which includes Bible study, singing, and praying aloud.

Walker believes that more people are becoming aware of religion and the spiritual nature of man, but fewer are becoming involved in religion because it poses a challenge to their security, especially in grades. Involvement in religion takes time, he says, time that might otherwise be used for studies.

Lawrence Kaplan, advisor to the Jewish Association, said that religious, educational and social activities are its main concern but this year the association is moving more towards developing group policy statements on certain issues. Kaplan cited the lack of Judaic religion courses as an example, which he feels would help broaden the liberal arts background of all students.

Even though Jewish services are open to the whole College community, Kaplan believes there is a lack of information on Judaism on campus. He hopes to see more awareness of religions and more exchanges among them now that a rabbi has joined the chaplaincy. Kaplan suggested planning an ecumenical Thanksgiving service that would help "increase religious awareness on campus."

Council hears petition

Simpson urged swift action: "The Council is obligated to bring this referendum to a vote of the student body as soon as possible. To postpone such a vote is to abdicate our responsibility to those who signed this petition and to the students who have a right to vote on it."

The Council then voted unanimously to accept a motion by Tucci to create a referendum committee composed of seven members to set a date for the referendum vote; to arrange for media publicity; to supervise the voting; and to respond to any difficulties should the referendum pass.

Goerlich and Beardsley, however, agreed after the meeting to postpone the referendum until February, allowing the elections—should the amendment pass—to coincide with those of other officers and committee members. Both were "surprised at the depth of hostility" evinced by the Council.

Goerlich described himself as offended by the body's "personal attack" against their petition. "The saddest thing," he concluded, "is that until April, we will have a secretary and treasurer who are appointed; who are not responsible to any student constituency; and who are voting on policy which affects all students." This voting power of appointees particularly vexed the two juniors.

In other business, the Council passed a motion made by Steve Magee '79 to deal with the six to eight thousand dollars of vandalism damage done each year. Presently, each house manager receives a bill for damage; its value is later deducted from the damage fund, which consists of the aggregate total of five dollars of each student's House Maintenance Tax. The ruling has each house manager announcing to his house the nature of the damage. The cost would then be borne by the house, deducted out of their dues fund, should no one claim responsibility for the damage.

Later, Rusty Case '80 of the Housing Committee reported that Ross Keller, Director of Food Services, has agreed to consider using student members of Food Services instead of full-time employees to supervise parties in Greylock, Mission Park, and Driscoll dining halls. Keller earlier had announced that groups sponsoring parties would be required to pay $60 in wages for this employee. Students, noted Case, could be hired more inexpensively.

The Social Coordinating Committee, he added, also has produced the first all-College social calendar, which includes listings of private and public parties, lectures, concerts, and so forth. Case, chairman of the committee, hopes that this consolidation will alleviate further conflicts, and thereby produce a more equable campus social schedule.

Finance Committee chairman Simpson announced tentative allocations of $4500 to the Boat Club; $300 to the Pipe Band; $1025 to the International Club; $600 to the pottery group; and $25 to Dave Weineman '81. Weinman who hopes to make arrangements for a blues band to play at the College.

Science and History are also heavily enrolled."

The important thing now is to "figure out how to get back to the original ratio," O'Connor stated. Currently the President, Provost, Deans, Director of Student Housing, and Admissions Director are debating how to reduce the student-faculty ratio.

Rosenthal believes that two important options the group must consider are "raising the number of faculty or cutting back next year to make up for over-enrolling in 1978." To compensate for this problem in the future, the College "could reduce the number of exchanges coming in." O'Connor would be reluctant to follow this course of action, however, "since we've promised the other schools in the Twelve College Exchange" to permit a certain number of students.

It is difficult, though economically desirable, to maintain a constant student population during both semesters, "With a permanent imbalance between the number of students on campus first and second semester, he emphasized, the cost of everyone's education is raised." Nevertheless, a large group of people choose to go abroad or [illegible] exchange during the spring when they have more time available. With Winter Study and summer vacation O'Connor mentioned that the Administration will consider admitting people for mid-year entrance "as Middlebury does."

Women top Holyoke

The Williams Women's Soccer Team outplayed the Mt. Holyoke College squad Thursday, defeating them 1-0 with a second half goal by sophomore Julia Weyerhauser.

This was the fifth game of the season, and the team now stands 3-1-1. Williams defeated Middlebury 1-0 in the first game of the season, in their next game they tied Smith, 1-1, after 2 ten-minute overtimes in which neither team was able to score. Williams lost its third game to Yale, 0-2, yet the match was marked by good performances among both teams. Last week the Williams team defeated Amherst, 3-1.

Runners meet with mixed success

Men stomp on Trinity, Union

WILLIAMSTOWN The Williams Men's Cross Country squad hit stride again Saturday, stomping Trinity 15-48 and Union 21-36 at Schenectady. The team is now 5-3.

The crucial factor in the double victory was the Ephs' pointer pack. After Tom Semrock eased in all alone in second place, three purple harriers tied for third: Steve Polasky, Mike Bernman and Garrier Leonard ran step for step together from the start. The final scorer for Williams was Phil Darrow, who dropped off the pack at the three mile mark and tried in to finish seventh.

The gap between Semrock and the fifth scoring runner has narrowed steadily over the past few meets, and was under one minute for the first time Saturday. This margin is still too large, however, according to Assistant Coach Peter Farwell. "The team looked strong and relaxed today, so I'm looking for at least a four man pack for the entire race next week."

The Ephs have a week to train before traveling to Hamilton on Saturday for the New England Small College Athletic Conference meet.

UVM in front

The Williams Women's Cross-Country team, reduced to a hardy core of six from the usual 11 runners, lost to the University of Vermont and Dartmouth in a three-way meet Saturday. Vermont won the race, held on their home course in Burlington, Vt. They had 21 points, Dartmouth had 48 points, and Williams had 68 points.

UVM captured 7 of the top 10 places, with sophomore Judi St. Hilaire easily winning the race. Her time was 17:34 on the 5000-meter course. Williams' first finisher was freshman Sue Marchant, tenth, who ran the race in a strong 19:54. Behind her were senior Tannis Fox, 15th, freshman Brenda Mailman 16th, junior Annie Ko, 21st, and freshmen Tammy Shea, 25th and Alexis Hamill, 30th. Thirty-two women competed.

The team travels to Hamilton College in Clinton, N.Y. next Saturday for the New England Small College Championships.

Last Wednesday the Team turned in many of its finest performances of the season despite rain and a wet, slippery home course to outrun Albany (SUNY) and Hartwick. Williams finished with 19 points and Albany with 54. Hartwick did not score because they were unable to field a full team of five runners.

Freshman Sue Marchant and senior co-captain Mary Hekala won the race, finishing together with a time of 21:33 on the 5.2 mile course. Also competing for Williams were senior co-captain Corrie Johnson, who placed fourth, senior Tannis Fox, fifth, freshmen Liz Martineau, seventh, Brenda Mailman, 11th, Stephanie Carperos, 14th, Tammy Shea, 15th, and Alexis Hamill, 16th. Seventeen women competed.

The team travels to the University of Vermont Saturday, where they will run against two other strong teams, UVM and Dartmouth, in what should be an exciting meet.

Women's volleyball club disgraces MIT, Smith

The Williams' Women's Volleyball squad suffered its first defeat in ten games at the hand of Eastern Nazarene College Saturday morning, but managed otherwise to add two victories to its record in the same hectic day.

Eastern Nazarene shamed the Ephwomen in two straight games in the first match of a four-team meet. Co-captain of the team Sue Jacquin said, "It was a matter of warming up. Nazarene was not as good a team as we are, but we started slowly and just couldn't seem to get going."

Williams lost the first game in the next match against M.I.T. 10-15, in what looked like it was to be a repeat performance of the first match. Junior Dana Mulvaney came off the bench, however, and with some fine play sparked the offense to a 15-4 win in the next game. The Ephwomen went on to win the final game and the match before disgracing Smith in two straight games, 15-2 and 15-6, for their second victory of the day.

The "slow-start" phenomenon had plagued the Williams squad in an earlier match against Fitchburg last Thursday Oct. 5. Williams fell to Fitchburg in the first two games of the match, 6-15 and 14-16. The Ephwomen took advantage of the match's 3 out of 5 win rules and thundered back to take the next game, 15-10. With that momentum, the squad overpowered Fitchburg in the next two games and the match in what captain Jacquin called, "the best match with the best opponent we've faced yet."

The team's record now stands at nine wins against a single loss.

What would Socrates think of O'Keefe?

If you question long enough and deep enough, certain truths about O'Keefe become evident..
It has a hearty, full-bodied flavor. It is smooth and easy going down.
And, the quality of its head is fact rather than philosophical conjecture.
We think there's one truth about O'Keefe that Socrates would not question: It's too good to gulp. As any rational man can taste.

Kickers shut out Bantams, countervail Dartmouth loss

By Dave Barth

Williams soccer evened its record at 2-2 with a 3-0 victory over Trinity College. The win was keeper Doug Fix's second shutout of the season.

From the start the game was one-sided, but Williams could not close the door. The Ephs hit posts, missed just wide, and failed on breakaways. It looked like one of those days. Despite a clear advantage in play, the Ephs managed not to score. By halftime, the Trinity keeper had blocked a dozen shots denying Williams on several good chances.

The second half promised to be like the first. A minute into the period, co-captain Perry 'LB' Nelson headed a ball that hit the crossbar and a post but stayed out. Soon after, Nelson was stopped on a clean breakaway set up by a quick throw-in by Gregg Hartman. The frustration mounted but Williams kept cool and continued the pressure. Not to be denied a third time, Nelson headed a beautiful corner kick from sophomore Brian Daniell into the top right corner. The Ephs were finally on the board.

Junior fullback Tad 'Bernie' Roach provided the insurance goal with the first score of his college career. Co-captain Chic Johnson passed a free kick back to the charging fullback who blasted a low screamer. On its way in the ball was deflected by a Trinity player. The keeper never had a chance.

The JV squad, now 3-1-1, tied Trinity's JV 2-2 on Saturday. Frosh Tad Chase saved the loss by scoring with 15 seconds to go knotting the game at 2.

Last Tuesday Williams lost a closely fought contest to Dartmouth in Hanover. The Eph booters came out strong and hard. They dominated the play but could not score on three golden opportunities. The score remained tied. Dartmouth's Rich Brown blooped a ball into the net. The unexpected goal took the wind out of the Eph's sails and brought Dartmouth to life.

In the second half the Green opened up the play and sent waves of wings crashing through a tiring Williams defense. Dartmouth's Paul Molt was left unguarded at the top of the penalty box. He took a pass and powered the ball into the net. That was enough. Williams had a few more chances but none as good as in the opening minutes. It was the first time Williams was shutout this year.

The JV's beat their green counterparts 1-0. Tad Chase redirected Mike Bilo's shot for the Ephs's sole score. The JV squad hosts Southern Vermont this Saturday at 1:30. The varsity travel to Maine this weekend hoping to better their record against Bates and Bowdoin.

The Williams football team defeated the Trinity Bantams 20-7 in an exciting game at Weston Field last Saturday. They remain undefeated.

Rushing attack helps unbeaten gridders trounce Trinity, 20-7

by Mary Kate Shea

Williamstown, Mass.—In a contest marked by hard hitting and 12 fumbles, the Williams College football team raised its season record to 3-0 last Saturday with a 20-7 win over previously unbeaten Trinity College. The Ephs will play on the road next weekend when they face the Bowdoin Polar Bears in Brunswick, Maine.

"It was a tough game," said Williams head coach Bob Odell after the game. "To a great extent, we hurt ourselves. We could have had a couple more touchdowns. The fumbles hurt. We're happy to come away with the 20-7 win."

The strong Williams ground game, which gained 285 yards to Trinity's 32 yards rushing, was led by junior Dave Massucco and sophomore Bill Novicki with 98 yards apiece.

Tenacious pass coverage by the members of the Williams defensive backfield made it extremely difficult for Trinity quarterback Mike Foye to find open receivers in the first half. The Bantams passed for just 36 yards in the first half.

Field goals of 35 and 26 yards by co-captain Ken Hollingsworth kept the Ephs in the lead throughout the afternoon. Hollingsworth converted the 35-yard attempt to put Williams on the scoreboard mid-way through the opening quarter. He made it two-for-two on his field goal tries when he split the crossbars with a 26-yard boot five minutes into the third quarter, giving the Ephs a 13-0 lead.

Both of Williams touchdowns were scored by Massucco. His first score was set up by a fumble forced by a hit by tackle Dan Towle and recovered by linebacker John Thiel. Massucco carried the ball on seven out of nine plays in Williams 36-yard scoring drive. The touchdown, which gave the Ephs a 10-0 lead, came with 2:35 remaining in the first half.

In the second half the Bantams' combination of Foye to split end Pat McNamara began to click. Foye found his favorite target five times for a total of 52 yards, including a 19-yard touchdown strike with 4:00 left in the third quarter.

The Bantams continued in the third and fourth quarters their threat to break through with another touchdown to tie the score. The tide began to turn in Williams' favor when a long pass completion to McNamara was nullified by an illegal motion penalty on the Bantams. The Eph defense held on and forced Foye to throw an interception picked off by linebacker Phil Shuman.

Shuman's interception stopped Trinity's building momentum and set up Williams final score of the afternoon with 10:36 remaining in the game when Massucco scampered five yards around the left end for his second touchdown of the game and seventh of the season.

Two more interceptions by the Williams defensive unit thwarted Trinity's hopes for another touchdown. Rover Mark Eckert snagged an overthrown Foye pass intended for the speedy McNamara. Eckert, who also recovered two Trinity fumbles in the win Saturday, leads Williams in interceptions with one per game in the Ephs first three contests.

Just as the Bantams started their passing attack rolling with back-to-back pass completions to McNamara, Shuman grabbed his second errant pass of the afternoon.

The Ephs paid a price for the win over Trinity on Saturday. On the final series of the first half, Williams quarterback Bob Lutz received a shot in the ribs and had to leave the game. "Lutz is such a tall gangly kid, he makes a good target," said Odell. "I just hope the ribs are bruised, not broken."

Scoring line:

WILLIAMS—Hollingsworth, 35-yard field goal, 7:07 left in 1st quarter.

WILLIAMS—Massucco, 2-yard run, 2:35 left in 2nd quarter, (Hollingsworth kick good).

WILLIAMS—Hollingsworth, 26-yard field goal, 8:39 left in 3rd quarter.

TRINITY—Foye to McNamara, 19-yard pass, 4:00 left in 3rd quarter, (Jacobs kick good).

WILLIAMS—Massucco, 5-yard run, 10:36 left in 4th quarter, (Hollingsworth kick good).

Score by quarters:

Other Sports Highlights

Rugby vs Alums

Coming off an impressive win over Middlebury last weekend, the Rugby Team fell to the Union College RFC 13-0 on Saturday. The match was marred by sloppy line play, poor loose rucking, and the loss of lineman Dave Weyerhaeuser. A much improved B side team lost in a closely fought struggle 12-7. Scoring for the B siders were Bill Gonzales with a try and Art Leo with a penalty kick.

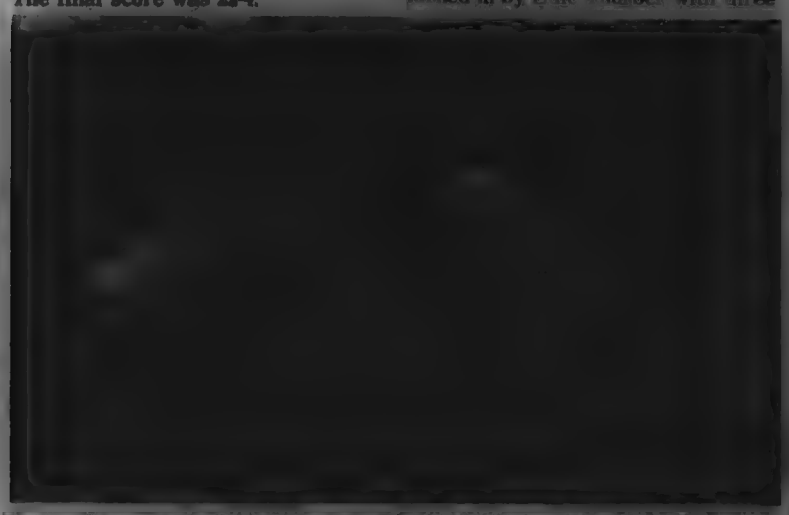
Highlighting the weekend was the Olde Farts match and banquet which took place this Sunday. Representing one of the toughest teams we will face this year, the undergraduates struggled through a tough first period, coming out four points down on a try by Jeff Jones, '66.

Then the WRFC suffered a major loss when captain Jeff Dunn suffered a knee injury which put him on crutches for what we hope will be a short time. The only score for the young ruggers came on a run by Yoshi Belash. Scores for the alums were made on tries by John "Tosh" Greer, Wally "Disco" Boyer, Hutch Hutchings, and a kick by Pete Tuttle. The final score was 23-4.

Following the game came a festive cookout at the Log. In the midst of song and general good mirth, the Hugh Hawkins Cup was presented to captains Peter Hopkins and Worthy Linen of the Olde Farts for the fifth time in five years. Following the presentation came three impressive ballads by Henry Whittemore, Kevin Kelly '72, and Worthy Linen, '73. As the old saying goes, "A good time was had by all".

Williams Rugby faces Colgate this weekend at Hamilton as they attempt to even their record at 2-2.

WUFO wins



The Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization (WUFO) beat Hampshire and Union Colleges last weekend to remain undefeated for the season. The victories extended the fall record to 3-0, not including a victory by forfeit over Middlebury.

On Saturday, an excited WUFO squad held Hampshire scoreless for fifteen minutes with scrappy defensive play and built up a seven point lead which was never overcome. A fine offensive performance was turned in by Eddie Thurber with three goals. Final score was Williams 20, Hampshire 13.

Sunday's game against Union was also highlighted by great defensive work, with WUFO sprinting to a 14-0 lead before giving up a goal 27 minutes into the game. The depth of the Williams club provided a potent offense, and by the game's end end the scorecard read 36-8.

Spectacular diving spurred both defensive and offensive action. The cry of "DIVE!" was heard often as Greg Smith, Peter Glidden, John Hopkins, Guido Adams, freshman Eric Cochran, and many others made splendid efforts in both games.

Next week WUFO travels to Dartmouth for a Saturday game, followed by tournament play at RPI after fall break; it will end the season with a homecoming game against Wesleyan and away against Amherst.

Women's Tennis

On Saturday the Williams Womens' tennis team overcame the University of Vermont in a 6-3 rout. Playing on the Williams indoor tennis courts, the Ephwomen proved the strength of their '78 team, which now holds a 4-2 record for the season.

Beckie Chase, Ann Morris, Mary Simpson, Laura Goebel, and Mary Tom Higgs each won in singles. While Goebel lost by her Vermont opponent in two tie-breaker sets, Trudie ten Broeke, at No. 2 singles, lost on the final point of the third set tie-breaker. Her final score was 7-5, 3-6, 7-6 (5-4).

In doubles action, Williams conceded two of their three matches. The winning team was Melanie Thompson—Ann Johnson. They recovered quickly from a 7-6 loss in the first set to win the following two sets 6-1, 6-2.

Weather permitting, the women will travel to Springfield on Monday to play a twice-postponed match. Then on Wednesday they face Middlebury and Amherst on Saturday. Both of these matches are at home.

Ephwomen lose to UVM 0-4

The Williams Varsity Field Hockey team suffered its fifth consecutive loss on Saturday as the University of Vermont rolled over the Ephwomen 4-0 in Burlington. The loss brings the Williams season record to 2-5 and comes on the heels of a similar routing by Springfield College in which the women lost 6-0.

Althought the UVM game was still well within reach of Williams at the half, when the score stood at 1-0, the purple offense was outshot by Vermont four to one. The Ephwomen took only six shots throughout the course of the game compared with UVM's 25. Two of Vermont's three second period goals came in the last five minutes of the game. Eph goalies Blythe Miller and Sue Smith had a combined tally of 19 saves.

The Williams junior varisty field hockey team also lost to UVM, 6-1. Pam Hansen scored on an assist from Wendy Brown in the first period. The junior varsity record is now 5-2. The next varsity field hockey game is at home Wednesday against Middlebury College.

Earlier last week, the team faced possibly their toughest opponents of the season in Springfield College Wednesday, and lost the contest 4-0. Springfield, at home under the lights and on the astroturf, scored twice in the first four minutes of play and set the pace for the entire game.

The junior varsity field hockey team was defeated 1-0 by Springfield in a close match. The loss was the JV team's first after five consecutive wins.

The Varsity Field Hockey team dropped its fifth consecutive game to UVM.

Spring St. residents say little noise

by Dave MacGregor

A majority of all Spring Street residents do not believe noise due to the Log is a major problem, a Record survey revealed. Six out of ten households contacted thought the Log was no problem, and two others said they thought it was not a serious problem.

The Record contacted ten Spring Street households by phone or in person last week, and asked each three questions concerning noise on the street. Five households could not be contacted.

One resident said, "The noises are not excessive. Sometimes there is light laughter which carries, but it passes and goes. I don't think there is the kind of noise anyone would call in and complain about."

Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zoito suggested to the Williamstown Selectmen last month that the Log be moved due to the number of complaints the police have received from residents about noise. After the first meeting of the selectmen dealing with the issue, Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor directed Log manager Mike Masi to close the Log at midnight on weeknights, and stationed a College security officer outside at closing time, beginning September 18.

The selectmen discussed the subject again two weeks ago, without inviting a representative of the College. At that time they discussed the idea of closing the Log still earlier, and asking the College to move it.

Zoito refused to discuss the Log with a Record reporter last week, and refused to reveal the number of complaints the police have received.

The Record asked residents, "1. Do you believe that there is excessive noise on Spring Street as a result of students walking to and from the Log? 2. The College has made extra efforts to monitor the Log this fall. Do you find the situation improved, worse, or no change? 3. As a resident of Spring Street, what specific nuisance problems do you see on the Street?"

Both residents who believed the Log to be a major source of noise on Spring Street agreed there had been some improvement this fall. One attributed the change to the presence of a Williamstown police officer on patrol. The other blamed the Log for excessive noise, but added that noise was just as bad on the street in the summertime, when the Log is not open.

The residents who saw the Log as a problem, but not a major one, either did not usually notice the noise, or noticed it but did not attribute the problem to the Log in particular. One commented that the noise problem on Spring Street existed long before the Log was opened several years ago.

The several residents who did not see the Log as a problem at all blamed the noise problem on other bars on Spring Street, and noted that much of the noise and littering attributed to students is in fact due to town residents and other non-students.

Perhaps complaints of noise from the boisterous patrons of the Log have not been as numerous as the town alleges.

CC approves impeachment; students will vote

by Ann Morris

The College Council passed a constitutional amendment Wednesday night providing a mechanism for the removal of a Council officer or at large member. The student body will vote on the amendment on Nov. 1.

The amendment allows for the impeachment procedure to follow one of two paths. If a voting member of the Council moves for impeachment, a two-thirds vote of the Council at a meeting at least two weeks later is required to impeach. If 30 per cent of the student body signs a specific petition for impeachment, a two-thirds vote of the entire student body at least two weeks later is required to impeach.

Proposed by the Referendum Committee created a week before, the impeachment amendment grew out of the debate generated by the student petition to directly elect the Council's secretary and treasurer. The College Council constitution presently contains no impeachment clause.

The original committee proposal included no provision for the student body to remove an elected official. Committee member Ted Tucci '79 explained that the decision to limit the impeachment process to the Council was based on the committee's feeling that a public election would be not only impractical, but unnecessarily damaging to the individual's reputation. "Students aren't able to devote the time this matter requires," agreed Jupie McNamee '80; "even in a democracy the rights of the individual must be protected."

Disagreeing with this argument, Council treasurer John Simpson '79 proposed that the student body be included in the impeachment process. He contended that although a representative system is crucial in effective government, it must stop "at the point when representatives are deciding on representatives."

Expressing a concern about the image of the Council as a "paternalistic" body deciding what students can and cannot do, Simpson said he trusts that the student body will handle such an election in a responsible and fair way.

Steve Magee '79 warned that the Council "must be careful of the idea that we can best handle things in this small body." He pointed out that since, "it's hard enough to get two-thirds of the students to say anything; if they do, we ought to listen." The Referendum Committee, accepted Simpson's amendment and included it in the rewritten amendment. The amendment was passed by all but one vote.

Tyler House reprsentative, Kate Wheeler '79, representing Bruce Goerlich '80 and David Beardsley '80, proposed that the referendum on direct election of Council secretary and treasurer be postponed until early March. This would allow the present officers to complete their terms, while tying the new elections in with the annual college election in the spring.

College chooses first rabbi

After a two-month search, the College has officially designated Rabbi Abraham Soltes of Stockbridge as chaplain to the campus Jewish community. The selection was made after extended consultation with the Jewish Association.

Rabbi Soltes has already led Friday evening services for the Jewish Association, which previously have been led by lay members, and he spoke at the Parents' Weekend brunch. His reception has been generally favorable among all sectors of the College Jewish community.

The appointment was announced last week by Assoc. Prof. Lawrence Kaplan, Jewish Association advisor. Kaplan said the rabbi's term is for the duration of the academic year, after which his performance will be evaluated and his rehiring considered.

College Chaplain Michael Henderson said Rabbi Soltes' appointment as assistant chaplain represents a part-time commitment to the campus Jewish community only, and not the entire college.

According to Kaplan, the Rabbi will not be officially active until late this month. Rabbi Soltes plans to hold office hours Sunday afternoons and evenings.

The rabbi is an adjunct professor of religion at Kingsborough Community College in New York City and chaplain at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. According to Henderson, Rabbi Soltes has a broad range of talent "from Talmud instruction to Israeli musicology."

Besides chaplaincy, the rabbi has radio and television programs which disseminate information on aspects of Jewish-Israeli culture.

Williams aid grants process discounts academic success

by Eric Schmitt

Financial aid grants at Williams are based upon many factors—but the actual high school performance of an applicant is not considered in the award process, Financial Aid Director Henry Flynt said.

Flynt said his office emphasizes the number of dependents in a family, and the incomes of both student and parents, in determining how much money an applicant receives.

According to Flynt, a prospective student files an application for financial aid along with his admissions form. Both forms are considered in the admission process as the admissions officers, after narrowing down the number of applicants to a "workable" number, 1000 for example, go through and determine the aggregate need of the group.

The Admissions office tries to maintain a viable balance in each class between those who require financial aid and those who do not. It is an uncertain process because the admissions people cannot predict how many financial aid candidates will eventually matriculate. Flynt said

Over 700 flock to Williams for 26th Freshman Parent's Day

by Priscilla Cohen

More than 700 parents, relatives, and friends arrived last weekend for the 26th annual Freshman Parents' Day. In spite of a steady downpour the special program of concerts, lectures and parties redeemed the otherwise scudding days.

President Chandler officially welcomed the 281 families at a Saturday morning program at Chapin Hall, a panel discussion on "The Williams Curriculum." Among the faculty members speaking on the subject were Prof. Russell H. Bostert, chairman of the History Department, Susan Dunn, Assistant Professor of French and Professor of Chemistry William R. Moomaw.

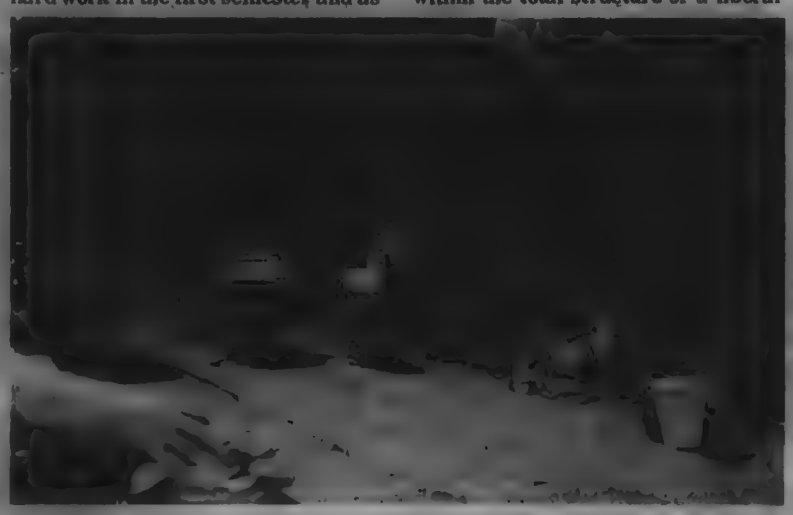
Bostert outlined the differences between the curriculum of 1967 and that of today. He pointed out that the reduction of required courses in a student's major allows for more electives. Many courses have been added to keep pace with "the "expanding frontiers of knowledge"; he said. Where the Williams catalogue showed 347 courses in the late 1960s, it now offers 467.

Looking back over thirty years of teaching at Williams, Prof. Bostert added that the constant reevaluation of the curriculum allows the college to "provide an environment appropriate to each generation."

Prof. Moomaw's report on the current efforts of student-faculty committees indicated that this process of reevaluation continues. At the forefront of their concern is the Winter Study Program and whether it is fulfilling the hopes that existed for the January interim period when it was first instituted in 1967. As President Chandler noted, it is too often regarded now "as a reward for hard work in the first semester and as a promise for the second," with its own value or opportunities ignored.

Moomaw, also mentioned that curriculum committee members see the need for a more coherent approach to courses outside a student's major field. He said that, while Williams has always met the needs of students specializing in either the sciences or the arts, the college now emphasizes the necessity of everyone seeing "both halves" within the total structure of a liberal arts education. Susan Dunn, Assistant Professor of French defended the teaching of foreign languages. It is only in learning another tongue, she said, that "the experience of otherness" occurs, a perception of other values, of other ways of life. She added that paradoxically, this ultimately adds to a sense of self-awareness.

The place of language courses in a college has always been affected by world affairs. For example, the popularity of German plunged after WW1; interest in Russian grew during the Cold War years. The Curriculum Committee is now considering a recommendation, said Dunn, that the language requirement be reinstated.



Many freshmen later joined their families at a buffet lunch served at Towne Field House. "I am happy to see," said President Chandler, "that, where once, not so long ago, students and parents sat on opposite edges of the picnic blanket, their backs to each other, this year's freshmen have looked forward to today."

While a picnic lunch was offered in Towne Field House, some parents and freshmen were seen at the British Maid and Howard Johnsons. And, while the athletic events which survived the weather had their cheering sections, some families opted for shopping expeditions along Spring Street.

Despite enthusiasm for the many sports events, the Parents' Council had suggested that there be more non-athletic events over Freshman Parents' weekend. As a result, a panel discussion took place on Saturday afternoon, in which four students discussed thier lab and field projects; they varied from a report on squirrel behavior to studies on wave action. "We wanted to expose parents to the nature of the facilities and how students can use them," said Professor Lee Drickamer, Coordinator of the Bronfman Science Center.

For the second year in a row, separate entries held their own cocktail parties. This practice gives parents the chance to meet their children's suite-mates, friends and junior advisors, as well as other parents visiting that dorm. Said one father, leaving the party, "I wish I were in the Class of '82, starting out right now."

The 1978 Freshman "REVUE entertained audiences on Friday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoon. Fifteen freshmen, made up the cast under the direction of Rob Baker '80, Fred Barr '80, Jim Stone '80 and Kevin Weist '81.

Parents and guests gathered at the Log last weekend for a quiet evening together. (photo by Read)

Misinformation

To the editor:

The Record has an obligation to get the facts itself. I am referring, of course, to the misinformation contained in Stu Massad's article, "Students Resurrect Activism at the College."

The section regarding the anti-nuclear movement on campus serves to illustrate the lack of care taken while researching and writing that article. Several bits of misinformation contained in that article require rectification:

1) The Northern Berkshire Alternative Energy Coalition is not, as the article implies, a new organization, "Formed on campus this fall." Rather, the NBAEC was created by area residents last Spring. Student involvement with NBAEC is minimal at best.

2) The uninformed reader is led to believe that the Williams Action Coalition is affiliated with NBAEC. At the moment, WAC has no intention of allying itself with either NBAEC or Clamshell Alliance. The Action Coalition exists to serve the Williams student body as an educational resource. The organization's primary goal is to highlight various issues of concern to its members and the College community-at-large. Furthermore, WAC does not plan to "focus its activities this year on nuclear power as alternative energy," as Mr. Massad indicates. Throughout the year, WAC intends to bring films and speakers to camus covering a broad range of issues from many different viewpoints. The nuclear power controversy is only one of those issues.

The most disturbing reality of Massad's piece of writing is that he has failed to contact the officers of the various organizations discussed therein. Instead, he presented misinformation in an irresponsible manner which could prove detrimental to the air of political awareness on campus. Any observant student can see that Massad's attempt to evoke images of a late 60's Dionysian frenzy of radicalism is not based on any reality. Clearly, the Record needs a new journalistic standard if it is to salvage what little respect students have for it.

Protest

To the editor:

Let me add my small voice to that of Mr. John C. Moore who wrote you in your September 26 issue protesting the shortening the Log's hours from 1:00 a.m. to 12:00 a.m.

I think it would be very unfortunate indeed if they forced "late revelers" off campus by either shortening the hours or moving the Log north of route No. 2. I have in mind the sad fate of several of my classmates at Williams who suffered fatal automobile accidents off campus coming back late at night which I think could have been averted had we had a place like the Log in those days.

My father, the late Ken Reynolds (class of '16) and Ralph Perkins originally started the alumni house (the Log) back in the early '40s and their portraits still hang in the front room there. I feel sure they would have been immensely pleased to see how much the students have enjoyed the use of the Alumni House in recent years, not to mention the alumni.

Sincerely,
Mark Reynolds '50

Sour Pickles

by Peter Rintels

Not too long ago I confronted one of the custodians in Baxter and asked what wrong I had done him that he should be emptying his trash into my SU box. The custodian was very confused by all of this, so I produced the offending material and he quickly pointed out that all of this "trash" had been duly postmarked and was, in fact, nothing but junk mail. Even so, I have been left incredulous by so much of this stuff lately that I hardly felt embarrassed by this incident.

Most of my junk mail is simply annoying, but I must admit that I occasionally get some amusing items. My favorite piece to date is a flyer advertising the Harvard Classics. With the inimitable humbleness of that institution, the flyer insists that "Justifiably, the famed Harvard Classics have been called 'all things to all people.' " No doubt there is at least some truth to this. To some people, the Classics, far from being "mere" books, are also door stops, props for unbalanced tables and excellent projectiles for domestic quarrels.

The Classics "offer you romance, invention, adventure, drama, history, knowledge—and the means of making your life what you want it to be." (Their emphasis, no kidding.) In short, "Just 15 minutes a day gives you new knowledge, confidence, respect."

I can't help but imagine that this ad has at some point found its way into the hands of some wheezy adolescent who read, looked into a mirror and exclaimed, "Dammit, I'm tired of being an intellectual scarecrow," while booting a chair across the room. "Charles Atlas, er, I mean the Harvard Classics say they can turn me into a liberally educated man with most fifteen minutes a day. What the heck, I'll try it."

Our friend proceeds rapidly through the classics, having plenty of time for reading while recuperating from a broken foot. Then, the next summer, while sitting at the beach with the girl of his dreams . . .

Girl: Pfft, Ugh. Why the bully of the beach just kicked sand in my face. He's the biggest nuisance around.

Harvard Classics Reader: Hey, can't you be more careful.

Bully: Oh yeah, well maybe I'll just punch your face out and steal your girl.

HC Reader: Oh year, well maybe you'll just recognize this picture of you in bed with your boss's wife.

Bully: Huh? What? How'd you get that?

HC Reader: We liberally educated men have our methods.

Bully: Well how about if I just tear up this picture and beat your face in anyway.

HC Reader: What kind of non-liberally educated moron do you take me for? I left copies of this photo with a friend and if he doesn't hear from me in an hour, they'll be in the mail to your boss faster than you can say Marcus Aurelius.

Bully: Marcus who?

HC Reader; Never mind. Now why don't you just scram, you little intellectual twerp.

Bully: Gee, I don't want to mess with no liberally educated men. (Fades off into the distance.)

Girl: (Hugging the HC Reader) My hero! Now take your medicine. That wheezing is awful.

I'm not sure if I like this scenario or not, but it's reassuring to know in any case that Sawyer has the full set of Harvard Classics.

Beneath Their Peaceful Shadows

by Chris DiAngelo

Contrary to popular belief, Williams has become a more intellectual campus over the past few years. This will, I think, come as a surprise to some; and especially those who claim the W.S.P. is encouraging students to take a flippant attitude towards their work in January, or that the W.O.O.L.F. trips represent a travesty by demonstrating that there's more to Williams than just books.

The complaints that are in the air about the alleged lack of student enthusiasm seem to miss the crucial difference between academic interests and intellectual interests. Both types can be found quite readily on campus, and can be distinguished with ease.

The academic (referring not only to students but to faculty and administrators as well) is the one whose life revolves around the classroom, and who, in the case of the student academic, maintains his interest in the material only up through exam time. For the true academic, college is either just a "tool" for a job later in life (also known as a "passport to the big bucks"), or, in the case of the faculty academic, a "tool" for earning a living.

The intellectual, on the other hand, has a life outside the classroom as well as the one inside it. He is the student who goes back to his room after class and tells his roommate what he has just learned. The faculty intellectual can be most easily differentiated from the faculty academic by his ability to sustain a conversation about something other than his discipline for more than three minutes. The intellectual, in all cases, sees learning as a process which one is constantly engaged in, and as an attribute which one carries around. The academic is trained; the intellectual is educated.

How quickly some members of the faculty have forgotten the point that was best raised by the fraternity addition—that the Williams education is far, far more than the books. In fact, a credible case could be made that the preponderance of whatever true education we leave here with came from outside the classroom: either learning which was completely nonacademic, such as how to get along with people, or the application of our book learning to situations in our lives or the world.

The "people" element is perhaps the key difference, although not the only difference, between the academic and the intellectual modes of college life. Ideas are often much easier to master than is the art of human relations, and a cultivation of such traits as compassion, good conversation, friendliness, humor and warmth are more fundamental attributes of the cultured individual than is a command of logic, microeconomic theory, and the rules of Latin grammar. The fact that Williams is a college community composed of people is the only thing which distinguishes it from the forty-second street branch of the New York Public Library. Anyone who believes that the only function of a college such as Williams is to provide an academic education has, unfortunately, probably learned very little from his own life.

Of course, there are students here who have little interest in the college except as a tool. Often these students are also among the very top students grade-wise. Some of them concentrate on their work to the exclusion of all other pursuits, missing out for good on the above-mentioned qualities of culture. A few brave souls even graduate early, to the amazement of those who wish they could stay longer to take all their desired courses.

But, on the other hand, Registrar George Howard, tells me that the number of Independent Studies will be over two hundred this year (excluding theses) and that the number rises every year. More than ever, students are interested in their studies to pursue topics of interest not covered in the course offerings. This alone should demonstrate their commitment to their work.

At least two new discussion-oriented clubs have been dormed since the semester began: a Philosophy Club and an Oriental Culture Club. These join such old standbys as the Tuesday Forum and the International Club in providing students with the opportunity to get together outside of class and engage in an opportunity besides partying. Students continue to invite professors to guest meals, and more than ever faculty are eating lunch with the students in the dining halls and showing up at the Log. In light of the awesome pressures on junior faculty to spend every spare moment doing research, this amount of mingling with the undergraduates is very heartening.

What is even more amazing is the establishment of the "walk-in hour" in the Dean's and President's Offices. The fact that even President Chandler himself is in the classroom this semester illustrates the intense feelings that the Hopkins Hall crowd has toward promoting student-faculty contact.

Coming back to the WSP, I only wish that its critics could have seen the students watch their mailboxes for the catalogs, and then eagerly read through them at the sight of the many interesting offerings, from "Dogs" to the trip to Israel. I think they might change their views on this integral part of the Williams curriculum, when students and faculty can relax, have fun, and get to know each other better.

As for WOOLF, Freshman Days should not try to paint the College as a "mere" classroom experience; the orientation rather should present a complete picture of what the next four years will be like as a total experience. To repudiate WOOLF is to repudiate Colonel Williams' wisdom in establishing the school in the most beautiful area he could find. What better mark of an educated person is there than an appreciation for beauty?

The abolition of frats, co-education, WSP, WOOLF, and many other changes and programs here at the College are successful moves we have made in recognition that a complete education is a higher goal than book training. Williams should continue to approach its ideal, and not step backwards towards outmoded theories of what a cultured individual is. We would all suffer.

The criticism is entirely unfounded

by Mike Masi

I hope that by writing this article I'll be able to clear up some of the rumors going around about the Log. But first, I'd like to preface my remarks by thanking all the people who have been using the Log for their cooperation in keeping down the level of noise. Also I'd like to commend the town police and security officers for their conscientious efforts to insure the peace and quiet on Spring Street.

The Log responds to the students' need for a place to go during the week and on quiet weekends. Whatever the problems associated with it now, it would create worse problems to close the Log without a suitable alternative available. The College has determined that it is economically impractical to try to convert some other building into a pub in the near future. Consequently, there is very little chance that the College will voluntarily either close or move the Log in the near future.

Moreover, I don't think sufficient cause has been shown to warrant these measures. Much of the criticism that the Log has been receiving is entirely unfounded. As Dean O'Connor noted in his letter to the North Adams Transcript, there have been only two complaints since Sept. 18 and security officers were on hand each time and reported that there was no basis for either complaint.—(Ed. note: the letter is reprinted elsewhere on this page.) I consider this an excellent record.

In view of this record, I think the other measures, imposed on the Log, such as the early closing time, are punishing students unfairly. It is my sincere hope that these measures will be relaxed soon.

Again, thanks for your understanding and cooperation in keeping the noise down.

Mike Masi '78 is manager of the Log.

A 'safe and congenial place'

Editor's note: The following are excerpts from a letter to the editor of the North Adams TRANSCRIPT written by Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor. O'Connor is responding to the TRANSCRIPT'S report of the October 2 meeting of the Williamstown Selectmen, at which the Log came under heavy criticism. The letter appeared October 6.

. . . The Log was set up in September, 1973, after the Massachusetts drinking age was lowered to 18, in order to provide a safe and congenial place for our 1,860 students—and at the same time to remove a potentially difficult problem for the town. The Log is near the center of our campus and on the main commercial street of the town. Contrary to a widespread misconception, 15 of our 32 housing units and approximately 40 per cent of our student population live south of Main Street. Students from all over the campus walk to The Log; in five years of operation there have been no automobile accidents related to The Log and no disorders within the building. Yes, there have been a few complaints from nearby residents of excessive noise, mostly at closing time. In order to monitor this problem, we always have one of our security officers on hand for the closing time. In recent weeks our security officers have been regularly joined by patrolmen from the Williamstown police force.

Since the last flurry of complaints, I instructed the proprietor of The Log to close one hour earlier on week day nights. At the same time I asked our security officers to keep written record of every complaint filed. From Sept. 18 to this date, two complaints were recorded. The first was at 11:45 p.m. on Sept. 19. The complaint went first to the town police and was radioed to town officer Kennedy who was patrolling outside The Log with our Officer Gardner at the time. Mr. Kennedy ascertained that there was no basis for the complaint and so informed his switchboard. The same person then called the College switchboard which radioed to officer Gardner who, after another check, radioed back to say there was no basis for the complaint.

15 of our 32 housing units and approximately 40% of our student population lives south of Main Street.

On Sept. 22 at 11:40 p.m. a call came to the College switchboard complaining of noise. Officer Milne from the College and town officer Kennedy checked it out together and once again reported no loud noise or disturbance in the area. Town officers Kennedy and Zoito have been on the street nearly every night since September 18. So far as I know they have been satisfied with our new closing procedures. We do not know of any legitimate complaints since Sept. 18, and I have therefore asked the Williamstown selectmen for evidence. . . . I plan to attend the next meeting of the Board to explain further our efforts and to answer any questions they may have.

DANIEL O'CONNOR
Dean of the College
Williamstown

"He made it sound so harmless. . ."

by Fred Walden

Some time in 1973 a representative from the College (I believe he was the Assistant Dean) came to my home. He said the College intended to apply for a permit to open a Pub and sell beer only to students in what was then the "Alumni House," and wanted my reactions. He told me that students would come on foot, and probably a few on bicycles. Most of them, she said, would be coming down the hill in back and hence there would be little traffic coming in the front door. He also said it would just be a place where students could get together with professors and instructors and have a nice quiet beer, and that the place would close around 11:00 or 12:00 p.m. He made it sound so harmless that I said I would give it some thought before committing myself one way or the other. After talking with other people in the area, I was convinced that it would not be in the best interest of all concerned.

"Students would get together with professors and have a nice quiet beer . . ."

A hearing on the question was held at a meeting of the Town Selectman. Approximately a dozen persons, including students, spoke at this meeting in opposition to locating a Pub on Spring St. This did not include many in the immediate area who either work for or rent from the College, and who were reluctant to voice their opposition for fear of losing their apartments or their jobs. The College was represented by its lawyer, Attorney Manuel.

Those opposed to the Pub expressed their concern about the noise that would be created on the street by students going to and leaving the Log. At least one Selectman was strongly opposed to locating on Spring Street and other Selectmen had reservations about locating a Pub on the main business street of the town. Chief Zoito told the gathering that in no way would it be possible to control the noise that would be created by a Pub on Spring St. He said that Spring St. already had too many problems of vandalism, loitering and noise, and that in all probability it would be necessary for the town to permanently assign a night patrolman to control the noise and traffic that a pub would bring to the area. He further stated that beer permits had been given to student groups in the past and that in every case they were abused.

After hearing arguments for and against, the Selectmen decided to adjourn for a week to see if the College could come up with a more desirable location on campus. The old Williams Inn and the Rathskeller room in Baxter Hall were mentioned as possible locations.

At the meeting a week later the College evidently couldn't find a location to their liking on campus. But they did go to Spring St. and pressured several merchants on the street and a few others who in some way had connections with the College into coming to the meeting and speaking favor of locating the pub on Spring St. The issue was one that they were not directly concerned with and I am sure that none of these men would want a Pub within a mile of his home. I recall one of the merchants saying how nice it would be to have the students back down on the street. He spoke of how they used to come into his place of business and he used to know them all by their first names, and said it would be nice to see them back. When he finished, one of the students opposed to the Pub wanted to know how he was going to get to meet the students when he closed his business at 5:30 p.m. and the Pub didn't open until 8:00 p.m.

Attorney Manuel pleaded with the Selectmen to give the College just one chance. He said that if there were any complaints or disturbances the pub could be closed at 11:00 or 10:00 or else the town could take away its license. He further said, that students would be on hand to keep order inside. If necessary a College security man would be present, the windows be kept closed. There would be no amplifiers, no drinking outside the building, and students would come and leave quietly. He and the merchants evidently convinced the Selectmen that all would go well, so they voted two to one in favor of the proposal.

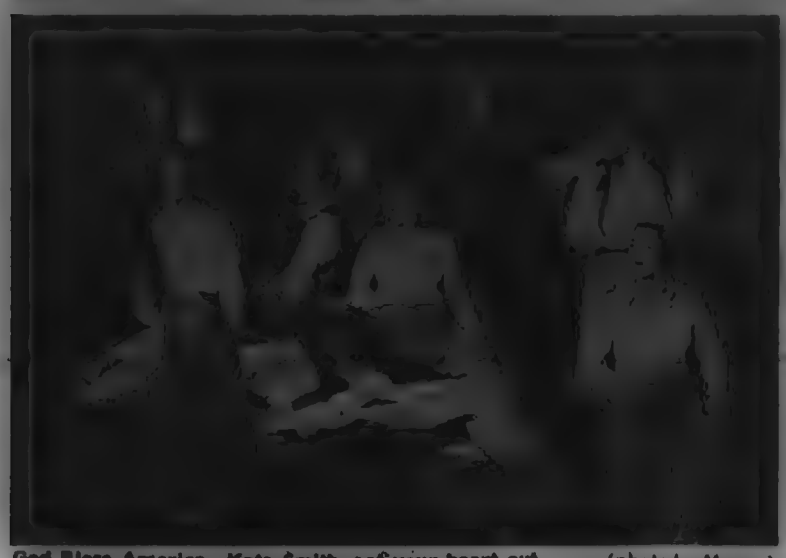
"He further stated that beer permits had been given to student groups in the past and in every case were abused . . ."

Since its opening there have been repeated calls to the town police and College security from people in the area concerning noise from students coming and going from the Log. All of the promises and restrictions have been ignored. After complaints are made, by the time officers arrive on the street the ones causing the disturbance have left the area. Chief Zoito says he doesn't have the manpower to station a man on the street every evening. Walt O'Brien says he doesn't have the help to station a man at the Log. I have complained to the town Manager and also the Selectmen. They contacted Mr. Roosenraad and he informed them that they always attempt to have a Security Officer on the scene when the Log closes at night. But what good does it do residents on the street, who have been kept awake until one or two o'clock to send an officer to the Log at closing time?

"Walt O'Brien says he doesn't have the manpower to station a man at the Log."

My family was awakened late one evening when a snowball crashed through our living room window. My porch was damaged when a car jumped the curb and ran into it. the cost of repairs was $130 dollars. I did not see those who were responsible for it, but the Log was crowded with students on those nights and the rest of the street was quiet.

People along the street certainly don't enjoy getting out of bed at 12 or even two o'clock in the morning to complain of noise from students leaving the Log. Even if they don't holler and yell, just the general noise of loud talk and laughter, the starting of cars, the slamming of car doors, and the blowing car horns makes it impossible to sleep.



When two to three hundred students spend an evening together drinking beer, they don't want someone leaning over their shoulder telling them to keep the noise down. Everyone agrees that students should have a place to enjoy beer and let their hair down a little, but good common sense tells anyone that Spring St. is not a good setting for such a place.

"When two to three hundred students spend an evening together drinking beer, they don't want someone leaning over their shoulder . . ."

The Log has not lived up to its agreement with the Selectmen of the town and if they do not relocate more centrally on campus, there will always be problems on Spring St.

In summary, let's face the facts. Promises have been broken.

Jukes will perform at Towne

Southside Johnny and the Asbury Jukes, well-known for their spectacular showmanship and energetic rock-R&B, will appear at the Towne Field House at 8:00 p.m. on Thursday, October 19 (the day before fall break). The 10-man group, which hails from Asbury Park, New Jersey, and has been closely associated with Bruce Springsteen, will release their third album a few days before the concert.

To insure quality sound in the acoustically imperfect Field House, the ACEC is spending $2000 on production. Co-chairman Steve Case is confident that the show will come off without a hitch, and has, in fact, tentatively booked two other concerts (Homecoming and last day of classes) for the Field House.

Appearing with the Jukes is a new band, Carillo, which has received rave reviews and has been favorably compared to performers such as Dave Mason and Bob Seger. The group is led by Frank Carillo, who previously played with Eric Clapton, Peter Frampton, and Yvonne Elliman.

Tickets for the concert are $4.00 for Williams students, and $6.00 for the general public, and go on sale Friday at Baxter Hall and The Record Store. Due to fire regulations, a limited number of tickets will be sold.

Frosh revue thrills audience

by Katie Springer

They were all there, from the great and mighty swaami to the enamored surgeon, juggling balls on one foot, promoting Sawsie Dustie cereal, and riling the substitute teacher.

This year's Freshman Revue, which packed Jesup Auditorium Friday, Saturday, and Sunday nights, was a series of 20 vaudeville routines conceived this summer by Robert Baker '80 and Jim Stone '80. The show provided a colorful assortment of song and dance routines, comedy sketches and monologues, including dramatic monologues by Kevin Rocap and Willa Black.

Among the acts was a slightly unorthodox version of "the Stripper" in which Marlene Standish slipped on successive layers of clothing amid whistles and shouts of "Cover the skin! Cover it all! Put it on!"

Later in the show, Jeb Gist relinquished his seat at the piano to perform a juggling routine, an act requiring "skill, coordination, balls, and good looks." "I'm going to juggle with my eyes closed," he announced, adding, "This is a feat which is rarely seen." The dramatic ending, in which Jeb was to juggle 10 flaming hatchets was, he announced apologetically, postponed for lack of time.

In another act, a freshman father was drafted from the audience to help prove the amazing telepathic powers of the great and mighty swaami (Colby Noble). As his assistant stood holding a key chain over his head, Marc de la Bruyere instructed the audience to stand up, lift their hands over their heads and to "go beyond their mediocre horizons" in intense concentration. The audience cooperated and within minutes the swaami had identified the mysterious object.

Other acts included an admirable rendition of Abbott and Costello's classic "Who's on First?" routine by Joseph Alfano and Bonnie Nadell. An extremely difficult routine to master, it calls for a quick volleying of dialogue, which the actors executed almost faultlessly.

Willa Black was convincing in her role as a country girl aspiring to become a great "actor-ess" and torn by her feeling for her bow-legged, cross-eyed boyfriend. Later in the show she returned to deliver a poetry reading and dramatic dialogue, which could not be more different from her humorous attempts as a "green girl".

Song and dance routines, including "Won't you Spoon with Me?" and "Ain't Misbehavin' " rounded off the evening. Overall, the singing was quite good and the background music, provided by Jeb Gist on the piano and William Burakoff on the drums was enjoyable.

The 15-member cast was directed by Kevin Weist '81, Fred Barr '80, Robert Baker '80, and Jim Stone '80. Musical director was Peggy Redfield '81 while Susan Von Moschzisker '80 arranged the choreography.

The cast was chosen from among 55 freshmen who auditioned early in September, Barr says. By limiting the group to fewer students than in past years, rehearsals have been more manageable and performances generally have been of higher quality, he explains, adding "This way we combine the fun part with a good theatrical show."

The talent displayed both on the stage and behind the scenes combined to produce an enjoyable show for parents and students. From the audinece reaction, it was a fun way to spend an evening.

Correction

The Record would like to extend its apologies for its mistake in attributing two poems which appeared in the October third issue to poets Louise Gluck and Geoffrey Wolff. Karen Eppler, '81, was the author of both these works, which were a creative response to the material presented by Gluck and Wolff in the first Contemporary Writers' Series program at the Clark.

CC forum focuses on "diversity"

Defining diversity and its importance at Williams drew campus debate again when some 40 students, faculty and administrators gathered in Dodd House Thursday for the College Council's first forum of the year, "Diversity and Life at Williams."

The forum, loosely guided by Council President Bronson Fargo '79 and faculty panelists Meredith Hoppin, Lawrence Kaplan, Charles Karelis '66 and Lawrence Vankin, brought together proponents and foes of increased diversity among Williams students.

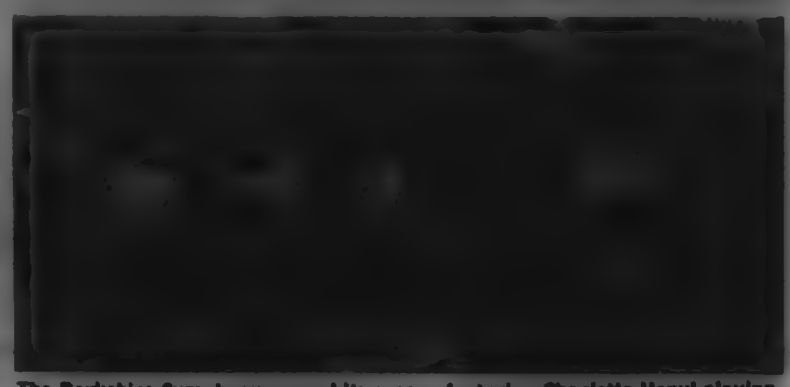
Discussion centered around how Williams encourages or discourages diversity in the academic and social lifestyles of its students. The forum skirted the issue of how the "Williams image" may discourage diversity by appealing only to a certain type of high school senior, an issue which Kaplan said "could be the topic for another forum by itself."

Students at the forum argued for a more loosely structured environment at Williams. They proposed loosening academic requirements to allow students to take other than four courses a semester, altering the freshman year and relaxing the residential college system and board plan.

Others noted that these alternatives run counter to the College's stated goals and financial requirements and that other alternatives for academic freedom exist in the student-initiated course option, independent study and the pass-fail option. Some students agreed that present levels of diversity are sufficient, but others argued that the institution, accused as "the Williams way," or "the Williams image," discourages experimentation so that only the most hardy, determined students break the perceived pattern.

"To me this is a little depressing," said Karelis, as he cited a decline in intellectual standards at Williams since his student years. He used as examples an alleged drop in Marshall and Rhodes scholars and placements into prestigious professional schools since that time. He argued that this intellectual decline was due to "overdiversification" in extracurricular activities, leading to "amateurism" among students.

Vankin countered with medical school placement statistics, which he said have declined only because of increased competition. Students argued that while depth in a subject is admirable, many youths experiment or overdiversify during their college years to gain perspective before deciding on a profession.



Hoppin took a middle ground, saying that pressures on pre-med, pre-law and pre-business school students, coupled with heavy grade competition, dampen diversity by inhibiting academic experimentation. Fear of failure stifles intellectualism, she said.

Guest meals and cocktail parties came under fire as well. They were variously labelled symptoms of white uppercrust society that create a harmful Williams image, relief from normal meals and valid social alternatives in Williams' diverse environment.

Dean of the College Francis O'Connor cautioned students not to blame the College for all the problems they meet in experimenting with lifestyles at Williams. He also noted that the history of Williams over the past 15 years—including abolition of fraternities and coeducation—show that change is not impossible.

The College Council plans to hold another forum later this year.

College Council passes impeachment measure questions, the Council voted to create a constitutional review committee. To be composed of four or five students and a faculty member acquainted with constitutional procedure, the committee will devise a full set or proposals on the constitution to "make it a smoother running document," Tucci explained.

On a motion proposed by Finance Committee chairman John Simpson, the Council voted unanimously that all student organizations receiving Student Activity Tax (SAT) funds must keep their books open to all students. At present, organizations can decide whether or not to leave their books open, and only the Finance Committee has the right to inspect them.

The motion will allow all students to discover how their SAT funds are spent, although organizations will maintain the right to keep private the records of funds not obtained through the SAT tax.

The Council also voted, on recommendation of the Finance Committee, to appropriate $2600 to Cap and Bells to cover the cost of bringing the Edward Albee production company to Williams. The professional company, directed by playwright Edward Albee, will present two Albee plays, "The American Dream" and "The Zoo Story." The performance will be for one night only, but students will be given proprity in purchasing tickets. Tickets will be $5.00, $3.50 for students.

Tentative SAT allocations this week include: $8500 for the Lecture Committee, $1075 for the Jazz Ensemble, $150 for the Roadrunners, $450 for Water Polo, $250 for the Americans for Democratic Action, and $160 for the Free University.

Eighteen students submitted applications for membership to the Shareholder Responsibility Committee, and twelve exchange or transfer student to the Housing Committee, Council vice-president Chris Jenkins '80 reported. The Elections Committee will make a recommendation on these names next week, Jenkins said, and encouraged further Council input on the names.

The position on the Elections Committee vacated by the resignation from Council of sophomore Janet Lavin was filled by volunteer Bonnie Schindel. The new at large member of the Council will be chosen through the regular application procedure.

Proposed Constitutional Amendment

Consideration or removal of any College Council officer or at-large representative may be initiated by one of two procedures.

A) Upon motion of any voting member of Council, a two-thirds vote of the Council will be required to remove an officer or at large representative at a meeting at least two weeks hence.

B) Upon specific petition of 30 per cent of the student body, a two-thirds vote of the entire student body at least two weeks hence is required.

Outside the ivory tower of Williams

"A meeting of Wesleyan faculty members and professional librarians approved a resolution Tuesday censuring President Colin Campbell and his administration for their handling of the events leading up to the strike by secretarial and clerical workers."

The strike ended September 25, "as the workers voted to accept the administration's latest contract offer. It is the first union contract in the history of Wesleyan. The President called one suggestion "a moratorium on classes 'inconsistent with the traditions of Wesleyan' and 'harmful to the University'. Campbell said he was 'incredulous' that the faculty members were even considering such an action. Such threats, he said, were "undermining the bargaining process."

"The University confined its infirmary facilities to the first floor of Davidson Infirmary this summer, and made room for six students to live upstairs.

The housing office calls it the "Infirmary Penthouse.' "

"On Tuesday, September 26, the College Judicial Board found a student guilty of being verbally abusive to Security officers and acquitted him of physically interfering with a security officer in the performance of his duty."

The student, whose name was given in the article, "was sanctioned and placed on probation for the rest of this semester."

"In a rare instance of severe disciplinary action, a Board of Deans has decided to dismiss three Amherst College students for unauthorized possession, use and duplication of College master keys. In addition, one of the students, no longer on campus, was accused of theft of College master keys and the two others were charged with receipt of stolen keys."

All three students were identified by name in the article.

Three Western New England College students reported citing a UFO over the WNEC football field on the evening of September 19. The "oblong disk-shaped thing with a bright stream of lights around the edge, and a flashing red light on top" reportedly hovered for three minutes before it "wobbled over to the gym."

Officials at the Westover Air Force Base said that there were no planes in the area at the time of the sighting.

Food Service says tough chits

A student monitor will be required at all house parties, Food Service Director Ross Keller announced last week. The student will be in charge of making certain that the premises and equipment of the dining areas are taken care of, Keller explained. All parties in Mission Park, Greylock, and Driscoll will require monitoring.

Originally a Food Service employee, hired by the house hosting the party at $60 per night, was to be required. But upon protest of the Housing Committee, Keller agreed to let a student serve as supervisor. The student will be paid $20 by the house. At the time any given group signs up for a space, Keller said, they need to provide the name of the student who is supervising the party.

Concerned with the number of people eating meals without having paid for them, the Food Service is tightening its rules on ID procedures. Students without IDs at meals are required to sign a blue chit, which may be "redeemed" by showing the found or replaced ID in the Food Service office within 72 hours. Students will be charged for meals if the chits are not redeemed within this period. The charges are $1.00 for breakfast, $2.00 for lunch, and $3.00 for dinner. This policy will go into effect on October 16. Charges for chits signed before this date will not be [illegible].

College bases all financial aid on need that statistics over the years have shown that around fifty per cent of this group decide to attend Williams.

Flynt explained that it is then the job of Phil Wick, a part-time financial aid, part-time admissions officer, to determine the actual amount of dollars for each student.

While it is rare when incoming freshmen needing aid are denied, there are alternative plans. First, according to Flynt, the students are put on a financial aid waiting list. With dropouts at the mid-year releasing their grants, the waiting list students are usually accommodated. These students are also encouraged to apply for a state loan under the auspices of a student aid program.

Opportunities for additional aid increase throughout the four years. While only freshmen applicants are eligible for Tyng scholarships there are numerous Federal, state and private scholarships awarded to upperclassmen.

Every aid student is required to reapply annually, as economic needs often change within the family.

Two million dollars is the 1978-79 financial aid operating budget, with roughly 30 per cent or 580 students of the student body receiving aid.

Aid ranges from a $500 general grant, to a $1150 loan, to the Tyng scholarships. The bulk of the budget, though, lies in the general grant fund ($1.3 million), from which an average grant of $3,000 is awarded to each student.

Flynt noted that his budget now represents 14 per cent of the college's overall operating budget, and has been "inching up" from the 10 per cent figure ten years ago.

"Right now," Flynt said, "we're operating on such a tight budget, we're essentially closed to any new cases this year."

There is no established limit as to where a parent's income would preclude his child's receiving financial aid.

"There is no absolute cut-off," Flynt said, "because there are so many variables involved. But basically what we're looking for is the amount of the parents' contribution. We subtract that, a percentage of the student's savings, and any summer earnings of the student's from what we consider to be a moderate but adequate budget for a student here. Anything left over after the deductions is the actual need."

Mountaineering #5.

REGULATION GARB

You, a faithful follower of this space, have been a mountaineer for some time now. You've studied the fundamentals, selected your gear and experimented with methodology. In short, you are nobody's fool. Nonetheless, you also know a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. So you want to learn more. Smart thinking.

First, you must realize that once the basics of mountaineering are mastered, it is only nuance which distinguishes the true artists from the merely adequate. Therefore, attention to detail, especially in matters of clothing, is vital.

Always protect the head according to seasonal fluctuations. In winter, a warm hat is mandatory. (The head, after all, is the chimney of the body. Avoid cerebral heat loss – it diminishes your psycho-physio abilities.) In summertime, a sun visor or a billed cap will guarantee crucial visibility among the craggy peaks.

Pay particular regard to your footgear. Shoes should be sturdy and stable. A secure footing is of utmost importance. Without it, you're asking for trouble. Point of order: while mountaineering is pursued for fun, it is nevertheless serious business. If you are going to down the mountains, rather than vice versa, you must be confident of your standing.

Between the head and the feet lies the area known to pros as "the body." Mountaineering bodywear is usually based on personal preference. However, keep a keen eye out for one common criterion. Your clothes should be comfortable and flexible, allowing for open movement, specifically in the vicinity of the arms. A free and responsive arm is a mountaineer's best friend.

Certain accessories, of course, complement and complete the regulation garb. Expedition flags to mark your territory in public places, connecting ropes for those who prefer the security of mountaineering in tandem and backpacks filled with beer nuts, mugs, bottle openers and other paraphanalia. Beyond these standards, wardrobe styles range from the rustic to the refined. And well they might, for mountaineers are a rugged and individual lot, joined only by a common taste for excellence.

Don't just reach for a beer. BUSCH® Head for the mountains.

Booters beat two

Williams soccer lifted its record to 4-2 this weekend with a pair of victories over Bates and Bowdoin. Bates fell 3-0; Bowdoin bowed 1-0.

Friday the Ephs traveled to Lewiston, Me. to play the Bobcats. Doug Cobb '79 saw his first start for Williams and was perfect in the nets. The purple booters dominated the action and forced several Bates errors. Frosh Marty White, in the right place at the right time, got his toe on a bouncing ball close in front. The goal put Williams ahead late in the first period.

Co-captain Seth Johnson played an outstanding game at midfield. Early in the second half Johnson forced a shot over Bates keeper Jim Hill just under the bar. Then minutes later he dribbled in and pushed a soft shot into the corner. The two goals iced the victory.

The next day Doug "Lefty" Orr '80 got the nod in the nets and notched his third shut-out in five games. The action was fast-paced and closely played for the full ninety minutes. The defense—seniors Tad Roach, Jas Dembinski, Marcus Smith, and sophomore Brian Daniell—was solid all day shutting down the Polar Bears before they could get untracked. Dembinski, a calm and pervasive force, swept the defensive area clean and kept a lot of pressure off keeper Orr. Lefty played a heads-up game and set up many quick counters with well-played outlet passes. Late in the game, Orr started the play that sent Gregg Hartman away one-on-one to goal. Hartman outran the Bowdoin sweeper to face only the keeper. The dramatic goal was well appreciated by the tiring Eph squad who dreaded the prospect of an overtime. The Ephs hung on to notch their third straight victory.

Williams hosts Tufts this Friday at 4:00.

Hakala runs 5th in NESCAC's

Mary Hakala '79, placed fifth out of sixty runners in the New England Small College Athletic Conference Championships at Hamilton College in Clinton, N.Y., Saturday. She was one of seven members of the Williams Women's Cross-Country Team and one of about 60 other women who competed in the meet. Because of NESCAC rules, team scores were not computed and only individual performances were recognized.

Karen Vonberg of Middlebury, who set a course record of 20:51 won the race. Hakala's time was 22:27. The course was an alleged 3.3 miles.

Also running for Williams were freshman Sue Marchant, 10th, who finished in 23:09, senior Tannis Fox, 14th, in 23:23, freshman Liz Martineau, 17th, in 23:37, senior Corrie Johnson, 19th, in 23:40, and freshmen Stephanie Carperos, 31st, in 24:55, and Brenda Mailman, 37th, in [illegible].

Coach Doug Armstrong felt most members of the team ran excellent races, noting that most had their strongest performances of the season despite the cold rain and slippery, muddy course. The team now gears up for the climax of the season, the New England Championships to be held at Holy Cross College in Worcester, Mass. Sunday.

12 boats to enter Charles

by Nick Lefferts

Twelve boats from the Williams men's and women's crews are entered in Sunday's Head of the Charles Regatta on the Charles River in Cambridge. The Purple oarsmen and women will join nearly 3,200 other competitors racing against the clock in a grueling three mile up-river race.

The prestigious Charles Regatta attracts top level crews and individual athletes from colleges, universities, schools, and clubs from across the United States and Canada. This year the Regatta boasts a fleet of 720 boats. Racing begins at 10:00 a.m. and runs until 4:30 p.m., with 60,000 spectators expected along the banks of the Charles.

To prepare for the Charles the men's crew raced at the Head of the Connecticut Regatta in Middletown, Ct. last Sunday, placing a varsity eight second in the senior eight category. The eight also made a strong showing against several elite-level crews while heavy and lightweight fours placed sixth and eighth respectively. The Williams freshmen made an impressive first showing with the top boat notching a fourth place among junior eights. All the Williams boats finished ahead of boats from rivals Wesleyan and Trinity.

Both men and women will boat eights and fours at the Charles with some oarsmen rowing two races. The Williams Boat Club will also enter five boats in single sculls events as co-captain Peter Wells makes his debut,

Netwomen claim Little 3 title

On Saturday the womens' tennis team met with a rival Amherst team on indoor courts at Williams to determine the Little Three Champion for 1978. For the second straight year in the existence of this title for Womens' tennis, the Williams netwomen, under the coaching of Curt Tong, were the victors through a 7-2 rout. Williams had defeated Wesleyan, the third member of the Little Three, earlier in the season with an 8-1 win. This win followed a 9-0 rout of Middlebury earlier this week.

Although the top two players in the Williams line-up—Beckie Chase and Trudie ten Broeke—lost in straight sets, the remaining singles players and doubles teams limited the Amherst winning streak. Ann Morris, Mary Simpson, Laura Goebel, and Mary Tom Higgs all won their singles matches in two sets. The doubles teams of Amy Demorest-Laura Katz, Melanie Thompson-Ann Johnson, and Kristin Dale-Jamie Harris extended the Williams victories by crushing their opponents in two quick sets. Also adding to the Williams winnings was Tam Turchetta, who triumphed in exhibition singles action.

Wednesday the women overcame Middlebury.

While Beckie Chase and Trudie ten Broeke won in three sets, other singles players—Ann Morris, Mary Simpson, and Laura Goebel—topped their opponents in two quick sets. The final singles victory came from Mary Tom Higgs in a long 7-5, 6-3 match.

With acknowledged strength in their singles line-up, Williams further proved the depth of their doubles teams as all three teams contributed to the victory. Amy Demorest-Laura Katz and Kristin Dale-Jamie Harris won relatively easily. The only tie-breaker of the afternoon was played by the No. 2 doubles team of Melanie Thompson-Ann Johnson, which won the tie-breaker 5-4 to make the match in two sets.

The Ephwomen now have furthered their season's record to 7-2.

Three place in NESCAC top ten

The men's cross country team continued its resurgence Saturday, making a fine showing at the individually scored N.E.S.C.A.C. meet at Hamilton College.

While the N.E.S.C.A.C. does not compete team scores at its meets, Williams' unofficial tally found that its top five individuals ran better than seven other groups of five individuals, including a dogged group form rival Amherst. The five of powerhouse Bates were the only ones to outdo the Ephs, squeezing ahead by only four points and mere seconds in a field of sixty-five men over a five mile course.

As an indication on improved tightness, Williams put three runners in the top ten and five in the top twenty-five. Co-captain Tom Schreck again led the purple, chasing Bates ace Kim Wetloffer to a fine second place finish. Both runners obliterated the old course record. Also with a hot race for the Ephs was Mike Behrman '80, who was right on the heels of another Bates runner in fourth place. Happily for the squad, Phil Darrow '81 finally "busted one," or ran much nearer his potential, by finishing tenth. Less than ten seconds behind him, Co-captain Steve Polasky '79 cruised into thirteenth, while Garrick Leonard '80 and Pat Dobson '81 finished twenty-fifth and forty-third, respectively. Both these latter two were disappointed with their efforts, yet the place numbers mean little in terms of time. The Ephs as a whole team are running much closer together.

On Wednesday, the harriers will face a tough test of their renewed strength as they host Worcester Polytechnic and Coast Guard at 4 p.m., starting in the Science Quad.

by capital gifts from alumni and friends of the crew. Last year a record $9000 was contained from this source. The College Council is asked each year to allocate $4000 in Student Activities Tax funds to crew. This stipend could be terminated if the College changed crew's status in favor of full-funding.

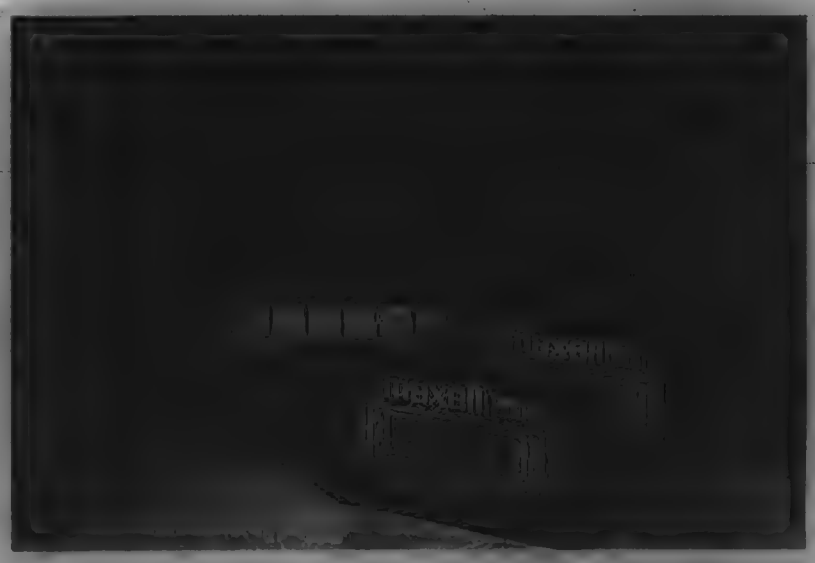
Crew this year is one of the most popular athletic activities on campus, which partially explains the size of its budget. During the fall 72 people will have competed in inter-collegiate crew races. The varsity and junior varsity football teams have a combined roster of 80 players, while 61 people play on the varsity and freshman soccer teams.

Marcus sympathizes with some of the College's reservations regarding his proposal. "Some of their concerns are legitimate," he stated. Although the women's crew got $9000 in donations last year, it had previously averaged $2000 to $3000 in annual giving. "If I were the College," Marcus said, "I would want to see evidence that this high level of gift giving will continue and that the $9000 was not just a flash in the pan."

Rugby drops match

Women's Rugby dropped its match against Yale on Sunday. Yale scored one try followed by a conversion kick in the first half.

For the remainder of the game, the women ruggers held their own on defense, even when Yale was six inches from the end zone, and also penetrated deep into Yale territory.



Sunday marked an upswing for this season's club as the ruggers game fell more into place with the finest scrum work and overall team play of this fall. Senior co-captains Ann McCabe and Cindy Tufts felt the club finally "clicked" and tapped some of its [illegible].

Because the Club is self-coaching, a period of adjustment follows the beginning of each season as players learn to overcome a reluctance to tackle and to utilize various plays.

How would Freud relate to O'Keefe?

Cold. Yet warming.
Hearty, full-bodied flavor. Yet smooth and easy going down.
And, O'Keefe develops a big head on contact.
Conflict. Conflict. Trauma. Trauma. Freud's diagnosis?

Polar Bears deep-freeze Eph gridders 14-13

by Mary Kate Shea

The old sports adage "Rain is the great equalizer," proved true Saturday afternoon at Bowdoin College's Whittier Field as the Williams College football team suffered its first loss of the season, 14-13, to a 1-2 Bowdoin squad.

Before the Polar Bears' upset win, Williams had been ranked eighth in the nation by the NCAA among Division III schools and second in the Lambert Cup poll of "rankings for outstanding performances by eastern small college teams."

The Williams team, which had averaged over 340 yards per game in total offense and had scored almost 34 points per game in its first three outings this season, could not get its attack going either on the ground or in the air against the Polar Bears. Bowdoin's defense held the Ephs to just 121 yards rushing and 187 yards in total offense.

Early in the game Williams had good field position when sophomore Scott Kapnick recovered a Bowdoin player's fumble of a 39-yard punt by junior Rick Walter on the Bowdoin 25-yard line. The Ephs could only manage three yards in three plays, and co-captain Ken Hollingsworth's 40-yard field goal attempt fell short.

A good pass rush by the Williams defensive line led to an interception by middle guard Don Rios at the Bowdoin 25-yard line. The Ephs were able this time to capitalize on the interception as sophomore quarterback Bob Stackpole found Hollingsworth open in the end zone on a 22-yard touchdown pass. Hollingsworth's successful extra point kick gave Williams a 7-0 lead three minutes into the second quarter.

The Ephs' lead was short-lived, however. The Polar Bears ran 10 straight running plays starting at thier own 34-yard line, and finally scored on a one-yard plunge up the middle by Sciolla.

Bowdoin took advantage of a mishandled kickoff return, pouncing on the Williams fumble on the Ephs' seven-yard line. The Polar Bears scored just two plays later when Spinner ran five yards around the left end for the touchdown. Alfie Himmelrich's second good extra point kick of the game gave the home team a 14-7 halftime lead.

Eph co-captain Greg McAleenan's 27-yard return of the second half's opening kickoff started the momentum for a 64-yard scoring drive on the first series of the second half. Halfbacks Dave Massucco and Greg Collins kept the drive alive with first down efforts in the series. With 11:03 remaining in the third quarter, Williams scored the final points of the afternoon for either team on a 24-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Tim Connelly to Hollingsworth.

It was a pressure situation on both ends of the play as the Bowdoin line pressured Connelly as he looked for his receiver, and Hollingsworth fought off several Bowdoin defenders to make the catch. The Ephs were unable to convert the extra point attempt. There was confusion on the snap and holder Kevin Hinchey's attempt to pass the ball for a two-point conversion failed.

The Ephs had several chances in the fourth quarter to initiate scoring drives, but they could not take advantage of the Polar Bears' mistakes. A 15-yard clipping penalty on Bowdoin on a Williams fourth down situation gave the Ephs the ball first-and-ten at the Bowdoin 30-yard line. Once again the Williams offense was stopped up by the Polar Bears and Bowdoin took possession of the ball.

With under nine minutes left in the game, linebacker John Thiel picked off a pass by Bowdoin quarterback Rip Kinkel. Three plays later, the Ephs gave up the ball when fullback Bill Novicki fumbled and Bowdoin's Andy Minich made the recovery.

Following the fumble, the Williams defense held the Polar Bears and the Ephs had what turned out to be their last shot at mounting a scoring drive. Williams' hopes were dashed when Collins fumbled a pitch from Connelly and Bowdoin recovered the ball with just 2:30 remaining in the game. The Polar Bears ran several plays to use up the clock, then let time run out.

Leslie Milne has a word with the referee during the field hockey team's game over the weekend.

Director considers crew status

"Last spring when the College wanted to upgrade more women's teams," Women's Crew coach Professor George Marcus told the Record last week, "we applied for varsity status for the women with the provision that major capital costs would still be borne by the club."

In the recommendation he submitted to Director of Athletics Robert Peck, Marcus estimated that his team would cost the College an additional $5000 each year, exclusive of coaching salaries. Last May the Physical Education department rejected that proposal.

Marcus felt strongly that the performance of the women's crew in recent years merited recognition from the Athletic Department. Last spring, for instance, a lightweight women's eight from Williams qualified for the final round of eliminations at the U.S. Rowing Nationals. In addition, one-quarter of the U.S. Women's Rowing Team is from Williams.

"No one ever told the crew that they would be made varsity if certain criteria were met," Peck said. "We never said we would change their status if they improved, for example."

Peck, in fact, applauded the work of John Peinert, the men's varsity coach, saying, "his financial responsibility has been outstanding. The whole fiscal arrangement is in very good order." By implication, it is clear then that varsity status is not being dangled in front of the crew as incentive for better performance financially and competitively.

Since their inception in the mid-1960's, both the women's and men's crews have operated as club sports. For this reason participants in the sport traditionally have had to bear costs, such as dues and travel expenses, which athletes at the varsity level are not required to pay.

Over the last six years the College's financial stance towards crew has changed, primarily at the bequest of the crew coaches and Peck. The College presently provides the Williams College Boat Club with a subsidy of $800 as well as funds sufficient for the salaries of two coaches and the maintenance of the crew boathouse. Also, in the past the College has transferred funds to the Boat Club—at favorable terms—for the purchase of vehicles.

President Chandler, Provost Grabois, and Peck worked together to formulate a response to Marcus's request. They were primarily concerned with "crew's potential for enormous expense," Peck said. He estimated that "crew would be the second most expensive sport on campus if it were done with capital expenses included."

Marcus admits that crew requires a large flow of funds, yet he believes its budget would compare favorably with those of major varsity sports, especially with its large income from donations. His requests that the College supply him with information on the size of the budgets of varsity sports have been denied. "I cannot accept the argument that crew is too expensive unless someone shows it is higher or lower in budget than others. We are probably in the middle on a per capita basis."

The Athletic Department was also wary of Marcus's proposal because it asked the College to deal differently with each of the two crews, although he offered assurance that "a positive response would not require a similar decision for the men's crew." In Peck's mind, "It would be foolish to deal with one crew one way and think we would not have to deal with the other in the same manner."

The total budget for both the men's and women's crews for this year will be approximately $35,000. Marcus calculates that one-third of the total crew tab is already picked up by the College, a large proportion of which goes for coaches' salaries. Another third of this sum is covered each year

Volleyball

Potsdam University, Plattsburg State and SUNY-Albany were the Women's Volleyball squad's latest victims as Williams extended its record to 14-1 in a quad meet Saturday.

Sophomore Rachel Aliber inspired the Ephwomen with her spiking finesse in the first match against Pottsdam. Williams quickly disposed of its previously undefeated opponents, 15-7, 15-11. Setter Karen Mitchell and spiker Sue Laidlaw, who recently recovered from an early season injury sparked the Ephs to their next two wins against Plattsburg, 15-7, 15-13, and Albany, 15-2, 13-15, 15-10.

Coach of the team Sue Hudson-Hamblin was impressed by the performance, claiming that the Ephwomen get "better and better each game." She sees no reason why Williams shouldn't finish its eight remaining games without another loss.

Last Thursday Williams beat Union and North Adams handily in its last home matches of the season. The team next faces U.N.H. and Springfield in Springfield Wednesday afternoon.

Golf

by Dan Katz

In bone-chilling cold, teeth-chattering wind, and monsoon rain conditions, the relentless Williams Golf Team slogged to its sixth and seventh victories without a defeat.

This week's victims were North Adams State and Springfield College, two teams expected to give the Eph linksters some trouble. The final score was Williams 412, Springfield 430, and North Adams State 443.

After plunging from lofty heights at Middlebury to the abyss of ineptitude against Union, Greg Jacobson once again displayed his remarkable resiliency as he copped medalist honors with an 80.

Close behind Jacobson were the junior tandem of Ed "Big" Bousa and Chris Holm with 81's.

In fourth and fifth positions were junior Marcel Oudin and senior co-captain Dan Katz, respectively. Oudin's 84 was basically characterized by impressive shot-making, but trouble with the sand traps on the third hole caused a quadruple-bogey eight. Finally, the troubled Katz continues to have problems as he fired a lackluster 86.

With their season record at 7-0, the Eph golfers look forward with confident anticipation to the final match of the season with the proud Bulldogs from Yale University.

Ultimate Frisbee

Last weekend in Hanover, N.H., the Williams Ultimate Frisbee Organization was handed its season's first defeat in a close 24-20 match with Dartmouth, bringing its season's tally to 3-1.

Playing under the driving rain and on an irregular field, Dartmouth raced to a 12-4 lead early in the first half before WUFO settled down and started to work its short game. Yet the quick Dartmouth defense continued to shut off WUFO's offense, and the half-time score read 15-8.

In the second half, a fired-up WUFO squad scored five unanswered points, before a strategic Dartmouth time-out broke the momentum. From that point on it was a close defensive battle, but WUFO never came any closer than within two points of tying the game.

Field Hockey

The Williams varsity field hockey team notched their third and fourth wins of the season this week, defeating Little Three rival Amherst College and Middlebury.

Saturday the Ephs overpowered Amherst 3-1 here on Cole Field. The Williams forward line combined for 26 shots on the Amherst net, while Amherst countered with only seven shots.

Sophomore forward Sarah Foster, the Ephwomen's leading scorer this season, was responsible for both of the first period goals, and senior Sally Kraft provided both assists. Early in the second half, senior captain Leslie Milne scored on a penalty stroke and made the score 3-0 Williams. With only five minutes remaining in the game, Amherst put a shot past Williams goalie Blythe Miller. The tally was Amherst's second goal of the season. Fine play was credited to Sarah Foster, Nancy Nichols, and Eph defensewomen Leslie Milne and Ann Ricketson.

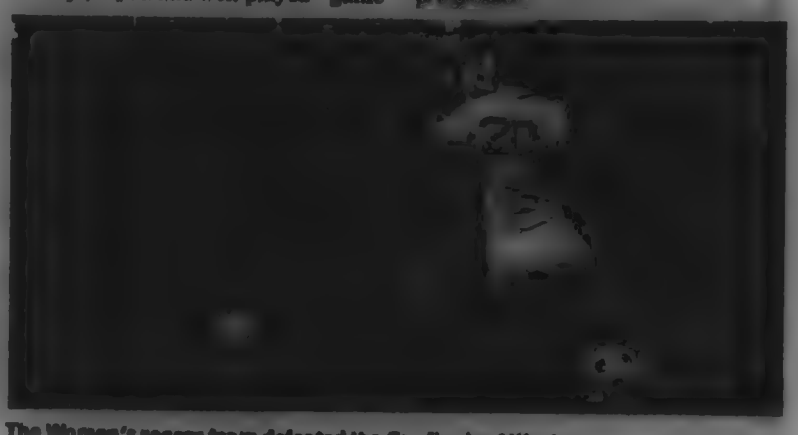
Poloers make N. E. tourney

by Bob Kraus

The Water Polo Club travelled to Boston last weekend for three games, and came away with a win and two losses. After losing on Friday to a tough squad from Boston College by a score of 13-6, the Ephs awoke on Saturday morning bright-eyed and ready for the team from the University of New Hampshire. Brian McDermott led the assault with five goals, as Williams pulled out a convincing 9-4 victory. Gordon Cliff had two goals, while single tallies were recorded by Bob Kraus and John Trapp. The win raised Williams' league record to 3-1, placing them second to B.C. in their division, and qualifying them for a berth in the New England Championship tournament.

Immediately following the UNH victory, the team travelled across town to Boston University, for a non-league game. Although total exhaustion took its toll on most of the poloers, Williams stayed with the B.U. squad for the entire game, and came out on the short end of a 9-6 score. Gordon Cliff led the offense with three goals, and Brian McDermott, Jerry Treiman, and Bob Kraus each contributed one score.

The team's overall record now stands at 3-5. A game against RPI is set for October 27, and the New Englands will be held at Southern Connecticut State College on Nov. 3-4. The final game of the season will be at Amherst, where the Ephs hope to spoil the Lord Jeff's homecoming.



Women kickers down Cards

After defeating Wesleyan 2-0 women's soccer lost to a talented Castleton State College squad Friday, 3-1. The match was played on Castleton's field outside Rutland, Vt.

Castleton was a closely fought game; the score was 0-0 at the end of the first half. Early into the second period, sophomore Nancy Osborne a left wing, scored William's only goal. But Castleton, despite the good efforts of Williams goalie Murph Nealy, was able to score three times in the last forty minutes.

Tuesday the squad fought what Coach Judy Zimicki called "an evenly-played and well-played" game to defeat the Cardinals 2-1.

Wesleyan scored first, in the first half. Then with about ten minutes remaining, left halfback Sara Reynolds '79, capitalized on a penalty kick situation to provide Williams with their first goal. In the second half, sophomore Julie Ernst, playing right wing on the forward line, scored Williams' second goal. She was assisted by a pass from freshman Millie Chapell. Zimicki noted that the game was marked with good passing by both teams, and that the quality of the competition improved as the game progressed.

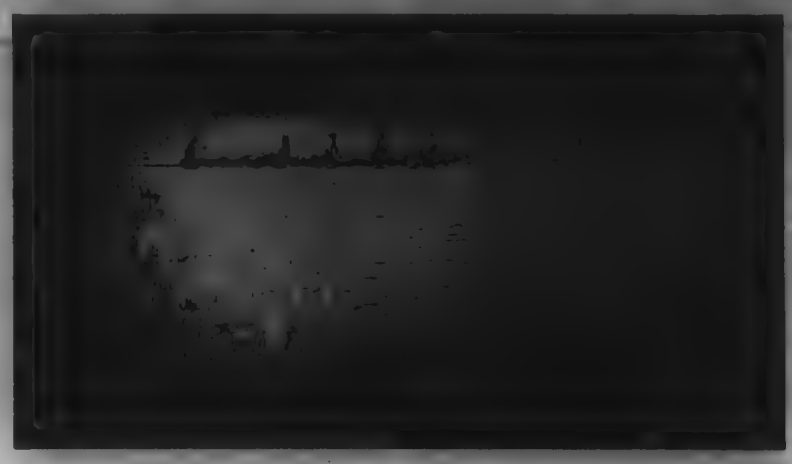
Chandler appoints new Action officer

President of the College John W. Chandler announced the appointment of Judith Allen to the new position of Assistant to the President for Affirmative Action and Government Relations at a meeting of the faculty a week ago last Wednesday.

Ms. Allen, who is currently the Director of Admissions and Financial Aid at Regis College in Weston, Mass., will arrive at Williams to begin her duties on or about January 1. She has been "exceedingly successful in gaining money for students on financial aid at Regis," according to Chandler.

In addition to her experience in admissions and financial offices aid, at Regis and Boston University, Allen has served as Vice Chairman of the Committee on Need Assessment Procedures, College Scholarship Service, as a consultant to the National Consulting Network for Liberal Arts Colleges, and as Chairman of the Scholarship Advisory Committee, Board of Education.



Provost Neil Grabois revealed that the College's overall budget for the 1977-78 academic year ran above $18 million and that projections for 1978-79 approach $19.5 million. Last year, he reported, $13.5 million was channeled purely into educational demands, including faculty compensation. The surplus was $39,600 or .2 per cent of the total budget, one which Grabois commented on as being "a little too close for comfort."

Head of the Committee on Education Policy William Moomaw announced that committee's intent to investigate the root of the College's continuing GPA increases. "Is it better performance on the part of the students?" he asked. "Is the faculty failing to make fine discernments within the 12-point grading system? Or is it actually inflation?" He posited that all three caused the uncurtailed rise of the average GPA at Williams.

Moomaw added that, along with the Committee on Academic Standing, the CEP will make a study of the misuse of the GPA. The CEP will also deal with recommendations concerning Winter Study, a reevaluation of the Contract Major and, by request of the Honor and Discipline Committee, the regulations concerning closed book, take-home and self-scheduled exams.

Professor Grant reported on the progress of the Winter Study Review Committee. He stated that, according to a questionnaire given the freshman class of 1982, 39 per cent of those responding felt that Williams' 4-14 curriculum was a factor in their matriculation at Williams. The WSP ranked seventh in factors considered to be an important influence on those who come here. "We have nothing to gain if the program is abolished," Grant commented.

Grant invited the faculty's specific suggestions for the future of Winter Study now that the Review Committee has discussed the ramifications of general policy changes.

$1 mil. for new professorship

The College's 40th named professorship has been endowed by a one million dollar bequest from Webster Atwell '21, a Dallas attorney, who died last June at the age of 77. The bequest represents the largest gift for this purpose in the College's history.

The flexible terms of his will allow the "Webster Atwell Class of 1921" professorship to be awarded to a faculty member in any of the departments. Named professorships are usually confined to a particular academic area.

"Webster Atwell often expressed his belief that outstanding teachers are the chief source of a college's excellence," said President John W. Chandler. "By establishing the most substantially endowed professorship in Williams' history has helped to insure the continuing strength and distinction of the Williams faculty and has earned the lasting gratitude of all members of the Williams community."

The million-dollar endowment is almost $250,000 more than the largest similar gift to the College.

Active in alumni affairs, Atwell served as a member of the executive committee of the Williams Society of Alumni from 1950-55, and as chairman of the College's Alumni Fund in 1953 and 1954.

Atwell attended Harvard Law school after graduating from the College. He served for one year as assistant U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Texas and then entered private practice in his native city, Dallas. He was a member of the International, American, Texas, and Dallas Bar Associations.

Council rejects slate of students for committee on shareholding

The College Council returned to the Elections Committee Wednesday night a recommendation of four student names for the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility.

The four names, proposed as a recommendation to be submitted to President Chandler, were viewed by many Council members as unrepresentative of the student body as a whole. The students who were initially proposed were Elizabeth Harper '79, Bernard lane '80, David Bennett '79 and James Levinsohn '80. President Chandler will consider the recommended four names, when approved by Council, in his appointment of two students to the Shareholder Committee.

Chris Jenkins, chairman of the Elections Committee, explained that related experience coupled with original proposals and ideas, not political views, were the criteria the Committee used to select the four students. Council member Steve MaGee pointed out that since the two students will be looked on as student representatives, their political beliefs should reflect the majority of student opinion. He criticized the Elections Committee for recommending neither a black student nor a member of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC). Both race and membership in the WAAC should be factors in the Committee's selection, he said.

The lack of a WAAC member in the recommended list is "statistically bogus," said Stu Massad, pointing out that one-third of the applicants were members of the group.

Council president Bronson Fargo reminded the Council that the Elections Committee had asked for student and Council input into the decision several times, yet only a few students offered an opinion. Since it is impossible for all representatives to see all of the applications, Chris Jenkins agreed, it is up to Council members to express their opinions individually to members of the Elections Committee.

A forty minute debate took place on the question of what criteria should be used to select the recommended students. Ted Tucci argued that the students selected should be the most sincere and committed ones, regardless of their political persuasion.

Dave Schwartz, however, said that since the nature of the Committee is "intrinsically political," politics can't be ignored as a factor in choosing students. Chris Jenkins contended that since there is no clear cut statement on student opinion concerning divestiture this year choosing students based on the degree to which their views represent the student body would be impossible. The Council finally voted to send the proposal back to the Elections

Town asks continued effort at Log

The Williamstown Board of Selectmen asked the College to continue its effort to reduce noise on Spring Street after hearing statements by several College representatives at a meeting last week.

The selectmen did not take any specific action at last week's meeting, although some members of the board commented that if complaints of noise due to the Log continued, they would have to be raise the issue again.

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor and a few College officials and students attended the meeting as a result of debate at the previous selectmen's meeting. At the earlier meeting, the board discussed reducing the Log's hours or moving it to a different location.

O'Connor told the board that the College had closed the Log earlier on weeknights, increased security patrols at the Log at closing time in order to reduce noise, and was prepared to share the cost of an extra town police officer to patrol Spring Street. He and Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad added that moving the Log would be impractical.

Assistant Director of Security Willard Busl explained the increased security procedures, and said he felt students were generally quiet and well-behaved coming to and from the Log. Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zoito disputed this, claiming that his personal observations on October 14 revealed many instances of disturbing noise due to students. He added, however, that on other nights students on Spring Street were quiet.

Zoito also accused Log manager Mike Masi '78 and the College of misunderstanding the meaning of "closing hours." The Log remains open after closing time, permitting students to remain in the building, but does not serve anything after that time. Zoito argued that the building should empty at closing time. Masi said that he felt keeping the building open after the bar closed reduced noise by encouraging students to leave at staggered times rather than all at once.

Dave MacGregor '79 described to the selectmen a Record survey of Spring Street residents indicating that only two out of twelve residents polled felt that the Log was a major noise problem.

The selectmen commended the College's co-operation in dealing with the noise problem, and expressed hope that the current system of earlier closing hours on weeknights and increased security patrols would be successful. They did not set any concrete deadlines or standards for the College to meet, but instead asked the College to continue its current effort. Two of the five selectmen warned, however, that if complaints continued, still earlier closing hours might be necessary.

Kane discusses prison life in U.S.A.

by Stu Massad

The starkness of the New York City prison system broke the Berkshire calm a week ago Wednesday when Fr. Joe Kane, assistant chaplain at the Riker's Island Prison, discussed problems in American prisons.

Fr. Kane, who has worked in prisons in Maryland, Puerto Rico, and New York since 1965, attacked the American penal system for intensifying inmates' psychological problems. "Prisons don't work," he said. "In New York State there are about 22,000 people in jail. You can't confine them forever—they're going to come out sometime, and they're time bombs."

"I don't meet bad people in prisons," the chaplain said. When you get to know these people, they're just like you and me. They have needs like you and me, and these aren't being met." Fr. Kane attributed the 70 per cent recidivism at Riker's Island to psychological troubles born of poverty which are intensified in prisons.

Fr. Kane said he advocated the abolition of the present American prison system. "Abolish prisons," he said, "yet continue the confinement of your dangerous people in something more like a hospital atmosphere." He urged a move from large prisons to small centers with an emphasis on counseling.

"If you're going to confine people," Fr. Kane said, "you must do it with love. Because if you don't, you stand to destroy them and yourself even more."

The chaplain acknowledged problems with this alternative. "The problems with our prisons aren't going to be solved in the prisons, because they're caused in the streets," he said. He claimed that the state of the present prison system is the product of a conscious choice by the taxpayer: "We're getting what we want and what we pay for.

Some listeners found Fr. Kane's talk depressing. "You can't deal with the deadlines of a prison," he said. "The major activities in prison are

Congress defeats Tax Credit

During the 95th Congress' last minute crush of pre-adjournment bill passing, one of the bills that got crushed was the controversial tuition tax credit proposal that would have provided tax credits of up to $250 to parents with children in college.

Congress, eager to provide some sort of relief to middle class families faced with high tuition bills, approved instead a proposal that raises the eligible family income limit for federal student aid from $15,000 to $26,000. This proposal is more in keeping with the wishes of President Carter, who had said he would veto any tax bill including the tuition tax credit.

The tax credit bill suffered a fatal blow just over two weeks ago when the House unexpectedly rejected a House-Senate conference committee version of the proposal. Before the bill went to the conference committee, the House had passed a version calling for the extension of credits to families paying tuition for children in college,

Transcript deals band its first loss in 15 years

Excerpts from The Transcript, Oct. 9, 1978.

No marching band can be effective at halftime if the home team is losing.

And effective the Williams College marching band was.

Could the band play?

The Williams College Band?

At a football game, Williams College ahead of the hated rivals, the fans primed on tailgate beer and the alumnae chomping cigars and waving banners?

Of course not. The purpose of a marching band is not to seduce its audience with musical perfection. It is not even to be musically competent.

In the tradition of the best Ivy League bands, the purpose of that ragged collection of musicians is to entertain, to amuse, to bumble and appear ridiculous.

Like the Harvard band, whose members are chosen solely for their skills in consuming distilled spirits, whose blatant halftime sexual innuendo and irresponsible political polemics have been known to cause riots in Harvard Square, the Williams marching band was offensive, intrusive, and most importantly, insulting.

The halftime show consisted of three skits which ridiculed the three largest groups of the college kids: Pre-med, pre-law and library haunting students.

Nearly every student was insulted. Nearly every student loved it.

The band also made some noise.

It was unreliably reported that some of the band members had played an instrument before Saturday's [illegible]

Band rallies back

To the editor of the Transcript:

Please find enclosed one Q-Tip which we ask you to present to your staff writer G. Wayne Miller to use before covering another Williams College half-time show.

Upon reading his article in the Oct. 9 Transcript, it becomes obvious that his ears need cleaning. "Could the band play? The Williams College Band?" Had Mr. Miller spent less time dodging our maneuvers and more time listening, he would have heard our thundering renditions of songs such as "Hawaii 5-0" and "Make Me Smile." These were performed with a musical virtuosity which even someone with an average ear for music would have appreciated. Unfortunately, The Transcript sent a reporter who seems completely tone-deaf to cover a musical event.

Seriously, the Williams College Band, under the direction of Francis C. Cardillo, is composed of musicians who are more than "offensive, intrusive . . . and insulting." Mr. Cardillo, who was a music minor, studied at Tanglewood in 1959 and 1960 with Seiji Ozawas, and has played principal clarinet for the Berkshire Symphony, the Albany Symphony, the Vermont Symphony, and the Lake George Opera Festival, directs some of the Berkshires' finest musicians. To list individual marching band members' musical awards and accomplishments would take too much space here. Suffice it to say, many of our members play with the Berkshire Symphony, various chamber groups and other fine musical ensembles.n Unlike the Harvard Band, the Williams College Marching Band prides itself on being not only amusing, bumbling, and entertaining, but also quite musically competent.

Perhaps if Mr. Miller would take his fingers out of his ears, he wouldn't put his foot in his mouth.

To the Editor:

Please find enclosed one American Heritage Dictionary definition of the word, "humor," which I ask you to present to Williams College Band members Doug Gernert and Steve Schow before writing another letter to The Transcript.

Upon reading their letter to the Oct. 18 Transcript, it becomes obvious that their skills in the English language need refining. "Can the band members read? Can they write letters? The Williams College Band?" Had Mr. Gernert and Mr. Schow spent less time dodging my pen and more time polishing their reading and writing skills, they would have writen a letter that hinted of an understanding of that peculiar style of writing known as humorous prose. My article was written with a shameless love of humor which even someone with an average eye for comprehending the written word would have appreciated.

Unfortunately, the band chose two massive authors who seem completely blind to appreciating a humorous article.

Seriously, I understand that the Williams College Band is composed of fine musicians. While I would hesitate to say that any rendition, "thundering" or otherwise, of "Hawaii 5-O" constitutes "musical virtuosity," even my currently Q-tip clean ears appreciated their musical ability. I am also aware of the distinguished musical accomplishments of Francis C. Cardillo, band director. As an alumnus of Harvard, I can also add that the musical achievements of many of its band's members would also "take too much space" to list here. Humorous writing, however, has no collegiate pride.

Perhaps if Messrs. Gernert and Schow would apply themselves more industriously to what I fervently hope is their native language, they would understand that "tongue in cheek" is far removed from "foot in mouth."

Will Chapin III open?

To the editor:

Last week I discovered that the music department, whose wisdom I have never had occasion to doubt, has adopted now, shortened hours for the Chapin practice rooms. This is not isolated, but suggests to me a trend:

1) Currier is an old building. Its practise rooms were open about fifteen hours a day.

2) Chapin II cost more than a hundred thousand dollars. It is currently closed about 17 hours a day.

3) Chapin III is budgeted at $2,200,000. Will it be open at all?

We apparently needed these facilities at a cost of over two million dollars. However, we need them open.

Other towers:

The Afro-American Society, Straight Ahead and La Causa have drafted a letter to the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) asking that WAMH be temporarily taken off the air. The group claims that program scheduling at WAMH does not fulfill the FCC's charter which requires educational FM stations to take community interests into account. Rob Ellis, Chairman of Straight Ahead, charged that WAMH's 'rule of continuity' directly contradicts Black and Third World community interests.

The conflict between these three Amherst minority groups and WAMH stems from the fact that the station's programming policy, in the interest of continuity, calls for Rock music Monday through Friday, with Sold and Rhythm and Blues on the weekends.

The three groups want a Minority Representative to WAMH's Executive Board to be elected by the Third World community. This representative would have final authority over all Third World programming, including the selection of on-air DJ's and all behind the scenes work: choosing Public Service Announcements and controlling Third World music.

Ellis claims that the program schedule at WAMH is 'definitely discrimination of a cultural variety which becomes racial in effect.' 'When you get right down to it,' Ellis continues, 'they're trying to relegate (our music) to a different time slot so they will not have to listen to it.'

If the radio station does not acquiesce, the groups intend first to mail the letter to the FCC, and, as a last resort, to demonstrate and take over the Radio station.

"The College radio station, WCHC, will "downplay" Billy Joel's hit single "Only the Good Die Young" because it may be considered offensive to Catholics, according to Tom Shugrue '79, station manager. The action came as a response to a letter from the Diocese of Worcester's Office of Communication.

"The Rev. John W. Barrett of the Office of Communication said in the letter to the station, 'Ridiculing Catholic beliefs and the practice of virtue as taught by the Lord Jesus Christ is not only offensive but insulting to all Catholics who are members of your listening audience and indeed to all people good will.'

Council reconsiders shareholder reps

Committee for a week of input and re-examination.

The Shareholder Committee is to be comprised of two students, two faculty members, two administrators, and two alumni. All but the student members have been chosen. Professors Stephen Lewis and Charles Payne will represent the faculty on the Committee, Francis Dewey and Neil Grabois the administration, and John Story '65 and Judge Charles Alberti '50 the alumni.

The Elections Committee recommendations for members to the Housing Committee were passed with no discussion. Paul Gallay and Gayane Zartarian, exchange and transfer students, were chosen as the two new members of the Housing Committee. The new at large member of Council will be elected on November 10, when the constitutional referendum concerning direct election of Council secretary and treasurer will also be voted upon. The election was moved from November 3 so freshmen would be able to run for the at large spot. The deadline for applications is 4 P.M., November 6, in the Dean's office.

The Constitutional Committee, a Council committee being formed to study and revise the Council's constitution, should be comprised of five members and one voluntary faculty advisor, the Council decided.

Finance Committee chairman John Simpson announced more tentative Student Activity Tax allocations. They include: $100 for the Student Support Group, $385 for Williams Ultimate Frisbee, $800 for the Newman Association, $1000 for the Jewish Association, $1200 for the Gay Peoples' Union, $600 for the Pottery Club, and $12,309 for the Record.

secondary and elementary schools.

Senate conferees, questioning the constitutionality of extending federal aid support families sending children to parochial schools, insisted that credits be allowed only for parents with children in college. This is the version which the conference committee passed and which the House subsequently rejected.

As a last ditch effort to hammer out a compromise, the conferees met again after the House vote and agreed to extend credits for secondary school students, but not elementary school students, but the proposal was not acceptable to the Senate.

Another attempt to salvage the tax credit by attaching it to the larger tax cut bill simultaneously being worked out by House-Senate conferees, also failed and the proposal died quietly during the Congress' rush to adjourn.

Kane explains life in prison feeding and medication . . . They fatten them up and let them go."

Fr. Kane also proposed the establishment of halfway houses for convicts. "Get them isolated from the streets," he said. "Get them some skills and help build a self-image. Then get them home."

The Jesuit advocated "street-corner counseling" for ex-convicts in the ghettos—only 10 per cent of the 8,000 inmates at Riker's Island are white, the rest black or Hispanic. He admitted that this would require "tremendous effort—more than you can be paid for," and that it is impossible under the present system.

Prison guards today work for money, not from altruism, the priest said. "Guards are average people doing a thankless job, so they don't care," he noted. He added that guards as well as prisoners are trapped in the system.

Fr. Kane remarked that job training is not the immediate answer for inmates' problems. "In the short haul getting jobs isn't their main problem." Many inmates can get jobs, he said, but they have problems keeping jobs because of psychological problems and alcoholism.

Jukes storm Towne but ACEC loses $5,000

by Andy Clark

Southside Johnny and the Asbury Jukes lived up to their reputation as one of the most exciting party bands in the East and Williams College lived up to its reputation as a serious academic institution Thursday night, as Sawyer Library easily outdrew Towne Fieldhouse in attendance and the ACEC suffered a financial drubbing of impressive magnitude.

Sprawled on a foam rubber cushion between sets, a distraught Steve Case (ACEC Co-Chairman) estimated that total losses would probably approach five thousand dollars or more, necessitating the cancellation of Homecoming concert plans.

If it's any consolation, however, the four hundred or so brave souls who were not deterred by rainy weather, the lure of geekdom, or the Outlaws concert in neighboring North Adams witnessed the best rock and roll Williams has seen in two years. The Jukes came out storming and never let up, unleashing an energetic 1½ hour set of infectious rock-r&b that had the small but enthusiastic crowd on their feet throughout.

As with fellow Asbury Parkers Bruce Springsteen and his E Street Band, the Jukes, in concert, emphasize fun—both for the audience and the band. On stage, they were loose and playful (though rarely sloppy) with Southside Johnny (alias Johnny Lyon)—attired in tight blue jeans, dark shades, and letter jacket—looking every bit the part of the rowdy high school troublemaker as he roamed around the stage jousting with members of his band.

Musically, the Asbury Jukes are a tight and talented ensemble, and, though Thursday's show was the first of their new tour (following the release of their third lp, Hearts of Stone, only a week earlier), they evidenced little in the way of opening night difficulties. Paced by a punchy rhythm section anchored by the Miami Horns, and featuring the snappy guitar work of Willie Rush and Southside's convincing vocals out front, the Jukes roared through 16 numbers—old and new—including a delirious encore rendition of the r&b classic, "Stagger Lee" which closed the show.

Five songs debuted from the new album—their most consistent and rock-oriented to date—were very well received, with the catchy "Trapped Again" and "Got to Find a Better Way Home" particularly standing out. The biggest crowd pleasers, however, were the popular Juke standards like the opener, "This Time It's For Real," "Fanny Mae" (complete with two false endings), "I Don't Want to Go Home," and a bluesy, slightly down-tempo version of Springsteen's powerhouse, "The Fever."

Carillo opened the show with a competent fifty minute set of mainstream rock, but was unable to generate any real excitement.

The ACEC clearly took a chance—apparently hoping that the attraction of a class act like Southside Johnny, along with the pre-break partying urge, would allay any risks that the scheduling might have incurred. Obviously, they guessed wrong—but what this means, and how it will affect the future of rock concerts at Williams remains to be seen.

Indian Music

In conjunction with its major fall exhibition entitled "The Grand Mogul: Imperial Painting in India 1600-1660," the Clark Art Institute will present a concert of South Indian music in a gallery next to the installation of Indian paintings this Sunday, October 29, at 8:30 p.m. Co-sponsored by the Williams College Music Department and the Institute, the recital will be free and open to the public.

Netwomen trim Smith

The Williams Netwomen met with Smith's tennis team on cold and windy Williams home courts Tuesday to test the Ephwomen's ability to extend their present winning streak to five games. Williams succeeded as the team slipped by Smith in a close 5-4 match.

Wins for Williams came from five of the six singles players—Beckie Chase, Ann Morris, Mary Simpson, Laura Goebel, and Mary Tom Higgs. The weakness of the team seemed to be in the performances of its doubles teams, all three of which lost. Two of the doubles matches stretched to three sets, but no Eph effort was sufficient to master the Smith opponents on the doubles courts.

Williams now holds a '78 record of 8-2, as well as the Little Three title, which was recently acquired when the Ephwomen toppled Amherst 7-2. On Thursday the women will travel to Skidmore for the last team match before the New England Womens' Collegiate tournament this weekend.

Booters boost record

Williams boosted its record to 5-2-1 this week bearing the Tufts Jumbos 3-1 last Friday and tying the Harvard Crimson 2-2 Tuesday. The booters remain unbeaten in their last 5 outings.

The Ephs looked flat early against Harvard and the slow start cost the victory. The Crimson scored twice in the opening minutes, but were only sporadically effective for the rest of the game. Williams took charge down 2-0 and quickly got one back when Stuart Taylor set up Gregg Hartman for a blast that left the keeper clutching at air. The Ephs created several more opportunities but failed to capitalize before the half.

The equalizer came with only ten minutes to play. Williams' forwards frustrated most of the afternoon finally got a break. Co-captain Perry Nelson sent a low cross into a crowded goal-mouth where the Harvard sweeper attempting a clear put it in the net.

The match was hard-hitting and full of penalties. Four yellow cards were handed out. Two players were expelled.

Williams played sluggishly against the Jumbos but still managed to score enough to win. Stuart Taylor notched his first goal of his college career with a pretty shot that found the upper right corner. Tufts tied the score quickly when a Jumbo headed a free kick over a surprised Williams defense, but Freshman sensation Marty White put Williams back on top before the half by pushing a Gregg Hartman pass past the Tufts keeper.

In the second half the Hartman-White connection provided the insurance goal as Williams cruised to the victory.

Jumbos stump gridders, 7-0

by Mary Kate Shea

The Williams College football team suffered its second frustrating loss in a row, as Tufts University scored just once, early in the game, then fought off Williams' drives throughout the remainder of the contest for the 7-0 win. The loss drops the Ephs' season record to 3-2.

As was the case in Williams' 14-13 loss to Bowdoin College last Saturday, untimely turnovers and an inability to capitalize on opponents' mistakes were key factors in the outcome of the game.

With just 0:01 left in the opening quarter, Tufts quarterback Dennis Works caught the Williams defense off guard with a 44-yard touchdown pass to junior split end Tracey Maclin. Mark Litner's successful extra point kick gave the Jumbos an early seven-point lead with what turned out to be the only points of the afternoon for either side.

Sophomore Bob Stackpole, starting for Williams in place of injured quarterback Bob Lutz, had a fine day passing, completing 22 of 38 passes for 243 yards. The Ephs topped Tufts in the offensive stats with 303 yards in total offense compared to the home team's 189 yards.

Williams threatened in the second quarter when senior end Russ Gee recovered a Tufts fumble and the Ephs started a adrive at their own 19-yard line. Following a 26-yard completion from Stackpole to halfback Greg Collins and several running plays, Williams received a key break when the Jumbos' Steve Sogard fumbled a Rick Walter punt and sophomore Brian Benedict pounced on the ball at the Tufts 24-yard line. Williams maintained the drive until Dave Massucco fumbled on the Tufts 11-yard line.

On the opening series of the second half, Stackpole engineered a drive starting at the Ephs 20-yard line. A 21-yard run by Massucco, combined with a 15-yard roughing the kicker penalty on Tufts on a fourth down situation and Stackpole completions to sophomore end Kirt Gardner and Hollingsworth for 25 and 13 yards, brought Williams deep into the Jumbos' territory. But the offense gave up the ball when Tufts' John DiBiaso snagged an errant pass intended for Hollingsworth.

The Ephs took possession of the ball at the Tufts 24-yard line when the Jumbos' punter could not handle the snap and was unable to get the punt off. Williams, however, was stopped up on four plays and had to give up the ball again.

Williams gained the momentum temporarily when linebacker John Thiel picked off a Works' pass just on the Tufts side of the midfield marker. A holding penalty against the Ephs negated a nice gain on a run by Massucco and sufficiently stifled the Williams drive.

With 1:30 left on the clock Williams took possession of the ball for the final drive of the game. Stackpole connected with Hollingsworth five times for 42 yards within the space of a minute. The Ephs couldn't quite do it, however, as Stackpole was sacked at the Tufts 16-yard line with five seconds left in the game, and time ran out.

Harriers kill MIT

An impressive pack of Williams Men's Harriers devoured M.I.T. 23-32 and Tufts 19-36 on the Ephs home course Saturday. The double win ran the Purple's record to 8-4.

All five scorers for Williams were within fifteen yards of each other until the last mile of the race. Though M.I.T.'s captain Barry Bayus cruised way out in front to an easy victory, the Ephs grabbed five of the next seven places. Tom Schreck eased through four miles but blasted home past Tufts' leader to take second. Mike Behrman again ran a steady race and finished fourth. Phil Darrow and Garrick Leonard each took successive shots at the M.I.T. runner in fifth, but settled for a sixth place tie as they could not muster kicking strength over the final quarter mile. Steve Polasky sewed it up for Williams, rolling in just three seconds behind his two teammates. Pat Dobson and Rusty Anderson rounded out the seven man varsity squad.

How would Einstein theorize about O'Keefe?
Although the O'Keefe formula is secret, certain factors in the equation are well known:
1. O'Keefe has a hearty, full-bodied flavor.
2. It is smooth and easy going down.
3. Its head commands respect.
Our theory is that Einstein would have concluded: It's too good to gulp. Relatively speaking, of course.

VOL. 92, NO. 9 — WILLIAMS COLLEGE — OCTOBER 31, 1978

GPA's jump; Dean vows to reverse trend

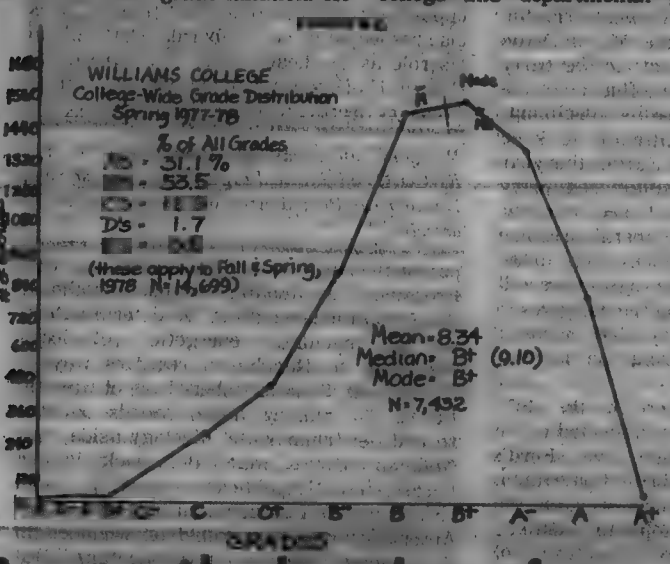
The average grade point average at Williams last year rose to an unprecedented 8.34, a jump of .16 over the average GPA in 1976-77.

According to a report from the Deans' Office, the grade most often given in two semesters last year was B-plus and the median grade of the 7,432 given was also a B-plus (9.1).

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor expressed extreme concern with the problem of grade inflation at Williams. "Students are being cheated," he said. "The problem is prevalent all over the country, but it has reached the point at Williams where something must be done about it."

O'Connor is preparing a proposal designed to curb and in fact, reverse the trend toward grade inflation. He hopes to present it to the faculty and the Committee on Academic Standing sometime before Christmas.

With the exception of the one-year period from 1975-76, the all-college GPA has continued to rise since Williams instituted the 12-point grading scale in 1953. The recent upswing in the past ten years, however, has slowed considerably as compared to that of the 1960's and early 1970's. An October 1978 update to Associate Provost David Boom's 1977 report to the faculty on grade inflation states that, although the rise recently has not been as rapid, "the updated statistics give us no reason to be confident that the GPA will not continue to rise under the present system of laissez-faire with respect to college and departmental grading procedures."



O'Connor stressed the point that action against grade inflation would not be unilateral. Dean Nancy McIntyre has brought up the issue at a meeting of the twelve colleges involved in the New England exchange program and O'Connor intends to discuss methods of control at a meeting of ACNE (Associated College of New England), which includes the other Little Three schools, Harvard and Yale.

Chairman of the CAS John Hyde reported at a meeting of the Faculty before fall break that the committee will investigate grade inflation this year, at the suggestion of Dean O'Connor. Hyde said that O'Connor was quite "zealous" in his intent to bring the issue before the faculty and the students.

The September 21 edition of the Amherst Student reported that grade inflation at that school has increased "dramatically" in the past nine years. There in 1968-69, only two per cent of the graduating seniors received any grade in the "A" range, as compared with 29 per cent of those seniors in the class of 1978.

Other statistics in the article revealed that 40.8 per cent of the undergraduated at Yale received A's last spring. 34 per cent of all seniors at Dartmouth received A's.

Blacks reject Williams admissions

by Eric Schmitt

The number of black high school students rejecting offers of admittance from Williams has risen significantly during the last five years. At the same time, fewer blacks are applying to Williams. The College has expressed concern about this decline.

In 1975, of the 100 black students accepted, 42 chose to attend Williams. The following year, 42 of 105 (40 per cent) black students matriculated into Williams. However, in this year's entering class (1982), only 24 out of 75 (32 per cent) accepted black applicants decided to attend Williams over other institutions.

The rate of matriculation for entering classes as a whole annually hovers around 50 per cent.

"There are several reasons behind the decline," Director of Admissions Philip Smith said. "The number of applications has declined (from a high of 185 in 1976 to 123 in 1978) and the competition between schools for the top black students has become more intense than ever before."

Smith and Professor Kurt Tauber, chairperson on the Black Student Life Committee, commented on two other important points concerning the shrinking pool of black applicants. A deterioration in the quality of inner city high school instruction is reflected in the declining number of "qualified" students produced by such institutions. As a large number of black students are concentrated in these urban schools, a major source of prospective applicants has dried up. Federally funded minority scholarships have also declined over the past few years.

Smith noted that despite an increase in the percentage of black students admitted to Williams—42 per cent of black applicants in 1978 versus 61 per cent in 1976—the number of accepted black applicants lost to competing institutions such as Harvard, Brown, and Dartmouth ranged as high as ten students lost for every one matriculation.

"Black students are becoming more aware of their higher educational opportunities," Assistant Director of Admissions Brenda Brock said. "While we (on the admissions staff) stress the virtues of the College when recruiting minority students, we have to be honest about its drawbacks. The lack of a black community in Williamstown and the secluded atmosphere of the school are two things about which we warn a prospective applicant." Student opinion on the issue varied.

Keith Scott '81, who lives in New York City, does not believe Williams is well known to the urban black student. Scott finds the isolation from city life to be a difficult adjustment. Since he is less happy than he would be in an urban environment, he is seriously considering transferring.

"It's much harder for a black student than it is for a white student to adjust to the environment at Williams," Brock said. "Some of these students come from all-black high schools and it's quite a shock for them here."

Council backs four as advisors

by Art Harris

After two revisions, the College Council Wednesday night passed a recommendation of four student names for membership on the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility. President Chandler will consider but is not bound by the Council's recommendation when he selects the two students who will serve on the committee.

The four students on the approved list are David Bennett '79, Debra Ferguson '79, Todd Tucker '81, and Jim Levinsohn '80. The original list proposed last week by the Elections Committee included neither Tucker nor Ferguson. This earlier list was returned to the Elections Committee for reconsideration after Council members feared it did not represent the student body.

At this week's meeting the list was first proposed by Elections Committee Chairman Chris Jenkins with one revision, the substitution of Debra Ferguson '79 for Betsy Harper '79. Many Council members, however, were not satisfied with this change.

Steve Magee '79 pointed out that since the list still contained "two anti-reservatives," President Chandler could select the two representatives and "still make it seem as if he were going along with Council."

Agreeing, Council member John Simpson '79 said that the choice of two conservatives would be "unfortunate" as their views would not be representative of student opinion. The motion to present this list to President Chandler was defeated 11 to 8.

Jenkins proposed an alternate plan, which, he said, the Elections Committee had decided to put forth if the first recommendation were defeated. The new list included another substitution, that of Todd Tucker for Rich Lane. Those students who had objected to the previous list agreed that now the recommendation was more balanced and representative. All but two members voted in favor of the recommendation, which will be submitted to President Chandler.

Only 400 people attended the ACEC sponsored "Southside Johnny and the Ashbury Jukes" concert on October 19, Simpson reported. The concert, which was planned without Council approval due to a misunderstanding with the ACEC, lost more than $5000, Simpson said. This brings the total ACEC losses for the year to $6700.

The Council voted unanimously in favor of a resolution asking for the removal of restrictions on Log hours. Complaints of late night noise led the College in September to move the Log closing hour from 1:00 to 12:00 on week nights.

The resolution, proposed by Simpson, seeks to return the Log to its previous hours. Simpson argued that since students have been responsible in keeping noise levels low over the past month, the 1:00 closing time should be tried once again.

Also passed unanimously was a motion requesting that Buildings and Grounds install adequate lighting between Mission Park and the Mission Park parking lot.

Membership of the Constitutional Review Committee was completed with the self-nomination of sophomore Kristan Dale. She will be the sixth and final member of the newly found formed committee, which plans to study and revise the College Council's constitution.

Radiation hoax wakes CFM

WCFM, the College radio station, set off a mild panic early Sunday morning when the DJ announced that the fallout from a nuclear accident in Canada was floating towards Williamstown.

Fred Kooperstein '79, the DJ, reported that he received a phone call at 1:55 a.m. from a man with a "mature voice" who identified himself as a member of the New England Weather Associates (NEWA). The caller said that a nuclear reactor in a power plant west of Quebec had "melted down" and that fallout resulting from a radioactive leakage was floating towards western Massachusetts. He urged everyone to take extra precautions, stay inside and close all windows until dismissal.

Kooperstein said that he checked wire service, but when he found no report from UPI decided that the weather station would probably find out before the wire service. Kooperstein announced the "bulletin" and then called NEWA for confirmation. The phone line to NEWA's president however, was not working, making confirmation impossible. He then called the Williamstown police and College Security.

The police officer who took the call was unavailable for comment.

About 2:20 after his telephone conversations, Kooperstein said that he realized that he "might have been conned." He went back on the air, and announced the possibility of the hoax. He broadcast for another thirty minutes before signing off.

Later in the morning, Kooperstein called John Hockridge, NEWA President Hockridge, Kooperstein said, said that although NEWA did have people on duty in case of emergency, there was no one at the office after 7:00 that evening. Hockridge compared it to another prank call which had been made to the Williamstown and North Adams police from a caller who identified himself as a member of the "Weather Bureau." The caller announced his intention to "assassinate" several people in western Massachusetts. Hockridge, Kooperstein said, speculated that the same person could have made all of these calls. The FBI entered the investigation he said and determined them to be hoaxes.

This Saturday is Homecoming, and remember that there is a $50.00 fine (Massachusetts Law) for destroying a Ephmen Security carpet. Please remove [illegible] before [illegible] after this picture was taken.

WAAC will visit frosh entries

by Priscilla Cohen

To inform new students of its activities and aims, the Anti-Apartheid Coalition will visit all freshman entries this semester. The Coalition hopes to alert freshmen to the situation in South Africa.

"The whole system is a nasty one," said Bruce Goerlich '80, referring to the segregation laws that exist in South Africa and create large gaps between the incomes and opportunities of the country's blacks and whites. In addition, blacks, representing 71 per cent of the national population have no voice in South Africa's electoral process.

According to Goerlich, American corporations are indirectly supporting this system by investments and loans, amounting to $2 billion to South Africa's business and the government.

As opposed to the campaigns launched on a number of campuses in the past few years, the Coalition is not pressuring for immediate divestiture. Instead it is asking the communication to join other colleges that hold stock in American companies with South African interests and to vote for change from within the corporate structure.

Today, American corporations that have a financial stake in South Africa play no part in that country's social or political life. The Coalition would like to see this change, envisioning American business as a force for reform; it could exert pressure for the amelioration of apartheid. Only if this fails, helps the Coalition, should the College sell its stock. "At Williams,

"Notes from a Strange Day"

9:20 a.m. A little annoyed at myself for my habit of straggling in late to my early morning classes, I decided to try to start this day off right by showing up at the physics lecture hall bright and early for a 9:30 class. My hopes were soon dashed, however when I remembered that I don't take physics. So it goes.

By strange coincidence, the class had been cancelled that day and the rumor was that he had been arrested the day before for breaking the second law of thermodynamics. Apparently had been operating a perpetual motion machine in his basement for almost five years when agents of the National Science Foundation got wind of it and cracked down. And I thought stuff like that didn't happen around here.

12:00 noon. Checked by mail and found some useless bit of junk mail from, as I recall, the National Foundation for the Eradication of Hangnails in Dwarfs, or some such thing. I have gotten into the habit now of recycling these pieces. I remove them from my box, walk around to the mailroom counter and say, "This appeared in my box by accident. Could you please put it in SU 1890?" I then pull the same piece of mail out of my box the next day and repeat the procedure. This helps keep up a steady stream of mail to me with minimum waste of energy. I hope the conservationists appreciate this.

Noted as I was eating lunch that there were fewer dogs roaming around the dining halls this year. According to the checker at the top of the stairs, this was because of the new tightened ID procedures.

I had a chance to see the new policy in action when a dog dashed up the stairs, flashed its ID to the checker, who duly scrutinized it and let him pass to wander around the dining hall and panhandle an afternoon's meal. The dog and I caught up with each other after I made through the lunch line, and between attempts to beg a bite of my hamburger he managed to communicate to me that he was taking a winter study course this January on psychology professors, which he seemed quite excited about. My later attempts to relate this exchange to friends have met with skeptical responses. Odd.

4:15 p.m. On my way to the library I was overcome by a sudden urge to have a pastrami sandwich, which wrestled me to the ground, stole my wallet and headed off in the direction of Spring Street. I must stop telling people that this is a safe campus.

5:00 p.m. Went back to my room and listened to the news on WCFM. I never knew there were so many B's in the name of the Israeli Prime Minister. Interesting.

6:00 p.m. Going through the dinner line I was overcome with attack of existential anxiety. Suddenly I felt the terror and horror of a being mired in abject creatureliness, a slave to bodily necessities which are meaningless and inescapable. My roommate gently reminded me that I should not get so worked up just because Mission was serving leftovers again. No doubt true but I still suspect that I will have trouble sleeping tonight. They were lousy leftovers.

Looking Ahead to 1980

by Jeff Nelligan

The Republican Party dazed and shaken after eight tumultuous years in the White House, ideologically split between its conservative and liberal-moderate wings, and at a low ebb nationwide in party members and public officials, is desperately groping for a formula that will unite the party and culminate in a political comeback in the 1980 Presidential election. It won't be easy. The GOP, even as the party out of office and even with President Carter, (up until the Camp David talks) enjoying marginal popularity, is in bad shape. So bad that at one point last spring, an alarmed Marvin Stone, Editor of the conservative U.S. News & World Report warned against the possibility and danger of a one party system. Fewer than 23 per cent of Americans today claim Republican ties. The GOP base is narrowing quickly through continuing disenchantment over the Watergate era and to the fright with which some Americans view the party's growing arch-conservative element. The Republican right controls most of the party organization in the area west of the Mississippi and south of the Mason-Dixon Line and has fanatical support in the party machinery everywhere. The influence of the GOP left has been steadily declining; witness the unsuccessful attempt to keep Rockefeller on the '76 ticket. Earlier this year Senator Charles Mathias summoned party progressives to a conference to seek ways of dealing with the diminishing liberal influence within the party. The future looks grim. In the view of one writer, "In 1980, progressives will be lucky to take 20 per cent of the delegates to the convention." Clearly the GOP needs a candidate capable of unifying the warring factions of the party.

This split was a factor in the 1976 Presidential loss, which was embodied in the strong Reagan challenge to Ford's incumbency at the Republican Convention. Party quarrels and divisions weaken the party structure from top to bottom; contributions not solicited, literature not distributed, speeches not made, and precincts not canvassed ultimately affect a candidate's standing. Relate this to the switch of a mere 9,000 votes in Hawaii and Ohio that would have given Ford the victory and it is not hard to see the consternation and frustration of GOP officials in assessing the 1976 campaign. Ford could have been President; instead he is following the Pro-Am circuit in a golf cart.

The Republicans don't lack personalities with aspirations to the White House but need rather the candidate capable of restoring some of the party's pride and morale as well as national popularity. Emphasizing these objectives is Republican National Committee Chairman Bill Brock who is avidly courting black leaders, heroically trying to temporize damaging ultra conservative elements within the party, and making it clear that the future lies in the hands of the younger, lesser known members and not in the party's Old Guard.

Even with this internal Republican disharmony, circling Democratic vultures should take heed of recent political developments within the country and their own party. There is an increasing conservative mood in America. The GOP has the golden opportunity to ride the waves of this sentiment and enhance the party's appeal and enlarge its constituency. Also, if Carter's Camp David summit popularity proves transitory, there may well be a repeat of the 1976 Republican debacle in the 1980 Democratic primaries. Senator Edward Kennedy and California Governor Jerry Brown are patiently awaiting the election year—and any indications of Carter floundering. Even though polls show that Kennedy could beat any Republican candidate, public opinion surveys cannot predict the strength of a divided party nor the vindictiveness of a toppled incumbent.

No wonder many GOP officials view Carter and the Democrats as vulnerable. Republican Presidential aspirants are already gearing up for 1980 showing promise, energy, and lots of moola. The candidates can be arrayed in three levels: the bottom tier consisting the darkest horses, the second tier containing those with a moderate the nomination and those in the first tier with the best chance of receiving the nomination.

In that last level is Illinois Representative Philip Crane, darling of the New Right who has already announced his candidacy. The press having once been burned by "Jimmy who?" gave Crane "polite" attention and figures Crane's only chance is a Carter-esque campaign: good showings in the early primaries creating a bandwagon effect to the convention. Governor James Thompson of Illinois also has an eye on the White House. His state commands "crucial" electoral votes, he is very popular within the state, and as a governor does not have to risk identification on national issues. Yet Thompson is young and unfamiliar with the workings of GOP national campaigning. Lowell Weicker, Senator from Connecticut, could be a suprirse in the early New England primaries. He is a well-respected party liberal, but his voting record could become a liability with conservative party stalwarts.

The first of the three men who comprise the second tier is former CIA chief, Party chair, and U.N. Ambassador George Bush. Bush is cool, intelligent, well financed, and has an intimate knowledge of the party machinery. Agreeable to conservatives because of his opposition to the Panama Canal treaties, he is also respected by some liberals who applaud his role as the head of the U.S. Mission to Peking. Ex-Democrat John Connally, former Treasury Secretary under Nixon and Nixon's personal choice to replace Agnew as Vice President, is another serious candidate simply on the strength of his determination. He is articulate, energetic yet looks suspicious to Republican regulars way of chameleons. Senator Robert Dole of Kansas, Ford's '76 running mate, rounds out the second tier triumvirate. Ideology aside, Jeff Nelligan, Dole's main drawback is his abrasiveness. Republicans still cringe when recalling Dole's observation that 1.6 million Americans had been killed or wounded in "... Democratic wars in this century." But Dole is a non-stop worker whose Campaign America Fund is steadily rising. Still, as Alan Barons points out, "If Reagan runs, Dole won't."

Notwithstanding the political chaos below, there are three candidates who rise above the smoke and confusion to emerge as the party's frontrunners. Senate Minority Leader Howard Baker is one. The country's leading elected Republican and a shrewd legislator, he is palatable to the GOP left because of his support of the Panama Canal treaties; yet as a Nixon defender in the televised Senate Watergate Committee hearings he endeared himself to conservatives. Baker is a strong candidate, but to win he must develop a campaigner's personality and flair, and change his image from that of a Congressional Wheeler dealer to that of a Presidential contender.

Regardless of his 18-hole, golf cart look, Gerald Ford is cautiously awaiting 1980. Ford is bitter at Reagan for contesting the 1976 nomination and contributing ultimately to Ford's narrow defeat in the general election. Ford does not want Reagan to receive the party's blessing in 1980 either. Yet Ford would be hesitatnt to engage in a rough primary fight with Reagan, or anyone else. Political fact, however, is simple; to get the nomination or deny it to Reagan, Ford is going to have to dirty his hands in the primaries which some maintain is hardly fitting for a former President. Ford remains in the news as an unofficial party spokesman. It will be interesting to see if he packs up the 9-iron for a trip to New Hampshire.

In everyone's eues, Ronald Reagan is the man to beat. Buttressed by huge funds, (his Citizens for the Republic Fund has almost $1 million) and fanatical supporters, Reagan refuses to leave the stage and fade away.

State politics

To the editor:

It is unfortunate that the large number of Massachusetts students at Williams does not cause more interest in state politics, especially this year when so many important races look to be fairly close, and when matters are so confused as to provide the voter with hours of speculation.

Taking a look at the principal contests in the Commonwealth this year, it would seem that a nearly complete re-orientation of the two political parties has taken place. A conservative candidate for governor, waving the banner of Proposition Thirteen and Law And Order, is opposing a fairly liberal candidate who has pledged to carry out many of the economic policies of the outgoing Democratic governor. What is unusual is that the latter candidate is Republican Francis Hatch, and the former is Democrat Edward King. Furthermore, the state's Republicans are in the position of having renominated one of the U.S. Senate's foremost liberals to carry their standard against the Democrats.

In fact, this transformation is neither as complete nor as sudden as it may seem; Democrat King is rather unwillingly harnessed to a young, liberal running mate, whose relation to the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives is probably the primary reason for President Carter's support of the Democratic ticket this year (one Carter aide reportedly referred to King as a "turkey", thus summing up Washington's feelings about his candidacy's value to the national Democratic Party). The Democratic Senatorial nominee, Paul Tsongas, is a liberal Congressman whose record shows few substantial disagreements with Brooke's. And Massachusetts has a long career of rather unorthodox political alignments, ranging from Federalist Senator John Quincy Adams' support of the Jeffersonian Trade Embargo in 1807 to the warm support accorded to Senator Joseph McCarthy by the state's Democrats in the 1950's. Indeed, the last Republican governor, Francis Sargent, was probably slightly more liberal than the Democrat who succeeded him, and who has now been made a lame duck by King's primary victory.

Of particular interest is the Senatorial race, since it involves the nation's only black U.S. Senator, and is being waged more as a referendum on his divorce than as a race between two candidates with opposing philosophies. The lack of disagreement between Tsongas and Brooke is not the only reason why many Democrats are supporting the incumbent; the latter has quite a bit of influence as a two-term Senator and member of several important committees, notably that on appropriations. It is not inconceivable that should the G.O.P. recapture a majority in the Senate, Brooke could be their choice as President pro tempore of that body, thus increasing this region's influence in its economical and political tug-of-war with the Sunbelt states.

In short, there is no reason for students who are citizens of Massachusetts to be apathetic about the elections this year. Most of the polls show the two candidates for governor as having fairly equal numbers of supporters, and the same is true of the Senate race. In both cases a large bloc of Undecideds hold the balance of power, and it will be they who decide the outcome of the contests. In this respect Campaign '78 resembles Campaign '76, with the exception that the state elections this year will very possibly alter the political atmosphere in Massachusetts far more noticeably than the Presidential election of 1976 has altered the political atmosphere of the nation.

Winter study reform

To the editor:

The best thing to come out of last Thursday's forum on Winter Study was the evidence that positive reform of WSP is possible—positive in the sense that both students and faculty would find the program more stimulating and enjoyable. People suggested that the rules covering independent "99" projects be reformed, that the cultural opportunities for January be more fully exploited, and that perhaps course subject orientations could be changed to ease the preparation burden on faculty members. These are the kinds of reforms from which everyone at Williams would benefit—and, I hope, they are the kinds of reforms that Professor Grant's committee will recommend to President Chandler.

The most frightening thing to come out of the forum was Mr. Grant's casual estimate that between one quarter and one third of the faculty favor abolishing Winter Study altogether. If the past performances of the College on such matters in any indication, then we face the danger of being presented with three overly-simplified option: abolish WSP; leave it completely unchanged; or convert it into a month of boring, pedantic grade-grubbing just like the other eight. If the Administration decides to resolve the debate along these lines, then the students should band together and fight like hell to keep Winter Study intact. But whoever might win that battle (and the Administration, as usual, holds all the high ground), everyone at Williams will have lost because the chance for positive reform was ignored.

Elections Outlook

An Overview

The Gubenatorial Race

by Molly Murphy

As might be expected from national trends, cutting taxes and limiting government spending are the major issues in the Massachusetts gubernatorial race. The state has thrown political observers a curve, however, in coming up with a contest in which the Democratic candidate is advocating sharper cutbacks than the Republican.

"I am a Democrat. Frank Hatch is a Republican," declared Edward King at a recent debate between the candidates at Harvard, but the statement carries less of the traditional ideological implications than usual. King, who defeated the liberal incumbent Michael Dukakis in the Democratic primary, is so conservative that Democratic leaders in Washington aren't even sure that they want him to win. The former Massachusetts Port Authority head and ex-professional football player favors capital punishment, mandatory sentencing and little restriction on gun use. He proposes to cut taxes by $1.3 billion over three years beginning with a $500 million cut the first year, mostly in property taxes. King also maintains that $138 million can be cut from welfare expenditures.

Frank Hatch, the Republican candidate—in name at least—is getting support not only from his own party ranks but also from liberal democrats, according to recent polls. The Massachusetts House Minority Leader is proposing moderate tax relief, claiming his opponent's goal of $1.3 billion cut is impractical. He does, however, believe that $60 million in fat can be trimmed from welfare expenditures and in general wants to place a cap on state and local spending. Hatch also intends to increase the percentage of the state's revenue growth allocated to cities and towns to fifty per cent.

Aside from money, the biggest issue in this race is personality.

Hatch has been attacking King's management style at the Massachusetts Port Authority, claiming that King can't run the state with a bulldozer as he has that agency.

King reciprocated the punches by describing the Harvard alumnus and Beverly Farms resident, Hatch as an "aloof millionaire" who is too far removed from the needs and concerns of the people to be an effective governor.

The most recent polls indicate an extremely close competition in a race that has stood the usual party-ideology associations on their head.

The Senate Race

by Byron Walker

Senator Edward Brooke has represented the interests of Massachusetts and of the United States as a whole. Although it sounds cliche, I'm supporting Ed Brooke because of his record in the Senate. Many politicans say that they're running on their record when in fact they find some timely issue to divert attention from it. This is not the case with Senator Brooke.

In his two terms in the office, the Senator has proved himself a knowledgeable and assertive legislator. As the only black in the Senate, he has notably led floor fights in the interest of civil rights legislation, minority business causes, and women's rights. He has been outspoken among his colleagues in the areas of education, labor and unemployment, and government ethics.

Brooke's lobbying and floor leadership figured into the rejection of Clement Haynesworth and Harold Carswell in their nominations to the Supreme Court. In this past session the Senator was a leading supporter of E.R.A. extension. His opponent, however, was absent for the crucial vote in the House. Similarly Brooke's recent vote in favor of billion tax credits for post secondary education underscores the efforts he has made to help parents bear the high cost of college education. Partly as a result, both the National Education Association and the American Federation of Teachers have given the Senator a 100 per cent rating for his work in education.

In the areas of defense and foreign policy the Senator has held unyielding positions on security for Israel and opposition to South African apartheid. As an indication of his support of Israel, the Senator recently voted against the Carter Administration's arms package deal to the Middle East.

Only last month on the Senate floor, Senator Brooke reaffirmed his opposition to apartheid and desire to end all United States government involvement in the South African economy. In a speech made earlier this year he stated, "Indeed our failure to challenge the iniquitous system of apartheid will eventually result in a tragedy of untold proportions. There, while the actions we do take must be carried out with finese, . . . they must also be unequivocal in signaling that we will not contribute to the maintenance of racial inequality in South Africa." Brooke said that an end to all Eximbank involvement with the South African economy would be such an unequivocal signal.

Massachusetts is a troubled state inflicted with rising property taxes, business flight, and urban decay. As ranking Republican member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Senator Brooke has undertaken steps to stem the states bleak economic prospectus. He has assisted in securing the F-18 fighter contract for General Electric in Lynn, the LNG tanker contract for General Dynamics in Quincy, and the Patriot missile system contract held by Raytheon.

I think no one can deny that the long lasting jobs, the jobs that carry the promise of success and advancement, are in the private sector. However whenever the private sector is unable to cope with the problem of unemployment, the use of public funds becomes necessary. In this case the Senator, in light of our present economic plight, became one of the original co-sponsors for S. 50, the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment and Balance Growth Act.

When unemployment in construction trades reached staggering proportions, nearing 40 per cent in Massachusetts, the Senator introduced the Brooke-Cranston Act to provide 7½ per cent interest rate mortgages to stimulate new housing construction. The program was enacted in 1974 and has been successfully lifting the home building industry out of it severe recession.

Energy is a major problem that we face in New England, having no other resource than our forests. The Senator is a proponent of solar energy and has introduced a tax credit for homeowners and small businesses installing solar and wind energy equipment. He has co-sponsored the small business loan program which is now law. The Senator co-sponsored the Dole-Brooke Resolution to keep the President from imposing a tarrif on the imported oil upon which our region depends. In addition the Senator is leading efforts to get a strategic reserve of petroleum products located in New England to protect Massachusetts from the damaging effects of another oil embargo.

Strangely enough, when Senator Brooke was a member of the Senate Ethics Committee, the Committee now investigating his finances, he was the only member to push for an investigation of allegations regarding illegal corporate campaign contributions. In January of 1974, the Senator introduced the first comprehensive Ethics Committee reform package of which one of his resolutions was to require full financial disclosure for all Senators. The result: the Senate has an Official Code of Conduct.

Senator Brooke is meeting his toughest opposition since being first elected in 1966. Unfortunately the origin of the opposition lies not so much in the political capabilities of his democratic challenger but with the adverse publicity resulting from a long and messy divorce settlement which raised questions of financial wrong-doing. Thus far the Senator has been exonerated in all investigations. Despite these pressures he has maintained his attendance and voting record in the Senate. The Senator does not seem to take his responsibilities lightly.

I realize that I have but briefly touched upon several issues here, however I hope that they have given you some idea of where Ed Brooke stands on some of the issues of interest to you. In as much as I have tried to give you this insight to the Senators stance I hope also that you will take time out before casting your ballot to look at this record for your self. If you do, I'm sure you too will agree that we cannot afford to lose this man in the United States Senate.

Brooke and Tsongas camps

Edward Brooke

by Mike Lasnack

By this time next week, Ed Brooke will know if he has won the biggest fight of his life. This year's Senate race between Republican incumbent Brooke and Democratic congressman Paul Tsongas has proved to be one of the closest in Massachusetts history. The issues are the men themselves, who is most deserving of traditional liberal support and who can best represent Massachusetts.

Brooke has served in the Senate since 1966. He was state Attorney General before that. Tsongas served as a reform county commissioner before going to Washington to represent the city of Lowell and its suburbs in Congress. The two men have enjoyed the support of liberals in this state for years, and as a result, their campaigns have focused in one what kind of a man the voters of Massachusetts want in Washington. Has Brooke ignored the plight of Massachusetts in his efforts to work for American blacks? Does Tsongas think that the state is one vast Congressional district where talk of apple pie and mother is enough to satisfy the constituents? In essence, does the state want a man who has looked with national eyes at national problems or a man who has looked with local eyes only?

Tsongas has two major accomplishments to his record. As county commissioner, he was involved in a major cleanup of government in Middlesex county. As congressman, he has brought many millions of dollars in federal aid to restore and rebuild the city of Lowell. Tsongas represents a continuation of the Mike Dukakis development cabinet, government aimed at bringing life back into the cities of Massachusetts. His opponent asks if he has the depth and the experience with issues. Tsongas counters that it is not what he has done that is important, but what he will do.

Brooke's family problems have served as a kind of non-issue throughout the campaign. Divorce proceedings, lies, charges of corruption, and a charge of dishonoring the

The writer is a political economy major who lives in Massachusetts.

United States Senate have been tossed about in the news media with relish. The Boston Globe, always a major factor in state politics, has been doggedly pursuing stories on the questions surrounding the Brooke family break-up, with the result that Brooke has condemned the paper publically for its nosiness. Some view it as an "oust Brooke" campaign.

Brooke faired well in his latest bout with the Senate Ethics Committee, but his reputation has, perhaps, been damaged for good. Surely, Brooke's problems will be in the voter's mind.

The race has also attracted the notice and aid of major national figures. Senator Edward Kennedy has broken with a old family tradition of not opposing republican incumbents to actively solicit votes for Tsongas. Jimmy Carter himself was in the state last week. On the republican side, Brooke and Frank Hatch are both viewed as the last, gasps of a dying party. Former governor Frank Sargent has charged that if both men don't win, the party will be irreconcilably split. In recent weeks, Brooke has won the support of some of his conservative colleagues in a reluctant effort to hold the party together.

Voters hold the key, however. The real question is whether the Massachusetts electorate can bring itself to vote against Brooke. His vast majorities in past elections and the always sensitive issue of race make that choice seem doubtful. Tsongas must capture enough of the voters to vote for him, as it seems that few if any will vote against Brooke.

Paul Tsongas

by Sarah Thorne

Who would sacrifice a safe Congressional district to run for the U.S. Senate seat of Ed Brooke, a 12 year old fixture in Massachusetts politics? Who would dare to challenge Brooke, a liberal Republican in an embarrassingly one-party state? Who would attempt to win the loyalty of guilty whites who cast their votes for Brooke as the only black in the U.S. Senate? Paul Tsongas, a 37 year-old second term Democratic Congressman from Lowell, Mass. is succeeding at each of these to overtake Brooke in the polls.

During his four years in the U.S. House of Representatives, Tsongas received a 100 per cent rating by the League of Conservation Voters, 93 per cent by the National Council of Senior Citizens, 100 per cent by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, and 86 per cent by the AFL-CIO's COPE. Tsongas has supported and sponsored many controversial and progressive bills:

—co-sponsor of Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment bill

—co-sponsored Kennedy-Corman National Health Insurance bill, opposed by Brooke

—authored amendment to prevent U.S. Export-Import Bank loans to South Africa

—co-sponsored congressional public financing bill

—sponsored extension of ERA ratification deadline, among others

After attending Dartmouth College, Yale Law School and serving for three years in the Peace Corps in Ethiopia and Jamaica, Tsongas quickly built up local support leading to his election as the Middlesex County Commissioner, Lowell City Councillor, and Assistant Deputy Attorney General. After four years of representation in Congress, a major newspaper in his district, the Lowell Sun, reported that, "Tsongas will most likely go down in history for having accomplished more for Lowell than anyone who has held the office in the past 100 years."

Paul Tsongas is not cashing in upon this year's simplistic glamour issue: taxes. However, according to "Taxation with Representation" a citizen's fair tax group, Tsongas has the best tax reform record among Massachusetts Congresspeople.

Instead of negating government's role with social service and tax cuts, Tsongas places top priority upon the issue of urban revitalization for the economically depressed and physically deteriorating Massachusetts cities. Most significant among Tsongas' urban revitalization and job attraction successes in his Congressional district was the designation and planned restoration of the decaying historic mill town of Lowell as the first industrial national park.

Congressman Tsongas' strong record of job attraction and preservation includes the location of the $10m regional federal Solar Energy Center in Cambridge. He believes that job creation and environmental protection can be synergistic rather than mutually exclusive. His opposition to the breeder reactor and legislative advocacy of renewable energy sources reflect his long run sensitivity to environmental quality, economic independence and stability.

Tsongas is one of the few Congressmen with living and working experience in developing nations. His service on a special mission to Ethiopia was central in preserving U.S. neutrality and nonintervention in last year's war in the Horn of Africa.

On other foreign policy issues, Tsongas calls for further limitations to the arms race and opposes the neutron bomb. In contrast, Brooke supports the neutron bomb and a halt in SALT negotiations until initial Soviet concessions are secured. Brooke's advocacy of increased defense spending helped him win the endorsement of Henry Kissinger.

In protest of a $6800 payraise which Congress voted itself, Tsongas created a college scholarship fund for students in his district. Unlike Brooke, he voluntarily disclosed his personal financial statements as early as 1971.

Tsongas has conducted an issues oriented campaign. He has not exploited Brooke's personal transgressions and now professional accusations relating to his illegal tax deductions and allegedly altered financial disclosure statements. Tsongas' record and liberal, progressive social and environmental policies offer the voters a distinct choice on November 7.

Sixty-seven years old but still the handsome, dynamic, right wing gospel preacher, Reagan has a huge national following, evidenced in his narrow nomination loss to incumbent Ford. An NBC poll of registered Republicans puts Reagan ahead of Ford 43 per cent to 35 per cent to win the nomination. Yet Reagan's arch conservatism frightens most Democrats and even some Republicans, a factor which could prove fatal in a general election. Sensing this, he has taken steps to moderate his image, refusing to endorse Jeff Bell, a former aide, in Bell's Senate primary fight against liberal New Jersey Senator Clifford Case. Reagan has also declined endorsing an initiative in his home state barring homosexuals from teaching jobs and is suddenly very anxious to point out his fairly moderate record as Governor of California. It is conceivable that Phil Crane's run at the White House might partially stem from Crane's suspicions of Reagan's conservative faith and thus Reagan's vulnerability. Barone points out that, "Ronald Reagan would rather be President than purist."

The 1978 Congressional elections have brought out some of the GOP hopefuls, intent on mending fences and picking up political IOU's. Within the next year, the leading candidates should emerge quite openly onto the national stage.

The original Williams Octet entertained listeners in its Fourth Annual Reunion concert at Jesup Hall Saturday night. (photo by Prasad)

Williams Octet, old and new, delights audience

by Joan Libertine

A mixed group of young and old packed Jesup Hall last Saturday night to attend the Fourth Annual Reunion Concert of the original Williams Octet. The nineteen member ensemble, all members of the Octet during its tenure from 1941-1945, regaled the enthusiastic audience with selections from its varied repertoire. In addition, the present Octet made a guest appearance.

The Williams Octet developed in 1940 from two other small groups of the late 1930's, the Glee Club Quartet, described as a group providing "comedy relief" after such works as Bach Chorales; and the Small Sheep. These two groups joined forces under the aegis of then Music Dept. chairman Robert Barrow to form the Williams Octet. Saturday's concert rejoined several of these original members.

After marching in to the strains of Come Fill Your Glasses Up, the Octet sang such favorites as Louisiana Hayride and Peg O' My Heart. Warren Hunke '42 and Lou Safford '41, then played a selection of songs by Gershwin and Berlin for piano duet. Safford also sang his own brand of Gershwin with the "classic" April in Fairbanks (Alaska, that is). The ensemble finished up the first half of its program with a piece by Kurt Weill and Ogden Nash, The Trouble with Women, a work describing women which probably does not apply today (unless, of course, one is discussing Holyoke or Smith).

After intermission, the present Octet came on for its guest appearance. The Octet, with its ten members (see figure, front), sang a selection of some of its favorites, including House of Blue Lights, Cohabitation, Roberta Lee, and Coney Island Baby. Sophomore Kevin Weiss provided us all with the grisly but funny history of that last song. The group was called back to do two encores, a sign of its great popularity on campus.

The present Octet is, without doubt, one of the finest musical groups at Williams if its Saturday performance was any indication of its talent. The ten members blend well together in one tight group. It is a pleasure to see a group able enough not to take itself too seriously and still provide first rate entertainment. Their only fault, if fault it can be called, is that they stole the show entirely from the older group.

After the new octet finished, Doug Buck '45 sang a selection of short, but scathing, songs, accompanying himself on the guitar. Included is that classic gem Drop-kick me, Jesus, Through the Goalposts of Life. Needless to say, the audience loved it.

The group then returned to finish its program with a brand new arrangement, Bidin' My Time. Also included were Me and Marie, an arrangement written especially for the Octet by Cole Porter; I Love the Ladies; and selections from Brigadoon, allowing several soloists in the group to show their stuff.

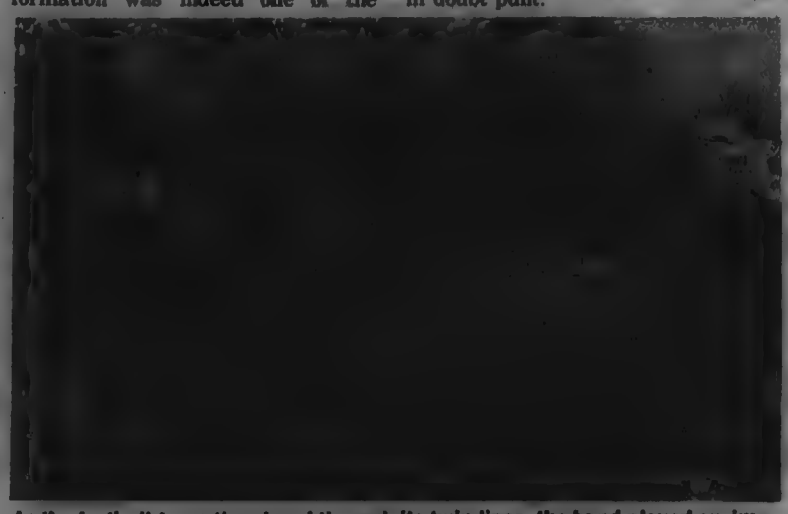
Saturday's concert proves that the Octet still has its old magic; the years have not diminished its members' ability and showmanship. Let us hope that these reunion concerts continue throughout the coming years to delight and amuse us all. One could not wish for better entertainment.

"Marching" Band blows Union away

by John Libertine

The scent of blood was in the air. After two successive losses, the Williams Band was out to kill. After a long, gruelling contest, the band came up from behind and won a key game in its bid for the All-College Bandionship against Union College. Given the ferocity of its attack, one shudders to think of the carnage that could have resulted if Union had had a band at the game.

Under the able direction of Fcancis C. Cardillo, senior co-leaders Ben Grudin, Andy Masette, and Doug Gernet, the band ended its losing streak with a display of wit, showmanship, and a minimum of unfair play. If all goes well, the band could win its twelfth straight title, an honor of rather dubious merit.



Despite its great success and fame (see the Transcript, for example), the Williams College Walking, Stalking, Ambling, Rambling, Scrambling, Gambling, (etc. ad nauseum) Moo Cow Marine Marching band remains something of an enigma (justifiably, according to some). Just what is this bunch of Monty Python rejects trying to prove? The answer should be obvious: nothing.

Modern psychologists would describe the band members as maladjusted individuals, probably frustrated and repressed, seeking an outlet for some form of self-expression and recognition. (We, of course, would merely describe them as bananas). Each member must choose some unique form of headgear in order to set themselves apart from the whole group (not to mention the rest of humanity). Bizarre is the only adjective available to describe such an array of haberdashery (after all, we are a family newspaper).

The band's entire raison d'etre (Aha! You knew there had to be one) is to provide a half-time show for football games. During their program, the members all march in formation (more or less), forming such objects as fit in with the overall theme of their show. The last show's theme was Star Trek, and the formation was indeed one of the starship Enterprise, minus a few appendages due to lack of adequate personnel.

The Homecoming program is always the most important to the band; this gives them the chance to go all out in their showmanship (Lord help us all!). When asked about the program for this weekend, one leader withheld comment preferring to keep the show a deep, dark secret (i.e. it hasn't been written yet).

The band's philosophy about its music seems to be quite simple: when in doubt punt.

As the football team thundered through its twin lines, the band played an impressive rendition of Rocky in pre-game warm-up action. (photo by Buckner)

Smith shows "pure fun"

by Melle Rockefeller

Hyla Smith paints for fun, and her show at the Dodd Student Art Gallery is pure fun. Where else would you find King Henry VIII in a new suit of clothes, one weird man tumbling ecstatically around a page, and a voracious flower that sucks you down into its depths?

Her works, which here are mostly drawings, are a wonderful combination of straightforward charcoal images and whimsical colored pencil ideas. Henry, who is the first in a series, represents the ludicrousness of the emperor's pomp separated from his clothes. His old image is black and white, his new, imaginative image is in "super"-color.

Smith has managed to take the children's game of colored pencils to incredible levels. Using its rich and subtle color, a harmless chrysanthemum sends its rainbow tentacles out to you, drawing you inextricably to its potent center.

The crowning jewel in this whimsical show is a quasi-poster of a fragmented young woman. Like a Revlon ad, she smiles at you, shimmers with brilliant color, and whooshes to the right. Her hair, reminiscent of Ovid's Daphne, hides a surprise which is left for you to discover.

Of course, Smith's talent is not limited to the drawings in the show. She is a serious Studio Art major, whose works include oil painting and even handicrafts. With luck, we will see more of her work later this year, including a contribution to Decorative Arts.

Even Cowgirls

by Marcus Smith

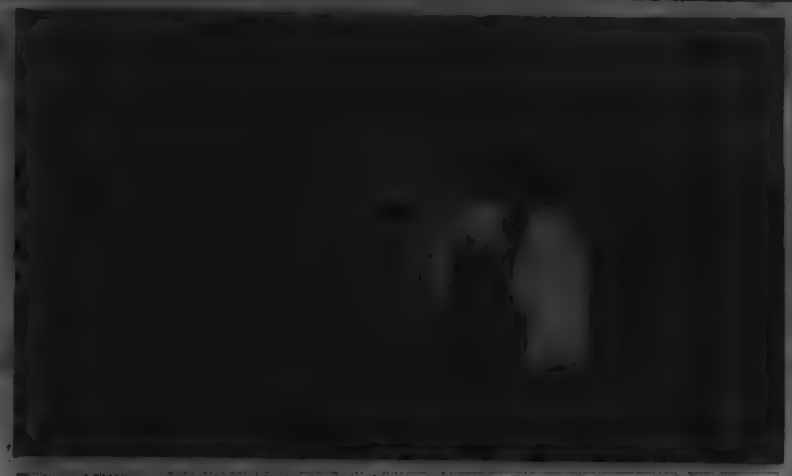
The problem with reviewing an album by "The World's Greatest Rock 'N' Roll Band" is what standard of judgment to establish prior to the listening. The Rolling Stones in other words have become so respectable, so misleading (coin a song title from Some Girls, that many a reviewer falls into the understandable trap of only invoking history, of only using the Stones then as a criterion of judgment for the Stones now. The alternative is to pretend the old performer is a new one and so gain a fresh perspective.

This is not to say, however, that the Stones must bash, crash, and belt away on every song they do because they are the Stones. Certainly, Jagger's cover of the Temptation's classic, "(Just My) Imagination" does justice to the Motown genre, while the dueling of Richard's and Woods' twangy guitars enhance the song with a gentle flair. And besides, even on Flowers Jagger sang another Temptations gem, "My Girl", as a respite from quintessential rockers like "Mother's Little Helper" and "Let's Spend The Night Together".

Where the Stones really fall short though on Some Girls is on their country music parody, "Far Away Eyes", and especially if one is of the opinion that much of country whines like a parody of itself anyway. Indeed, the whimsy of Arlo Guthrie is much preferred.

Review Copy Courtesy Of Tooneryille Trolley.

Certainly, this is the flaw that consistently seeps into an otherwise confident and competent collection of rock and blues-based boogie. "Now that we're respected in society - We don't worry about the things we used to be", jeers Mike atop the jaunty, streamlined guitar patchwork of "Respectable", but it's a lazy sarcasm from the mouth of someone who could care less whether he's "popping heroin with the President."



Consequently, it's Watts' keen seen of rhythm that propels the Stones whenever they become carbon copies on themselves, as on "Lies", little more than a remake of the undistinguished "Dance Little Sister."

But now we're judging on the basis of the past again. Yet we must to indicate that the mysogony of baiting insolence that has ever catavaulted the Stones into their satanic realm of several innuendo and brashness is just as harsh and potent as ever. "Some Girls", another swaggering blues ditty, is the ultimate put-down of all girls of all nationalities and race, but also a catalogue of inert indifference, even to the pose itself.

The Stones do sizzle instrumentally on this album though on more than just "Respectable". "When The Whip Comes Down" lunges as a noisy frolic, the Stones at their assertive best. "Shattered" meantime captures the jeery rumble-tumble flavour of the street in the resonant scratch of the Richarde-Woods guitars and combines it with the sardonic decadence of Jagger's facetious phrasing to make the self-parody a biting art.

Which leaves us with "Beast Of Burden" and the Stones once more lightening their intensity with control and effort as Jagger briefly reaches for a falsetto or two without straining himself too much.

In the words of "Shattered", "Ah, does it matter?" The Stones previously have supplied the answer ("It's only rock 'n' roll"). Now they beg the question.

CDE mints economists

by Gail Farrell

The Center for Development Economics, located in the old Delta Psi fraternity house at the north end of the college campus, is a branch of Williams College that has remained all too anonymous. Nineteen students from various developing nations are participating in this year's CDE program, working towards a degree in the Master of Arts in Developmental Economics.

The Center is operated through funds from the Ford and Clark foundations under the direct auspices of the Williams College Administration. The comprehensive one-year program offers graduate study in those areas of economic analysis and quantitative techniques most directly relevant to economic policy-making in developing countires.

The students, thirteen men and six women, range in ages from twenty to thirty years old. Their tuitions are provided through funds from various United Nations agencies and grants from their own governments. They are on leaves of absence from different government posts, hoping to return to their jobs with new knowledge and an appreciation for a new culture. In order to receive the MADE degree, the students must each maintain a B average in their area of study.

The intensity of the CDE program limits the amount of free time the students can enjoy. However, they do look forward to mingling with the College crowd and learning about American life in the Berkshires. Williamstown, though it is no metropolis, does provide a culture shock of sorts.

Cynthia Paras and Jana Potecar, both from the Philippines, complain that Spring Street does not offer the most exciting night life, but they are impressed with the beauty of the mountains. The climate in Williamstown is a great change for most of the CDE students, and Herbert Ezenwa of Nigeria, who is already bundled up in sweaters, cannot believe that it will get much colder. Marcos Viale of Peru has an unusual complaints, insisting that all American women look the same.

The members of the Center explain they want to open their doors to the Williams undergraduates. This year, the Center has affiliations with six social houses and would like to plan functions with as many groups as possible. The men are hoping to arrange a challenge match with the Williams soccer team and they seem fairly confident that they will give the varisty players a tough game. The cde has won the ping pong championship for the past two years, and this year's team does not plan to ruin the record.

Scheduled events include a series of "country nights" in which the CDE students will present different aspects of their native countries to the Williams community.

Music in the Round

Composers of four nationalities will be represented in the Music in the Round concert on Friday, November 3, at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The variety of instruments will be equally interesting, as Julius Hegyi and Lucy Joseph will play the violin, Susan St. Armour will play the viola, Douglas Moore will play the cello and David Cobb will play the double bass. Admission is free with a Williams I.D.

Myrna Nachman

Myrna Nachman, pianist, will play music by J. S. Bach, Ravel, Copland, and Schubert in a solo recital on Sunday, November 5, at 3:00 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The concert, sponsored by the Williams College Department of Music, is free and open to the public.

Opening the program is Bach's 1729 Partita No. 4 in D Major, consisting of seven movements. Following it is Maurice Ravel's Valses nobles et sentimentales, composed in 1911. After the intermission, Nachman will perform Aaron Copland's 1930 Piano Variations; and closing the recital is Franz Schubert's Sonata in A Major, Op. Posth., written in 1828.

Nachman, who was Visiting Assistant Professor of Music at Williams last year, is currently on the music faculties of the State University of New York at Stony Brook and of Brooklyn College.

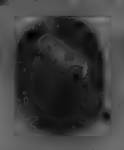
What would Socrates think of O'Keefe?



If you question long enough and deep enough, certain truths about O'Keefe become evident.
It has a hearty, full-bodied flavor. It is smooth and easy going down. And, the quality of its head is fact rather than philosophical conjecture.
We think there's one truth about O'Keefe that Socrates would not question: It's too good to gulp. As any rational man can taste.

Forum on WSP elicits some ideas

by Lorraine Driscoll

Participants at the Winter Study Review Committee meeting last Thursday night suggested that the committee make two significant reforms in the Winter Study program. The people in attendance favored modifying the pass-fail system to a pass-marginal pass-fail system. The audience also agreed that the committee should encourage and approve more 99 projects than they have in the past.

The major problem with the Winter Study Program, according to Chairman William Grant, is that the faculty complains that they work hard preparing for the courses while the students do not seem really motivated to learn.

Associate Provost David Booth suggested the modified grading system. He explained that it would distinguish between those who work; those who merely show up for class; and those who don't even show up. Hopefully, he added it would provide some incentive for students to do more than marginal work. As one professor said, "Winter Study is not a two grade system - last year no one failed . . . it's a pass-pass system."

Some people reasoned that if the committee is truly worried about a lack of student effort they should provide for more 99's because students are bound to be enthusiastic about the programs they develop.

The committee indicated that they are considering decreasing the number of required Winter Study Projects. Faculty members may have to teach just one every two years rather than two every three, and students may be required to take only three out of four.

Nearly everyone in the audience was vehemently opposed to abolishment of the program. The committee indicated that they were not seriously considering either abolishment, or maintaining the status quo, but rather, to make adjustments.

Anti-Apartheid Coalition holds forum tonight

The relationship between Williams and apartheid in South Africa faces a new round of scrutiny tonight at a panel and open discussion "South Africa: Political vs. Economic Strategies," sponsored by the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC) at 8 p.m. in Jesup Auditorium.

Four speakers will lead off the discussion. Richard Nuccio, political science professor, and Clay Wilde '79 will speak on political avenues to creating change in South Africa, while Stephen Lewis of the Economics Department and Jacqueline Wilson '79 will present economic approaches. Peter Meyers '79 will moderate.

In open discussion following these presentation, the WAAC hopes to generate ideas on the direction that anti-apartheid activities should take over the coming year. The value of divestiture for creating change is an open issue in light of the Trustees' actions over the summer. Proponents and opponents have been invited to attend and present their cases.

Lewis and Nuccio are members of the faculty anti-apartheid group. Nuccio was active in last spring's divestiture drive, while Lewis spent last year in Botswana, a southern African state.

The panel is part of a move throughout the Northeast to raise the issue of American involvement in South Africa before elections. The move has led to rallies, demonstrations and teach-ins on campuses throughout the region.

Black acceptances drop tremendous obstacles in enjoying college life, Craig White '79 explained. As so much effort is put into "proving oneself," he said, "it's often difficult to let down one's guard and relax." "I've found that in class discussions," he said, "often being the only black, people expect me to have the 'black' opinion. That's quite a burden."

Although the trend in black admissions is a valid concern for Smith and the Admissions staff, no one is panicking.

When asked if the College would ever accept a black only to fill quota requirements, Smith said: "No responsible admissions staff will ever admit anyone who is not suited to do the work." The College, he noted, does not operate under a quota system. Brock, though, did say that to a certain extent "qualified" black students are judged separately from "qualified" white students, but in either case the academic success of an applicant, black or white, is the deciding factor.

While the decline in the number of black students attending Williams has not yet reached a critical stage, there is little doubt that the issue poses a threat to the diversity the Administration wishes to achieve in the Williams student body.

Field hockey

The Williams Varsity field hockey team ended their 1978 regular season play at home Wednesday losing to a strong team from Dartmouth College 4-0. The Ephwomen, with a final record of 6-6, could not sustain their four game winning streak against the solid Ivy League foes.

Dartmouth scored all four of their goals during the first half of the game, and took a total of 35 shots at Williams goaltenders Blythe Miller and Sue Smith, who combined for 25 saves. It was a totally defensive effort by the Ephs.

The Ephwomen, with an even 6-6 record in season play and a 1-1 record in Little Three competition, will participate in an All-College field hockey tournament to be held at Smith College on Oct. 28-29. At this event, individual team members will be selected to four All-College teams and will be eligible for selection to New England and National teams which compete later this fall.

The Williams JV field hockey team wound up its 1978 season last week with an impressive 8-2 record.

Water polo

Williams Water Polo will travel to New Haven this weekend to compete in the New England Regional Tournament. Sporting a 3-1 league record, including wins over UNH, Westfield State, and rival Amherst, the Ephs hope to improve on their sixth place finish of a year ago.

Seeing their first action in two weeks, Williams traveled to RPI Friday night for their final tuneup for this weekend's tournament. Rusty from the layoff, the Ephs were unable to control the Engineers' passing game. RPI ran off five third period goals en route to a 14-9 victory over the Ephs. Co-captain Brian McDermott fired 9 shots on net, hitting on 4 of the attempts to spearhead the Williams attack. Gordy Cliff chipped in with a pair of early goals, while co-captains Bob Krause and John Trapp and Frosh Bill Hymes put in one each.

Women's soccer

Neither the Williams Women's Soccer Team nor Vassar's booters were able to break a tie in a double overtime leaving the final score 2-2 in their match Friday. The game played on Williams field, leaves the Ephs with a 5-4-2 record.

Inner Laurie Jones, a senior, provided both Williams' goals, scoring one in each half. Williams coach Judy Zimicki credited her, along with the entire defense, with strong play.

Despite the final score, Williams dominated the game. The ball was in the Vassar end about three-fourths of the time, and Williams took 31 shots on their goal compared to Vassar's 10 shots on the Williams goal.

Williams' last game of the season will be Wednesday against Dartmouth. It will be played at 2:15 on Williams' Cole Field.

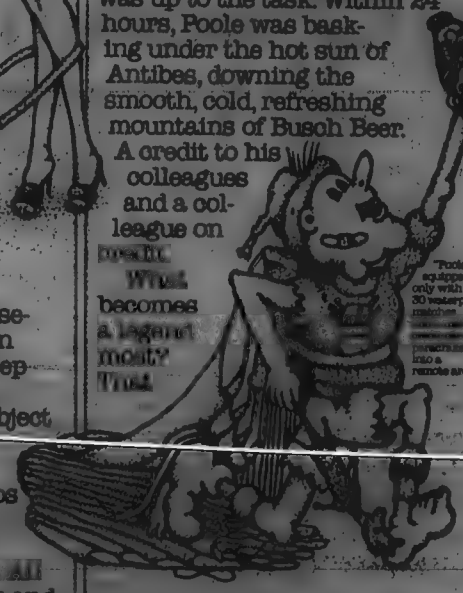
Mountaineering #6.

LORE & LEGEND

Mountaineering is an oral tradition. Over the years, it has been passed down from teacher to pupil, father to son, package store owner to customer. As a result, a folklore – a mythology, if you will – has formed around the mountains of Busch. You, being a student of mountaineering, no doubt wish to acquaint yourself with these truths and half-truths, these stories both accurate and apocryphal. A wise decision. And, as luck would have it, this ad is just the ticket.

One of mountaineering's earliest legends is Bennington Baxter Bennington. Adventurer, international bon vivant and inventor of the phrase "your check is in the mail," it was he who perfected the finer points of expedition financing. While other mountaineers resorted to such bizarre extremes as gainful employment, Bennington subsidized assaults on the Busch mountaintop with creative economics. An amalgam of paper schemes, franchised dreams, dummy corporations and corporate dummies kept him on 20 fiscal years. Asked at the culmination of his career to reflect upon the secret of success, Bennington revealed his first rule: "Keep all your assets liquid."



Another frequent subject of mountaineering lore is the wildlife. Numerous tales abound, but perhaps the most famous story is that of the 1973 Minor Mathematics Convention. All 75 prodigies, whiz kids and bewhiffled geniuses [illegible] an after hours expedition. It began harmlessly enough. But soon, the Busch mountaineers reached the [illegible] Strip, a racy nightspot catering to highbrow hijinks. Before the evening was over, several of them were bending the slide rules. Others were smoking big cigars and [illegible] every woman in sight. They were agents with an eye for [illegible], obviously.

"I can make you a mathematical model, baby." Talk about your wildlife!

But when looking for sheer courage, W. Dexter Poole must rank in lore among the top mountaineers. Fond of saying "The road to truth goes through bad neighborhoods," Poole enjoyed skirting with danger and approached mountaineering as a test of survival skills. In his most famous challenge, Poole, equipped only with 30 waterproof matches and a major credit card, parachuted into a remote area known as Cleveland. He was up to the task. Within 24 hours, Poole was basking under the hot sun of Antibes, downing the smooth, cold, refreshing mountains of Busch Beer. A credit to his colleagues and a colleague on [illegible]. What becomes a legend most? That is (one) a matter of subjective judgment and (two) in a constant state of flux. Keep in mind legends are created every day. So when you flex your [illegible] muscles, be true to the tradition. At best, you'll be part of history. At least, you'll be a [illegible].

Quarterback Lutz sparks 11-8 nipping of Union

by Mary Kate Shea

With just under eight minutes remaining in the game, and with Williams behind by an 8-8 score, injured quarterback Bob Lutz made his first appearance since the Ephs game against Trinity three weeks ago and sparked a 92-yard scoring drive that led to an 11-8 win over the Union College Dutchmen.

Williams will take its 4-2 season record into Little Three action when the Wesleyan Cardinals visit Weston Field next Saturday afternoon.

Williams' passing attack proved to be more of a threat than did its running game. Led by senior Greg Collins (46 yards in 16 carries) and freshman Jay Wheatley (38 yards in 8 carries), the Ephs gained just 81 yards on the ground. Sophomore quarterbacks Bob Stackpole and Bob Lutz combined to complete 14 of 31 passes for 170 yards in the air.

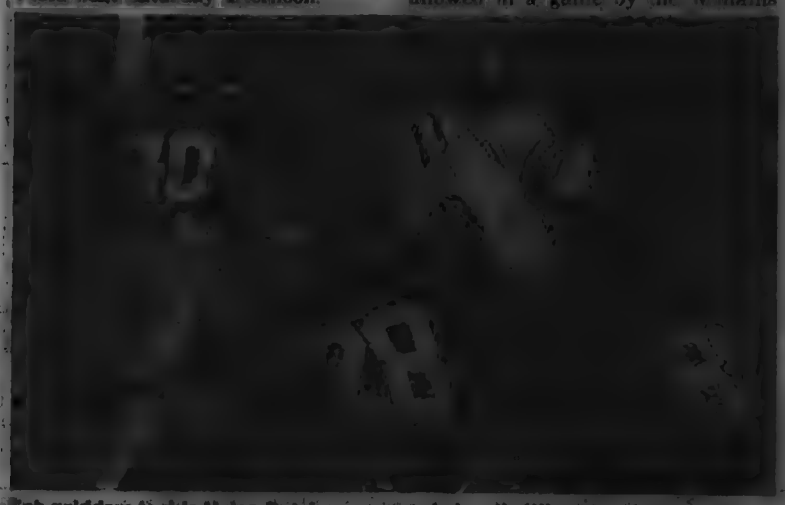
The Dutchmen employed a mixture of running and passing plays to gain a total of 278 yards, the most yardage allowed in a game by the Williams defense so far this season. Union quarterback Andy Terranova completed 21 passes for 187 yards throughout the game. Terranova consistently hit his receivers for short yardage pickups. Led by the running of halfback Rich Pomer with 58 yards in 17 carries, the Dutchmen gained 131 yards on the ground.

The problem of turnovers, which plagued Williams in its previous two games, shifted to the Ephs' opponent as on several occasions Union started drives only to have passes picked off by members of the Williams defense.

On a third down play at the Williams 15-yard line early in the second quarter, sophomore linebacker Brian Benedict snagged a pass across the middle intended for Dutch defensive backs Mark Eckert and Mark Gerry teamed up to produce an interception on Union's next offensive series. Gerry tipped a Terranova pass and Eckert grabbed the bobbled ball and ran the interception back 21 yards. With less than 0:25 left in the first half, co-captain Greg McAleenan intercepted Dana Johnston's attempted halfback pass and returned the interception 54 yards on an exciting run. The Williams backfield's fourth interception of the afternoon came on the Dutchmen's last series of the game when senior Long Ellis snagged a long desperation pass by Terranova, and ran the ball back 31 yards. Ellis' interception allowed the Ephs to run out the clock to end the game.

Neither team could muster much of an attack in the opening quarter but Williams managed to get on the scoreboard first, with co-captain Ken Hollingsworth's successful 32-yard field goal attempt nine minutes into the quarter.

Union scored its first points of the game on what was perhaps the most unusual play witnessed by Williams fans this season. The Dutchmen got two points for a safety just before the end of the first half when punter Rick Walter chased a snap that soared over his head and kicked the ball out of bounds in the end zone. The play was a smart one of Walter's part since a Union recovery of the bad snap in the end zone would have given the Dutchmen a touchdown.



Union's lead increased to five points with 32- and 31-yard field goal conversions by Jim McDonald in the third and fourth quarters.

Lutz's entry into the game sparked the Williams offense and his passing took the Ephs 92 yards in seven plays for what proved to be the game-winning touchdown. The potent combination of Lutz to Hollingsworth—one that had been so successful in Williams' first three wins of the season—showed its magic again as the Eph quarterback hit his favorite receiver four times for 78 yards during the drive. Hollingsworth seemed to be all over the field as he collared passes for gains of 14, 9, 34 and 22 yards.

Following three consecutive passes, Lutz called a running play and Collins scampered nine yards through a big hole up the middle for the touchdown that made the score 8-8 in Williams' favor. A successful two-point conversion from Lutz to Hollingsworth on the extra point gave the Ephs a critical three-point lead with 1:52 left in the contest.

Much of the credit for Lutz's success must go to the Williams offensive line. The line gave Lutz excellent protection the entire time he was in the game, as demonstrated by the fact that the Union defensive line did not touch Lutz once in the two series he called.

Union started a drive and moved steadily down the field on the strength of Terranova's passing until Ellis' interception gave Williams possession of the football, allowing the Ephs to run out the clock with the final score Williams 11 Union 8.

Tenacious booters Eph out victory in 11-goal shootout vs. Springfield

by Dave Barra

There was a turkey-shoot down at Cole Field Saturday and when the smoke cleared Williams had outshot Springfield 6-5. The Ephs are now 6-2-1 and look eagerly ahead to this Saturday's Homecoming match against Little Three rival Wesleyan.

Williams wasted no time getting on the board. Stuart Taylor '81 was brought down in the penalty area by a Springfield defender four minutes into the game. Gregg Hartman '79 took the penalty shot. The Chief keeper made the initial stop but Hartman put in the rebound. Twelve seconds later Hartman crossed a beautiful ball to Peter May '79 crashing in from his wing. The goal was May's first for Williams. The score was quickly 2-0. But Springfield was only warming up. Taking advantage of the confusion caused by whistles from the JV field, Springfield's John Szymko put in a shot after Williams had given up on the ball thinking a call had been made. Several more times Springfield threatened but Gregg Hartman regained the two goal edge with a left-footed shot that surprised even himself. Then, with three minutes to go, Williams allowed a penalty kick. The match went to the half 3-2.

Springfield came out charging and caught Williams flat. The Chiefs scored one minute into the second half. Seven minutes later they scored again taking the lead for the first time. Stung by the quick turnabout Williams came to life. The Ephs dominated play but missed on several opportunities until Peter May made sure on the equalizer thirteen minutes in. But Springfield kept coming. John Szymko got the hat-trick midway through the period and put the Chiefs back on top 5-4.

The Ephs did not give up. Relentlessly they pressured Springfield controlling play hoping for a break. Perry Nelson, senior co-captain, made his own break heading Stuart Taylor's cross into the upper right corner. The game now tied would go to who wanted it more.

With 4:07 left to play, Nelson found a wide-open Dave Barra '79 streaking to goal. Springfield's keeper froze on his line as Barra pushed the game-winner past him. Williams' unbeaten streak goes to seven games. The Ephs host Wesleyan this Saturday at Cole Field.

Runners show strength at Easterns

Men take 5th

Despite crippling injuries, the Williams Men's Cross Country squad ran to a fifth place out of the twenty-one teams at the Eastern Collegiate Championships last Saturday.

The Ephs traveled to Boston's Franklin Park without the services of co-captain and first man Tom Schreck, who was hobbled by an ankle injury. Although his teammates ran hard, the squad did not have the depth to make up for Schreck's absence.

The team maintained respectability largely because of the fine efforts of Mike Behrman and co-captain Steve Polasky. Both runners made strong moves over the last two miles to finish sixteenth and eighteenth, respectively. This qualified them for All-East status. Not far behind in the dense field was Garrick Leonard, who maintained his solid consistency by running to twenty-seventh, just seconds behind the All-East standard. Phil Darrow stayed close after the three mile mark, but his slow start held him back to thirty-seventh. Pat Dobson, running tough with a nauseated stomach, fought himself home to ninety-ninth, while Rusty Anderson came in 125th. Approximately 150 runners completed the race.

The Ephs will now pull things back together in order to host the Little Three meet on Wednesday. With the return of Schreck and that extra margin of psyche which always accompanies the event, the Purple is confident of their ability to hold off a strong threat from the traditional rival and capture the crown once again. The meet will be run at 3:30 from the Science quad.

Women - 11th

The Williams Women's Cross-Country Team finished an admirable 11th place in the New England Championships held Sunday at Holy Cross College in Worcester, Mass. A total of 35 teams competed.

The University of Vermont won the race with a low score of 58 points, followed by Harvard with 85 and the University of New Hampshire with 108. Williams had 280 points.

Middlebury's Karin Vonberg set a course record of 17:36 on the 5000 meter run. The unseasonably warm weather, contrasting to snow or sleet of past New England Championship meets, was generally an advantage to the distance runners.

Mary Hakala, a senior, was Williams' first finisher, placing 24th with a time of 19:22. Freshman Sue Marchant ran a strong race, finishing 38th, in 19:54. She was followed by senior Corrie Johnson 61st, in 20:27, freshmen Liz Martineau, 71st, in 20:44, Stephanie Carperos, 86th, in 21:24, junior Annie Ko, 101st, in 22:03, freshman Brenda Mailman, 115th, in 22:35, and Alexis Hamill, 149th, in 23:23.

The field was by far the largest the team has ever competed in. Thirty-five teams and over 300 women from New England colleges participated.

Coach Doug Armstrong said he was pleased and "actually surprised" at the team's strong finish, and noted that the race was "extremely exciting to watch".

This was the culmination of the season for Williams. They will conclude with the Little Three Championships on their home course on November 1.

Golf team drives to victory

The enforced winter idleness at the prestigious Taconic Golf Club will not be difficult to bear this year as the tenacious Eph linksters, the team with the highest winning percentage in Williams College history, ended its fall season undefeated 7-0 record.

After a shaky start, Greg "the Snake" Jacobson reached to the depths of his golfing soul for an elixir of straight shots and holed putts. A 75 at Middlebury, a 163 at Yale, and an 80 in a torrential downpour against Springfield were the highlights of his season.

Ed "Big" Bousa, a gifted junior whose oft erratic play shaves years off a coach's life, produced some spectacular golf this Fall. Fellow juniors Marcel Oudin and Chris Hoth delivered some crucial scores, but both suffered from the ravaging effects of that villainous big stick, the driver. With some work on their long games, these impressive upper-bodied swingers could contend for a New England title this spring.

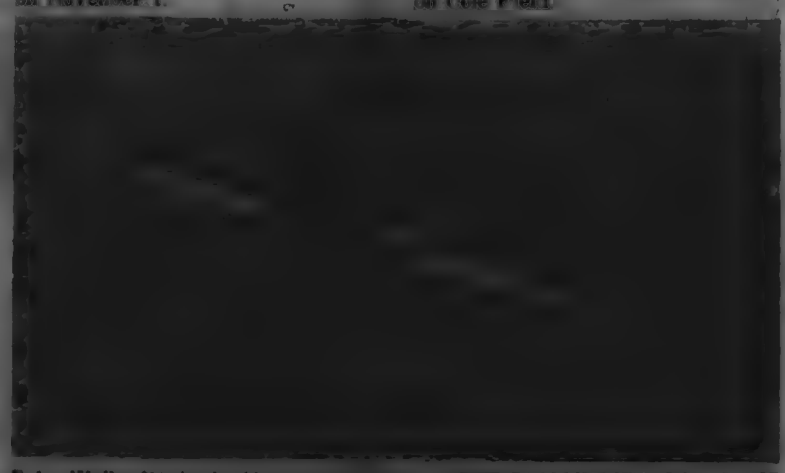
Senior co-captain Dan "Leaping Lar" Katz, though a consistent top five performer, had a disappointing Fall. Not even Katz's fine ball-striking could make up for a mysteriously recurring spasmodic jab on the putting greens. But at 21 Katz's nerves cannot have frayed beyond the point of no return. Look for his return to health this spring.

If it were possible to selectively breed mind and wrist characteristics for high level golf, Young Bill Sprague would provide the model. Sprague showed flashes of brilliance against Union and Albany State but these promising performances were marred by other outings. A fearful rendezvous with the orthopedic knife may be in the offing this winter.

Senior Michael C. Lynch capped his season in a classical way. Classical in the sense of the Platonic conception of music of the spheres. On the third hole at Middlebury, Lynch delicately massaged a wedge shot into the hole for an eagle two.

Finally, Bill "Dick Tracy" Upton capped a fine competitive season with a stunning victory in the 1978 Williams College Golf Championship. With a first round victory over former champion Bill Sprague and a second round nerve-shattering triumph over roommate Mike Lynch, Upton found himself pitted against the formidable Ed Bousa. Upton whittled a 4-stroke deficit to 2 down with 3 to go, and then proceeded to crunch a monstrous drive to par the challenging sixteenth hole. Upton went on to win the seventeenth and easily clinched the match at eighteen. It was a collegiate characteristic of a champion.

Eph ruggers rout Berkshire club 6-4



In the battle for Berkshire County supremacy, the WRFC narrowly defeated the highly touted Berkshire Rugby Club 6-4. The play of the WRFC had been sloppy before last weekend's game and and the club has been plagued by numerous injuries. This match was not without its losses, specifically to second row John Svoboda and prop Victor Zerbino.

For the first year in the history of this intense rivalry, the two teams were playing for what will soon be the goal of every western Massachusetts rugger, the soon to be famed Commissioner's Cup. The Berkshire ruggers, a group of highly skilled athletes, faced a band of rejuvenated college ruggers who are just reaching their peak. With only two games remaining on the fall schedule, Boston College and arch-rival Amherst.

The closely contested match was typified by marches up and down the field, which were thwarted by strong goal line stands. The Berkshire club was knocking on Williams' door when scrum-half Yoshi Belash scooped up a bouncing ball and ran the length of the field to score the first try of the game. Ted Cypiot blasted the extra points through the uprights to make the score 4-0.

The Berkshire club came back strong after with four points of its own, but failed to convert on the kick. The score stood for the rest of the game, giving the Ephs a gratifying 6-4 victory. In another closely fought game the B-side narrowly lost to a team consisting mainly of Berkshire A-siders. Freshman standout Kirwin Webb scored their only points on a penalty kick in the first half.

The festivities following the game were dominated by the WRFC as usual. It was highlighted by a thrilling rendition of Eskimo Nell by Bill Green and a chug from the Commissioner's Cup by the captains. The cup will be on display in the Rugby Trophy case in the Log. The team is looking forward to its bout against Boston College on Homecoming at 11 o'clock on Cole Field.

Letters: stars, boos and gifts

Kudos

To the editor of the Williams Record:

Reporter Peter Rintels deserves 10 gold stars and a round of applause for his coverage of the recent case of embezzlement at WCFM and for his defense of that coverage.

The Record editors deserve several black stars and a long, drawn-out "boo!" for their refusal to include the guilty student's name in the article.

To argue that the Williams Record, because its primary source of revenue is the College Council, should bow to rules more appropriate to a junior high school, is similar to saying that a "real" newspaper should bow to the journalistic preferences of retailers because advertising contributes the largest chunk of its income.

This, of course, is to totally ignore the absurdity of any student committee or administrator deciding that somehow college students are less than adults and should not be subject to the same public humiliation to which adults would be subjected in similar circumstances.

If that same student had not gone to Williams College but had, instead, gone to work in the real world for a real radio station and had behaved similarly, he would now more than likely be charged with grand larceny. His name would appear in real newspapers.

One would think that in the wake of Watergate, Koreagate, etc., ad nauseum, students and student journalists at Williams College would be somewhat less than willing to protect the identity of an alleged embezzler. It's not a minor offense; it's a serious crime.

If the College Council wants a house organ, let it print a mimeographed newsletter. The administration already has the Alumni Review, the catalog and numerous other smaller publications. Let the Record be an independent voice of student journalists who consider themselves journalists first and campus leaders only secondarily.

Please give

To the editor:

I didn't know her and there aren't many left on campus who still remember. Four years ago a women's basketball coach made such an impression on her team, her classes, and her acquaintances that today they are trying to help. There are twelve hundred people, and still more are needed.

Connie Crawford was in a car accident last January and was left paralyzed. She needs financial help. She needs a hand-controlled car and a properly equipped apartment. A group of students, faculty, friends, and acquaintances are trying to raise a minimum of $5,000.

Please. If you can, give as much as you can. If you need to know any more about the situation or about how you can further help, feel free to contact any of the following people: Leslie Milne, Carol Ann Paul, Mel, Rose, Linda Wilkins, Sue Smith, Barbara Hunter, Joe Ross, Lucienne Sanchez, and Tiger Davis. We are busily sending letters and hoping for checks made payable to The Bonnie Crawford Fund - United Methodist Church. Please leave the contributions in either S.U. Box 2511 or 1826, or give them to your coach.

Thank you.

Beneath Their Peaceful Shadows

The other day the Associate Provost, Prof. David Booth, very graciously devoted some of his time explaining to me the results of the poll he gave to the class of '78 regarding Winter Study. His remarks are very useful in many ways, and especially because they point to a particularly interesting finding: the vast majority of the students polled—some 80 per cent—thought that student commitment to WSP was not sufficiently intense. Furthermore, 48 per cent of those who responded agreed with the statement "Winter Study is a waste of time for many students."

Mr. Booth cautioned that since only 163 questionnaires were returned from the 450 graduating seniors (the poll was conducted last spring), and since those who returned the questionnaire were a self-selected (rather than a random) sample, he has no way of knowing how representative the results are of the views of the student body. However, he believes it to be somewhat unlikely that the basic conclusions of the study are very far from the truth.

Some other highlights of the survey and our discussion:

—Three questions were asked where respondents were to comment on the time spent, the educational value, and the enjoyment of each of their four WSPs. Interestingly, all three tended to increase moving from the freshman year WSP to the senior WSP. Especially large is the change in educational value, which moved from (using Mr. Booth's famous 7-point scale, where 1 is low and 7 high) 4.0 to 5.7 in the four years. This educational value question is the same as the one asked on the course evaluations. Last spring, the mean score given by all students for all courses on educational value was 5.2.

Thus, it would seem that the freshmen consider WSP to be of considerably less educational value than most students think their semester courses are. In fact, only does the junior year WSP come close to the average semester course in educational value. This suggests to me that if the faculty decides to reduce the number of WSPs in which students participate, they might want to consider something along the lines of making the first two optional and the last two mandatory.

—82 per cent of those who spent time off-campus claimed that this experience was of equal (12 per cent) or more (69 per cent) value than the on-campus projects. Also, 46 per cent of the respondents said that had WSP been abolished, they would have tried to get jobs or internships for the month.

This suggests to me that it would be wonderful if more out-of-classroom internship-type projects could be arranged by the school. It is unfortunate that Williamstown is such a small place, since the opportunities for a single month's worth of community service work are limited. However, given the students' claims that out-of-classroom WSPs are very useful, and their apparent willingness to work during January, perhaps more can be done by students working in the community (teaching, reading, homemaking for the elderly, assisting in local schools, etc.). Then again, off-campus projects might be popular simply because they get people away from Williamstown, and the sentiment to get more involved in the community might be lacking. Regardless, I think it is something to be looked into. Such an experience might be especially useful for freshmen and sophomores. Furthermore, increased student concern with the area might help improve college-town relations.

—In regard to the question of whether the abolision of WSP would hurt admissions, Mr. Booth could only say that "we wouldn't gain anything" by doing away with it. Rather than any direct role played by the 4-1-4 calendar, he noted that if the faculty abolished WSP the current student body might be sufficiently upset to try and dissuade potential students from coming (through tours, other campus visits, general word-of-mouth). The faculty should consider this point very important.

—Although the students both on the questionnaire and at the recently-held open forum on WSP were set against any major changes, they did seem open to the idea of relatively minor changes, including some sort of grading. The 12-point scale seemed very unpopular as a device for extracting more student commitment, but Mr. Booth's idea of a new "perfunctory pass" grade inbetween "pass" and "fail" seemed acceptable to most students at the forum. Thus, although no student could do better than a "pass", the student would now have to demonstrate more commitment than many do at present to receive that grade.

In the original CEP report of May, 1966, when the WSP was proposed, it was the intention of the Committee that a list of students who had done "outstanding" work in WSP be forwarded to the Dean. Thus the idea of a three-tiered level of distinction was built into the idea of WSP since the very beginning. It seems endemic within the spirit of WSP to institute such a "perfunctory pass".

by Peter Rintels

2:00 p.m., Sunday, November 5. I am sitting behind my typewriter scrounging around for an idea for this week's column and can't help but notice that it is sunny and at least 60 degrees outside. And it is Sunday, November 5th. In Williamstown. Massachusetts. I am thinking seriously about running the facts of today's weather over to the religion department tomorrow and offering it as a tidy little proof of the existence of God, or possibly of the existence of Freud, which for the department around here is worth at least as much.

But that is tomorrow. For the time being, I am still looking for something to write about. But lo and behold here is a quotation from E. B. White coming to mind. It is from his Subtreasury of American Humor where he is introducing a section on comic criticism. Says the past master of this task: "The truth is almost every good humorist is a critic of sorts." Now far be it from me to try and go around flashing credentials, but White is suggesting here a possible direction, and as I note that Pique made it out this weekend, I'll think I'll take him up on the offer.

As for what to criticize, this is easy: poetry. I know nothing about it and in the past have had but the paltriest success in attempting to parse it for meaning. To me it is so much metaphorical heireglyphics. What more amusing way to pass a balmy Sunday afternoon but to totter through some linguistic foliage that I cannot make hide nor hair of? The pages of Pique have not let me down in supplying the material in that I refer especially to a little number by Fabienne Marsh with the promising title of "Spring Carnage". If this isn't literary cuneiform, then I have been left miles behind.

Miss Marsh starts off: "I understand why one mad fly - spat against the bulb last night - and friend alive." Let's have a go at this. First of all I wonder if that "spat" is not supposed to be spiat, or possibly sped, indicating some sort of connect between the unfortunate wayward insect and the bulb. As it stands, we have the past tense of spit, to expectorate, in which case we understand that a lunatic fly has spit on someone's light bulb and been fried as a result. While I personally have a little trouble getting worked up over some fly spit on my lamps, I will grant to Miss Marsh that someone might. In any case, flies it seems can suffer quite a fate for some chintzy things. I am glad I am not a fly.

Miss Marsh continued: "I would do it another way - in a dun-dappled convertible, - driving fast, to - spank my face against the wind and - suffocate to death." I am now glad I am not Miss Marsh, and if I ever buy a convertible, I will make a point of hiding the keys if I hear she is in town.

Miss Marsh presses on: "Or else I'd be the murderess - cupping and plucking scarlet tulips, - taut bodied cognac goblet - and steal away when all, en masse, - mouth riot on my calves." Our authoress, it seems, has transformed herself from suicidal depressive to homicidal flower girl, but seeing as I got lost back where spitting flies were getting fried, I can't get too upset at this. It seems as likely as anything else I've run into so far.

As for the "mouth riot on my calves," this is [illegible] I won't touch. I'm not even sure I want to sit in the same room with it. I will say this, though; if any mouth rioting starts going on on my calves, I'm calling out the National Guard. I'm no fool.

There is actually a bit more to "Spring Carnage", but there's been enough carnage on my ability to think straight after three verses that I think I'll knock off, if you don't mind. Too much afternoon tottering through poems like this leave me a little weak-kneed, which is why I don't hang around much with poetry in the first place. As for the rest of the afternoon, I think I'll idle it away working up some more proofs for the existence of Freud.

Course Guide: By the students, for the students

by Rick Moog

A couple of weeks ago, a copy of the Williams College Student Course Guide for Spring 1979 appeared in the mailbox of every student on campus. The appearance of this publication was not preceded by a great deal of publicity or forewarning, and undoubtedly came as quite a surprise to a great number of people. Although the purpose of the Guide is to provide some answers to questions students might have about courses and professors, this issue may have raised several questions among both students and faculty about the Guide itself. Why are so few courses included in the Guide? For the courses that are covered, are the "right" questions being answered? Is the information provided accurate or useful? Should anyone use the Guide in choosing courses?

Dick Moog, '79, is chairman of the Course Guide Committee.

The recently released Guide contains write-ups on 68 courses, which is precisely 68 more than any other Guide that has covered Spring courses. Last Spring's Guide, published as an aid to choosing courses for this year, contained summaries of 131 courses, all of which were offered last fall. One reason the size of the Spring Guide is relatively large is that Winter Study Period followed the designated questionnaire collection time last December, and additional responses could be collected during that time. This extra time was not available at the end of May. This, however, is not the only reason that the present Guide is smaller. Twenty out of the 131 courses in last year's issue are not even being taught this year! All of the write-ups found in the latest Guide describe courses which will be offered in the Spring. Many people who spent much-appreciated time and effort summarizing questionnaires during the first month of the school year were understandably upset to find no trace of their work in the Guide. Hopefully, their anger will be somewhat abated when they read that their write-ups have not been simply discarded, but are being held on file for future Guides, where they will be more relevent. This was done not only for courses that are bracketed this year, but also for those courses which are the second half of whole-year hyphenated courses. The latter were omitted because those who are taking the first half right now are essentially "locked in", while those who are not currently enrolled are "locked out". Once again, these write-ups are being held in reserve, and will be used in the future. These new policies were implemented for several reasons, not the least of which was a desire to make the Guide a source of useful and relevant information.

The question of what really is "useful and relevant" has been tossed about committee meetings since the inception of the Guide, and is a difficult problem. Efforts have been made to obtain the kinds of information that students feel is helpful in making decisions about courses. Since there are a great number of factors which are important to different people, there are several different types of questions on the questionnaire, but nothing is excluded because it might be a factor which a true academic "should not" consider. Although those people who view the implicit educational value and intellectual stimulation provided by a course as the sole criteria for choosing courses would decry several parts of the questionnaire as irrelevant or insipid, the harsh truth is that many (if not most) Williams College students do consider such factors as the difficulty of grading, heaviness (or lightness) of the workload, and the availability of the professor outside of class when choosing courses. Since the Guide is published for students, to help them make decisions, this information is considered to be vital. Additionally, the questionnaire is revised every semester with the goal of better gaining information which the committee feels will be used by students in course choosing. Right now, alterations in the questionnaire are being considered which would provide for questions regarding the relationship of a course to other courses, and to overall educational objectives. The more student input the committee receives regarding the types of information used in course choosing, the better the quality of the questionnaires and the resulting Guide. For this reason, the committee openly welcomes any comments or suggestions on this or any other aspect of the Guide.

There are several arguments against the reliability of the Guide, and its relevance to the course selection process. Some detractors would look at the relatively low response rate for some of the courses and declare the results statistically insignificant, or at least irrelevant insofar as they tell a prospective student what to expect should he or she decide to enroll in the course. Others might simply declare that the only way to make an intelligent decision about a course is to spend a great deal of time examining the corresponding texts and syllabus, talk with students who have already taken the course, and then decide whether or not one's own educational needs would be met upon enrollment. Both of these arguments have merit, and if the Course Guide were the sole source of information on campus regarding courses and professors, they would carry much more strength. However, as is explained in the introduction to the Guide, "The most important aspect of the Guide to keep in mind when using it is to recognize that it is only one of several methods to gain information about courses at Williams College". Certainly the Guide would better reflect overall student opinion if the questionnaire responses were more numerous, but the information provided is still useful as a part of the overall decision making process. The Guide also provides a quick overview of a large number of courses, something that would take a great deal of time and effort to get through the college grapevine, and information that is probably more objectively reported than from a single student.

Hopefully, the Guide did play a beneficial role in course selection for next semester. All of the faculty members who have all of the students allowed in class distribution, and who filled out questionnaires last Spring, collected them in May, and summarized this Fall are deeply thanked for their time and assistance. Only through a true community effort can the Guide continue to exist, and play a role in intelligent course selection for years to come. Every effort is being made to make the Guide a useful publication, and all comments and suggestions are indeed welcome. Finally, I urge everyone to complete all of their questionnaires, so that the next Guide can be the most complete, informative, and beneficial Guide yet.

Correction

In case it was not already obvious, last week's Outlook article by Mike Lissack was intended to be an overview of the Massachusetts Senate race and Byron Walker's a Brooke apologetic, not vice-versa as they appeared. We regret the error.

Course Guide "a mistake"

Editor's note: Reprinted below are Professor Charles Kadlec's comments from the back Spring 1979 Student Course Guide.

Any student who lets himself be influenced by this "course guide" in his choice of courses is making a mistake, in my opinion. The way to decide whether the contents of a course will serve your educational aims is to spend an hour or two with the syllabus and the texts (both normally available in the library) and to speak with particular individuals who have taken the course and whose judgment you know and trust (the instructor will let you see his back class lists). As for the quality of instruction, it should (I think) be relatively unimportant, and in any case it's very difficult to predict; from rough data about how the average student reacted to Professor Jones this year, how you will react to Jones next year. For one thing, many teachers feel the quality of their teaching varies considerably from one year to the next. A final point. The student-run guide is, in fact, a competitor of the college-run survey. The success of the former may be related to the current troubles of the latter. If the college-run survey were to break down completely, student input into hiring and promotion decisions would be seriously compromised.

The Democrats in 1980: Carter watching out for the wings

by Jeff Nelligan

Several months ago, political taps had commenced sounding over the Potomac for Jimmy Carter. Rising inflation, soaring unemployment, NATO rifts, the devalued dollar and Democratic Congressional devisiveness had resulted in the lowest public confidence a second year President had ever held. Powerful interest groups within the Democratic Party were seething. Jews were appalled by the generous Mid East arms sale. Blacks were angry at the lukewarm support Carter accorded the stagnated Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment Bill. Labor was bitter over the administration's failure to enact labor law reform (although in fact an administration supported bill died in Congress). Liberals were aghast at the Pentagon's booming arms business and Carter's retreat from global nuclear fuel non-proliferation standards. Conservative elements of the party winced over what they felt was Carter's give away the Panama Canal and no firm stance behind the less than tactful Andrew Young. That was several months ago. Now Carter's grin is back, a result of his born-again popularity.

The Camp David talks, Congressional passage of the Humphrey-Hawkins measure (albeit a heavily watered down version,) a comprehensive energy plan, a successful veto of a defense appropriations bill, and civil service reform action have won some admiration from those formerly dissatisfied with the President.

Carter's increasing popularity in some ways reflects the surprising strength of the Democratic party. Heading into the 1978 elections, the Democrats are enjoying unusual popularity, unusual because the party in power is frequently blamed for everything from rising prices and taxes to bad weather. The reason for party strength? A majority of Americans not only trust Democrats more, they feel that Democrats can deal with today's problems more effectively than their Republican opponents. Fewer than 21 per cent of American voters claim Republican ties compared to the more than 45 per cent that classify themselves as Democrats. Republicans once coolly predicting substantial office gains this year are now sober prophets. They will be lucky to pick up two, maybe three, Senate seats, a Governorship and several House chairs, far below earlier dreams of seven to eight Senate seats, 3 Governorships, and as many as 30 House positions. What does this mean for the Democrats and Carter? A stronger nationwide position and more importantly, a crucial head start in the 1980 Presidential race.

During the Carter Fallout earlier this year, speculation swirled around Senator Edward Kennedy of Mass. and California Governor Jerry Brown as likely stand ins for the beleaguered president in 1980. Although Carter's unpopularity is receding, it is wise to watch these two men. Both have strong political positions and cannot, nor will not, be ignored.

Jerry Brown continues to be the West's most adept politician. After spending the last two weeks of his uneventful primary campaign virorously attacking the tax slashing Proposition 13, he lost no time in embracing it when California endorsed it by more than a two to one margin. Brown has strength all over the state and can dance to the tune of most anyone's calling. Conservationists and labor support him yet business and manufacturing developments thrive within California's borders, the states GNP being the fifth largest in the world. Brown has stood by the United Farmworkers, appointed a woman and a black to the State Supreme Court and supported state funded Medicaid abortions. Before Proposition 13, the states budget surplus approached an incredible $6 billion. California has an equitable welfare system, and the nations highest standard of living. Brown has built a base political following with the reforming, unpredictable, non-political image, and his limited government, "era of limits" theme. "No labels sit on him," comments Journalist Russell Baker, "He is neither liberal nor conservative, nor middle-of-the-road and he believes in neither big government nor small government." He has so cleverly implemented Proposition 13 that most Californians believe he was originally in favor of it. If this isn't enough to sell the California Dream, consider this; Brown leads his Republican gubernatorial opponent, Attorney General Evelle Younger, (an early Prop. 13 proponent and a man who outpolled Brown in the 1974 statewide race), in some polls by as much as 30 percentage points.

Senator Edward Kennedy's candidacy has been and is one of the most widely speculated matters in national politics today. Urged by party regulars to enter the 1972 and 1976 races, Kennedy refused to budge, conscientiously and tirelessly supporting the party nominee. In fact, Kennedy was the first major figure Governor Jimmy Carter consulted with before planning his two year marathon bid for the nomination. Carter was ready to revise his strategy if Kennedy chose to move in 1976.

There are few people in the country who don't at least respect Ted Kennedy. Senator Kennedy is a good legislator, a compassionate man, and almost frighteningly charismatic. Until recently, he has been unswervingly loyal to the Carter Administration. Yet Kennedy's broad National Health Insurance plan was challenged by a narrower, special-interest affected Administration version, which no doubt Kennedy saw as inadequate and insulting. Carter's tax-bill passed in the twilight of the 95th Congress was harshly criticized by Kennedy for favoring upper income brackets while ignoring lower income households. Clearly the Kennedy-White House partnership has been worse for wear.

The most amazing aspect of Kennedy's potential candidacy is that although he has repeatedly denied any intention of seeking the nomination, and does not seem to be doing any overt campaigning, polls show him soundly beating incumbent Carter for the nomination and defeating either Reagan or Ford in the general election.

Nevertheless, Kennedy would probably enter the race only if Carter was faltering or if another Democrat, namely Brown, was in the foray. Given the opportunity, Kennedy would most likely want to be first, "... in line for the white House." Besides, he can't stand Brown.

Brown would probably make his move in the early primaries, hoping to set off a domino-like string of victories, much like Carter in '76. Yet if Carter showed strength from the onset, Brown's failure to backdown could result in a disastrous and humiliating defeat. Furthermore, primary rules, drafted anew by Carter partisans in the DNC Winograd Election Reform Commission, shorten the primary season and make it difficult to enter late and garner delegate votes; the result of a complicated percentage formula based on popular votes. Which simply means that Kennedy and Brown can't wait too long for the right signals if they are to stand a chance. Also, the White House has learned from the past. Incumbent Presidents are not impossible to nudge or even overturn. Ronald Reagan and Eugene McCarthy proved that.

Carter has tackled quite a few sensitive and controversial issues. His jump in popularity resulting from the Camp David peace talks is a welcome relief to Administration officials. His Energy Bill, though scalped, has been passed by Congress, as have other measures. These successes, coupled with a successful and non-recessionary anti-inflation drive could be the vanguard of a gleaming future. Yet Carter and his advisors will eye the wings of the Presidential stage uneasily .... and they should.

Williamstheatre opens with alternating repertory

Williamstheatre opens its 1978-79 season at the Adams Memorial Theater with two productions in alternating repertory: Euripides' Orestes and Bertolt Brecht's comedy A Man's A Man. The plays are presented on alternating days beginning tomorrow night. Orestes on Nov. 8, 10, 16, and 18 and A Man's A Man on Nov. 9, 11, 15 and 17. Admission to each play is $3.00 with Williams ID, and tickets may be obtained at the AMT box office on weekdays from 1 pm-5pm or by calling 458-3023. Below are two previews of the upcoming productions.

The chorus of the women of Argos protect Electra in the forthcoming Williamstheatre production of ORESTES.

A Man's a Man

by Stephanie Voss

A Man's A Man is one of Bertolt Brecht's few comedies. Under the direction of Gregory Boyd, the play is set in 1925, centering on the transformation of a man from Kilkoa, by a British machine-gun detachment, an ordinary guy Boyd describes as "similar to Chaplin's tramp." Although the play's point about the ease with which a man may be reshaped is made forcefully, the play is "leavened," as Boyd puts it, by a sense of fun, a "child-like quality."

Speaking about the selection of the play, Boyd says that he personally has a tremendous affinity for Brecht's work. Another reason for the choice, he adds, is that "I like to direct comedy."

Brecht, a German playwright who died in 1956, had some very specific theories about theatre. In a Brecht play, the characters are presented straightforwardly, rather than interpreted.

Another unique aspect of Brecht's drama is that the mechanics of the theatre are exposed. The audience is constantly aware that this is indeed a play. One reason Boyd finds Brecht so appealing is that he is "unabashedly theatrical."

A Man's A Man is from the early period of Brecht's work, and, according to Boyd, has "all sorts of crazy characters." These include the western movies, Charlie Chaplin, Berlin cabarets, and Rudyard Kipling.

In this production, the variety is supplemented by the music, which can best be described as "eclectic." Robert Forrest, '81 composed and orchestrated the six songs and the incidental music for the 7-piece ensemble. He says the music consists of a combination of jazz and musical comedy among other things. He says, "Basically, it's music for the theatre."

The set was designed by Peter Gould, new to the theatre faculty this year. Gould also designed the set for Orestes, and as the two shows are being done in repertory the design overlaps. The sets this year are described as, "bigger than what people are used to seeing here."

Also contributing to the effect of the show are the costumes, which consist for the most part of military uniforms. Costume Designer Martha Hally sees her basic problem as one of making uniforms appear interesting. "It's difficult to create different characters if they're all wearing the same thing."

Several members of the cast commented on the hardships and rewards of the show last Saturday at a technical rehearsal, as they battled with the compounded chaos of lights, music, props and set pieces. Fran Civardi '81, who plays Mrs. Begbick, said, "It's different from anything I've ever done. It's very hard to be so specific in your actions, so disciplined." She added, "you can't become the part, you have to remain objective."

Jim Stone '80, who has the role of Galy Gay, explained further; "the audience has to know exactly what you're doing. Everything internal is wasted."

Another cast member remarked, "This production is true to Brecht, which is rare. It is different, and I think it will be enjoyed."

Orestes

by Merle Rachenberg

Euripides' Orestes has survived since 408 B.C. as a chilling story of the dissolution of family bonds and the corruption of personal goals. It became the most popular play in ancient Athens because of its timely satire. Orestes, the matricide, is condemned to death by a Spartan society that is as cruel and bengeful as his family. Only the rule of law, an Athenian institution, and divine aid lifts him from the mire of violence and murder to which he, pylades, and Electra have sunk.

Directed by Jean-Bernard Bucky, the play is a forceful reminder of our own lawless heritage, as near as Charles Manson or James Earl Ray. Bucky has chosen to build up the starkness and to mix in a frightening dose of modern reality with the appearance of a messenger in a sport coat.

Everything that is done on stage is to heighten the tensions expressed to the audience and to render the static Greek drama into a fluid, dynamic experience. The lighting sucks the audience into the whirling, chaotic house of Atreides by use of screens and a special projected image.

Laurie Boyd's choreography emphasizes the omnipresence of the Greek female chorus. She has them acting as expressions of the emotions of the main characters, from purring satisfaction to malevolent connivance. Aiding in the creation of these effects is Martha Halley's costume designs. The colors are traditional but electrifying and are used to highlight Orestes' meta-motifs.

Stephen Dankner of the Music Department conducts his original score which blends the diverse elements of the play, visual and aural, historical and modern, into a continuum.

The play stars Kevin Davis '81 who portrays the tormented and driven Orestes with great sensitivity. Ann Eakland '80 plays his sister Electra.

Orestes began last summer in conversations between Meredith Hoppin of the Classics Department and Bucky. The interpretation of the play forged between them has resulted in a strong and eerie production which explores Euripides' work to its depth.

Dankner and Forrest compose play scores

One day this fall, Stephen Dankner of the Williams College Music Department sat down at his piano and turned out the entire score for Euripides' 2300-year-old drama Orestes. Williams sophomore Rob Forrest took a little longer to compose a score for Brecht's 20th century comedy, A Man's A Man, about six weeks. Berkshire theatregoers will be able to enjoy both men's work during this week's opening productions of Williamstheatre's fall season at the Adams Memorial Theatre.

Dankner, who also provided the piano score for Williamstheatre's presentation last fall of Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, sees his role in the production of Orestes as providing a musical backdrop. The music will echo the actors' emotional states without eclipsing the action on stage.

Original scores for the accompanying music to ORESTES and A MAN'S A MAN were composed by Stephen Dankner, right, and sophomore Rob Forrest.

To prepare himself for the writing task, Dankner attended the first two weeks of rehearsals to grasp the emotional sense of the play. Then he wrote the score at his piano in less than one day.

He created a musical effect that the audience will find far from traditional. The music is made up of what Dankner calls "occasional pieces, to be performed both during and between acts, but always subordinate to the play." About the writing itself, Dankner said, "I wasn't so worried about individual notes and harmonies as I was about creating an instrumental sounding board to vibrate with the stage's action. The result is a series of musical mirrors that reflect everything from a jazzy lyricism to a charged, chaotic bewilderment."

Although the five instruments he will conduct during the performance have been given both the pitch and the general rhythm of the music, the score is so flexible that no two performances of a particular scene will ever be identical. "It is both random and ordered," he said, "like an abstract painting. By emphasizing or softening any of the five or six notes in a piece, the music takes on the quality of silly putty, a malleable sound sculpture, turning out different each time."

While Dankner's composition is a backdrop in "Orestes," Forrest's music for "A Man's A Man" often becomes the focal point. During his first year at the College, Forrest wrote original words and music on keyboards and percussion for a student-directed production, Ubu Rel. A score for Chekhov's Three Sisters that he wrote as a class assignment caught the eye of Williamstheatre director Gregory Boyd. As a result, Boyd asked him to write music for the songs that will be performed in the play, A Man's A Man.

In contrast to Dankner's avant-garde score, Forrest describes his songs as traditional semi-popular melodies sung both in solo and in chorus. Forrest also composes on the piano, but not with the virtuoso speed of Dankner. "I play around with chords until something strikes me," he said. "In that respect it is a random process. But I took only six weeks to write all the music. Since the songs tend to stop all action on the stage while the singer comes forward to the audience, they stand alone. It's important to get them right."

Pleased audience hears Nachman

by Kevin Hall

Myrna Nachman, Assistant Visiting Professor of Music at Williams last year, returned Sunday to give a recital of solo piano works by Bach, Ravel, Copland, and Schubert. The concert was held in the Chapel and was attended by a relatively small but appreciative audience.

The program opened with J.S. Bach's Partita No. 4 in D Major. Nachman's performance of this, one of the greatest of Bach's dance suites, was remarkably polished and well-shaped. Her control in the fast dances, particularly the Gigue, was impressive, and the slow dances were evenly paced and displayed a sense of inner repose that was deeply moving. She could perhaps have taken more advantage of the possibilities for embellishment, and her use of ornamentation could have been more imaginative. Nevertheless she did her part to combat the modern prejudice against Bach on the piano, showing that such performances are not necessarily stylistic travesties and that they may in certain ways be capable of more expressive power than a conventional harpsichord performance.

Next came another set of dances, Ravel's Valses Nobles et Sentimentales. These seven undulating waltzes are bewitching in their subtlety. After hearing them Debussy remarked that their composer possessed the most delicate ear that had ever existed. They require the utmost sensitivity of touch and pedalling. Nachman did them complete justice, despite the fact that she was struggling with an imperfectly-tuned piano with a strident and unresponsive treble.

The second half of the program began with Aaron Copland's Piano Variations. This set of twenty variations, all of which are generated from an initial four-note motive, is in Copland's austere and fiercely-dissonant early manner, and they abound in huge leaps and other wild figuration. Nachman threw aside all reticence and plunged elbow-deep into the music, exhibiting surprising technical resources and producing a performance of unusual coherence.

The best and the worst playing of the afternoon both came in the final work, Schubert's Sonata in A Major, D. 959. In the first movement and in the scherzo, Nachman was visibly nervous and fatigued, hitting a number of wrong notes and even having a memory lapse. One wonders whether it was wise to place the longest and most mentally-taxing piece on the program last. The last movement's gentle lyricism was beautifully poised, on the other hand, and the Andantino, with its juxtapositions of melancholy and growling recitative, was flawless.

We lost an estimable musician when Ms. Nachman left us last year, and since there is a dearth of solo recitals on this campus, let us hope that she decides to return often.

Chorus to feature works by Haydn and Poulenc

One hundred singers, a full orchestra, and outstanding vocal soloists will combine under the direction of Kenneth Roberts to present the major fall concert of the Williams College Choral Society on Friday, November 10th at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The program includes Haydn's Mass in Time of War and Poulenc's Gloria. Admission is free with Williams ID.

Franz Josef Haydn's Mass in Time of War is one of the last six pieces written after Haydn's return to Vienna from London. Written in 1796, it exemplifies the mature, symphonic nature of his final work, a natural development considering the symphonies and dramatic music he wrote in London. The Mass in Time of War is considered one of his major compositions, and many listeners may be surprised to hear a sound that is reminiscent of Beethoven. The work features the alternation between the choir's text and various rolls and beats of the timpani, this giving it, in Europe, the popular name of "kettledrum Mass" or "timpani Mass."

The Haydn work is performed by the chorus, a classic-sized orchestra, and a quartet of soloists, all of whom are well known in the area. Judith Reichert, soprano, making her debut with the Choral Society, teaches voice and has given a number of recitals. Carol Randles, alto, has most recently been heard in Elgar's Music Makers with the Choral Society, and at the Clark Art Institute in a recital with Kenneth Roberts, pianist. Tenor Peter Payson appears each year with the Springfield Symphony in its opera and choral concerts and was tenor soloist with the Choral Society in its performance of Les Noces. Terry Dwyer, bass, sang in Mozart's Mass in C Minor with the Choral Society last year and has given several recitals at Williams. His next appearance here is in recital on November 20th.

Francis Poulenc's Gloria was composed in 1960 in commission from the Koussevitzky Foundation, and first performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1961 with Charles Munch conducting. This major work for large orchestra, chorus, and soprano solo takes its text from the second movement of the Mass, but is arranged into six movements to display all the influences in Poulenc's writing: Parisian music theatre, Gregorian chant, Stravinsky, the saccharine-sweet quality of devotional hymns, and, above all, the brilliant wit and love of nonsense that was so typical of French art in the first half of this century.

Soloist Mary Beth Peil won the prestigious Metropolitan Opera Auditions in the Spring of 1964, resulting in a contract with that company to tour the United States, Canada, and Mexico. Since then, most of her activity has been with regional opera companies like the Memphis Opera, Lake George Opera, and the New York City Opera. She has been an Affiliate Artist, appearing at colleges in the midwest and on the eastern seaboard, and has sung with such orchestras as the New York Philharmonic, the Honolulu Symphony and Opera, and the Buffalo Symphony.

Conductor Roberts has drawn the members of his orchestra from the Berkshire, Albany, Springfield, and Vermont State Symphonies, as well as using a number of gifted Williams College student instrumentalists.

The Williams College choral society rehearses in Thompson Chapel for its upcoming Fall concert, to be performed this Friday at 8:30 p.m.

Arts Briefs

Soprano presents foreign repertoire

Hanna B. Booth, mezzo-soprano, will perform a program of foreign songs Monday Nov. 13 at 8 p.m. in the Weston Language Center. She will be accompanied by Betty Pierce. Admission is free and open to the public.

Booth's program includes songs by Peter Heise, P. Lange-Muller, Carl Nielsen, Hugo Wolf, Sir Edgar Elgar, Igor Stravinsky, and Edvard Grieg. Most of the selections have never been performed in Northern Berkshires, and the foreign works will be briefly translated and commented on by Booth.

Booth studied voice with the late Gudrun Hojoye in Denmark and sang with the Royal Conservatory Choir in Copenhagen before coming to the United States. While in the Berkshires she has been a student of Carol Randles of Schenectady and has performed with several different groups.

Pierce, the organist and music director at St. John's Episcopal Church in North Adams, is a graduate of Jordan Conservatory. She has performed as both soloist and accompanist at many recitals throughout the United States and Canada.

Author/poet to read from works

The poet and story writer Raymond Carver will read from his own works in Room 3, Griffin Hall on the Williams College campus Nov. 13 at 8 p.m.

Carver has written three books of poetry, "Near Klamath," "Winter Insomnia," and "At Night the Salmon Move." He has also written three books of short stories, "Put Yourself in My Shoes" (a chapbook), "Furious Seasons," and "Will You Please Be Quiet, Please," which was nominated for the National Book Award in 1976.

Carver has won the O. Henry Prize Story Awards in 1973, 1974, and 1975, and the Best American Short Story Award in 1967.

The reading is sponsored by the Williams College English Department.

Marlboro Music returns

Music from Marlboro will return to Williamstown on November 9, when four outstanding soloists will present chamber music works by Schumann, Janacek, and Faure at the Clark Art Institute at 8:30 p.m. Admission is free with I.D.

The Marlboro Music Festival, now under the artistic direction of Rudolf Serkin, was founded in 1950 by three families bearing the famous musical names of Serkin, Busch, and Marlow, and brings together for two months each summer leading musicians from many countries. Both young professionals and mature artists come to Marlboro, Vermont, at their own expense, to exchange ideas and explore together the vast repertoire of chamber music in an informal and intimate setting removed from the pressures of professional concert life. Since they began in 1965, the Music from Marlboro concerts, an extension of the Festival into the winter months, have become a unique part of the American chamber music scene. The New York Times claims these concerts are "as valuable as a national forest and should be put under the protection of Congress."

On November 9 at 8:30 at the Clark Art Institute, Bruno Canino, piano, Mitchell Stern, violin, Sarah Clarke, viola, and Jerry Grossman, cello, will play piano quartets by Schumann and Faure and an interesting but relatively unknown work for cello and piano by the early twentieth-century Czech composer Leos Janacek.

Music in the Round concert meets with mixed success

by Jackson Galloway

The second concert of the Music in the Round series was held on Friday, Nov. 3 in Thompson Chapel. The program included works by Lajtha, Ravel, Hamilton, and Dvorak.

The first movement of the Lajtha trio brought the concert off to a good start but quickly bogged down in repetition and the poor blend of the ensemble. The presto movement was completely marred by overbearing violin and a viola too timid to assert itself underneath the sustained ostinato. The last two movements followed suit as interesting melodic and rhythmic ideas were slowly put to death by lack of individual coloring and poor ensemble playing. It seems that the only redeeming feature of the trio in this performance was that it presented an opportunity for the instrumentalists to show their individual techniques.

The Ravel sonata for violin and piano began with the same faults but rapidly resolved them as the piano became clearer and sharper in its blend with the violin. The blues movement was especially delightful.

The Dvorak quintet which ended the concert provided an enjoyable style interchange. Though at times the performance lacked energy, melodic interchange and texture was superb, upset only occasionally by the insistence of the second violin. The allegro assai provided a spectacular finale to a good program. By far, the highlight of the evening was the Ian Hamilton Serenata for violin and clarinet. The violin and clarinet were in perfect balance as they wove the graceful melodies of the andante and grazioso movements. Susan Hohenberg, the clarinetist, added especially to the vivo finale.

Overall, the concert provided a refreshing and enjoyable alternative to the conventional Homecoming activities.

Literary readings continue

John Irving, author of The World According To Garp, and Linda Pastan, poet and recipient of the Poetry Society of America's di Catagnola Award, will read from their work in the auditorium of the Clark Art Institute at 8:00 p.m. on Wednesday, November 8.

Paston has published four books of poetry, and her poems and reviews have appeared in numerous magazines including The New Yorker, Atlantic, The New Republic and Ms. She has received a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts and has served as a judge for many poetry contests. She will discuss various aspects of poetry in the Makepiece Room at Greylock at 11:00 a.m. on November 9.

John Irving, novelist and short story writer, has received Fellowships from the Guggenheim Foundation and the National Endowment for the Arts and has been awarded a Rockefeller Foundation Grant. His most recent novel, The World According To Garp, has been on the best seller list for months and is a main selection of the Book-of-the-Month Club. At 3:00 p.m., on November 8, he will discuss the writing of fiction at Southern Vermont College in Bennington, Vermont. Both the discussions and the readings are free and open to the public.

DELTA BOOKS

No, it's not in Virginia...

by Bruce Deitz

As winter approaches and the snow begins to coat the campus, you can be certain that Williams will not be hidden from the minds of those who really know. Williams College has finally achieved the recognition it so rightly deserves in the new Hawes Comprehensive Guide to Colleges published last month.

The Hawes guide is a little different from most other college references because it rates schools on their social prestige and social achievement. Social prestige is judged according to the number of members of the social register who attended the college. Social achievement is determined by the number of college graduates found in a random sample of entrants in Who's Who in America each year.

While top honors in the social prestige category went to Harvard (pronounced Hahvahd), Williams (pronounced Willums) was not far behind, ranking sixth in the nation. Next time someone confuses Williams College for William and Mary or William Smith, you can point this out and emphasize that this is a reflection on them and not your socially appealing alma mater. Coming in second was Yale, followed by Princeton, University of Pennsylvania, and University of Virginia. University of California at Berkeley and Stanford University follow Williams in positions seven and eight.

The logical question of course would be to ask how far from the bottom would one find Amherst and Wesleyan. Amherst somehow came in 16th and Wesleyan ranked 25th. (Now what's more important—a football game or national social prestige?) Both are in the "very high" category, just below the top section of stellar institutions like Williams. Out of a possible score of 1000, Williams received 748 points, more than doubling Amherst's meager attempt at 300 and Wesleyan's futile effort at 168.

In terms of social achievement Williams wins again, ranking 35th. Amherst is just behind in the 36th positions and Wesleyan is listed as 59th. All are in the "very high" category.

Gaining admission to all three is considered "hard." The cost of tuition is listed in the most expensive category, but this should surprise few.

The third major piece of information the Hawes guide uses to examine schools is the mean faculty salary. The logical line of reasoning would be that the better faculties receive higher salaries. Few professors here would agree though. The faculty salaries at Williams are in the "low average" category at $16,700. The Amherst faculty's average pay is $19,300 and Wesleyan's faculty are paid an average of $18,200, both in the "high average" category. Perhaps the difference in salary reflects the multitude of amenities received for teaching at such a prestigious school with such gifted students.

While the value of these indices is of questionable merit, they do prove an interesting insight into contemporary evaluations of educational programs. All in all, Williams comes out as the pinnacle of The Little Three. So keep those noses high and those pink and green Lacoste shirts on. You have four years to seek out a member of the social register or predict the next entry into Who's Who.

Even cowgirls . . . Are We Not Men?

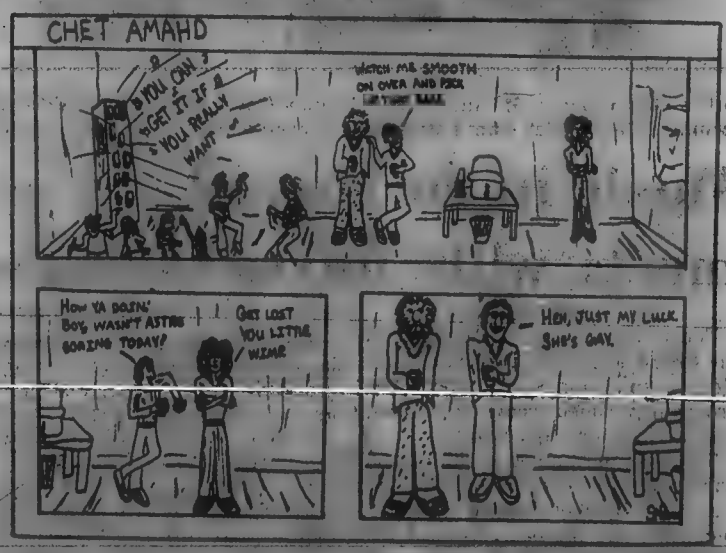
by Bruce Smith

"Modern" has become one of our most loaded contemporary words. Once a term of progression, it has come to designate regression and contempt. In the rock 'n' roll world, "modern love" translates into the latest form of caustic pessimism. Whether the style be that of the Jam's This Is The Modern World with its intense assertion of individualistic defiance or the pathetically innocent and vulnerable vision of the eccentric Jonathan Richman and the Modern Lovers' first album, the song inevitably remains the same, for the answer is still an old one: "We gotta get out of this place."

Devo and Pere Ubu are the Cleveland and Akron equivalents of "post-existential" cynics and mourners. The Midwest will never be ready for them and even London audiences squirm a good deal. They are, without exaggeration, the dead fish floating to the top of Lake Erie, the latest chroniclers of the empty life, "the sound of things falling apart" (the words of Devo's Bob Mothersbaugh), and they even upset my dog.

Devo's debut, Q: Are We Not Men: A: We Are Devo!, produced by the unpredictable Brian Eno of Roxy Music fame, spend their energies in the portrayal of "jocko homo", the de-evolved simian man: "They tell us that-We lost our tails-Evolving up-From little snails-I say it's all-Just wind in sails-Are we not men?-We are DEVO."

The means Deve employs to illustrate their devolution theory are varied. Their sardonic wit ranges from the perverse ("My baby she said sloopy-I think I missed the whole") to the purposely mundane ("Too Much Paranoias" quotes the McDonald's Big Mac Attack jingle). Their music meantime has moments of compelling rock 'n' roll, but mostly breaks down into a mealange of sordid screaching and off-tempo rhythms (as on their robotic version of "Satisfaction"). Clearly, like Talking Heads, this is the music of fragments.



Ironically, "Mongoloid" is a truly first rate rocker circa '66. Its infectious but understated riffs, and terse lyrics are as convincing as its everyman theme is ominous ("And he had a job-And he brought home the bacon-So that no one knew he was a mongoloid").

Less overly clever and smug is Pere Ubu, a band which plunges us amidst the post-modern ruins of time and place with their debut, The Modern Dance, an uneven patchwork of gloom and faint hope.

The first Pere Ubu was the creation of French absurdist playwright Alfred Jarry (1873-1907). Ubu was an accumulation of excess deformity, another "mongoloid", another "de-evolved man."

Pere Ubu the band, however, are as informal and evocative as Devo is robotic and dogmatic. Lead singer David Thomas strains painfully and sadly, before working himself up into a gutteral frenzy. Occasionally he bangs hammer upon metal to give a focal point to music that is more often than not a chaotic clang of mirky dissonance. Side Two is particularly "inaccessible", while in this context the song titles possess a sharp Satanic edge to them: "Real World", "Over My Head", "Sentimental Journey", "Humor Me."

"Laughing" is the synthesis: Ubu alternating between crips jams and ethereal flute interludes with the former more successful.

Chang not "schizophrenic" but versatile writer

by Johnsetter

"There are plenty of crummy books out, including some of mine." Modesty is not the stock of most authors. William Chemistry Professor Raymond Chang, who made the above comment, is not exactly the typical academic author.

Chang's two most recently-published books are a textbook, Physical Chemistry with Applications to Biological Systems and a book on the Chinese language, Speaking of Chinese. While the second work was co-authored by his wife Margaret, one might think that two such divergent subjects would require a schizophrenic author.

However, "In these days of specialization and hyper-specialization," observed Mr. Chang, "we are often so busy trying to refine our knowledge that sometimes we narrow excessively our interests."

"If you like a topic," he continued, "even if you don't know that much about the subject, why not write a book on it?" Chang added that proper research was vital. The success of a work depends upon much more than the author's initial expertise in the field.

Large chunks of time are an obvious prerequisite for authorship. Although diligent students may not believe that such a thing as spare time exists (of course, professors may not believe that such a thing as the diligent student exists), professors somehow manage to find time to write.

"At Williams," said Professor Chang, "there's not always that much to do. The town is, uh, limited in its activities," he said. "Everything you do is wrapped up with the college. There's time to write," he concluded.

Writing obviously brings more benefits than filling the author's time. A reader of Speaking of Chinese will come away not just with a sure-fire cocktail-party topic but with insight into Chinese culture through its language. Readers of a well-written textbook obtain new understanding of some topic—ideally enough understanding to be able to skip the class on the subject. The author learns as well.

"The Chemistry text taught me a lot," observed Chang. "It brought me up to date with the literature—I was forced to read a lot of papers I would otherwise not touch—and it helped me to organize my class lectures." It is possible, though, that the author learns more about the subject after he finishes a book.

"When a student comes up to you," Chang began, "and he says, 'Your book is not clearly written,' it hurts." He pouted and continued, "You think to yourself, 'I blew it.'" Constructive criticism is by definition helpful, though.

"The lesson you learn is that writing a book is just communication," he said, "but it is a lesson that is not specific to a particular book but applicable to teaching in general: you have to do something comprehensible."

Mr. Chang found student needs in a book almost as hard to fulfill as they are easy to recognize. Students want a book that is interesting, relevant, and readable," he said. "They want everything."

The gap filled by Speaking of Chinese was somewhat narrower. "There are dozens of books on Chinese," Mr. Chang said. "Unfortunately, they are either ten-page pamphlets from which you learn too little," and he paused, "or seven hundred page tomes from which you learn too much."

"It seemed," he said, "that no book talked about Chinese seriously enough without boring you to death. There was a lot of interest on the subject, so I talked my wife into it."

Co-authorship has its hazards. When first asked, Dr. Chang had a dubious opinion on the matter.

"I don't recommend it," he laughed. Fortunately, Margaret Chang has a good sense of humor as her husband's, and Mr. Chang continued, "I think the biggest benefit of co-authorship is in the quality of criticism you give to one another. No one looks at a work," he said, "with as critical an eye as someone whose name is going to be on it."

Mr. Chang followed his maxim of criticism throughout the interview. When he wasn't damning his work with faint praise, he made it clear that his writing a book made him in no way real "one-up" to those in the Williams community who have not.

Mr. Chang does prefer to write books, on all sorts of subjects. At the risk of being accused of dilettantism, he has a good time exploring diverse fields. "I think," he said with a grin, "that it is more fun to try to be a jack-of-all-trades than a master of one field." There's certainly no harm [illegible]

Mountaineering #7

PROFICIENCY TEST

Oh sure, injured indignation. "A quiz?" you protest, feigning ignorance. Well sir, what do you think these mountaineering[1] lessons have been all about? That's right—knowledge, and the accumulation thereof. So put your gray matter on red alert and start cracking. Here's where you move to the top of the mountain. Or get left at base camp. And, by the way, remember that the difference between the two is all in your head.

Multiple Choice

Drinking Busch beer is known as:
(A) Sucking 'em up
(B) Downing the mountains
(C) Quaffing
(D) Peaking

Answer: True

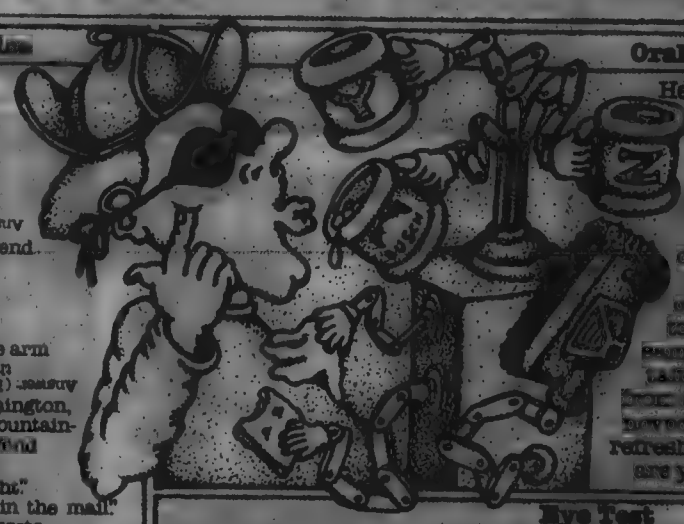
A mountaineer's best friend is his:
(A) Dog
(B) Bailbondsman
(C) Main squeeze
(D) Free and flexible arm

Answer: (D) Without it, a Busch in the hand is worth nothing

Bennington Baxter-Bennington, the noted financier of mountaineering expeditions, was fond of saying:
(A) "The price is right."
(B) "Your check is in the mail."
(C) "Keep all your assets liquid."
(D) "Put this on my tab, fella."

[illegible]

The best place for a mountaineer to take a romantic fall is:
(A) Somewhere over the rainbow
(B) 24 hours from Tulsa
(C) In the craggy peaks
(D) Deep in the heart of Texas



[illegible]

You can recognize a mountaineer by his:
(A) [illegible]
(B) "Nerd" [illegible]
(C) [illegible]
(D) Preppy [illegible]

[illegible]

The most natural reason for mountaineering is:
(A) Because it's there
(B) Because it helps [illegible]
(C) [illegible]
(D) [illegible]

Answer: None of the above. There is no natural reason for mountaineering. Mountaineering is the activity of people who have always felt close to the earth. All come to the same point.

Oral Exam

Here's where you put your tongue to the test. Arrange three glasses, two ordinary beers and one Busch in front of yourself. Ask a friend to blindfold you and your each into a glass. Sip all three, taking pains to close your private bathroom doors — either by saying a quick coda or loudly clearing your throat with a bell-ringing hack. Identify the Busch. The one you've just removed from will be a mouthful of perspiration. This should be easy. Cold refreshment and natural smoothness are your two big cues to the [illegible]

Eye Test

This is the visual perception portion. Simply read the pertinent subject phrase and determine which picture most closely symbolizes it. Then, check the appropriate box.

(A) ☐ Mountaineering (B) ☐
(A) ☐ Mountain Peak (B) ☐
(A) ☐ Mountain Lion (B) ☐
(A) ☐ Mountain Pine (B) ☐
(A) ☐ Mountain Music (B) ☐
(A) ☐ Mountain Cat (B) ☐

Scoring 10-12 correct: congratulations, bucky, your flag waves at the summit. 7-9 correct: not bad but there's room for improvement. 4-6 correct: college can't come soon enough. 1-3 correct: mountaineering's not a sport, [illegible] and read the rest to you?

Mountaineering is the science of [illegible]. The hardy enthusiasts use it to [illegible] the snowy, icy peaks sported by the best resorts and [illegible] it to the max, securely screwing taste buds.

Don't just reach for a beer. [illegible] Head for the mountains.

Tuition taxes

Dear editor:

Despite its shortcomings, the Record does manage to pique the interest of at least a few of us recent grads. I am tempted to comment on several developments recorded in those pages—the Trustees tepid attempt to bluff their way through the South Africa issue; the depolitization of the newly named Gay People's Union; the College Council's groundbreaking experimentation with "jawbone censorship."

However, at this time I will limit myself to the debate over the tuition tax credit. As a loyal alumnus and firm believer in the sanctity of The Free Exchange of Ideas at Williams, I was of course alarmed to see the financial aid office take a stand on this issue. Those subversives that John Chandler wanred us about must have taken over Mr. Flynt's office. And we better watch out, or they'll sneak across the hall and take over our first line of defense for our Investments, the Treasurer's office.

My alarm is only slightly diminished by the fact that Mr. Flynt is right. His Record debating partner, Jeff Nelligan, supports the tax credit notion with some shaky reasoning. First, he contends that the tax credit would not raise taxes, as opposed to the Carter proposal to increase the BEOG program, and that it would therefore affect "only those with school-aged children." In fact, neither plan would raise taxes. Both would be financed through an increased deficit. The only difference is that Carter's proposal will add only $1.2 billion, while Nelligan's would add at least $7.5 billion.

Secondly, while the Carter program would add to the bireaucracy at HEW, the tax credit scheme would add to the bureaucracy at the IRS. And as Sen. Kennedy has noted, it is hardly evident that the IRS is a more effective administrator of federal spending programs than other government agencies.

Third, the tuition tax credit is inequitable and inefficient. How many students will not be able to go to Williams becuase they can get an extra $250 or even $500? Moreover, the plan would degract from the progressivity of federal taxes. Over one-fourth of the benefits would go to less than 5 per cent of the taxpayers who earn over $30,000 a year.

Finally, Mr. Nelligan assumes that students and parents deserve relief, presumably because of increased tuition costs. However, tuition is not going up faster than the ability to pay. The Congressional Budget Office observes that private tuition ate up 27.8 per cent of median family income in 1967, compared with 27.5 per cent in 1970.

Both Nelligan and Flynt concentrate on federal government actions, ignoring the active role that the College could play within the confines of the Purple Valley. Rather than emphasizing new plant construction at Williams, the College could make the endowment for financial aid the first fundraising priority. A large number of alumni-like Mr. Sneath of Union Carbide—could ease their consciences (or polish their corporate images) by increasing such contributions. Then a tree or whatever could be named after them so that the world would take note.

Of course, this change in priorities would require Williams to take an active role in integrating egalitarian social aims with its own operation, at some cost. This would be a radical departure. Nevertheless, Williams might want to familiarize itself with the concept of social responsibility, at least in this area. Then college officials wouldn't have to degrade themselves by saying blatantly "political" things on "controversial issues of our times.

Sincerely,
Ben Bernach '79

The Financial Aid office has taken no stand on the tuition tax credit issue. Mr. Flynt, writing at the invitation of the RECORD, was speaking only for himself. —Ed.

Open letter to Ross Keller

An Open Letter to Ross Keller:

Between 8 and 9 a.m. on Saturday, Homecoming morning, I noticed a phenomena you might not be aware of: 40 people came to breakfast in Greylock. Ordinarily this would be fine, not even remarkable. But Saturday breakfast had been changed to brunch, 11:30 - 1:00, and nobody knew!

I carefully checked the Register for any hour changes - no notice. The Record - no notice. The front doors of Greylock - nothing. In fact, I only discovered what you were up to when, at 11:30, I saw the notice on the checker's desk. When at least 10 per cent of a residential unit is unaware of dining hall hour-changes, a problem in advanced wearning is clearly indicated.

In the future, I hope we will see departures from the schedule posted a) in the Register, b) on the front doors of the dining hall, and c) in the dining hall at least 24 hours beforehand.

Sincerely,
Meile Rockefeller '79

Rabbi will reach

To the editor:

In the article (October 17) regarding the selection of a rabbi, I am quoted as saying that Rabbi Soltes is to serve "the Jewish community only, and not the entire college." I have no intention of limiting the rabbi in that fashion.

Your reporter inquired about possible plans for ecumenical events in which he might work with us and with Father Graap, and in response I said, among other things, that since Father Graap and Rabbi Soltes spend a limited number of hours per week on the campus, their time could easily be all used up in serving the needs of their own religious traditions—a practical concern, not a matter of limited jurisdiction, as your article seems to say.

We would be delighted to see the rabbi reach out to the entire college, and glad to work with him as the occasion may arise.

Bar Nestle's

To the College Community,

Nestles' candy bars have been removed from Williams College vending machines. This seemingly insignificant change stems from our deep concern over Nestles irresponsible marketing of Lactogen in the Third World.

Nestles Corporation, to counteract the Western World's shrinking market for infant formula, has cultivated a third world market. "Milk Nurses", dressed in white uniforms and showing concern for the health of these babies, offer free samples of Lactogen to expectant mothers. This formula, combined with impure water, stored without refrigeration and served from insufficiently sterile bottles has exacerbated the already high infant mortality rate. Furthermore, mothers lose the ability to breast feed by the time their free samples have been depleted. However, infant formula is expensive, costing for example 40 per cent of the average Pakistani laborer's daily wage. Poor mothers must stretch the formula by serving diluted bottles of Lactogen to their hungry children. 82 per cent of mothers using the formula in Barbados make a four day can last from 5 days to 3 weeks. It is no wonder that the percentage of children dying from malnutrition or suffering permanent brain damage has increased significantly since Nestles began to market Lactogen in Third World countries.

The deadly effects of Nestles' irresponsible advertising practices cannot be ignored! In view of these operations we ask you to participate in our boycott of Nestles goods. All Nestles brand name products, Nescafe, Nestles, Libby's, Stouffers, Wispride, and Jarlsberg cheese.

Misrepresentation

To the editor:

Unfortunately, in October 31 issue of the Record my viewpoint on the question of investments and apartheid was misrepresented. I have never suggested a policy of American corporations working for an "amelioration of apartheid." Corporations are not in any position to effect political changes in South Africa. Any economic benefits which corporations provide for blacks, through salaries, are more than offset by the taxes which the companies must give to the regime. (A ratio of 77 million in wages to 200 million in taxes in 1977). It is my and W.A.A.C.'s belief that withdrawal is the best step for change that American companies can take. We do feel that the college should work with other institutions to vote stock proxies in order to work for corporate withdrawal. Only after such efforts have failed should the college prodently sell its stock in those companies which continue to operate in South Africa.

Sincerely,
Bruce Goerlich '80

GPA deflation

To the editor:

I would like to let the College community know that I am one person who has conscientiously tried to keep down the G.P.A. JUMP. Through perseverance I have managed to keep my G.P.A. down to an 11:25, but it hasn't been easy. I've tried my hardest to be poorly in my courses, but to no avail. I do no reading, I do not write assigned papers, I deliberately botch exams and I insult my professors, but still I get A's. I have found that Williams is just so easy that it is almost impossible to prevent G.P.A. inflation. I sincerely hope that my fellow students will share my concern on this issue and do their part in keeping G.P.A. jump down.

Profs will present papers at Mt. Hope conference

Members of the Williams College faculty will gather this Saturday, Nov. 11 at the Elm Tree House on Mount Hope Farm for a conference about something they all have in common . . . teaching.

"It will be an opportunity for the faculty members to discuss innovative teaching ideas," said Paul Solomon, assistant professor of psychology and one of the conference organizers. "This won't involve philosophical issues. The conference will deal with the nuts and bolts of teaching."

James Maas, a professor of psychology at Cornell University will address the gathering on "Improving the Teaching-Learning Process in Undergraduate Education." Maas, a 1961 Williams graduate was the first director of Cornell's Center for the Improvement of Undergraduate Education. He teaches introductory psychology to 1,400 students, Cornell's largest single class.

Maas is an accomplished filmmaker who has won several national and international awards for his work. He is also director of the Cornell Candid Camera Collection, which features educational films based on Candid Camera television program footage.

Brnett Cates, assistant professor of Germanic is one of five Williams faculty members who will speak at the conference. His topic is "Comprehension-based Language Teaching." Irving Straten, a visiting lecturer in economics and Director Chief of the Economic Development Institute at the World Bank, will discuss "Teaching Government Officials Analytical Techniques." Sean Sloane, assistant professor of physical education, will present a paper titled "For Better Teaching: The Medium or the Message." And Robert Kavanaugh, an assistant professor of psychology, will speak on "College Teaching Applications from Piagetian Theory."

College nominates Watson fellows

The Williams Selection Committee for the Thomas J. Watson Fellowship has nominated for post-graduate study and travel abroad. The nominees are Belle Zars Anderson, Albert G. Blakey IV, Anne W. Salladin, and Craig O. White.

Anderson plans to write a biography of one or two families or groups of immigrants to the United Kingdom, Israel, Nepal, and India, detailing how these immigrants merge into alien societies in different parts of the world.

Blakey hopes to observe and study the traditional forms of music and its role in Western and Central Africa culture by living in communities and becoming part of tribal music families.

Salladin would like to spend time in Japan and Chinese settlements to document through photography the visual influence of traditional architecture upon modern urban design. White hopes to explore urban housing progress and problems in Ghana and Kenya.

These four students will compete with 176 candidates from 48 other institutions. Each year the Watson Foundation chooses 70 graduating seniors for a year of independent study and travel abroad.

WHAP plans Nov. 15 fast

The Williams Hunger Action Coalition (WHAP) has scheduled a series of events to raise student consciousness on global development and world hunger.

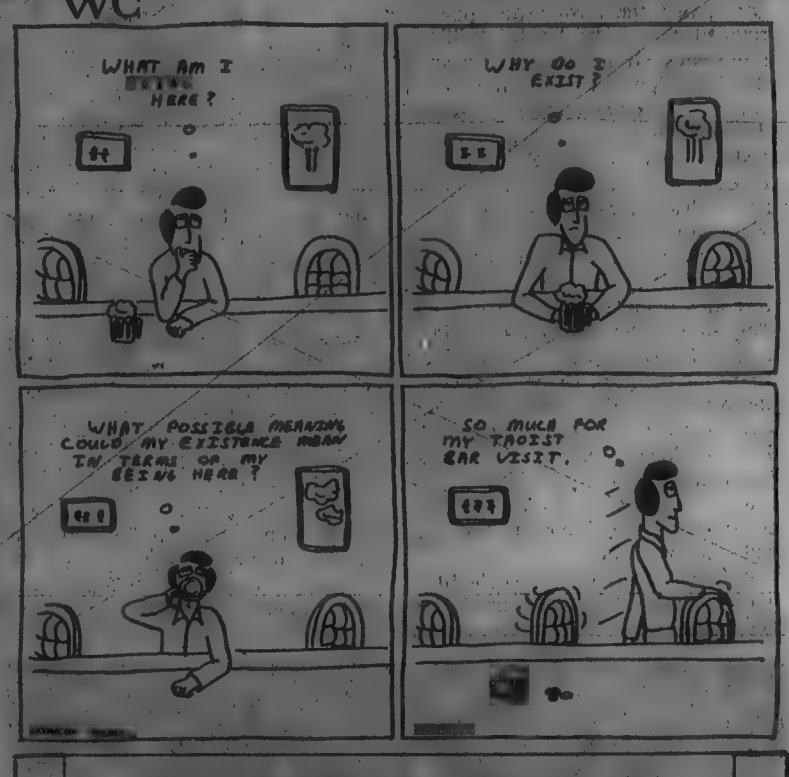
The activities centering around a three part public television series and a day long fast on Nov. 15, are planned in connection with Oxfam America's world hunger week beginning Nov. 12.

The public television series, entitled "The Fight for Food," is to be shown Nov. 12 at 8 p.m., Nov. 13 at 8 p.m., and Nov. 16 at 9 p.m. The WHAP will meet with interested college and community leaders in the Dennett House T.V. lounge to view and dicsuss the series.

The group will also meet on Nov. 14 at 9 p.m. in the Dennett lounge to view "Distant Thunder," Stayajit Ray's classic film on famine in an Indian village.

The dollar value of the food saved during the Nov. 15 fast will be sent to Oxfam America to support overseas self-help development projects. The WHAP urges all students and faculty to support the fast; pledge forms will be available at the major dining halls on Nov. 9, 10 and 12.

Feminist films



The Williams Feminist Alliance will be showing two documentary films by Helena Solberg-Ladd tonight at 7:30 p.m. in Weston Language Center. "The Emerging Woman" is an award-winning film about the history of women in the United States with a section devoted to the contributions of black women. "Double Day" is a highly acclaimed documentary about working women in Latin America. All are welcome. Admission is free.

Display

There will be an exhibition of early American furniture from the Charles M. Davenport collection opening Monday November 13 at 7:30 in the rotunda of the Williams College Museum of Art. The exhibition will include thirty pieces of 17th, 18th, and 19th century American furniture selected from 168 pieces of furniture which were bequeathed to the college museum by Mr. Davenport in 1943. Refreshments will be served.

Senior Portraits

Senior portraits are now being taken for the 1979 yearbook. We want this yearbook to be a true representation of our seniors and one that will surpass all previous books. We ask that everyone dress properly. Women are adyised not to wear horizontal stripes as they tend to distort the wearer. The same applies to bulky turtlenecks. Men are requested to wear a suit or at least a shirt, tie, and jacket.

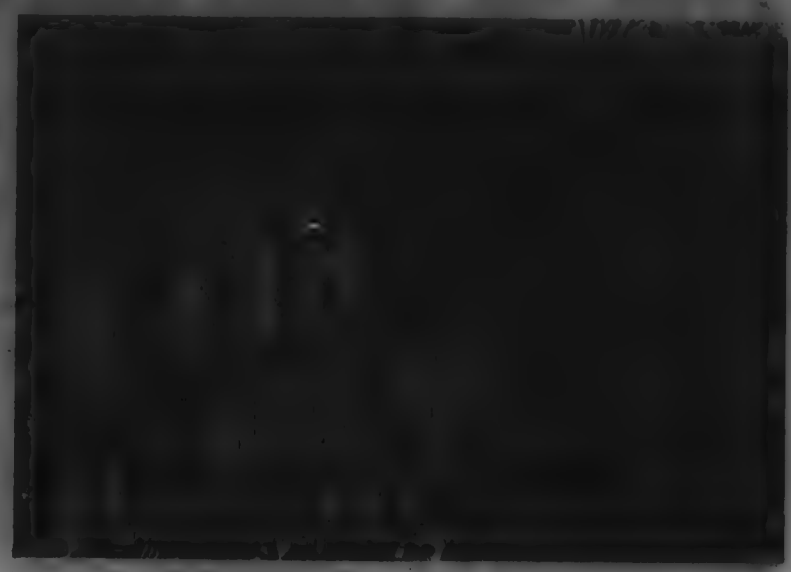
What is the evolution of O'Keefe according to Darwin?

First, there was the idea.
A brew with a hearty, full-bodied flavor. A quaff smooth and easy going down. A tankard with a head full of pride. That is the origin of the species O'Keefe.
Having adapted and differentiated itself, O'Keefe prospers and proliferates throughout the land. It's a perfect example of the survival of the fittest. And it's also because, "It's too good to gulp."

Eph booters clobber Wesleyan Cardinals

By Dave Barry

The Cardinals came to Cole Field hoping to spoil Homecoming and capture the Little Three soccer title Saturday morning. They left disappointed and denied. Williams won 3-1 and the booters now look to next Saturday's showdown at Amherst where they can clinch their second Little Three title of this decade.



The Ephs are 12-1 undefeated in 7 starts, and have a shot at becoming the winningest team in Williams history. UCON, ranked ninth nationally in division one soccer, comes to Williamstown this Wednesday to try to break the streak.

Saturday's game was not pretty to watch. Over fifty fouls were called; four yellow warning cards were handed out. The play was rough and sometimes bitter. But Williams is used to all that. Power soccer is their game, and the harder an opponent runs at them, the harder Williams fights back. Gregg Hartman '79 set up the first Eph score five minutes in simply by outhustling a Cardinal defender to a ball nearly over the endline and centering it to Dan Friesen '81 at the top of the penalty area. Friesen ripped a shot before Wesleyan could recover.

Wesleyan tied the score with eight mintues left in the half by netting a free kick from some forty yards out. This slap in the face made Williams angry. Hartman again provided the spark for the goal. Dribbling through the Wesleyan defense he was brought down hard in the penalty area. Like last weekend against Springfield, Hartman's initial shot from the charity stripe was blocked, but he coolly put in the rebound. The half ended 2-1 Williams.

The second period was like the first, only rougher. Wesleyan felt frustrated and gave vent to this feeling by overplaying the man. In short, they lost their cool. Williams took advantage of this and notched a two-goal lead early in the half. Gregg Hartman got his second assist of the day hitting Peter May '79 crashing to goal. May blasted a banana ball past the helpless Cardinal keeper for the insurance tally.

Wesleyan did attempt to come back. But after a shaky start, junior goaltender Doug Orr came on strong to stop them. With four minutes left Wesleyan was awarded a penalty kick. The momentum was turning for the Cardinals; there was enough time to gain a tie. But Orr rose to the occasion and blocked the shot. His defense cleared the rebound. Williams had half a Little Three title.

Harriers cop Little 3 title

In its most brilliant team race of the season, the Williams Men's Cross Country squad thrashed both Amherst and Wesleyan to capture once again the Little Three Varsity and JV titles.

Final scores for the varsity were Williams 23, Amherst 41 and Wesleyan 68, while in the JV race they were Williams 26, Amherst 39 and Wesleyan 67. As indicated, the expected threat by the Amherst Lord Jeffs to wrest the crown away from the Ephs never materialized. Williams has now been Little Three champions for nine straight years.

The JV squad led off the meet and set the tone for the day. The five scorers finished in a solid 3-4-5-6-8 pack to wrap up the victory. They were, in order: Don Hangen, Gordon Coates, Arch Perkins, Dan Sullivan and Steve Bellerose. Rounding out the roster were Basil Briggs, Jay Hellmuth, Charley DeWorld, Bob Tyler, John Bescherer, Jim Hoch and Joel Hollander.

In the varsity race, the Purple dominated from the very start. After the half-mile mark, a tight five-man bunch of Ephs opened up a huge lead over the Jeff pack. While Williams had had trouble maintaining its group strategy earlier in the year, this time the runners could have been roped together. As usual, Tom Schreck gradually pulled away from the whole field as Wesleyan's Spence Smith moved up to challenge. Schreck won the individual championship going away. Behind him, the rest of the Eph pack stayed together and cruised easily home to a 4-5-6-7 finish. Steve Polasky, Phil Darrow, Garrick Leonard and Mike Behrman were all within fifteen seconds of each other in an awesome display of team power. Also with strong races for Williams were Pat Dobson in 14th, Rusty Anderson in 18th, Cam Virrill in 19th and John McCammond in 25th.

Coming off this resounding triumph, Williams will face stiffer competition this weekend at the New Englands in Boston. If they can keep the same rock-like formation, the runners should fare well against the big schools.

Wesleyan thrashes gridders 24-12

by Mary Kate Shea

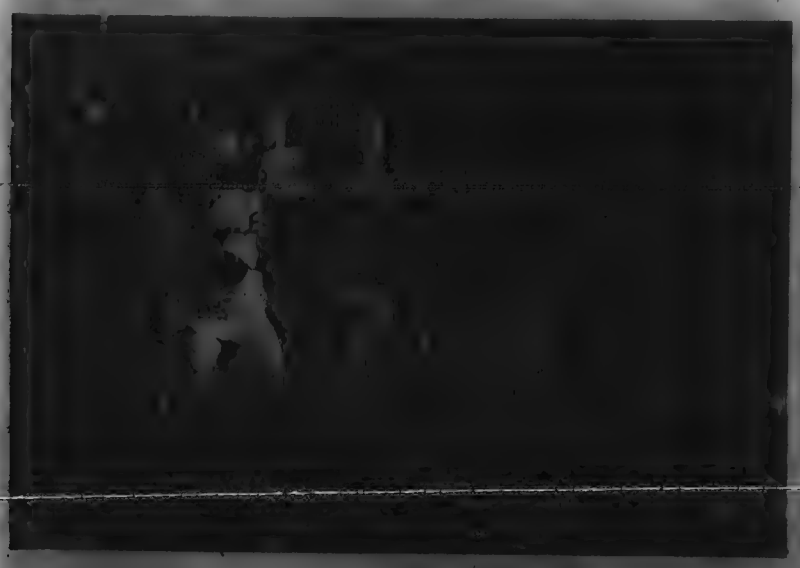
The Wesleyan University Cardinals combined seven interceptions with a potent running attack to roll past the Williams College football team 24-12 in Little Three action. The loss, Williams' first to Wesleyan since 1970, drops the Ephs' season record to 4-3 and means that they must beat Amherst next weekend to share the Little Three crown with Wesleyan and Amherst.

The Cardinals came up with 10 points in the last three minutes of the first half and 14 points in the third quarter to jump to a 24-0 lead that Williams was unable to surmount.

Although Wesleyan had only 56 yards passing on the afternoon, the Williams defense could not contain the Cardinals' consistent ground gains. Led by running backs Bob Latessa (90 yards in 26 carries) and Mike Scacca (66 yards in four carries), Wesleyan's running game produced 223 yards in 61 carries.

The Ephs gained virtually all of their 316 yards in total offense through their passing attack. Senior Greg Collins was Williams' top rusher with 46 yards in 13 carries, but the Ephs total yards rushing came to just 21 yards as quarterback Bob Lutz was sacked by the Wesleyan defense five times for a loss of 67 yards. Lutz completed 14 of 35 passes for 272 yards, but also threw seven critical interceptions.

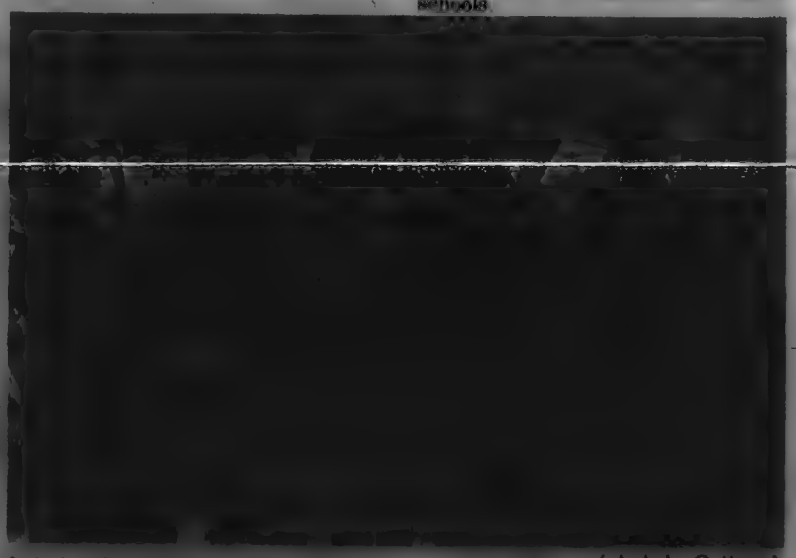
Wesleyan's touchdowns came on a two-yard plunge by Spike Cooney, a 61-yard spring by Scacca, a three-yard run by Dennis Robinson, and a 20-yard field goal by quarterback John Papa.



A 30-yard punt return and a 13-yard penalty on Williams gave Wesleyan possession at the Ephs' 12-yard line and set up Cooney's touchdown with 3:16 left in the first half. Papa's field goal with just 0:29 remaining gave Wesleyan a 10-0 halftime lead.

Six minutes into the third quarter, Scacca ran a sweep around the left end and outran the entire Williams defense for 61 yards and Wesleyan's second touchdown of the afternoon. An interception of a Lutz pass intended for Ken Hollingsworth led to the Cardinals' last points of the game. Combining passes from Papa to Latessa and runs by Robinson, Wesleyan broke into the end zone again, less than two minutes after its second touchdown, when Robinson gained the final three yards on a pitch left.

Following a 39-yard Wesleyan field goal attempt that fell short, Williams took possession of the ball at its own 22-yard line. On the second play of the series Lutz unloaded a 74-yard pass to Hollingsworth, who collared the pass and ran the rest of the way for the Ephs' first points of the game.



Four minutes into the fourth quarter, the Ephs struck again. A pickup of 14 yards on a run by Collins was negated by a penalty against Williams; but Williams got a break that set up its second touchdown when a pass interference penalty was called on a Wesleyan defender on a long pass intended for Hollingsworth. The penalty put the Ephs at the Cardinals' three-yard line, and two plays later Collins went into the end zone on a one-yard plunge. The two-point extra point attempts failed after both scores.

Down 24-12 late in the fourth quarter, Williams started to move down field with Lutz scrambling and hitting Hollingsworth for completions. The Ephs' momentum was stopped cold, however, when Collins fought off two Wesleyan defenders for a 25-yard reception, only to have the gain nullified by an illegal procedure penalty against Williams. On the Ephs' final drive, the Cardinals picked off their seventh interception of the game on a Lutz pass deep intended for Collins.

Volleyball tops Holyoke

The Williams Women's Volleyball team ended its premiere season with an 18-5 record after drubbing the Mt. Holyoke squad 15-12, 15-11 and 15-7 Tuesday night.

Standouts Sue Jacquin and Rachel Alber sparked the Ephwomen to their final victory with excellent all-around play and decisive spiking in tight spots. Senior Michele Johnson came off the bench for the third game of the match, inspiring the team with quick blocks and sharp spikes which broke the back of Holyoke's offensive.

The Holyoke match ended a first season highlighted by wins over such large and experienced volleyball schools as U.N.H., Albany State, Potsdam and UMaine. Coach of the Williams team Sue Hudson Hamblin was impressed by the savvy of her rookie team. "They came through the season as a unit, one whose play became better and more polished in every game," she said. Although the squad will lose co-captain Sue Jacquin and Michele Johnson at graduation, Hudson-Hamblin predicts an even stronger season next year. "The schedule will be similar, but Williams will have a year of varsity experience behind it," she explained.

In addition to an extended 23-25 match schedule next fall, Williams will also host the New England Intercollegiate Athletic Conference tournament on November 3.

Soccer loses

The Williams Women's Soccer Team lost their last game of the season to a talented Dartmouth squad. The game played on Williams' field Wednesday, ended in a 3-1 score.

Two of Dartmouth's goals came in the first half, their first occurring minutes after the game began. They played a good team game and tended to dominate the action. Williams' goal came late in the second half after a corner kick from Sara Reynolds was capitalized on by a good shot from left half Julie Anderson, a freshman.

The game left Williams with a 5-5-2 record for the season. Despite the defeat, coach Judy Zimetti said that she and the team were generally pleased and "psyched with the season."

Women 2nd in Little 3

The Williams Women's Cross-Country Team made a strong effort to capture the Little Three Championship, but they were unable to outrun the Wesleyan harriers in the race held here Wednesday. Wesleyan's winning score was 20 points, Williams had 36, and Amherst cannot score because they did not have a full squad of five competing.

Wesleyan's Jill Quigley won the race, running the 3.2 mile course in a time of 19:50. Williams' co-captain Mary Hakala, a senior, was second in 20:25, a new Williams course record which betters her old record by three seconds. Behind her for Williams were freshman Sue Marchant, 6th, who ran a very tough race in 21:11, senior and co-captain Connie Johnson, 8th, with a personal best on the course of 21:30, freshman Liz Martineau, 9th, also with a best of 21:42, and senior Tannis Fox, 11th, in 22:12. Also contributing to the Williams effort with fine personal races were junior Annie Ko, 13th, freshmen Brenda Mailman, 14th, Alexis Hamill, 16th and Tammy Shea, 17th.

Faculty shows increasing concern over salaries

by Tim Jones

The days when college professors had lead lives detached from mundane financial concerns are gone. For most of the past decade academics have been forced to accept salaries which, when measured in real or deflated dollars, have shrunk each year.

The calculations of assistant professor Kim Bruce of the Faculty Compensation Committee have revealed that the average starting salary offered by Williams has actually declined by 20 per cent since the 1969-70 academic year, when measured in real dollars using the Consumer Price Index (CPI). When inflation is not included, however, these salaries appear to have risen each year.

"What concerns me most," Bruce said, "is that within (the assistant professor pay) grade, beginning salaries are declining very rapidly. It is now very difficult just to make it on the (average) beginning professor's salary."

This situation is not confined to the ranks of the newly hired. In fact, Bruce determined that the average full professor who was fully tenured during the period from 1969-1978 "lost money" when his salary hikes were compared to the CPI for the same time period.

While this decline in earning power represents a "small loss," Bruce stated, it also means that a full professor "has gotten no extra pay in real dollars for experience" during the seventies.

There are, however some members of the faculty whose earnings have not declined during recent years. These are people who have been at Williams for several years but who have not been elevated to full professorship. Thus assistant and associate professors enjoy larger earnings each year in spite of inflation.

As Provost Neil Grabois explains, "A beginning member of the faculty is moving through the ranks as well as along with them. The general movement of salaries and salary hikes affects junior faculty more than senior ones."

Compensation increasingly occupies the minds of faculty for two reasons. They anticipate that total inflation in 1979 will be worse than in recent years, although prices as measured by the CPI have already skyrocketed from a level of 100 in 1967 to 181 in 1977. Faculty also worry that President Carter's inflation control program will prevent salaries here from rising enough to compensate for spiraling purchasing power.

The plight of educators is further exacerbated by several long-term trends unique to the education field. Wherever teachers apply for jobs, they face a buyers market, wherein hundreds compete for each available position. With so many qualified individuals to choose from, colleges and universities feel little pressure to raise salaries to attract talented instructors.

Professor of Music Irwin Shainman comments that "It's no great secret that presently due to the general economic picture, we are now in a depressed industry."

Teachers across the nation feel disadvantaged compared to other professional groups, with a major

Dean voices fears to CC

by Ann Morris

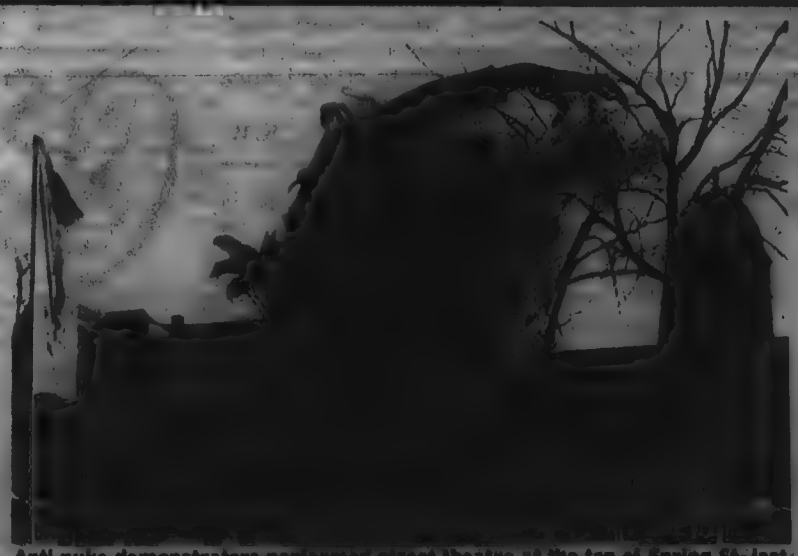
The administration has observed an erosion in the meaning of the residential house system, Dean O'Connor told the College Council Wednesday night. O'Connor fears that houses have lost their "community sense," and that students are no longer willing to spend energy to "confront diversity," or "respect the rights of others."

An increase in the number of students who want to transfer houses or move off-campus has led to much of the administration's concern, O'Connor explained. The residential house system, he said, unlike the fraternity system it replaced, was designed to "put people who are [illegible] together in a random way."

"The confronting of this differentness," he continued, was intended to "play into the whole educational policy of the school, and of liberal arts." He emphasized his fear that excessive inter-house transferring and off-campus living would defeat this purpose.

Student voiced varied reactions to O'Connor's concern. Vice-President Chris Jenkins '80 noted a "pervasive lack of unity and house spirit," saying that often houses are controlled by a "noisy minority." Although diversity is the greatest benefit of our housing system, he continued, there could be more diversity if social events were not all decided by similar loud minorities.

Secretary Mike Lissack '79 suggested that if the College were "less paternalistic, less willing to become involved in house matters," the house itself would have to solve its problems, and students would thus have to talk more about them.



Jon Ballan '79 commented that it was "only natural" to want to live with friends, and it was "healthy" to transfer to be able to do so. He did not see a problem in the lack of house diversity to which this transferring might lead.

O'Connor explained that the Dean's Office has no desire to "police or intervene" in any house problems. Any concrete changes, he said, must come from a house's own self-government. Simply a general concern and desire to know the facts led him to bring the question to the Council's attention, he emphasized.

The Dean praised the Committee of Undergraduate Life's (CUL) proposal to change parietal rules and the method employed by the house in deciding upon them. The proposal, which encourages house self-policing and respect for the rights and privacy of all house members, was passed at the November faculty meeting.

The present section on "Parietal Rules" in the Student Handbook will be replaced with this statement on "Residential Self-Government."

Rash of thefts steals student peace of mind

Police and security strongly urge students to lock their doors, due to a rash of thefts which have swept the campus. According to Housing Committee member Rusty Case the local police are currently investigating the possibility that a group of Williamstown high school students are responsible for the thefts.

During the summer, faculty reported similar incidents of burglary in their homes. Officials suspect that the same people may be involved in the recent outburst of stealing.

[illegible] have occurred throughout the campus, cutting a swath from Greylock to Mission Park to Prospect.

In Hopkins House, a stereo disappeared, as well as a headphone set, wall hangings, money, and smaller items. Money and a book bag vanished from a room in Prospect. Though the bag reappeared, keys from it remain missing.

From Brooks House, a car recently was stolen. Three youths were arrested in New York in connection with the incident, according to Walter O'Brien, Director of Security.

O'Brien also urged students to report any unusual sightings, and to notify security of unfamiliar or suspicious people.

Faculty supports contract majors

The faculty unanimously supported a recommendation to continue to offer the contract major with some modifications as proposed by the Committee on Educational Policy at its monthly meeting last Wednesday.

Chairman of the CEP Moomaw, who was charged with reviewing the success of the contract major since it was instituted in 1974, said that he supported this alternative as a "flexible opportunity to meet the educational needs of those whose interests lay outside Williams' traditional majors."

The CEP, however, recommended some changes which further clarify the requirements and the timetable for a contract major as noted in the Student Handbook. Sophomores must present a written statement in the spring which, in addition to outlining their project, designates at least two faculty sponsors, one of whom must be in residence in Williamstown during the student's senior year. The major must include at least nine semester courses, one of which is to be considered a senior major course.

The student may, in addition, choose between two routes to honors in his contract. He may undertake a year long senior thesis, or choose to take eleven semester courses (or ten and one WSP) and then write a mini-thesis in one semester or during Winter Study.

The CEP also recommended that the number of contract majors continue to be limited to ten each year. Professor Moomaw indicated that this was a reasonable number because the total number of contracts approved in four years since 1974 has been exactly ten.

The CEP's proposal called for another review of the contract major in 1984.

A resolution proposed by the Student-Faculty Committee on Athletics calling for President Chandler to reaffirm the College's association with and approval of the tenets of the New England Small College Athletic Conference at a meeting of NESCAC college presidents this Wednesday and for the continued study of the organization's post-season play provision was tabled after a short discussion.

Professor Peter Frost, who moved to table the proposal, said that the issue of post-season play was obviously of great importance to the student body. "We don't have enough information to make an educated decision," he said.

Nina Murphy, '79, addressed the meeting on behalf of the student members of the Athletic Committee. "Students at the forum Monday night gave serious and thoughtful consideration to the matter," she said, "but they were disappointed by the fact that the faculty's viewpoint was not represented there. We wish only to make it clear that this is a very divided issue on campus and that communication among students, faculty and the administration is paramount if Williams is to make any kind of decision or recommendation on the matter."

Chairman of the Athletic Committee Barnett suggested that perhaps the faculty might hold an informal meeting in the near future at which students would be invited to express their opinions about post-season play.

The faculty also voted to designate rules governing residential houses not as "parietals" but as rules of "residential self-government." Chairman of the Committee on Undergraduate Life said that the deletion of this and other archaic phrases in the handbook's description of parietal rules will underline the importance of student rights, privacy and consideration in the residential housing system.

Forum urges playoff eligibility

by Eric Schmitt

A majority of students at the Faculty-Student Committee on Athletics' open forum last Monday night expressed the opinion that Williams should be able to send teams to NCAA post-season tournaments.

The New England Small College Athletic Conference (NESCAC) since 1971 allows individual athletes to compete in NCAA post-season tournaments, but does not allow team sports to compete in post-season play more than one week after their seasons officially end.

As most NCAA team tournaments (e.g., soccer and football) are ladder tournaments, Williams teams, no matter how successful are limited to [illegible] one week and are [illegible] ineligible to compete further than any first round playoff. The NESCAC rule would have to be changed for Williams to participate further.

Professor Vincent Barnett, chairperson of the Athletics Committee, said the forum was a means by which the committee could gain student-faculty input on the issue before making a recommendation to the entire faculty, and to President Chandler who will be attending a NESCAC board meeting tomorrow.

Advocates of post-season competition were numerous and [illegible]

One student commented that those students making the tremendous commitment to a sport deserve consideration when there is a possibility of post-season play.

Dan Sullivan '79, a member of the committee, said that post-season athletic events are a valuable and unique educational experience.

Other positive aspects mentioned were the stimulation of interest among students, community, and alumni, the availability of and complete NCAA funding for men's teams attending national tournaments. Currently the College pays an athlete's entrance fee, room, and board for regional tournaments, but requires the student to pay transportation costs. There is no outside financial support available for women's post-season play.

One proponent of the current NESCAC limitations said the increased pressure placed upon students and coaches to qualify and win tournaments would be detrimental to the athletic program and to a student's academic performance.

Many members of the audience challenged that theory, contending that if a student can handle the current academic pressures, he can handle any additional pressure from

Tunnel Vision

Last Wednesday the faculty (or rather, the fraction thereof which remained until the end of the meeting) voted to table a resolution submitted by the Athletic Committee which called for a reaffirmation of the policies espoused by NESCAC (the New England Small College Athletic Conference) and a continuing investigation into student and faculty attitudes towards post-season play for Williams teams.

Professor Peter Frost proposed the tabling because neither he nor the faculty members present felt that they had a sense of what those attitudes were.

How could they? Virtually no one besides those faculty members on the Athletic committee itself attended the well-publicized forum on post-season play a week ago Monday evening. Students, on the other hand, made it a point to be present in large numbers. Last year, at two forums scheduled to deal with exactly the same issue, the pattern was the same. Students and many coaches participated in the open airing of views, while faculty attitudes—apart from those of professors and administrators directly involved in the committee—were not expressed. They were conspicuously absent.

The issue of post-season play has come before the College too often to deny that it is an important and emotional topic for a significant number of students. If it is indeed the responsibility of the faculty to determine the role of athletics on campus and the set of rules which will govern that facet of campus life, it is then also its responsibility to be fully aware of the views, attitudes, commitments and feelings of those who participate. In spite of the fact that it has had several occasions on which to inform itself, the faculty has not taken advantage of them.

The communication gap which has revealed itself thus far in the College's dealings with post-season play is frightening. We can only hope that the faculty's lack of interest or reluctance to express it is soon rectified and that its apathy—or tunnel vision—does not extend to other issues important to the student body.

Beneath their Peaceful Shadows

by Chris DiAngelo

First, congratulations to the defense, and the football team as a whole.

Now, the main attraction: the first of two parts on the College Council, and its Constitution in particular.

I've looked into what's been happening to the constitution since a new one was put into effect in 1964, when the end of the frats necessitated some major changes.

Since that time, there have been three major changes in student government which deal just with the Council, and all three have to do with the selection of members:

1969: up until now, all house presidents served as house reps to the CC as well. Now, anyone the house chooses can serve.

1970: for the first time, the offices of President and Vice-President are elected from the student body, by the students. Previously, the Council chose those members from within itself.

1973: the six positions of "at large member" were created.

It appears that, over the past nine years, some reforms have been slowly introduced which seem designed to prevent the CC from becoming overly elitist, and which try to increase representation on the Council. Furthermore, all of these changes were brought about by the Council itself (as far as I can tell) and were not the result of student body initiated actions, although student sentiment was obviously behind them.

Another change was brought about in student government in 1969. Although not affecting the CC directly, this was the biggest change in the CC's role on campus since 1964: the establishment (by the faculty) of joint faculty-student committees, which operate de facto independently of the Council. On this point I quote at length part of an interview with Dean Stevens which appeared in the Record November 7, 1969 (Dean Stevens is talking):

"The College Council might lose much of its power and influence as a governing body with more and more students on college committees.

"Suppose every faculty committee becomes a faculty-student committee, what will the function of the College Council then be?

"The Council is going to have to be aggressive in order to stave off the competition. It might be more glamorous for a student to be on CEP than on the Council, so the Council may lose its potentially best members.

"It would be a pity if the Council were reduced to the high school level of just running a big dance once a year. I hope the competition will aid the Council in finding its own identity."

Dean Stevens is more of a prophet than we generally give him credit for. I think that the past nine years have proved his remarks true, and given his questions a strong rhetorical edge.

Over the years, many of the really meaningful issues on campus (JA's, housing, housing, WSP, curriculum) have been resolved in the committees, and not by the Council. This is not to say the apart from its allocation function the CC has had no impact in recent years, but it has had less of an impact on many important questions than the committees. It might even be fair to say that the CC has less of an impact than it used to, period.

Thus, it seems that Dean Stevens was right: the students' power has increasingly manifested itself in the committee structure, and the CC has suffered. But what about the Dean's last point: has the CC, in the wake of this challenge, defined its role better?

Well, let's remember that except for the three constitutional changes I mention above, the Council has not changed much in fourteen years. Specificially, the functions of the Council remain much the same as they were in 1964—before the frats were completely gone, before the women were here, before the student body grew by 600, before the blacks began to assert themselves (beginning with the Hopkins occupation in April, 1969), before the Vietnam War and the Nixon Administration heightened the political awareness of all college students—before alot of changes. Add to all this the role of the committees. What's left?

It also seems that this year, the CC, on top of everything else, has quite a bit of student sentiment against it at its roots: its structure, and its legitimacy. I am suggesting that this is due primarily to the factors discussed above, which can be summed up as: the College Council has not been terribly successful in, to use Dean Stevens' wording, "finding its own identity" amidst a period of rapid change.

I'll take up this again next week, with specifics in regard to the current scene.

Sour Pickles

by Peter Rintels

There seems to be a widespread misconception that last week marked my debut as poetry critic for the Record and that I, something in the manner of Mark Twain's in "Fenimore Cooper's Literary Offenses" did a literary two-fisting of my own on Fabienne Marsh's "Spring Carnage." Let me set the record straight on this. "Spring Carnage" makes very little sense to me, and while that perhaps stands as a criticism of sorts, it comes from a one who is also unsure of how Emily Dickinson made hope into "the thing with feathers" or of what Lewis Carroll's "slithy toves" are doing gyring and gimbling in the wabe. Such are my credentials as if not poetry critic, then bewildered poetry reader.

In any case, no literary violence was intended, but if violence was done, it seems fitting to complement it with what these days is violence's ineffable side-kick, which is (you're way ahead of me here right?) sex.

I have this theory about the subject of sex which I have carefully developed over four years of Williams College education which, briefly put, is this: that everything that can be said about it has been said about it, and at least three thousand times. For my own contribution, therefore, I will resort to the anecdotal level.

I am not by nature a reveller, but recently I managed to get caught up in the festive spirit of the change back to standard time (festive enough for my purposes, at any rate) and made off to one parties scheduled for that weekend. My date for the evening was a Miss Anne Thorpe, who, I must say, struck me as a bit cold and I am told others have found her this way as well. She said that she was accepting my invitation not out of any special fondness for me, but for a lark, which I dutifully provided her, although I have no idea what she did with the thing.

Anne made it clear from the outset that she had mixed feelings toward me, a combination of abject loathing and intense enmity, which I quickly perceived as having the potential for putting a damper on the evening. When I greeted her at her room, the atmosphere between us reeked with hostility, although now that I think about, a considerable contribution to that atmosphere was made by what the people down the hall were smoking.

In any case, once we proceeded across campus I faced the usual problems finding some topic for conversation. The difficulty here was especially serious as Anne and I moved in predominantly different circles, she in a hermeneutic one and I, according to many people I know, in logical ones.

Finally, desperate for an ice breaker, I recalled Bogart's words (roughly): "I never met a dame who couldn't understand a hard slap across the face or a slug from a 38." Having foreseen earlier the possibility of using this wisdom, I had brought a slug from a 38 with me, which I produced from my pocket and offered to Anne for inspection. Unfortunately, she simply looked at it bewilderedly and returned it to me. So much for Bogart's advice.

After some time, however, I did get her to open up and tell me something of herself. It turned out that she is "very into angst." "My suitemates and I can sit around for hours and talk about our existential anxieties."

"Ever resolve any of them?" I queried.

"Everyone knows you can't resolve existential anxieties" she replied. "We just talk about them until we reach a nice state of angst and then get stoned."

As the hour pressed on toward one, security began shooing people out and I dutifully held the door for Anne as she left.

"I see there's still some chivalry left in this world," she said.

"More than you imagine, I'm sure," I responded.

"You interested in going out some place for a night cap?" she asked.

"Can't," I said. "I have to get up early tomorrow for an eight o'clock jousting match."

Letters: Poem

"Spring Carnage"

To the editor:

Thank you for your benignly trenchant comments regarding my poem. My only regret is that you spent one splendid Sunday inside, punching at a typewriter. For my part, I was riding my golden steed (a sparkly Italian bicycle) on Sunday, November 5, experiencing the very exhilaration I wrote of in "Spring Carnage." And finally, I would like to show you the final revision of the poem, one that was completed a few days after the Pique deadling.

Spring Carnage

I understand why one mad fly spat against the bulb last night and fried alive
I would do it another way—
in a sun-dappled convertible, driving fast, to spank my face against the wind and suffocate to death

Or else I'd be the murderess—
capping and pinching
scarlet nipps [illegible] gesters and steal away when all, en masse,
mouth riot on my calves

But when the stripped air thickens with Summer melting in,
as that was Fenian
flies assembled in chokes of pert mosquitoes.

Using the CC to its fullest potential

by Julia McNamee

Suppose it's the beginning of a semester and you've signed up for several courses. Suddenly you begin to hear some negative things about one of the courses—in fact, some people say the course is absolutely worthless. If these people are friends of yours whom you respect and with whom you agree on everything, you may well drop the course immediately. But in a usual case of this sort, what are you likely to do? Go to a few classes, do some of the readings—you see for yourself. Most of us don't drop something without giving it a fair change, whether a friend, a new food or a marriage. If there are some advantages to be gotten from something, we usually try to exploit its potential first. If we then decide it just cannot work, we may decide to pour our energy into something else we find more effective.

It's not very difficult to apply this notion to the College Council. There it is, from 9:00 - 10:30 (or later) every Wednesday night in Griffin. Like any representative organ, it can only be as good as the people it represents. Can most people say that they've tried to bring problems to the Council and failed? Can most individuals in the Council itself say they've put a few hours a week into thinking about the Council and failed to come up with any positive, important things on which the Council could work? Can most of us say we've made a real effort at elections to see that the best people are on the Council (even if that means running ourselves) and failed?

The writer, a junior, is on the College Council.

I think it's a problem of energy and time. If school policy is important to us (which it should be—it concerns us directly), we should consider it a priority and give it some time. The Council is a reasonable forum to determine student interest. Each house has a representative, the Freshman class has representatives, and officers and at large representatives are elected to provide for general student opinion. It's kind of an imposed diversity, insuring that everyone has someone to whom he or she can talk, through whom he or she is represented. When people have specific identifiable problems about the constitutional structure of the Council, such as the lack of an impeachment amendment, they can be worked on and improved (even now a committee is working to revise the constitution), but the structure itself is basically sound.

Communication is, thus, where time and energy most need to be spent. I don't know that much about all this myself—this is my first term on the Council and so I'm probably similar to most students as far as my experience goes. It seems to me, however, that there are a few things we can do to strengthen the representatives of the system. So let's go through the whole problem of representation from start to finish.

1) Elections are certainly a good place to begin. This is our chance to vote no confidence in the Council. Two times a year we can vote for a representative to the CC. If we don't like the policies of the past College Council, we can elect someone closer to our values, views, etc. But, to do this, elections must be taken seriously. Do nominate responsible people, people on whom you can count to take things seriously, who will come back to you to see how you feel about issues and who will put some time into Council work. It's like being in a singing group or playing a sport—representatives must be willing to make a commitment.

2) So the elections have been held, what now? Don't stop here. Think about things that come up. Should Williams have a language requirement? Is the swastika on Weston an important enough problem to worry about? Should the ACEC be given less money? And tell your rep how you feel. The reps are ideally doing the same thing from the opposite end, thinking about the issues and talking to you. This is communication and it's essential that we make it lively and useful.

3) Another option: come to the Council if you don't feel quite right about the communication between you and your rep. Maybe you don't agree on one issue, or maybe you've never agreed on anything. Anyone can come to a Council meeting. You don't have to have a specific problem and different viewpoints are welcome. You can talk, make a motion, whatever you want, and the Council will listen. If you aren't sure how to make a motion or set things going, call an officer or rep and they'll be able to help.

If the Council agrees with you (the reps having determined their constituents interests), it will support you. It may seem that the whole process of coming to decisions is tedious, but think what the CC is doing: twenty plus people are determining how the student body feels about issues. They must hear all sides of the question, listen to facts, opinions, etc., of all parties involved. Imagine how long it would take if the whole student body had to go through the process on every policy matter.

So bear with the rules. For the CC's statements to mean something, all different groups must have their say. Just this September, we've voted in a whole new set of easy rules so that confusion in meetings is unlikely to exist. In order for a final decision to be reached, though, some rules must exist for example, to limit discussion. Read up a little on the rules or talk to a CC member or two before you come to a meeting, but don't give up. Do come and bring your viewpoint, evidence, information, etc. If you don't feel it's already being adequately expressed. And there's always your chance to vote "no confidence" in the next election.

Just a final word about "student power", a subject many of us have wondered about. Lincoln once said that "a house divided against itself cannot stand," and the statement is especially relevant to the student community. For our number and strength to be meaningful we must be able to present to the faculty and administration (who usually are able to present their "stands" on issues) a united front of student feeling. Certainly differences of opinion among the students will always (thankfully) exist. Once people are made aware of all the different sides to a problem, usually some consensus will develop, however. The CC can be an effective instrument for determining, articulating and acting upon this consensus. It provides a forum through which students can be represented and can speak. It is, nonetheless, of a manageable enough size that a consensus can be reached relatively quickly. (And often time is an important factor in decision making.)

Before we talk about destroying the College Council, it just makes sense that we work to bring it up to its potential. If we then find that it's unworkable, fine. At that point we can work to establish something new, but it would be foolish to destroy the College Council without specifically knowing what we are voting to put in its place. The three steps I've discussed are just thoughts—most of you can probably quickly think of more. Questioning the institution is always good if it is positive and constructive. A little thought on what we want can only help. For the time being, let's stop complaining and put that energy into working with what we have—an unmistakable opportunity for representation.

Making the College Council responsive

by Stephen Magee

A few weeks ago The Record printed an editorial criticizing the College Council for spending too much time discussing the Indian peace symbols that flank Weston Language Center. At their next meeting, with only one dissenting vote, our student representatives demanded that the newspaper print a retraction to this editorial. Clearly The Record did not take the Council's pompous demand very seriously. In fact, the student body has never taken the College Council very seriously.

Nonetheless, the Council seems to take itself seriously, with its members considering themselves the legitimate representatives of the student body. Furthermore, those who don't know any better look upon the Council's action, or its inaction, as expressive of student opinion.

If our student government is a legitimate one; if in fact a majority of the student body would express confidence in the College Council if they were given the opportunity to do so, then our situation would surely stand as an exception to the rule. For how many of us know of a high school or college student government that is truly legitimate in the eyes of its constituents? Most are, on the contrary, [illegible] elitist forums for those interested in getting into law school and testing their oratorical skill at the same time.

Perhaps it is the inflexibility of the structure of student representation that dictates this problem. At a time in our lives when we should be questioning the institutional structures that exist in our society, it is clear that the College Council constitution leaves us very little room to experiment with different vehicles for political expression. This constitution was written in 1965. While all the constituents have changed, the same constitution essentially remains. Although many students may be interested in experimenting with new forms of representation, the mechanisms do not currently exist which might enable them to quickly dispose of the Council and the current constitution and help them to work towards new forums for political power.

Stephen McGee '79, is the CC representative from Gladden and an organizer of Disillusioned Students for Dissolution.

The question of "structure" should not be dismissed as unimportant, since different arrangements are appropriate for different goals. Instead of just accepting the framework that eixsts, we should begin to ask ourselves some fundamental questions. What powers do students need and want? What form of government or representation would be most effective in bringing about needed changes. Answers to these questions will change with time. As new functions evolve, differeing forms must be able to emerge. . .

A recently organized group of students (Disillusioned Students for Dissolution) is working to improve the College Council constitution. Currently, this document is structured as if it should remain forever unchanged, except for an occasional amendment. The D.S.D. wonders why constitutional stability is so important for a group like the College Council. This type of rigidity implies that the C.C. performs some crucial function; one so important to the students it serves, that any experimentation would involve an unacceptably high level of risk.

What then is this important function that justifies the inflexibility of our constitution? Are the risks really so formidable that we must systematically stifle the creativity and imagaination of the student body in order to insure the permanence of something like the College Council?

The D.S.D. would like to suggest a creative solution to this problem. The amendment we propose would provide a mechanism for students to express "no confidence" in the College Council if they should choose to do os. This amendment does not propose that the College Council be dissolved. Instead it provides the students with a process they could use to create a new constitution should a majority decide that they had no confidence in their current government. In that sense this amendment is far from radical, for who among us would be so foolish as to suggest that the Council should be allowed to exist without the consent of the student body it supposedly governs? Many students have asked the D.S.D. to propose concrete alternatives to the College Council. There are two reasons why this request is out of place. The obvious one is that the question of alternatives will only become relevant, if students decide to use the dissolution mechanism. All this amendment does is create a mechanism the students could use in the future, if they choose to do so. Furthermore, our personal feelings concerning specific alternatives are irrelevant, since this is something the student body as a whole would have to decide if it should ever choose to dissolve the Council. What is important is that we have outlined a clear method that students could use to create a new constitution.

Even if students never dissolved the College Council, this amendment would still serve an important function. It would make the Council more accountable to the student body. An example from recent Williams history demonstrates why this is so. Last year, students were more concerned about investment in South Africa then they had been about any other issue in recent memory. A large group of students came to the College Council to express their opinions.

The feelings of concerned students were overwhelming as they left Griffin Hall that night. Instead of attempting to protect this new flame of student activism, the leadership of the Council used Robert's Rules to stifle debate, claiming that the preservation of order was most important. As a result of this nonsense, no meaningful discussion of the issue ever took place within the Council. Instead, the argument centered around parliamentary procedure and whether or not one particular student would be permitted to film the meeting. (He was not allowed to do so.)

The scenario might have been different if the amendment we now propose were part of the constitution last spring. Students would have had a real way to express their disillusionment. They could have rightly said, "O.K. College Council leaders. You can play games with us now. But if you choose to do so, we may be able to dissolve you by the end of the month. Before long we will have a better vehicle for the expression of our opinions." Of course, use of the amendment might have been unnecessary. The threat of dissolution would probably have been enough to make the Council more responsive to the needs of its constituents.

The D.S.D. considers this amendment constructive rather than destructive. For if at some future time a majority of students decide that they have no confidence in the Council, it would then be innaccurate to think of the C.C. as representative in any way. This amendment would delineate a method that could be used to create something of value where only a vacuum existed.

Finally if you believe that the College Council has the confidence of a majority of the student body, then you should have no trouble voting for this amendment. For when students have the power to dissolve their government, and they choose not to do so, the Council will be viewed as a more legitimate organization. If on the other hand, you contend that the Council does not have the confidence of a majority of students, then providing an orderly mechanism for the creation of a better alternative becomes a necessary step towards the actualization of a new system.

Many Council members have complained that the D.S.D. should work within existing Council structures to being about constitutional change. This "in house" sentiment was also behind their assertions that only Council members, and not the student body, should have the right to impeach a C.C. officer. Why not put this power where it belongs; in the hands of the students. The D.S.D. has chosen to broaden the scope of discussion through a campus-wide referendum, rather than have a group of twenty "representatives" make decisions like these for the rest of us.

Although most people could care less about the College Council now, this may not always be the case. There will be a time when we are faced with a new "South Africa". The next time we are moved to action, and come to the Council with our concerns, let us be armed with this amendment.

Outlook on the College Council

Editor's note: At a meeting roughly two weeks ago, members of the recently formed "Disillusioned Students for Dissolution" [of the College Council]" led an open forum to discuss the future of student government at Williams. One outcome was a proposed amendment to the College Council constitution that would permit the dissolution of the Council upon by a 60 per cent vote of at least two-thirds of the students in favor of a "no confidence" referendum. The amendment also makes provisions for an interim student government and the writing of a new constitution should dissolution occur. It does not say what form that new constitution would take, but at the forum a member of DSD members suggested as one possibility the modelling of a new government on town meetings and thereby abolishing representation in favor of a more direct democracy.

Orestes presentation lacks cohesion

by Mollie Rocherolles

Jean-Bernard Bucky, director, and Euripides, playwrite, have combined their talents to produce a disastrously muddled and disjointed Orestes. Typical of Euripides, there are several themes at work in this play which are never resolved, but set against each other. These divisions were not welded into a whole by Bucky, but allowed to run loose, thereby confusing the audience between drama, satire and comedy.

The initial theme is one of violent desperation felt by the three protagonists: Orestes, Electra and Pylades. Their crime, matricide; their sentence, death. Their desperation and entrapment between Bob Berry as Tyndareus the Law, and Eric Kuzmik as Menelaus, the wishy-washy failure, is highlighted by the stark set with death's head, the brutal music and the gruesome but graceful chorus. Only the acting in the Prologue and the reunion scene fail to carry the impact. Were Eakland, Electra, and Davis, Orestes, to convey more conviction and fewer gestures, the message might be even more compelling.

But, as this tension mounts with the death sentence passed, the children go too far. The blood-lust and almost-murder of Helen strike wrongly against out sense of justice, and that of fifth century Greece. At the moment when Orestes puts the gun against Hermione's head, we understand and fear the human lawlessness which still reigns in our day.

And that is the moment Europides chooses to pull the rug out from our feet. Apollo, God of Justice, descends in a well-constructed, but unwelcome, deus ex machina and instructs them to "Depart now, . . . and your feuds reconcile." Since all their troubles have been solved without a breath of compromise, all are happy and the audience is cheated of a denouement.

There seems to be a satire going on here. Euripides is mocking the harsh lawmakers and council by the hollowness of their sentence, yet he also deprives those who take the law into their own hands of satisfaction. Fence sitters like Menelaus get the worst of all worlds! And 'just' decisions from on high cannot be relied on: Apollo's speech is a deliberate parody. The point seems to be that human judgment is fallible, but, mistaken and sullied, it remains all that we have to guide our future, and must be constantly compromised.

But, if this is the theme, why must it compete with Bucky's comic intervention for floor space? The Phyrgian slave, trebled, expresses spirit and evokes laughter, but that laughter degracts from our horror at Helen's murder and our conception of how far personal retribution has violated justice. In this same incident the chorus, who through Cecilia Rubino's excellent voice, has been the only contact with the real horror of the play, turns to disco dancing. This superfluous humor detracts from both the dramatic and satiric impact by undercutting, too soon, our empathy with the action. And Helen as Liberty is merely distracting.

Had there been an effort at greater unity among the themes, the other supporting elements of the play might have gained their due recognition. The actors were generally good, although Rubino seemed to understand Electra's part better than Eakland. Greg Boyd is so outstanding he runs the risk of outshining the rest of the cast. Laurie Boyd's choreography made the most of a graceful chorus who reflected the changing mood of the play, and complemented Hally's costumes.

A MAN'S a rich and complicated play

by Mimi David and Bill Pursche

Williamstheatre's production of A Man's A Man is a good production of Brecht's challenging and difficult drama. Brecht essentially presents one main theme, yet it is a theme with many complex implications. The net result is a complicated and rich play that is much more than a simple comedy.

The play takes place in Asia in 1925. Four British soldiers in a machine gun unti rob a temple, during which one of the soldiers loses some of his hair. Afriad that his bald spot will betray them, his comrades leave him behind for the time being. He is discovered by the owners of the temple, who, instead of turning him over to the authorities, make him into a god. The remainder of the play is concerned with the three soldiers' search for a replacement for their comrade. Galy Gay, the naive docker and the "man who can't say no," is taken in by the army unit and is transformed, little by little, into a 'good soldier.' On the way, we encounter thematic excursions into the nature of individuality, manhood, and identity, resulting in much of the play's complexity.

Visual images are an important part of the play. In Brechtian fashion, each character possesses his own set of gestures, movements, and manners of speaking which forms a visible symbol of the essence of his character. Much of the humor is dependent on visual cues, as the characters' actions are external and visually displayed rather than internal. For example, when Galy Gay must decide whether to return home to his wife or to join the soldiers, we see him deciding—holding in one hand a cucumber, symbolizing his wife and home, and in the other hand holding a cigar, representing the soldiers and army life.

The character of Galy Gay is an especially difficult role, and one that is central to the play, as he must transform from a docile docker to a rough-and-ready fighting man in just over two hours. Jim Stone as Galy Guy is successful in portraying each separate aspect of his character as seen in the different episodes; however, he fails to symbolize a progressive and cumulative character transformation. This becomes most apparent in the crucial scene where the new Jeriah Jip confronts the coffin of the transformed Galy Guy. Here, Stone's orations seem to lack the strength which the play demands of them.

In general, the drama is demanding of the actors in that it is difficult for the players to maintain character coherence throughout the series of episodes. John Lloyd, leader of the British army unit, gives an outstanding performance as Uriah Shelley. Lloyd is a dominating presence on stage as he maintains a strong, tough, cynical character whose delivery of lines is forceful and funny. Rob Baker and Eric Widing, two of Lloyd's comrades, are consistently supportive of the humor generated by Lloyd. Widing stands out in his individual speeches and is particularly endearing to the audience. The final member of the unit, Jeriah Jip, is played by the Williams-reknowned Renzie Lamb. His performance is best appreciated in the context of his character in the Williams community. Opposing this army unit is Bloody Five, the overtly stodgy yet covertly sensual British sergeant, played by C. W. Elliott. Elliott is more successful in portraying the transformation of his character than he is in establishing a convincing personality at either extreme.

The two female roles are completely supportive of the male-dominated action. Betsy Beers is totally defined as "Mrs. Galy Gay" and is quite convincing as the submissive peasant housewife. Fran Civardi as the Widow Begbick is the only female presence on stage for most of the play. More often than not, Civardi maintains the tough sexuality of an army prostitute. Her rich, powerful, sensuous voice provides a wonderful relief from, and contrast to, the harsh masculine voices of the soldiers.

This switching and variation of voice and tone is but one instance of the wonderful rhythm that Gregory Boyd, the director, creates in the play. He does this in a number of ways. The actors remain in relatively posed positions during speeches, which contrasts to the flurry of action in changing episodes and scenes. The very nature of the episodic presentation itself contributes to a rhythmic feeling of progression. The way Brecht's play is structured also lends itself to this nice rhythm; the audience is taken out of the artificial action of the drama and into the realm of the theatre through introductions, and narrations by the actors.

Robert Forrest has done a good job of composing a score that adds to the richness of the play and works well with Boyd's production. The music is stereotypical in itself, and reinforces the episodic nature of the production; changing from a military marchlike beat to a stiff, Oriental sound and back again. Peter Gould, the new AMT designer, has created a set that is simple yet remarkably effective. The use of a half-curtain works quite well; in many ways it adds to the total 'feel' of the play. It is a constant reminder of what the play is about and underscores much of the verbal and visual messages being presented.

All in all, Boyd's production is faithful to Brecht, yet it does not get too tied down in forcing a particular message. The play is humorous, but it is not without its serious overall element. Williamstheatre's production is quite successful in making it clear that this play is more than just a comedy.

Hill and O'Connor to sing of Schubert

Victor Hill, pianist and Daniel O'Connor, baritone will commemorate the 150th anniversary of the death of Schubert on November 19, 1828, next Sunday at 8 pm in Weston Language Center, with a complete performance of his song-cycle "Winterreise."

During the last months of his life, Schubert took the 24 poems of the "Winter Journey" of Wilhelm Mueller and set them, as he described to his friends, as "terrifying songs that have affected me more deeply than has been the case with any other songs." The cycle is in the form of a monologue for a traveler walking alone through the wintry countryside. Schubert took these poems as a portrait of himself at the end of his short life, lacking recognition or support from society and faced with an incurable and terminal illness.

Daniel O'Connor studied singing and interpretation of Lieder in Germany. With his first teacher Otto Gogl, the lessons were initially conducted in the only language the two had in common—Latin.

Holyoke Chorus

CORO MOUNT HOLYOKE, a chorus of thirty-four women from Mount Holyoke College conducted by Catharine Melhorn, will perform selections by French composers of the time of the Impressionists in the main lecture room of the Clark Art Institute tonight at 8:00 p.m. Admission will be free and the public is cordially invited to attend.

The program of French music will include works by Faure, Debussy, Caplet, and Chabrier—composers who are often linked to the great Impressionist painters. The concert will also feature New York soprano Lucy Shelton, who as the 1977 winner of the Naumberg Chamber Music competition has been presented recently in a series of Tully Hall concerts with the Jubal Trio.

McBroom's Photos

The Williams College Museum of Art is currently sponsoring an exhibition of "Photographs of Women's Communities" by photographer Ann McBroom. Assisted by a grant from the Vermont Council on the Arts, McBroom spent much of the past year visually documenting communities of women in southeastern Vermont.

"In this area," she explains, "there are an increasing number of single women bringing up children or living together in small groups to work the land and build their own houses. They are becoming less and less dependent on men, and turn to each other for emotional, spiritual and practical support . . . I spent many hours with these women, hoping to learn why they choose to live with or near other women, and how it differs from living with men." Her photographs, then, are attempts at understanding.

The exhibition will be open through December.

Hunt

All Freshmen who really don't know what to do with their time next Saturday between 7 and 10 PM need no longer despair of having to bury themselves in their room and, God forbid, study.

An all entry competition, known as the 1978 Fantasmagorical all frosh Scavenger Hunt (Inc.), has been organized by the Freshman Council to keep those innocent looking cherubs running around campus in search of items as impossible to find as say, an out of state taxi. At 6:30 PM, the organizers of the hunt, stationed in the Rathskeller, will hand out identical lists of one hundred items to representatives of each entry involved in the hunt. The entries will then have until ten o'clock to bring before the referees as many items as they will have been able to muster.

Simultaneously, WCFM will be broadcasting every half hour an either highly difficult or highly skillful thing to be performed before the judges. Teams will thus have the opportunity to add points to their scores by adding proficiency and guts to imagination.

After the hunt, the two winning male and two winning female entries will be invited to a party in the Rathskeller featuring mixed drinks and dancing.

Labaree to discuss Mystic program

This year four Williams students and sophomores and juniors from other similar institutions are participating in the American Maritime Studies Program at Mystic Seaport, Connecticut.

This Williams-in-Mystic Program was begun in the fall of 1977 by Professor Benjamin W. Labaree, formerly Ephraim Williams, Professor of American History.

In addition to taking required courses in American Maritime history, American Maritime literature, oceanography or marine ecology, and a seminar on uses of the sea, students develop at least one maritime skill under the instruction of the Seaport staff. The Seaport itself is a working museum of a mid-nineteenth century New England coastal town.

Each semester Williams may nominate up to six students for the program. The deadline for either part of next year will be February 2, 1979. On Thursday, November 16, Professor Labaree and several Mystic "alumni" will discuss the program over lunch (12:15 p.m. in Makepeace Room, Greylock) and at a slide presentation at 4:00 p.m., Brooks Living Room. Further information is available in the Dean's Office.

HOW TO PROTECT THE PAINT ON YOUR CAR

GRAVEL, SUN, INDUSTRIAL POLLUTION, AND ROAD SALT CAUSE MOST PROBLEMS.

Where you live and where you drive will determine the kind of problems you could have.

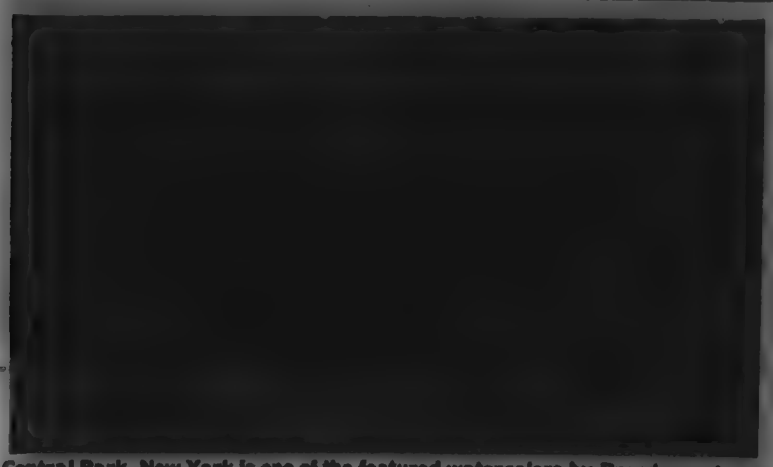
If you drive on gravel roads or roads with a gravel shoulder, you can avoid nicks and scratches by increasing the distance between your car and the car in front of you. Tires, as you probably know, can pick up small stones and "fling" them out at great velocity. If you're too close to the car ahead, the sharp stones will hit your grillwork and fenders very hard. Increase the distance, and the stones lose their velocity and fall back to the ground before your car hits them.

In areas of the country where the sun is very strong, some color change may occur over time unless you protect your car from direct sun. Parking in the shade is a good idea, and using a garage or some form of carport will help to minimize the sun's effect not only on the paint, but on the interior trim, as well.

Damage from industrial pollution is a problem in a few places. You can help protect your car's finish from these pollutants by keeping your car in a garage.

Road salt is extremely corrosive and can literally eat through paint and metal. So if you live in an area where salt is used extensively, wash your car frequently. Don't forget to rinse the underside of the car, too, where salt tends to collect. If you take it to a commercial car wash, remember, if they use recycled water, it may contain salt.

We do recommend that you wax your car regularly. Use a wax that is also a cleaner or use a separate cleaner to remove accumulated dirt and salt. The wax will serve as a protective coating that can help to preserve the finish.



But no matter what you do to protect your car's finish, some nicks and scratches are unavoidable. For the sake of your car's appearance and to avoid rust problems, buy some touch-up paint from your GM dealer or a local supplier. It comes in small quantities, and you can apply it yourself in a minute or two. While the paint never looks as good as when the car was new, the touched-up spot will look better than a nick, and the metal will be protected from exposure.

Our goal at GM is to paint cars so that they look just great and really keep their looks. And we are trying to do so in a way that is energy-efficient, environmentally sound, and not harmful to the health of the people who do the painting. It's a tall order, but GM can do it. We're doing it now.

Central Park, New York is one of the featured watercolors by Prendergast now on exhibit at the Clark.

Clark displays watercolors

"Watercolors by Maurice Prendergast from New England Collections", which opened last Saturday at the Clark Art Institute, will be on view through December 17. The exhibition of twenty-seven works by Prendergast includes examples from all periods of his career, drawing attention to the diversity in his watercolor style as distinct from his work in oil and monotype. Both familiar works, such as Umbrellas in the Rain (Museum of Fine Arts, Boston) and watercolors that have been exhibited less frequently, such as Landscape (Williams College Museum of Art) will be seen.

The Institute's show is the first Prendergast exhibition to be shown in New England for many years. It will be accompanied by a 64-page fully illustrated catalogue by Gwendolyn Owens, a student in the Williams College-Clark Art Institute Graduate Program in the History of Art. In conjunction with the exhibition, a group of American watercolors and pastels from the Clark collection will also be on view.

A year after — sexism still sizzles

by Priscilla Coen

Last Tuesday marked the first anniversary of the "Library Incident," and controversy over the "Bean of Beers" ad, events which focused attention on sexism at Williams. Greater awareness and perhaps a change of attitude characterizes the mood on campus, according to the Williams Feminist Alliance.

"The library incident was an educational experience for the campus—it made people a lot more sensitive to sexism," said participant Tom Johnson '80. Last November 7, eight sophomores, coming from a surprise birthday party, sang what many called a "crass and offensive" song, and threw an inflatable doll over the balcony of the library reserve room.

"Williams College is almost 50 per cent women now and such a performance is an unconscionable affront to the women here," wrote Valerie Andersen '78 in one of many letters that appeared in the Record about the incident.

Two days later, 50 students occupied the Record office, forcing Editor-in-Chief Scott Fenn '78 to cancel the last in a series of three Schlitz beer advertisements. The ads which featured a woman selling beer with silicone breasts and hot-pants were, according to the Williams Women, "an insult to the intelligence of everyone on this campus, but especially insulting to women."

The issue quickly intensified and several days later 400 students and faculty attended a forum on sexism. "The meeting made people more aware of the issue but didn't change anyone's attitude," said Dee Mortensen '80 reflecting on the discussions.

The forum also drew the attention of women faculty and strengthened their wish for an affirmative action officer," said Dean of Faculty Francis Oakley. The college recently hired Judith Allen to fulfill that need. She will take office in January.

The Feminist Alliance became a more active organization on campus after the incident and changed its name from the Williams Women. This year, the group has redefined its goals. By providing a center of support for women, it emphasizes discussions of members' personal concerns. The Alliance also brings speakers and films to campus.

Kathy Schwarz '80, one of the co-ordinators of the organization, believes that "people are now more careful of what they say because they don't want to be labelled sexist. But many don't have a clear perception of what sexism is."

athletics. Students also argued that any conflicting athletic-academic pressures were self-imposed, and not the result of peer or coach pressure.

Athletic Director Robert Peck, like all members of the Athletic Department, a supporter of post-season play, outlined many of the faculty perceptions of the issue. "There are members of the faculty who feel there is too much emphasis on sports at Williams, too much student participation in athletics, and too much money going towards the athletic department's budget," Peck explained. Professor Vincent Barnett had earlier acknowledged that a large proportion of the faculty is opposed to the idea of post-season competition.

Assistant professor Sherron Knopp, also a committee member, said she has altered her anti-post season stand, but explained many faculty members fear the subordination of academics to athletics.

Later in the week, Barnett's committee voted 4-3, with two student members absent, to reaffirm the College's present policy. Presented before the faculty last Wednesday, the motion was tabled and will be considered at a later date. President Chandler will probably endorse the committee's reaffirmation at tomorrow's meeting.

There are methods of circumventing NESCAC's policy. Last June for example, the women's crew competed in Seattle as an independent rowing club without direct College support, thereby circumventing NESCAC's ruling which applies only to College teams. The sentiments of many faculty members, however, suggest a dim future for the possibility of Williams teams participating in NCAA Division III post-season tournaments.

Guinan discusses violence in America

by Stu Massad

"I had intended to be hopeful and optimistic," said Ed Guinan, speaking last Monday on "America as a Metaphor for Violence" before some 50 people, but the activist sketched a gloomy picture of the prospects for quick social change.

Guinan argued the need to change the world order, but said he saw no immediate avenues for change because American institutions, in his view, support a system which propogates suffering through exploitation. "The overwhelming, the damning criticism that can be made of our civilization," Guinan said, "is that our teachers, our institutions, have trivialized this situation."

Guinan blasted the use of America's resources for feeding the "rats" of the military-industrial sector, while society approves the blight. "The only global order we have is multinationals," he said. "It's very much run on the balance sheet, but it doesn't calculate all the costs."

Founder of the Community for Creative Non-Violence in Washington, D.C., Guinan saw two avenues for change: revolutionizing the "institutional structure" or changing individuals' values. He criticized each path as inadequate and doomed to fail without the other.

Guinan also attacked American materialism. "We tell a person's worth by their possessions, their exterior," he said. "We've pursued objects." And although now there is another group who believes that a "personal deprivation" results when people try to relate solely to objects, he continued, they must be careful to "temper quick gratification with long-term goals."

Guinan extended his criticism of America to its uses of technology. "Most of our ability at technology we have used to devastate things. Technology hasn't been used to significantly improve people's lives."

"To get rid of technology tomorrow isn't going to answer it," Guinan cautioned, "because the negative values are still going to be there. They'll just get another vehicle."

Guinan argued against violent action—"armed struggle"—in America. "How viable is violence in a society that's armed to the teeth?" he asked. "I think we have to get away from the romantic idea that it's going to be just a handful of urban guerillas," he said.

The odds for immediate change of American institutions and structures are poor, Guinan reported. "Individuals can't do it. Maybe they can trigger it, but it will take a major institution to do it.

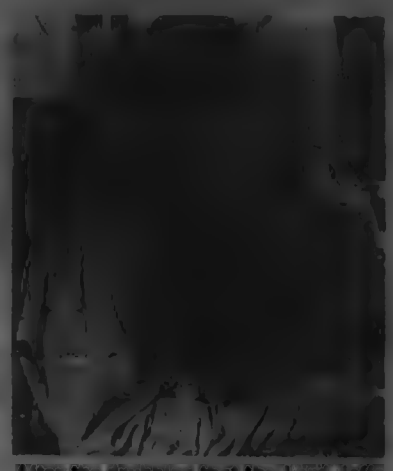
Anti-nuke group demonstrates



by Lorraine Brassil

"No Nukes is Good Nukes" claimed the Williams Action Coalition last Saturday during their demonstration in memory of Karen Silkwood. The group, headed by Dave Randolph '79, performed street theater emphasizing the dangers of nuclear power. After a performance at the north end of Spring Street, they marched to a North Adams shopping center to repeat the skit.

The demonstration was conducted in memory of Karen Skilkwood, whose death in a car accident in November, 1974 may not have been accidental. She was driving to a New York Times interview equipped with evidence that the power plant she worked for was falsifying quality control tests on rods for breeder reactors, when she lost control of her car.

The coalition maintains that nuclear power is too dangerous to use. The possibility of major meltdowns coupled with the problems of safe containment of nuclear waste far outweigh the benefits of nuclear power, they believe.

The group advocates a switch in energy sources away from centralized, non-renewable types, such as oil, coal, and nuclear fuel, to water, wind, solar, and geothermal power. They maintain that many small plants of this type could satisfy the country's energy needs. They also stress that people should follow strict conservation measures.

Inflation cuts faculty salaries educational backgrounds. "You know in most cases you cannot walk out of a job here into a better paying one elsewhere," assistant professor Michael McPherson stated. "Your hold on the whole job market is precarious."

McPherson claims that there are two forces at work today which bode ill for the future of higher education, particularly the private institutions." First, while there is great pressure to raise faculty salaries through increased tuitions, private institutions of higher education must attempt to hold their tuitions at a level which is competitive with public universities. To make matters worse, public education can tap state and federal tax-payer generated funds which are not available in large amounts to schools like Williams.

Simultaneously, the demand for all types of education is slackening. Since the birthrate in America fell during the 1960's, there will be fewer buyers of college educations throughout the rest of this decade and beyond. "You cannot raise tuition fast when your client population is declining. Especially when the public sector has better access to funds," noted McPherson.

Here on campus a feeling of helplessness has gripped many faculty, creating a "terrific morale problem," according to Bruce. If present levels of remuneration do not rise significantly instructors will be forced to contemplate teaching at Williams for several decades on earnings comparable to what they receive now.

Some members of the faculty believe that Williams' tuition is being held at an artificially low level. Professor Sherman maintains that this is "made possible by various subsidies, including low faculty and staff salaries."

Relatively smaller tuition increases made possible in part by these lower salaries may benefit students in the short run. Yet over an extended period of time faculty will find less opportunity for academic research as they are forced to glean extra income from outside consulting work.

In McPherson's sober assessment of the situation: "The value of your degrees depends on the prestige of the institution and hence the faculty." The College suffers if the faculty spend less time keeping abreast of their fields. "Thus students have a genuine interest in seeing that faculty are well paid," he concluded.

CC considers house system, ACEC money

O'Connor expressed the hope that the new statement would lead to more house interaction, while permitting minority views to be heard and respected.

The Finance Committee will have to trum $5000 from its tentative SAT allocations, chairman John Simpson '79 reported, so as to preserve an adequate "buffer" fund. This "major surgery" was to be performed at this week's Finance Committee meeting. The budgeting procedure will not begin for two weeks due to this problem.

Simpson announced the following tentative SAT allocations: $2,635.95 for Backtalk, $2,800 for the ACEC, $9,500 for the Gul, $150 for Language Clubs, $300 for the Italian Club, $4,800 for the Lehman Service Council, $3,700 for Pique, $200 for Purple Key, $575 for the Sailing Club, $673 for Peer Health, $2,903 for the Student Course Guide, $415 for the Student Support Group, $350 for the Anti-Apartheid Coalition, and $725 for David Weinman '81 to sponsor black musical events.

Rusty Case '80 read the Council a letter from Steve Case '79, co-chairman of the ACEC, expressing concern over the ACEC's SAT funding. Case's letter explained that the ACEC had planned a schedule requiring $15,000, but were only budgeted $12,000. Furthermore, having suffered large losses already this year, the ACEC remains with only $4,800 for the rest of the year.

The letter questioned whether the Finance Committee had really considered student opinion when determining the ACEC budget, and suggested that, given the inadequate funds the ACEC has to work with, perhaps it would be better to abolish the ACEC.

The Finance Committee encourages many other sorts of musical activities. Simpson pointed out, all of which manage on a much smaller budget. Chris Jenkins noted that the ACEC had sponsored many well attend concerts in the past, and abolishing the committee and the College's ability to host concerts would be a huge mistake.

D"eph"ense pops archrival Amherst

by Mary Kaye Sikes

The Williams College and Amherst College football teams battled to a scoreless tie for the first three quarters of their Little Three contest last Saturday at Amherst's Pratt Field before the Ephs got on the scoreboard in the fourth quarter with what proved to be the game-winning touchdown.

Williams held on for the final ten minutes, after a seven-yard touchdown run by freshman halfback Jay Wheatley and an extra point conversion by co-captain Ken Hollingsworth, to win the game 7-2.

The Williams victory, which boosts the Ephs season record to 5-3 and drops the Lord Jeffs to 3-5, causes a three-way tie among Williams, Wesleyan and Amherst for the 1978 Little Three title. The win was a crucial one for coach Bob Odell's Ephmen, since a tie or Amherst victory in the contest would have given the Lord Jeffs their first Little Three football championship since 1968. Williams has now won the Little Three six of the last eight years and has tied Wesleyan and Amherst for the crown this season and in 1976.

Amherst racked up 261 yards in total offense, running for 72 yards in 51 carries and completing nine passes for 132 yards. The Ephs combined 174 yards on the ground with an aerial attack that produced just 82 yards for 256 yards in total offense.

Amherst's Bob Steer was the leading rusher on the afternoon with 57 yards in 17 carries. Williams' running game was led by Vernon Davis (39 yards in seven carries) and Wheatley (38 yards in 13 carries).

Williams quarterback Bob Lutz connected on three passes for 76 yards. Lutz's long completion of the afternoon was a 53-yard bomb to Hollingsworth on the Ephs' first series of the second half. Amherst fended off this Williams' threat, holding the Ephs around the Amherst 30-yard line and forcing them to punt.

The fine play of the Williams defense, which continuously thwarted its opponent's effort to gain yardage on the ground, set up the Ephs touchdown.

Early in the fourth quarter Odell replaced Lutz with sophomore Kevin Hinchey, and the Ephs went to their running game in an attempt to grind out the yards to the end zone. Gains by Bill Novicki, Greg Collins and Wheatley, combined with a 15-yard personal foul penalty on Amherst, brought Williams to the seven-yard line before Wheatley made the most of a big hole opened by the offensive line and went in for the score with 9:30 left in the game.

The Lord Jeffs had their opportunities to tie the game following the touchdown, but they could not get their attack going, due largely to the intense play of the Williams defense. Amherst recovered a Williams fumble, but was forced to punt after five plays.

A critical break for the Lord Jeffs came when a Williams defensive back tipped the ball into an Amherst receiver's hands on a near interception of a long Teare pass. The 46-yard reception brought Amherst to the Ephs' three-yard line with 2:30 left in the game. The Lord Jeffs fumbled the ball at the goal line on the next play as Steer tried to run up the middle. Williams defenders pounded on the ball, and then the Eph offense started to run out the clock.

On a fourth down situation at the Ephs' five-yard line, punter Rick Walter ran around the end zone to use up the time remaining on the clock, then took the safety, making the score 7-2 in Williams' favor.

Cops Little 3 title

Soccer bops Jeffs 3-1

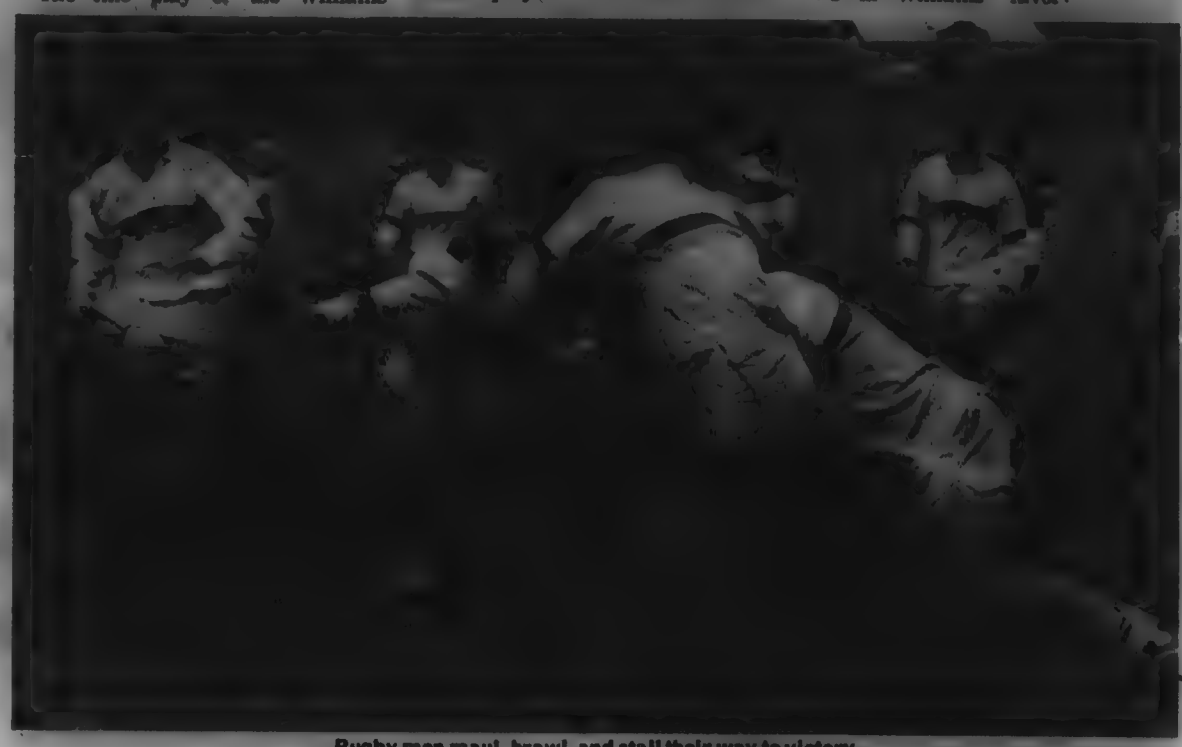
The Ephs beat arch-rival Amherst 3-1 in overtime at Amherst to win their first Little Three soccer title since 1971 and cap a very successful year.

Williams finished 8-3-1, tied for the most wins in Williams history, and remains unbeaten and untied in dividion three play.

The Amherst game was action-packed and intense. The Ephs came out slowly; the Jeffs played with inspiration. Both teams had several opportunities, but neither could break the ice and the first half ended in a scoreless tie.

The Jeffs got on the board first midway through the second half, but Williams did not collapse. Instead they came back as Peter May '79 forced a defensive error that cost the equalizer and sent the game into overtime.

Tad Roach '79 who had an outstanding game on the defense, stripped the Jeff forwards of the ball all day, and blocked a sure goal. Co-captain Perry Nelson sent the ball across to Roach on a corner kick late in the first overtime period and Roach pooned in the game-winner. Amherst quickly ran out of gas.



Keeper Doug Orr was tough all day in the nets. Orr played despite a nagging shoulder injury that was aggravated by several rough hits during the game.

Sophomore Dan Friesen ran in the insurance goal as Williams put constant pressure on the Jeffs.

Team spirit was definitely a big factor this year. Not as skilled as previous teams, this year's club relied on hustle and desire to spark their play.

Co-captain Seth Johnson summed up the day and the year, saying, "This has been the most rewarding experience of my athletic career. It has proven to me what hard work and desire can achieve."

The Little Three title comes to Williamstown after a long absence. We hope it never leaves.

Rugby men maul, brawl, and stall their way to victory.

Williams Ruggers stop Lord Jeffs 9-6

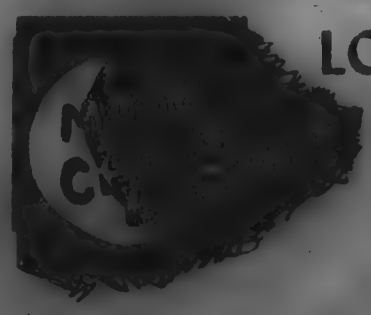
With a winning season on the line, the WRFC took on a fired up Amherst side this Saturday and emerged triumphant with a 9-6 victory. Ephman John Svoboda scored the winning try with only moments left in the game. A Dave Weyerhaeuser conversion ended the scoring.

Questionable refereeing typical of an Amherst game allowed the Jeffs to take a quick 3-0 lead which held throughout the first half. Tenacious hitting by Williams kept the score low as they adjusted to the long kicking game. Williams came out determined in the second half, and Weyerhaeuser scored the equalizer with a clutch long field goal. Then the Amherst standoff, who had been attempting drop kicks all game long, connected and gave the Jeffs a 6-3 lead.

Bearing down, the Ephs continued to pressure until Boda took a miskick in from five yards for the winning score. Amherst mounted its strongest threat of the game with only seconds remaining, but the Ephs dug in to preserve the victory and won Amherst's shirts as well.

The B-side rounded out a fine season with a disappointing loss. The defeat was to an Amherst squad loaded with Alumni ringers, including a member of the U.S. National Team. The play and spirit of these young ruggers assure the WRFC of a bright future.

In the previous week's Homecoming action, Williams soundly defeated a disorganized Boston College side 10-4. In a hard hitting game, the Eph line finally came into its own, as Ted Cypiot scored all the points with two trys on super runs around end and one converted kick. Ken Quinn led a fired up defense which held B.C. scoreless until the final minutes, but the outcome was never in doubt.



The B-side dropped a 15-11 game to a predominantly A-side B.C. team. Williams punished them physically but was stopped just short of the necessary points. Trys were scored by Pinto Sheridan and Jeff Samson, and a Kerwin Webb kick rounded out the scoring.

Cross Country tops

The men's cross country team wrapped up another fine season last week, placing a strong ninth out of some thirty universities and colleges at the New Englands. The Ephs finished two points ahead of both BU and BC, and avenged an earlier loss to the University of Vermont.

Once again leading Williams in his last team race was senior co-captain Tom Schreck, who felt he had a poor race but who still finished 24th in a field of well over 200. Schreck was followed by junior Mike Behrman, who had his best race of the year to finish 30th. In an amazing display of team togetherness three Ephmen somehow placed 87th through 89th amidst the huge crowd. Senior co-captain Steve Potasky, junior Garrick Leonard and Soph Phil Darrow ended up just seconds apart over the five mile course.

Although Williams failed to qualify any individuals for the Division III nationals this week, the season as a whole was a triumph, especially after such a slow start. The Ephs were 7-1 in dual meets over the last two months, finishing 10-4 overall. Besides the New Englands finish, Williams was also third at the Eastern and second unofficially at the NESCAC meet. The icing on the cake was clearly the double thrashing of Amherst and Wesleyan, making the Purple Little Three champs for the ninth year in a row.

How would Shakespeare have played O'Keefe?

With gusto. And in all seasons.
It is a brew for listening to a winter's tale. It's a liberation in praise of a midsummer night's dream.
It is hearty, full-bodied. It is smooth and easy going down.
And the head of O'Keefe is like the crown of a king.
And all the players act upon the theme, "It's too good to gulp."

Williams played sluggishly against the Jumbos but still managed to score enough to win. Stuart Taylor notched his first goal of his college career with a pretty shot that found the upper right corner. Tufts tied the score quickly when a Jumbo headed a free kick over a surprised Williams defense, but Freshman sensation Marty White put Williams back on top before the half by pushing a Gregg Hartman pass past the Tufts keeper.

In the second half the Hartman-White connection provided the insurance goal as Williams cruised to the victory.

Jumbos stump gridders, 7-0

by Mary Kate Shea

The Williams College football team suffered its second frustrating loss in a row, as Tufts University scored just once, early in the game, then fought off Williams' drives throughout the remainder of the contest for the 7-0 win. The loss drops the Ephs' season record to 3-2.

As was the case in Williams' 14-13 loss to Bowdoin College last Saturday, untimely turnovers and an inability to capitalize on opponents' mistakes were key factors in the outcome of the game.

With just 0:01 left in the opening quarter, Tufts quarterback Dennis Works caught the Williams defense off guard with a 44-yard touchdown pass to junior split end Tracey Maclin. Mark Litner's successful extra point kick gave the Jumbos an early seven-point lead with what turned out to be the only points of the afternoon for either side.

Sophomore Bob Stackpole, starting for Williams in place of injured quarterback Bob Lutz, had a fine day passing, completing 22 of 38 passes for 243 yards. The Ephs topped Tufts in the offensive stats with 308 yards in total offense compared to the home team's 189 yards.

Williams threatened in the second quarter when senior end Russ Gee recovered a Tufts fumble and the Ephs started a adrive at their own 19-yard line. Following a 26-yard completion from Stackpole to halfback Greg Collins and several running plays, Williams received a key break when the Jumbos' Steve Sogard fumbled a Rick Walter punt and sophomore Brian Benedict pounced on the ball at the Tufts 24-yard line. Williams maintained the drive until Dave Massucco fumbled on the Tufts 11-yard line.

On the opening series of the second half, Stackpole engineered a drive starting at the Ephs 20-yard line. A 21-yard run by Massucco, combined with a 15-yard roughing the kicker penalty on Tufts on a fourth down situation and Stackpole completions to sophomore end Kirt Gardner and Hollingsworth for 25 and 13 yards, brought Williams deep into the Jumbos' territory. But the offense gave up the ball when Tufts' John DiBiaso snagged an errant pass intended for Hollingsworth.

The Ephs took possession of the ball at the Tufts 24-yard line when the Jumbos' punter could not handle the snap and was unable to get the punt off. Williams, however, was stopped up on four plays and had to give up the ball again.

Williams gained the momentum temporarily when linebacker John Thiel picked off a Works' pass just on the Tufts side of the midfield marker. A holding penalty against the Ephs negated a nice gain on a run by Massucco and sufficiently stifled the Williams drive.

With 1:30 left on the clock Williams took possession of the ball for the final drive of the game. Stackpole connected with Hollingsworth five times for 42 yards within the space of a minute. The Ephs couldn't quite do it, however, as Stackpole was sacked at the Tufts 16-yard line with five seconds left in the game, and time ran out.

Harriers kill MIT

An impressive pack of Williams Men's Harriers devoured M.I.T. 23-32 and Tufts 19-36 on the Ephs home course Saturday. The double win ran the Purple's record to 8-4.

All five scorers for Williams were within fifteen yards of each other until the last mile of the race. Though M.I.T.'s captain Barry Bayus cruised way out in front to an easy victory, the Ephs grabbed five of the next seven places. Tom Schreck eased through four miles but blasted home past Tufts' leader to take second. Mike Behrman again ran a steady race and finished fourth. Phil Darrow and Garrick Leonard each took successive shots at the M.I.T. runner in fifth, but settled for a sixth place tie as they could not muster kicking strength over the final quarter mile. Steve Polasky sewed it up for Williams, rolling in just three seconds behind his two teammates. Pat Dobson and Rusty Anderson rounded out the seven man varsity squad.

How would Einstein theorize about O'Keefe?

Although the O'Keefe formula is secret, certain factors in the equation are well known:
1. O'Keefe has a hearty, full-bodied flavor.
2. It is smooth and easy going down.
3. Its head commands respect.
Our theory is that Einstein would have concluded: It's too good to gulp. Relatively speaking, of course.

GPA's jum

The average grade point average at Williams last year rose to an unprecedented 8.24, a jump of .05 over the average GPA in 1976-77.

According to a report from the Deans' Office, the grade most often given in two semesters last year was B-plus and the median grade of the 7,432 given was also a B-plus (9.1).

Dean of the College Daniel O'Connor expressed extreme concern with the problem of grade inflation at Williams. "Students are being cheated," he said. "The problem is prevalent all over the country, but it has reached the point at Williams where something must be done about it."

O'Connor is preparing a proposal designed to curb and in fact, reverse the trend toward grade inflation. He

by Ann Morris

After two revisions, the College Council Wednesday night passed a recommendation of four student names for membership on the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility. President Chandler will consider but is not bound by the Council's recommendation when he selects the two students who will serve on the committee.

The four students on the approved list are David Bennett '79, Debra Ferguson '79, Todd Tucker '81, and Jim Levinsohn '80. The original list proposed last week by the Elections Committee included neither Tucker nor Ferguson. This earlier list was returned to the Elections Committee for reexamination, as many Council members feared it did not represent the student body.

At this week's meeting the list was first proposed by Elections Committee Chairman Chris Jenkins '80 with one revision: the substitution of Debra Ferguson '79 for Betsy Harper '79. Many Council members, however, were not satisfied with this change.

Steve Magee '79 pointed out that since the list still contained "two rich conservatives," President Chandler could select the two representatives and "still make it seem as if he were going along with Council."

Agreeing, Council treasurer John Simpson '79 said that the choice of two conservatives would be "unfortunate", as their views would not be representative of student opinion. The motion to present this list to President Chandler was defeated 11 to 8.

Next Jenkins proposed an alternate plan, which, he said, the Elections Committee had decided to put forth if the first recommendation were defeated. The new list included another substitution: that of Todd Tucker for Rick Lake. Those students who had objected to the previous list agreed that now the recommendation was more balanced and representative. All but two members

WILLIAMS COLLEGE OCTOBER 31, 1978

...np; Dean vows to reverse trend

...hopes to present it to the faculty, and the Committee on Academic Standing sometime before Christmas.

With the exception of the one-year period from 1975-76, the all college GPA has continued to rise since Williams instituted the 18-point grading scale in 1953. The recent upswing in the past ten years, however, has slowed considerably as compared to that of the 1960's and early 1970's. An October 1978 update to Associate Provost David Bosch's 1978 report to the faculty on grade inflation states that, although the rise recently has not been as rapid, "the updated statistics give us no reason to be confident that the GPA will not continue to rise under the present system of laissez-faire with respect to college and departmental grading standards."

O'Connor stressed the point that action against grade inflation would not be unilateral. Dean Nancy McIntyre has brought up the issue at a meeting of the twelve colleges involved in the New England exchange program and O'Connor intends to discuss methods of control at a meeting of ACNE (Associated Colleges of New England), which includes the other Little Three schools, Harvard and Yale.

Chairman of the CAS John Hyde reported at a meeting of the Faculty before fall break that the committee will investigate grade inflation this year, at the suggestion of Dean O'Connor. Hyde said that O'Connor was quite "zealous" in his intent to bring the issue before the faculty and the students.

The September 21 edition of the Amherst Student reported that grade inflation at that school has increased "dramatically" in the past nine years. There in 1968-69, only two per cent of the graduating seniors received any grade in the "A" range, as compared with 29 per cent of those seniors in the class of 1978.

Other statistics in the article revealed that 40.8 per cent of the undergraduated at Yale received A's last spring. 34 per cent of all seniors at Dartmouth received A's.

Blacks reject Williams admissions

by Eric Schmitt

The number of black high school students rejecting offers of admittance from Williams has risen significantly during the last five years. At the same time, fewer blacks are applying to Williams. The College has expressed concern about this decline.

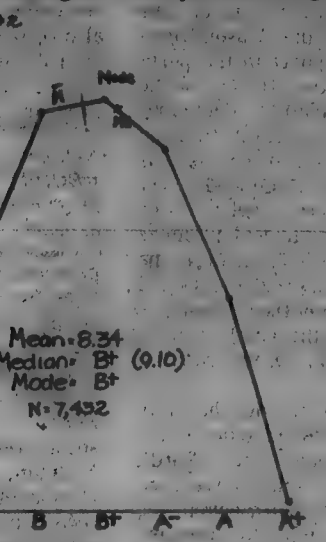
In 1975, of the 100 black students accepted, 42 chose to attend Williams. The following year, 42 of 106 (40 per cent) black students matriculated into Williams. However, in this year's entering class (1982), only 24 out of 75 (32 per cent) accepted black applicants decided to attend Williams over other institutions.

The rate of matriculation for entering classes as a whole annually hovers around 50 per cent.

"There are several reasons behind the decline," Director of Admissions Philip Smith said. "The number of applications has declined (from a high of 185 in 1976 to 123 in 1978) and the competition between schools for the top black students has become more intense than ever before."

Smith and Professor Kurt Tauber, chairperson on the Black Student Life Committee, commented on two other important points concerning the shrinking pool of black applicants. A deterioration in the quality of inner city high school instruction is reflected in the declining number of "qualified" students produced by such institutions. As a large number of black students are concentrated in these urban schools, a major source of prospective applicants has dried up. Federally funded minority scholarships have also declined over the past few years.

Smith noted that despite an increase in the percentage of black students admitted to Williams—42 per cent of black applicants in 1973 versus 61 per cent in 1978—the number of accepted black applicants lost to competing institutions such as Harvard, Brown, and Dartmouth ranged as high as ten students lost for every one matriculation.



"Black students are becoming more aware of their higher educational opportunities," Assistant Director of Admissions Brenda Brock said. "While we (on the admissions staff) stress the virtues of the College when recruiting minority students, we have to be honest about its drawbacks. The lack of a black community in Williamstown and the secluded atmosphere of the school are two things about which we warn a prospective applicant." Student opinion on the issue varied.

Keith Scott '81, who lives in New York City, does not believe Williams is well known to the urban black student. Scott finds the isolation from city life to be a difficult adjustment. Since he is less happy than he would be in an urban environment, he is seriously considering transferring.

"It's much harder for a black student than it is for a white student to adjust to the environment at Williams," Brock said. "Some of these students come from all-black high schools and it's quite a shock for them here."

...voted in favor of the recommendation, which will be submitted to President Chandler.

Only 400 people attended the ACEC sponsored "Southside Johnny and the Ashbury Jukes" concert on October 19, Simpson reported. The concert, which was planned without Council approval due to a misunderstanding with the ACEC, lost more than $5000, Simpson said. This brings the total ACEC losses for the year to $6700.

The Council voted unanimously in favor of a resolution asking for the removal of restrictions on Log hours. Complaints of late night noise led the College in September to move the Log closing hour from 1:00 to 12:00 on week nights.

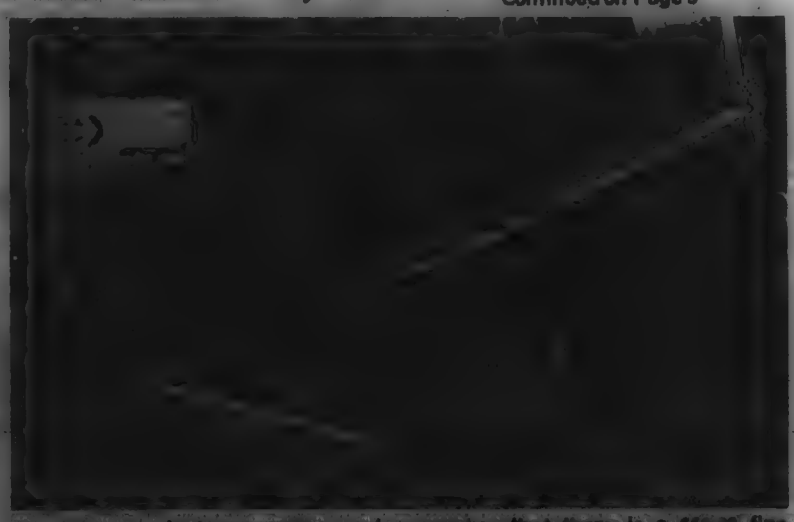
The resolution, proposed by Simpson, seeks to return the Log to its previous hours. Simpson argued that since students have been responsible in keeping noise levels low over the past month, the 1:00 closing time should be tried once again.

Also passed unanimously was a motion requesting that Buildings and Grounds install adequate lighting between Mission Park and the Mission Park parking lot.

Membership of the Constitutional Review Committee was completed with the self-nomination of sophomore Tristan Dale. She will be the sixth and final member of the newly found formed committee, which plans to study and revise the College Council's constitution.

Radiation hoax wakes CFM

WCFM, the College radio station, set off a mild panic early Sunday morning when the DJ announced that the fallout from a nuclear accident in Canada was floating towards Williamstown.



Fred Kooperstein '79, the DJ, reported that he received a phone call at 1:55 a.m. from a man with a "mature voice" who identified himself as a member of the New England Weather Associates (NEWA). The caller said that a nuclear reactor in a power plant west of Quebec had "melted down" and that fallout resulting from a radioactive leakage was moving towards western Massachusetts. He urged everyone to take extra precautions: stay inside and close all windows until daybreak.

Kooperstein said that he checked wire service, but when he found no report from UPI, decided that the weather station would probably find out before the wire service. Kooperstein announced the "bulletin" and then called NEWA for confirmation. The phone line to NEWA's president however was not working, making confirmation impossible. He then called the Williamstown police and College Security.

The police officer who took the call was unavailable for comment.

About 2:20 after his telephone conversations, Kooperstein said that he realized that this "might have been conned." He went back on the air, and announced the possibility of the hoax. He broadcast for another thirty minutes before signing off.

Later in the morning, Kooperstein called John Hockridge, NEWA President. Hockridge, Kooperstein said, said that although NEWA did have people on duty in case of emergency, there was no one at the office after 7:00 that evening. Hockridge compared it to another prank call which had been made to the Williamstown and North Adams police from a caller who identified himself as a member of the "Weathermen." The caller announced his intention to "assassinate" several people in western Massachusetts. Hockridge, Kooperstein said, speculated that the same person could have made all of these calls. The FBI entered the investigation, he said, and determined them to be hoaxes.

This Saturday is Homecoming, and remember that there is a $50.00 fine (Massachusetts law) for destroying a goalpost. Security cannot have anyone's head in a paddy wagon shortly after this picture was taken.

WAAC will visit frosh entries

by Priscilla Cohen

To inform new students of its activities and aims, the Anti-Apartheid Coalition will visit all freshman entries this semester. The Coalition hopes to alert freshmen to the situation in South Africa.

"The whole system is a nasty one," said Bruce Goerlich '80 referring to the segregation laws that exist in South Africa and create large gaps between the incomes and opportunities of the country's blacks and whites. In addition, blacks, representing 72 per cent of the national population, have no voice in South Africa's electoral process.

According to Goerlich, American corporations are indirectly supporting this system by investments and loans, amounting to $5 billion to South African business and the government itself.

As opposed to the campaigns launched on a number of campuses in the past few years, the Coalition is not pressuring for immediate divestiture. Instead, it is asking the Administration to join other colleges that hold stock in American companies with South African interests and to work for change from within the corporate structure.

Today, American corporations that have a financial stake in South Africa play no part in that country's social or political life. The Coalition would like to see this change, envisioning American business as a force for reform. It could exert pressure for the amelioration of apartheid. Only if this fails, holds the Coalition, should the College sell its stock. "At Williams,

"Notes from a Strange Day"

9:20 a.m. A little annoyed at myself for my habit of straggling in late to my early morning classes, I decided to try to start this day off right by showing up at the physics lecture hall bright and early for a 9:30 class. My hopes were soon dashed, however when I remembered that I don't take physics. So it goes.

By strange coincidence, the class had been cancelled that day and the rumor was that he had been arrested the day before for breaking the second law of thermodynamics. Apparently had been operating a perpetual motion machine in his basement for almost five years when agents of the National Science Foundation got wind of it and cracked down. And I thought stuff like that didn't happen around here.

12:00 noon. Checked by mail and found some useless bit of junk mail from, as I recall, the National Foundation for the Eradication of Hangnails in Dwarfs, or some such thing. I have gotten into the habit now of recycling these pieces. I remove them from my box, walk around to the mailroom counter and say, "This appeared in my box by accident. Could you please put it in SU 1890?" I then pull the same piece of mail out of my box the next day and repeat the procedure. This helps keep up a steady stream of mail to me with minimum waste of energy. I hope the conservationists appreciate this.

Noted as I was eating lunch that there were fewer dogs roaming around the dining halls this year. According to the checker at the top of the stairs, this was because of the new tightened ID procedures.

I had a chance to see the new policy in action when a dog dashed up the stairs, flashed its ID to the checker, who duly scrutinized it and let him pass to wander around the dining hall and panhandle an afternoon's meal. The dog and I caught up with each other after I made through the lunch line, and between attempts to beg a bite of my hamburger he managed to communicate to me that he was taking a winter study course this January on psychology professors, which he seemed quite excited about. My later attempts to relate this exchange to friends have met with skeptical responses. Odd.

4:15 p.m. On my way to the library I was overcome by a sudden urge to have a pastrami sandwich, which wrestled me to the ground, stole my wallet and headed off in the direction of Spring Street. I must stop telling people that this is a safe campus.

5:00 p.m. Went back to my room and listened to the news on WCFM. I never knew there were so many B's in the name of the Israeli Prime Minister. Interesting.

6:00 p.m. Going through the dinner line I was overcome with attack of existential anxiety. Suddenly I felt the terror and horror of a being mired in abject creatureliness, a slave to bodily necessities which are meaningless and inescapable. My roommate gently reminded me that I should not get so worked up just because Mission was serving leftovers again. No doubt true but I still suspect that I will have trouble sleeping tonight. They were lousy leftovers.

Looking Ahead to 1980

by Jeff Nelligan

The Republican Party, dazed and shaken after eight tumultuous years in the White House, ideologically split between its conservative and liberal-moderate wings, and at a low ebb nationwide in party members and public officials, is desperately groping for a formula that will unite the party and culminate in a political comeback in the 1980 Presidential election. It won't be easy. The GOP, even as the party out of office and even with President Carter, (up until the Camp David talks) enjoying marginal popularity, is in bad shape. So bad that at one point last spring, an alarmed Marvin Stone, Editor of the conservative U.S. News & World Report warned against the possibility and danger of a one party system. Fewer than 23 per cent of Americans today claim Republican ties. The GOP base is narrowing quickly through continuing disenchantment over the Watergate era and to the fright with which some Americans view the party's growing arch-conservative element. The Republican right controls most of the party organization in the area west of the Mississippi and south of the Mason-Dixon Line and has fanatical support in the party machinery everywhere. The influence of the GOP left has been steadily declining; witness the unsuccessful attempt to keep Rockefeller on the '76 ticket. Earlier this year Senator Charles Mathias summoned party progressives to a conference to seek ways of dealing with the diminishing liberal influence within the party. The future looks grim. In the view of one writer, "In 1980, progressives will be lucky to take 20 per cent of the delegates to the convention." Clearly the GOP needs a candidate capable of unifying the warring factions of the party.

This split was a factor in the 1976 Presidential loss, which was embodied in the strong Reagan challenge to Ford's incumbency at the Republican Convention. Party quarrels and divisions weaken the party structure from top to bottom; contributions not solicited, literature not distributed, speeches not made, and precincts not canvassed ultimately affect a candidate's standing. Relate this to the switch of a mere 9,000 votes in Hawaii and Ohio that would have given Ford the victory and it is not hard to see the consternation and frustration of GOP officials in assessing the 1976 campaign. Ford could have been President; instead he is following the Pro-Am circuit in a golf cart.

The Republicans don't lack personalities with aspirations to the White House but need rather the candidate capable of restoring some of the party's pride and morale as well as national popularity. Emphasizing these objectives is Republican National Committee Chairman Bill Brock who is avidly courting black leaders, heroically trying to temporize damaging ultra conservative elements within the party, and making it clear that the future lies in the hands of the younger, lesser known members and not in the party's Old Guard.

Even with this internal Republican disharmony, circling Democratic vultures should take heed of recent political developments within the country and their own party. There is an increasing conservative mood in America. The GOP has the golden opportunity to ride the waves of this sentiment and enhance the party's appeal and enlarge its constituency. Also, if Carter's Camp David summit popularity proves transitory, there may well be a repeat of the 1976 Republican debacle in the 1980 Democratic primaries. Senator Edward Kennedy and California Governor Jerry Brown are patiently awaiting the election year—and any indications of Carter floundering. Even though polls show that Kennedy could beat any Republican candidate, public opinion surveys cannot predict the strength of a divided party nor the vindictiveness of a toppled incumbent.

No wonder many GOP officials view Carter and the Democrats as vulnerable. Republican Presidential aspirants are already gearing up for 1980 showing promise, energy and lots of moola. The candidates can be arrayed in three levels, the bottom tier consisting the darkest horses; the second tier containing those with a moderate the nomination; and those in the first tier with the best chance of receiving the nomination.

In that third level is Illinois Representative Philip Crane, darling of the New Right who has already announced his candidacy. The press, having once been burned by "Jimmy" who gave Crane "public" attention and figures Crane's only chance is a Carter-esque campaign; good showings in the early primaries creating a bandwagon effect to the convention. Governor James Thompson of Illinois also has an eye on the White House. His state commands "crucial" electoral votes, he is very popular within the state, and as a governor does not have to risk identification on national issues. Yet Thompson is young and unfamiliar with the workings of GOP national campaigning. Lowell Weicker, Senator from Connecticut, could be a suprirse in the early New England primaries. He is a well-respected party liberal, but his voting record could become a liability with conservative party stalwarts.

The first of the three men who comprise the second tier is former CIA chief, Party chair, and U.N. Ambassador George Bush. Bush is cool, intelligent, well financed; and has an intimate knowledge of the party machinery. Agreeable to conservatives because of his opposition to the Panama Canal treaties, he is also respected by some liberals who applaud his role as the head of the U.S. Mission to Peking. Ex-Democrat John Connally, former Treasury Secretary under Nixon and Nixon's personal choice to replace Agnew as Vice President, is another serious candidate simply on the strength of his determination. He is articulate, energetic yet looks suspicious to Republican regulars way of chameleons. Senator Robert Dole of Kansas, Ford's '76 running mate, rounds out the second tier triumvirate. Ideology aside, Jeff Nelligan, Dole's main drawback is his abrasiveness. Republicans still cringe when recalling Dole's observation that 1.6 million Americans had been killed or wounded in "Democratic wars in this century." But Dole is a non-stop worker whose Campaign America Fund is steadily rising. Still, as Alan Barons points out, "If Reagan runs, Dole won't."

Notwithstanding the political chaos below, there are three candidates who rise above the smoke and confusion to emerge as the party's frontrunners. Senate Minority Leader Howard Baker is one. The country's leading elected Republican and a shrewd legislator, he is palatable to the GOP left because of his support of the Panama Canal treaties; yet as a Nixon defender in the televised Senate Watergate Committee hearings he endeared himself to conservatives. Baker is a strong candidate, but to win he must develop a campaigner's personality and flair and change his image from that of a Congressional Wheeler dealer to that of a Presidential contender.

Regardless of his 18-hole, golf cart look, Gerald Ford is cautiously awaiting 1980. Ford is bitter at Reagan for contesting the 1976 nomination and contributing ultimately to Ford's narrow defeat in the general election. Ford does not want Reagan to receive the party's blessing in 1980 either. Yet Ford would be hesitatnt to engage in a rough primary fight with Reagan, or anyone else. Political fact, however, is simple; to get the nomination or deny it to Reagan, Ford is going to have to dirty his hands in the primaries which some maintain is hardly fitting for a former President. Ford remains in the news as an unofficial party spokesman. It will be interesting to see if he packs up the 9-iron for a trip to New Hampshire.

In everyone's eues, Ronald Reagan is the man to beat. Buttressed by huge funds, (his Citizens for the Republic Fund has almost $1 million) and fanatical supporters, Reagan refuses to leave the stage and fade away.

State politics

To the editor:

It is unfortunate that the large number of Massachusetts students at Williams does not cause more interest in state politics, especially this year when so many important races look to be fairly close, and when matters are so confused as to provide the voter with hours of speculation.

Taking a look at the principal contests in the Commonwealth this year, it would seem that a nearly complete re-orientation of the two political parties has taken place. A conservative candidate for governor, waving the banner of Proposition Thirteen and Law And Order, is opposing a fairly liberal candidate who has pledged to carry out many of the economic policies of the outgoing Democratic governor. What is unusual is that the latter candidate is Republican Francis Hatch, and the former is Democrat Edward King. Furthermore, the state's Republicans are in the position of having renominated one of the U.S. Senate's foremost liberals to carry their standard against the Democrats.

In fact, this transformation is neither as complete nor as sudden as it may seem; Democrat King is rather unwillingly harnessed to a young, liberal running mate, whose relation to the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives is probably the primary reason for President Carter's support of the Democratic ticket this year (one Carter aide reportedly referred to King as a "turkey", thus summing up Washington's feelings about his candidacy's value to the national Democratic Party). The Democratic Senatorial nominee, Paul Tsongas, is a liberal Congressman whose record shows few substantial disagreements with Brooke's. And Massachusetts has a long career of rather unorthodox political alignments, ranging from Federalist Senator John Quincy Adams' support of the Jeffersonian Trade Embargo in 1807 to the warm support accorded to Senator Joseph McCarthy by the state's Democrats in the 1950's. Indeed, the last Republican governor, Francis Sargent, was probably slightly more liberal than the Democrat who succeeded him, and who has now been made a lame duck by King's primary victory.

Of particular interest is the Senatorial race, since it involves the nation's only black U.S. Senator, and is being waged more as a referendum on his divorce than as a race between two candidates with opposing philosophies. The lack of disagreement between Tsongas and Brooke is not the only reason why many Democrats are supporting the incumbent; the latter has quite a bit of influence as a two term Senator and member of several important committees, notably that on appropriations. It is not inconceivable that should the G.O.P. recapture a majority in the Senate, Brooke could be their choice as President pro tempore of that body, thus increasing this region's influence in its economical and political tug-of-war with the Sunbelt states.

In short, there is no reason for students who are citizens of Massachusetts to be apathetic about the elections this year. Most of the polls show the two candidates for governor as having fairly equal numbers of supporters, and the same is true of the Senate race. In both cases a large bloc of Undecideds hold the balance of power, and it will be they who decide the outcome of the contests. In this respect Campaign '78 resembles Campaign '76, with the exception that the state elections this year will very possibly alter the political atmosphere in Massachusetts far more noticeably than the Presidential election of 1976 has altered the political atmosphere of the nation.

Winter study reform

To the editor:

The best thing to come out of last Thursday's forum on Winter Study was the evidence that positive reform of WSP is possible—positive in the sense that both students and faculty would find the program more stimulating and enjoyable. People suggested that the rules covering independent "99" projects be reformed, that the cultural opportunities for January be more fully exploited, and that perhaps course subject orientations could be changed to ease the preparation burden on faculty members. These are the kinds of reforms from which everyone at Williams would benefit—and, I hope, they are the kinds of reforms that Professor Grant's committee will recommend to President Chandler.

The most frightening thing to come out of the forum was Mr. Grant's casual estimate that between one quarter and one third of the faculty favor abolishing Winter Study altogether. If the past performances of the College on such matters in any indication, then we face the danger of being presented with three overly-simplified option: abolish WSP; leave it completely unchanged; or convert it into a month of boring, pedantic grade-grubbing just like the other eight. If the Administration decides to resolve the debate along these lines, then the students should band together and fight like hell to keep Winter Study intact. But whoever might win that battle (and the Administration, as usual, holds all the high ground), everyone at Williams will have lost because the chance for positive reform was ignored.

Elections Outlook

An Overview

The Gubenatorial Race

by Molly Murphy

As might be expected from national trends, cutting taxes and limiting government spending are the major issues in the Massachusetts gubernatorial race. The state has thrown political observers a curve, however, in coming up with a contest in which the Democratic candidate is advocating sharper cutbacks than the Republican.

"I am a Democrat. Frank Hatch is a Republican," declared Edward King at a recent debate between the candidates at Harvard, but the statement carries less of the traditional ideological implications than usual. King, who defeated the liberal incumbent Michael Dukakis in the Democratic primary, is so conservative that Democratic leaders in Washington aren't even sure that they want him to win. The former Massachusetts Port Authority head and ex-professional football player favors capital punishment, mandatory sentencing and little restriction on gun use. He proposes to cut taxes by $1.3 billion over three years beginning with a $500 million cut the first year, mostly in property taxes. King also maintains that $138 million can be cut from welfare expenditures.

Frank Hatch, the Republican candidate—in name at least—is getting support not only from his own party ranks but also from liberal democrats, according to recent polls. The Massachusetts House Minority Leader is proposing moderate tax relief, claiming his opponent's goal of $1.3 billion cut is impractical. He does, however, believe that $60 million in fat can be trimmed from welfare expenditures and in general wants to place a cap on state and local spending. Hatch also intends to increase the percentage of the state's revenue growth allocated to cities and towns to fifty per cent.

Aside from money, the biggest issue in this race is personality.

Hatch has been attacking King's management style at the Massachusetts Port Authority, claiming that King can't run the state with a bulldozer as he has that agency.

King reciprocated the punches by describing the Harvard alumnus and Beverly Farms resident, Hatch as an "aloof millionaire" who is too far removed from the needs and concerns of the people to be an effective governor.

The most recent polls indicate an extremely close competition in a race that has stood the usual party-ideology associations on their head.

The Senate Race

by Byron Walker

Senator Edward Brooke has represented the interests of Massachusetts and of the United States as a whole. Although it sounds cliche, I'm supporting Ed Brooke because of his record in the Senate. Many politicans say that they're running on their record when in fact they find some timely issue to divert attention from it. This is not the case with Senator Brooke.

In his two terms in the office the Senator has proved himself a knowledgeable and assertive legislator. As the only black in the Senate, he has notably led floor fights in the interest of civil rights legislation, minority business causes, and women's rights. He has been outspoken among his colleagues in the areas of education, labor and unemployment, and government ethics.

Brooke's lobbying and floor leadership figured into the selection of Clement Haynesworth and Harold Carswell in their nominations to the Supreme Court. In this past session the Senator was a leading supporter of E.R.A. extension. His opponent, however, was absent for the crucial vote in the House. Simularly Brooke's recent vote in favor of tuition tax credits for post secondary education underscores the efforts he has made to help parents bear the high cost of college education. Partly as a result, both the National Education Association and the American Federation of Teachers have given the Senator a 100 per cent rating for his work in education.

In the areas of defense and foreign policy, the Senator has held unyielding positions on security for Israel and opposition to South African Apartheid. As an indication of his support of Israel, the Senator recently voted against the Carter Administration's arms package deal to the Middle East.

Only last month on the Senate floor, Senator Brooke reaffirmed his opposition to apartheid and desire to end all United States government involvement in the South African economy. In a speech made earlier this year he stated, "Under our failure to challenge the iniquitous system of apartheid will eventually result in a tragedy of untold proportions. There, while the actions we do take must be carried out with finese, . . . they must also be unequivocal in signaling that we will not contribute to the maintenance of racial inequality in South Africa." Brooke said that an end to all Eximbank involvement with the South African economy would be such an unequivocal signal.

Massachusetts is a troubled state inflicted with rising property taxes, business flight, and urban decay. As ranking Republican member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, Senator Brooke has undertaken steps to stem the states bleak economic prospectus. He has assisted in securing the F-18 fighter contract for General Electric in Lynn, the LNG tanker contract for General Dynamics in Quincy, and the Patriot missile system contract held by Raytheon.

I think no one can deny that the long lasting jobs, the jobs that carry the promise of success and advancement, are in the private sector. However whenever the private sector is unable to cope with the problem of unemployment, the use of public funds becomes necessary. In this case the Senator, in light of our present economic plight, became one of the original co-sponsors for S. 50, the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment and Balance Growth Act.

When unemployment in construction trades reached staggering proportions, nearing 40 per cent in Massachusetts, the Senator introduced the Brooke-Cranston Act to provide 7½ per cent interest rate mortgages to stimulate new housing construction. The program was enacted in 1974 and has been suecessfully lifting the home building industry out of it severe recession.

Energy is a major problem that we face in New England, having no other resource than our forests. The Senator is a proponent of solar energy and has introduced a tax credit for homeowners and small businesses installing solar and wind energy equipment. He has co-sponsored the small business loan program which is now law. The Senator co-sponsored the Dole-Brooke Resolution to keep the President from imposing a tarrif on the imported oil upon which our region depends. In addition the Senator is leading efforts to get a strategic reserve of petroleum products located in New England to protect Massachusetts from the damaging effects of another oil embargo.

Strangely enough, when Senator Brooke was a member of the Senate Ethics Committee, the Committee now investigating his finances, he was the only member to push for an investigation of allegations regarding illegal corporate campaign contributions. In January of 1974, the Senator introduced the first comprehensive Ethics Committee reform package of which one of his resolutions was to require full financial disclosure for all Senators. The result: the Senate has an Official Code of Conduct.

Senator Brooke is meeting his toughest opposition since being first elected in 1966. Unfortunately the origin of the opposition lies not so much in the political capabilities of his democratic challenger but with the adverse publicity resulting from a long and messy divorce settlement which raised questions of financial wrong-doing. Thus far the Senator has been exonerated in all investigations. Despite these pressures he has maintained his attendance and voting record in the Senate. The Senator does not seem to take his responsibilities lightly.

I realize that I have but briefly touched upon several issues here, however I hope that they have given you some idea of where Ed Brooke stands on some of the issues of interest to you. In as much as I have tried to give you this insight to the Senators stance, I hope also that you will take time out before casting your ballot to look at this record for your self. If you do, I'm sure you too will agree that we cannot afford to lose this man in the United States Senate.

Brooke and Tsongas camps

Edward Brooke

by Mike Isaacs

By this time next week Ed Brooke will know if he has won the biggest fight of his life. This year's senate race between Republican incumbent Brooke and Democratic Congressman Paul Tsongas has proven to be one of the closest in Massachusetts' history. The issues are the men themselves; who is most deserving of traditional liberal support and who can best represent Massachusetts.

Brooke, has served in the Senate since 1966. He was state Attorney General before that. Tsongas served as a reform county commissioner begore going to Washington to represent the city of Lowell and its suburbs in Congress. The two men have enjoyed the support of liberals in this state for years, and as a result, their campaigns have focused in one what kind of a man the voters of Massachusetts want in Washington. Has Brooke ignored the plight of Massachusetts in his efforts to work for American blacks? Does Tsongas think that the state is one vast Congressional district where talk of apple pie and mother is enough to satisfy the constituents? In essence, does the state want a man who has looked with national eyes at national problems or a man who has looked with local eyes only?

Tsongas has two major accomplishments to his record. As county commissioner, he was involved in a major cleanup of government in Middlesex county. As congressman, he has brought many millions of dollars in federal aid to restore and rebuild the city of Lowell. Tsongas represents a continuation of the Mike Dukakis development cabinet, government aimed at bringing life back into the cities of Massachusetts. His opponent asks if he has the depth and the experience with issues. Tsongas counters that it is not what he has done that is important, but what he will do.

Brooke's family problems have served as a kind of non-issue throughout the campaign. Divorce proceedings, lies, charges of corruption, and a charge of dishonoring the United States Senate have been tossed about in the news media with relish. The Boston Globe, always a major factor in state politics, has been doggedly pursuing stories on the questions surrounding the Brooke family break-up, with the result that Brooke has condemned the paper publically for its nosiness. Some view it as an "oust Brooke" campaign.

Brooke faired well in his latest bout with the Senate Ethics Committee, but his reputation has, perhaps, been damaged for good. Surely, Brooke's problems will be in the voter's mind.

The race has also attracted the notice and aid of major national figures. Senator Edward Kennedy has broken with a old family tradition of not opposing republican incumbents to actively solicit votes for Tsongas. Jimmy Carter himself was in the state last week. On the republican side, Brooke and Frank Hatch are both viewed as the last gasps of a dying party. Former governor Frank Sargent has charged that if both men don't win, the party will be irreconcilably split. In recent weeks, Brooke has won the support of some of his conservative colleagues in a reluctant effort to hold the party together.

Voters hold the key, however. The real question is whether the Massachusetts electorate can bring itself to vote against Brooke. His vast majorities in past elections and the always sensitive issue of race make that choice seem doubtful. Tsongas must capture enough of the voters to vote for him, as it seems that few if any will vote against Brooke.

The writer is a political economy major who lives in Massachusetts.

Paul Tsongas

by Sarah Thorne

Who would sacrifice a safe Congressional district to run for the U.S. Senate seat of Ed Brooke, a 12 year old fixture in Massachusetts politics? Who would dare to challenge Brooke, a liberal Republican in an embarrassingly one-party state? Who would attempt to win the loyalty of guilty whites who cast their votes for Brooke as the only black in the U.S. Senate? Paul Tsongas, a 37 year-old second term Democratic Congressman from Lowell, Mass. is succeeding at each of these to overtake Brooke in the polls.

During his four years in the U.S. House of Representatives Tsongas received a 100 per cent rating by the League of Conservation voters, 93 per cent by the National Council of Senior Citizens, 100 per cent by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, and 91 per cent by the AFL-CIO's COPE. Tsongas has supported and sponsored many controversial and progressive bills

—cosponsor of Humphrey-Hawkins full employment bill

—cosponsored Kennedy-Corman National Health Insurance bill (opposed by Brooke)

—authored amendment to prohibit U.S. Export Import Bank loans to South Africa

—cosponsored Congressional public financing bill

—cosponsored extension of ERA ratification deadline, among others.

After attending Dartmouth College, Yale Law School and serving for three years in the Peace Corps in Ethiopia and Jamaica, Tsongas quickly built up local support leading to his election as the Middlesex County Commissioner, Lowell City Councillor and Assistant Deputy Attorney General. After four years of representation in Congress, a major newspaper in his district, the Lowell Sun, reported that, "Tsongas will most likely go down in history for having accomplished more for Lowell than anyone who has held the office in the past 100 years."

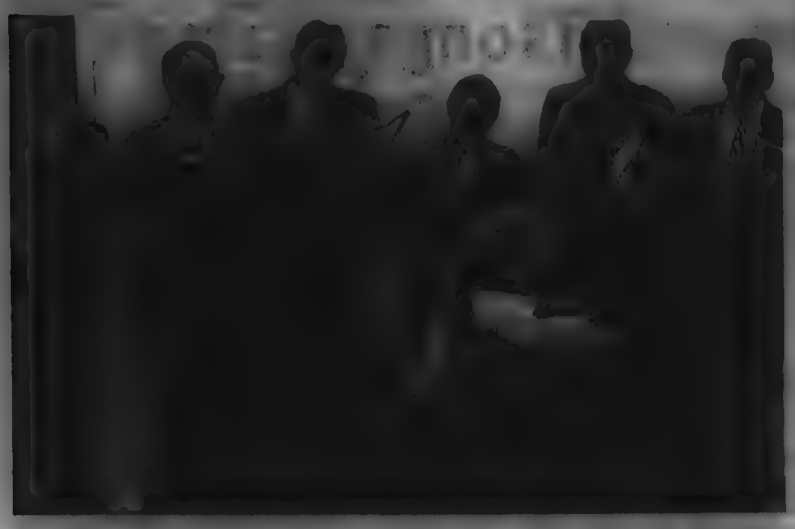
Paul Tsongas is not cashing in upon this year's simplistic glamour issue: taxes. However, according to "Taxation with Representation" a citizen's fair tax group, Tsongas has the best tax reform record among Massachusetts Congresspeople.

Instead of negating government's role with social service and tax cuts, Tsongas places top priority upon the issue of urban revitalization for the economically depressed and physically deteriorating Massachusetts cities. Most significant among Tsongas' urban revitalization and job attraction successes in his Congressional district was the designation and planned restoration of the decaying historic mill town of Lowell as the first industrial national park.

Congressman Tsongas' strong record of job attraction and preservation includes the location of the $10m regional federal Solar Energy Center in Cambridge. He believes that job creation and environmental protection can be synergistic rather than mutually exclusive. His opposition to the breeder reactor and legislative advocacy of renewable energy sources reflect his long run sensitivity to environmental quality, economic independence and stability.

Tsongas is one of the few Congressmen with living and working experience in developing nations. His service on a special mission to Ethiopia was central in preserving U.S. neutrality and nonintervention in last year's war in the Horn of Africa.

On other foreign policy issues, Tsongas calls for further limitations to the arms race and opposes the neutron bomb. In contrast, Brooke supports the neutron bomb and a halt in SALT negotiations until initial Soviet concessions are secured. Brooke's advocacy of increased defense spending helped him win the endorsement of Henry Kissinger.



In protest of a $6600 payraise which Congress voted itself, Tsongas created a college scholarship fund for students in his district. Unlike Brooke, he voluntarily disclosed his personal financial statements as early as 1971.

Tsongas has conducted an issues oriented campaign. He has not exploited Brooke's personal transgressions and now professional accusations relating to his illegal tax deductions and allegedly altered financial disclosure statements. Tsongas' record and liberal, progressive social and environmental policies offer the voters a distinct choice on November 7.

Sixty-seven years old but still the handsome, dynamic, right wing gospel preacher, Reagan has a huge national following, evidenced in his narrow nomination loss to incumbent Ford. An NBC poll of registered Republicans puts Reagan ahead of Ford 48 per cent to 38 per cent to win the nomination. Yet Reagan's arch conservatism alienates most Democrats and even some Republicans, a factor which could prove fatal in a general election. Sensing this, he has taken steps to moderate his image, refusing to endorse Jeff Bell, a former aide, in Bell's Senate primary fight against liberal New Jersey Senator Clifford Case. Reagan has also declined endorsing an initiative in his home state banning homosexuals from teaching jobs and is suddenly very anxious to point out his fairly moderate record as Governor of California. It is conceivable that Phil Crane's run at the White House might partially stem from Crane's suspicions of Reagan's conservative faith and thus Reagan's vulnerability. Barone points out that, "Ronald Reagan would rather be President than turist."

The 1978 Congressional elections have brought out some of the GOP hopefuls, intent on mending fences and picking up political IOU's. Within the next year, the leading candidates should emerge quite openly onto the national stage.

Williams Octet, old and new, delights audience

by John Libertine

A mixed group of young and old packed Jesup Hall last Saturday night to attend the Fourth Annual Reunion Concert of the original Williams Octet. The nineteen member ensemble, all members of the Octet during its tenure from 1941-1945, regaled the enthusiastic audience with selections from its varied repertoire. In addition, the present Octet made a guest appearance.

The Williams Octet developed in 1940 from two other small groups of the late 1930's: the Glee Club Quartet, described as a group providing "comedy relief" after such works as Bach Chorales; and the Small Sheep. These two groups joined forces under the aegis of then Music Dept. chairman Robert Barrow to form the Williams Octet. Saturday's concert reunited several of those original members.

After marching in to the strains of Come Fill Your Glasses Up the octet sang such favorites as Louisiana Serenade and Peg O' My Heart. Warren Hunke '42 and Lou Safford '41, then played a selection of songs by Gershwin and Berlin for piano duet. Safford also sang his own brand of Gershwin with the "classic" April in Fairbanks (Alaska that is). The ensemble finished up the first half of its program with a piece by Kurt Weill and Ogden Nash, The Trouble with Women, a work describing women which probably does not apply today (unless, of course, one is discussing Holyoke or Smith).

After intermission, the present Octet came on for its guest appearance. The Octet, with its ten members (you figure it out), sang a selection of some of its favorites, including House of Blue Lights, Constitution, Roberta Lee, and Coney Island Baby. (Sophomore Kevin Weist provided us all with the grisly, but funny, history of that last song.) The group was called back to do two encores, a sign of its great popularity on campus.

The present Octet is, without doubt, one of the finest musical groups at Williams. If its Saturday performance was any indication of its talent. The ten members blend well together in one tight group. It is a pleasure to see a group able enough not to take itself too seriously and still provide first rate entertainment. Their only fault, if fault it can be called, is that they stole the show entirely from the older group.

After the new octet finished, Doug Buck '45 sang a selection of short, but scathing, songs, accompanying himself on the guitar. Included is that classic gem Drop-kick me, Jesus, Through the Goalposts of Life. Needless to say, the audience loved it.

The group then returned to finish its program with a brand new arrangement, Bidin' My Time. Also included were Me and Marie, an arrangement written especially for the Octet by Cole Porter, I Love the Ladies, and selections from Brigadoon, allowing several soloists in the group to show their stuff.

Saturday's concert proves that the Octet still has its old magic; the years have not diminished its members' ability and showmanship. Let us hope that these reunion concerts continue throughout the coming years to delight and amuse us all. One could not wish for better entertainment.

"Marching" Band blows Union away

by John Libertine

The scent of blood was in the air. After two successive losses, the Williams Band was out to kill. After a long, gruelling contest, the band came up from behind and won a key game in its bid for the All-College Bandionship against Union College. Given the ferocity of its attack, one shudders to think of the carnage that could have resulted if Union had had a band at the game.

Under the able direction of Francis C. Cardillo, senior co-leaders Ben Grudin, Andy Masette, and Doug Gernet, the band ended its losing streak with a display of wit, showmanship, and a minimum of unfair play. If all goes well, the band could win its twelfth straight title, an honor of rather dubious merit.

Despite its great success and fame (see the Transcript, for example), the Williams College Walking, Stalking, Ambling, Rambling, Scrambling, Gambling, (etc. ad nauseum) Moo Cow Marine Marching band remains something of an enigma (justifiably, according to some). Just what is this bunch of Monty Python rejects trying to prove? The answer should be obvious: nothing.

Modern psychologists would describe the band members as maladjusted individuals, probably frustrated and repressed, seeking an outlet for some form of self-expression and recognition. (We, of course, would merely describe them as bananas). Each member must choose some unique form of headgear in order to set themselves apart from the whole group (not to mention the rest of humanity). Bizarre is the only adjective available to describe such an array of haberdashery (after all, we are a family newspaper).

The band's entire raison d'etre (Aha! You knew there had to be one) is to provide a half-time show for football games. During their program, the members all march in formation (more or less), forming such objects as fit in with the overall theme of their show. The last show's theme was Star Trek, and the formation was indeed one of the starship Enterprise, minus a few appendages due to lack of adequate personnel.

The Homecoming program is always the most important to the band; this gives them the chance to go all out in their showmanship (Lord help us all!). When asked about the program for this weekend, one leader withheld comment preferring to keep the show a deep, dark secret (i.e. it hasn't been written yet).

The band's philosophy about its music seems to be quite simple: when in doubt punt.

As the football team thundered through its twin lines, the band played an impressive rendition of Rocky in pre-game warm-up action. (photo by Buckner)

by Meile Rockefeller

Hyla Smith paints for fun, and her show at the Dodd Student Art Gallery is pure fun. Where else would you find King Henry VIII in a new suit of clothes, one weird man tumbling ecstatically around a page, and a voracious flower that sucks you down into its depths?

Her works, which here are mostly drawings, are a wonderful combination of straightforward charcoal images and whimsical colored pencil ideas. Henry, who is the first in a series, represents the ludicrousness of the emperor's pomp separated from his clothes. His old image is black and white, his new, imaginative image is in "super"-color.

Smith has managed to take the children's game of colored pencils to incredible levels. Using its rich and subtle color, a harmless chrysanthemum sends its rainbow tentacles out to you, drawing you inextricably to its potent center.

The crowning jewel in this whimsical show is a quasi-poster of a fragmented young woman. Like a Revlon ad, she smiles at you, shimmers with brilliant color, and whooshes to the right. Her hair, reminiscent of Ovid's Daphne, bares a surprise which is left for you to discover.

Of course, Smith's talent is not limited to the drawings in the show. She is a serious studio art major, whose works include oil painting and even handicrafts. With luck, we will see more of her work later this year, including a contribution to Decorative Arts.

Williams Reports

New energy attitudes required

Another New England winter is almost upon us, and it brings the urgent reminder that energy conservation is an economic, social and moral necessity.

At Williams, a concentrated energy conservation effort began early in the decade. The results so far have been encouraging. But all the easy things have been done, and still, costs are rising.

The year-old Energy Conservation Committee has studied how far we have come and the direction in which we should be moving. The committee recommendations range from setting thermostats at 66 degrees and using cold water for washing clothes to proposing that "no additional space be added to College facilities unless capital funds are in hand to cover energy costs." Money raised for the new art facility, for example, will include not only construction costs, but also an endowment for funding future maintenance and energy costs.

Even the smallest energy-saving steps are part of the much larger picture. Since the easy things have been done, new steps will probably have more of an impact on daily life. This condensation of a report delivered by the Energy Conservation Committee in April reveals the scope of the problem and approaches to its solution. Members of the committee were Bob Kozelka, Henry Art, Malinda Bergamini, Tom Black, Edwina Cruise, Lee Drickamer, John Holden, Ross Keller, and Charles Fuqua.

The charge most to be brought against New England is not Puritanism but February.

—Joseph Wood Krutch

Energy orientation involves two separate aspects: credibility and motivation. The question involves more than getting members of the College community to believe that energy consumption is a serious problem. It is critically important to convince them that the College is concerned about the problem and to motivate serious behavior about it as well.

Students, being the largest single group at the College, are of primary importance. Educating incoming freshmen, probably through their Junior Advisors, is the most plausible approach. For upperclassmen, house managers are the natural overseers since they are paid to make sure their houses are in order.

Credibility and motivation are two sides of the same problem. Students had an interesting reaction to two electricity conservation contests, each with a $25 prize. They found concerns about electrical waste "Mickey Mouse" compared to the attention given to heat loss. If students can be convinced that the College is doing its part in energy conservation, it becomes easier to get the students to do their part.

Why 'Williams Reports'

Decisions . . . This whole $20 million-per-year institution revolves around a decision making process which never stops. The seasons come and go. People come and go. But all the while academic departments and administrative offices, committees and study groups, are at work on one project or another. At the end of every project comes a report . . . and from those reports, come the decisions that affect our lives at Williams.

Have you seen any of those reports lately?

Williams Reports will be one source of information about the various groups, their work, their topics and their results. We'll also try to put the information into perspective. On the question of energy consumption, for example, individual energy-saving steps are part of a much-larger plan. Some steps have been taken, more are coming. And as part of the overall picture, we thought you might find it interesting to know how Williams people kept warm 100-plus years ago.

The publication is prepared by the College News Office. We've purchased space in The Record and will run as an insert about once every three weeks. We hope you find it useful.

Faculty members are models for the whole College community, and for this group the problem of motivation is both simpler and more difficult. It is simpler because the direct approach springs immediately to mind: send money. (Bronfman Science Center personnel saved about 12 per cent on energy costs when promised any savings would be added to research funds. Surely some equivalent reward can be found for the faculty as a whole.) Motivation of the faculty is more difficult because habits are more fixed, occasionally causing specific energy considerations to get lost on the stairway leading up the ivory tower.

Although the dollar savings the faculty can effect by its actions may be small, the atmosphere its attitude can create is substantial. Energy conservation incentives for the faculty should be offered with that in mind.

Non-academic personnel have both special opportunities and special problems relating to energy conservation. Their opportunities come through direct access to energy controls (light switches, radiator valves, stoves), giving them immediate opportunities to effect relatively substantial savings. But they also have many details other than energy to be concerned about, so motivation of non-academic personnel may have to begin with supervisors. While it is clear that monetary incentives should work as well for non-academic personnel as for the faculty, it is less clear how to set up the incentives. For one thing, suggestion boxes, with appropriate rewards for suggestions which are adopted, have a long and honorable history in industry. So, suggestion boxes should be made available to everyone.

"It is hard to get excited about an extra light bulb when the snow is blowing in around the windows."

The administration and Trustees bear a special burden in the credibility department. As a student said at one open meeting, "It is hard to get excited about an extra light bulb when the snow is blowing in around the windows."

The Energy Conservation Committee has found a great many places on campus where energy is literally wasted. Some of these energy leaks could be easily fixed once attention is called to them. But collectively, many small things can destroy the credibility of conservation efforts. There should be an immediate response (or at least an explanation) for each problem, or any conservation effort will be short lived. A suggestion box or telephone number to be used by people with conservation complaints should be widely publicized.

We call upon the administration, in conjunction with the Energy Conservation Committee, to promote and publicize a rise in the "discomfort index" on the campus. No matter how much the College community practices conservation, we will eventually reach practical upper limits to energy conservation; as E. B. White says, "There is a limit beyond which you cannot push beauty because of the lines it leaves in the face." We must all be ready to be more uncomfortable than we are now. We cannot expect to sit in our offices/classrooms/dormitories in our shirtsleeves without paying an exorbitant cost. The administration should make clear, and this committee will support, a new standard of discomfort, unpalatable as that may sound. We must all be made to realize that winter in the Berkshires involves a certain amount of just plain being cold and dark.

Conservation will require extensive publicity to attain the level of habit. We propose a set of scales for monitoring energy use and expense. By combining and

19th Century students hewed wood, hauled water

Bill Pratt, "the Sawbuck Philosopher," was hired by wealthier students in the 1800's to provide firewood.

By Martha Riley Johnson
Library Assistant, Williamsiana

The energy cost-per-student at Williams this year is about $450. Consider the way things used to be.

A century and a quarter ago, expenses for light and heat for a year as estimated in the 1853-54 catalog were $5-10 per student. Utilities were not a crushing burden for the strained budget of what was then a poor country college, not only because they were cheap, but because in the dormitories students were responsible for maintaining their own supplies of fuel and water, As for the college's public spaces, austerity was the rule. Even 60 years later alumni would recall with horror shivering before dawn in a chapel equipped with oil lamps but no hint of a fire. Classroom space was over-crowded and poorly ventilated summer and winter. Smoking wood stoves and lamps smelling of whale oil meant either superheated or frigidly cold classrooms and dim uncertain light. The most effective measure for cutting fuel consumption was the six week winter vacation.

Students in those days were literally hewers of wood and drawers of water. The freshman arriving at West College in early September saw halls crammed with peddlers and walls crowded with notices advertising such articles of self-sufficiency as the handsaw, handlamp, bucket, washstand, and broom.

Sanitary facilities were probably outhouses, and at best there may have existed a crude bathroom arrangement which was in use at West College as late as 1900. Sand Springs was a popular spot for bathing. One could bargain with a washerwoman for weekly laundry service. Beginning in 1850, West College freshmen no longer had to go to the end of Spring Street for their water, for the College had a contract with the new Williamstown Water Co. to bring water from Cold Spring to the colleges in a system of wooden pipes. Though this company foundered in 1858, a new one had taken over by 1860.

A quart of fuel for the lamps then in use could last from two weeks to a month, but woe to the student who found his lamp empty on Saturday evening. "He must beg or borrow or appropriate, or sit in utter darkness."

About Thanksgiving, some farmers from the surrounding hilsides would arrive in the College yard with loads of wood to drive a hard bargain with the inexperienced freshman. Most students sawed their own wood and made their own fires, except those who could afford to hire Bill Pratt, "the Sawbuck Philosopher," whose occupation was sawing wood for students and townspeople.

Those extravagant souls who hated to dress in a cold room could hire a man named O'Brien to come in before they arose to make the fire. The quantities of wood needed were huge. Wood piles were laid up against the outside walls of each building. In spring, the students deemed it their function to clean the littered yard thoroughly. Chip Day, a working holiday in mid-May, was the result, in which the last vestiges of the Berkshire winter were joyfully raked, shoveled, burned or carried away.

The Williamsiana Collection consists of printed and manuscript material relating to Williams College, and College records. Facts used in this article were taken from Perry's Williamstown and Williams College, memoirs of students of this period written for the Williams Quarterly, Williams Literary Monthly and Williams Alumni Review, and the Class of 1850 reunion book for 1900.

New music building, adjacent to Chapin Hall, has been planned for energy efficiency. Heavy insulation, double-glazed windows, and a roof-mounted solar unit for heating water are some of its features. The building has fewer windows than in the original plans, and natural breezes will provide air conditioning in good weather.

College taps sun as energy source for new music facility

The two-story music building, now nearing completion, has been planned to be "very energy efficient," according to Peter Welanetz, director of the Williams physical plant.

In a new step for the College, experiments with solar-powered heating units will be made. They will be used to heat domestic (tap) water and to power the reheat coils in the humidity controls.

The $2,600,000 structure, adjacent to Chapin Hall at the center of the Williams campus, will not be air-conditioned, but it will be well-ventilated for summer use. To withstand the Berkshire winters, says Welanetz, it will be heavily insulated, and double-glazed windows will be used throughout. Light levels will be kept at a minimum, with little lighting for architectural effect.

The building was also designed by the architects, Cambridge Seven Associates, Inc., to be readily accessible for handicapped users.

When it is completed this winter, the building will feature a 279-seat auditorium with projection facilities for illustrated lectures. There will also be a 170-seat choral rehearsal room and an orchestral rehearsal room.

In order to harmonize as much as possible with its surroundings (Georgian Lehman Hall, Greek Revival Chapin Hall, and the Contemporary Sawyer Library), the building's poured concrete exterior will be etched with acid to give a limestone-like appearance.

A courtyard will be created by the addition between the new structure and Chapin Hall. This area will be used to contain intermission crowds in good weather, according to Welanetz.

Several conservation steps have already been taken

1) Thermostats are set at 66 degrees during the day. There are night setbacks to 55 degrees in classroom and office buildings and 60 degrees in living areas.

2) The temperature of hot water has been cut from more than 150 degrees to about 125 degrees.

3) There is no hot water in the campus washing machines.

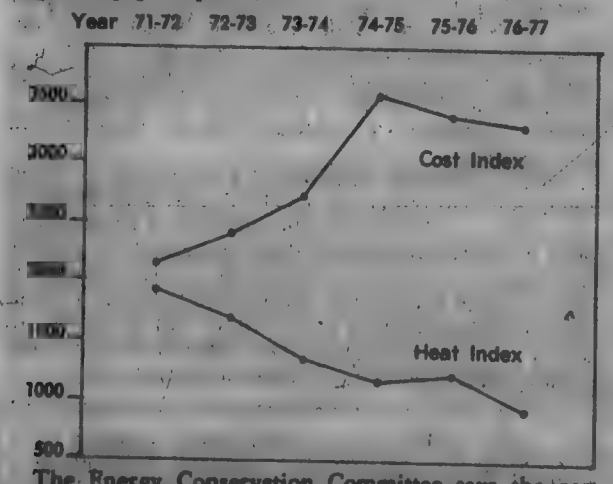
4) More efficient storm windows have been installed in many campus buildings.

5) Attic insulation has been put in several of the College's older buildings.

6) A system of insulation and recycling has been developed for the College's 400,000 gallon fuel oil tank which eliminates the need for an auxiliary heater to keep the oil warm.

And, of course, there is the reminder to turn out the lights and keep the windows closed. The little things add up.

Conservation efforts cutting use of energy, costs continue to rise



Energy conservation programs at Williams saved the College an estimated $160,000 last year. The figure comes from the Buildings and Grounds Department which has compared energy usage at Williams in 1977-78 with the way energy was used in the 1971-72 academic year.

The saving is the silver lining in the dark cloud of steadily rising energy costs. A lot of money is spent for heat and light. The bill last year was $723,000 compared with only $333,500 in 1972-73. But the conservation measures taken so far have been effective enough that the amount of fuel oil used by the College has actually dropped! The amount of oil used in 1972-73 was 1,373,000 gallons while 1,280,000 gallons were used last year.

The Energy Conservation Committee and the Physical Facilities Committee suggest that a good way to monitor energy use and expense is through scales which take into consideration variables such as weather, price (including inflation), square footage and the number of people involved. The graph below is a cost and heat index for Williams since the 1971-72 academic year.

The cost index shows energy costs per student per degree day per square foot.

The heat index shows energy usage per student per degree day per square foot.

The Energy Conservation Committee says the cost index could be a way of indicating when contingency plans might be put into effect if energy costs rise precipitously. The heat index is an indication of how our conservation efforts are going.

Don't look for the cost index to drop. But if the heat index continues to decline, the conservation program is doing well.

studying variables such as weather conditions, price fluctuations, square footage, and the number of people involved, we could let the College community know how well the conservation effort is doing and how much it is costing us. We could also agree in advance at what point the energy indicators will show more drastic conservation steps should be taken.

Another obvious proposal for increasing energy awareness is an attention-getting yearly focus on energy conservation. This should take the form of a subject for convocation, a commencement speaker, a Mellon conference, a Winter Study project, an Earth-Day-like format, an extensive competition, or some combination of these ideas.

The monetary aspects of the problem cannot be overemphasized. They are of immediate importance to everyone and will not go away. Money spent and attitudes formed now will be economies both in the short and long runs. Other aspects should not, however, be overlooked. The educational value of conservation efforts is not trivial. We may argue that the educated person is not only considerate in social relations but also in environmental relations. Moral values are not to be short-changed. While, in a world view, our efforts at Williams may seem negligible, we are talking about new realities with which we are going to have to contend.

Students of the last century spent a great deal of time and energy providing wood for their fires and keeping oil in their lamps. Even so, natural light was often more efficient.

Even Cowgirls

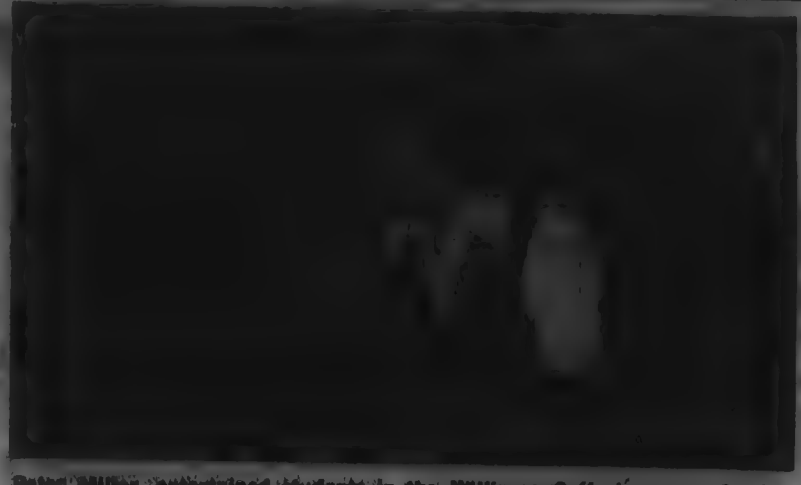
By Marcus Smith

The problem with reviewing an album by "The World's Greatest Rock 'N' Roll Band" is what standard of judgment to establish prior to the listening. The Rolling Stones in other words have become so "respectable", to misleadingly coin a song title from Some Girls, that many a reviewer falls into the understandable trap of only invoking history, of only using the Stones then as a criterion of judgment for the Stones now. The alternative is to pretend the old performer is a new one and so gain a fresh perspective.

This is not to say, however, that the Stones must bash, crash, and belt away on every song they do because they are the Stones. Certainly, Jagger's cover of the Temptation's classic, "(Just My) Imagination" does justice to the Motown genre, while the dueling of Richard's and Woods' twangy guitars enhance the song with a gentle flair. And besides, even on Flowers Jagger sang another Temptations gem, "My Girl", as a respite from quintessential rockers like "Mother's Little Helper" and "Let's Spend The Night Together". Where the Stones really fall short though on Some Girls is on their country music parody, "Far Away Eyes", and especially if one is of the opinion that much of country whines like a parody of itself anyway. Indeed, the whimsy of Arlo Guthrie is much preferred.

Review Copy Courtesy Of Toonerville Trolley.

Certainly, this is the flaw that consistently seeps into an otherwise confident and competent collection of rock and blues-based boogie. "Now that we're respected in society. We don't worry about the things we used to be", jeers Mike atop the jaunty, streamlined guitar patchwork of "Respectable", but it's a lazy sarcasm from the mouth of someone who could care less whether he's "popping heroin with the President."



Consequently, it's Watts' keen seen of rhythm that propels the Stones whenever they become carbon copies on themselves, as on "Lies", little more than a remake of the undistinguished "Dance Little Sister."

But now we're judging on the basis of the past again. Yet we must to indicate that . . . the mysogony of baiting insolence that has ever catavaulted the Stones into their satanic realm of several innuendo and brashness is just as harsh and potent as ever. "Some Girls", another swaggering blues ditty, is the ultimate put-down of all girls of all nationalities and race, but also a catalogue of inert indifference, even to the pose itself.

The Stones do sizzle instrumentally on this album though on more than just "Respectable". "When The Whip Comes Down" lunges as a noisy frolic, the Stones at their assertive best. "Shattered" meantime captures the jeery rumble-tumble flavour of the street in the resonant scratch of the Richarde-Woods guitars and combines it with the sardonic decadence of Jagger's facetious phrasing to make the self-parody a biting art.

Which leaves us with "Beast Of Burden" and the Stones once more lightening their intensity with control and effort as Jagger briefly reaches for a falsetto or two without straining himself too much.

In the words of "Shattered", "Ah, does it matter?" The Stones previously have supplied the answer ("It's only rock 'n' roll"). Now they beg the question.

CDE mints economists

By Gail Carroll

The Center for Development Economics, located in the old Delta Psi fraternity house at the north end of the College campus, is a branch of Williams College that has remained all too anonymous. Nineteen students from various developing nations are participating in this year's CDE program, working towards a degree in the Master of Arts in Developmental Economics.

The Center is operated through funds from the Ford and Clark foundations under the direct auspices of the Williams College Administration. The comprehensive one-year program offers graduate study in those areas of economic analysis and quantitative techniques most directly relevant to economic policy-making in developing countires.

The students, thirteen men and six women, range in ages from twenty to thirty years old. Their tuitions are provided through funds from various United Nations agencies and grants from their own governments. They are on leaves of absence from different government posts, hoping to return to their jobs with new knowledge and an appreciation for a new culture. In order to receive the MADE degree, the students must each maintain a B average in their area of study.

The intensity of the CDE program limits the amount of free time the students can enjoy. However, they do look forward to mingling with the College crowd and learning about American life in the Berkshires. Williamstown, though it is no metropolis, does provide a culture shock of sorts.

Cynthia Paras and Jana Potecar, both from the Philippines, complain that Spring Street does not offer the most exciting night life, but they are impressed with the beauty of the mountains. The climate in Williamstown is a great change for most of the CDE students, and Herbert Ezenwa of Nigeria, who is already bundled up in sweaters, cannot believe that it will get much colder. Marcos Viale of Peru has an unusual complaints, insisting that all American women look the same.

The members of the Center explain they want to open their doors to the Williams undergraduates. This year, the Center has affiliations with six social houses and would like to plan functions with as many groups as possible. The men are hoping to arrange a challenge match with the Williams soccer team and they seem fairly confident that they will give the varisty players a tough game. The cde has won the ping pong championship for the past two years, and this year's team does not plan to ruin the record.

Scheduled events include a series of "country nights" in which the CDE students will present different aspects of their native countries to the Williams community.

Music in the Round

Composers of four nationalities will be represented in the Music in the Round concert on Friday, November 3, at 8:30 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The variety of instruments will be equally interesting as Julius Hegyi and Lucy Joseph will play the violin, Susan St. Amour will play the viola, Douglas Moore will play the cello and David Cobb will play the double bass. Admission is free with Williams I.D.

Myrna Nachman

Myrna Nachman, pianist, will play music by J. S. Bach, Ravel, Copland, and Schubert in a solo recital on Sunday, November 5, at 3:00 p.m. in Thompson Memorial Chapel. The concert, sponsored by the Williams College Department of Music, is free and open to the public.

Opening the program is Bach's 1729 Partita No. 4 in D Major, consisting of seven movements. Following it is Maurice Ravel's Valses nobles et sentimentales, composed in 1911. After the intermission, Nachman will perform Aaron Copland's 1930 Piano Variations; and closing the recital is Franz Schubert's Sonata in A Major, Op. Posth., written in 1828.

Nachman, who was Visiting Assistant Professor of Music at Williams last year, is currently on the music faculties of the State University of New York at Stony Brook and of Brooklyn College.

What would Socrates think of O'Keefe?

If you question long enough and deep enough, certain truths about O'Keefe become evident.
It has a hearty, full-bodied flavor. It is smooth and easy going down.
And, the quality of its head is fact rather than philosophical conjecture.
We think there's one truth about O'Keefe that Socrates would not question; It's too good to gulp. As any rational man can taste.

Forum on WSP elicits some ideas

by Lorraine Dennehy

Participants at the Winter Study Review Committee meeting last Thursday night suggested that the committee make two significant reforms in the Winter Study program. The people in attendance favored modifying the pass-fail system to a pass-marginal pass-fail system. The audience also agreed that the Committee should encourage and approve more 99 projects than they have in the past.

The major problem with the Winter Study Program, according to Chairman William Grant, is that the faculty complains that they work hard preparing for the courses while the students do not seem really motivated to learn.

Associate Provost David Booth suggested the modified grading system. He explained that it would distinguish between those who work; those who merely show up for class, and those who don't even show up. Hopefully, he added it would provide some incentive for students to do more than marginal work. As one professor said, "Winter Study is not a two grade system—last year no one failed . . . it's a pass-pass system.

Some people reasoned that if the committee is truly worried about a lack of student effort, they should provide for more 99's because students are bound to be enthusiastic about the programs they develop.

The committee indicated that they are considering decreasing the number of required Winter Study Projects. Faculty members may have to teach just one every two years rather than two every three, and students may be required to take only three out of four.

Nearly everyone in the audience was vehemently opposed to abolishment of the program. The committee indicated that they were not seriously considering either abolishment, or maintaining the status quo, but rather, to make adjustments.

Anti-Apartheid Coalition holds forum tonight

The relationship between Williams and apartheid in South Africa faces a new round of scrutiny tonight at a panel and open discussion "South Africa: Political & Economic Strategies" sponsored by the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC) at 8 p.m. in Jesup Auditorium.

Four speakers will lead off the discussion. Richard Nuccio, political science professor, and Clint Willis '79 will speak on political avenues to creating change in South Africa, while Stephen Lewis of the Economics Department and Jacqueline Wilson '79 will present economic approaches. Peter Meyers '79 will moderate.

In open discussion following these presentation, the WAAC hopes to generate ideas on the direction that anti-apartheid activities should take over the coming year. The value of divestiture for creating change is an open issue in light of the Trustees' actions over the summer. Proponents and opponents have been invited to attend and present their cases.

Lewis and Nuccio are members of the faculty anti-apartheid group. Nuccio was active in last spring's divestiture drive, while Lewis spent last year in Botswana, a southern African state.

The panel is part of a move throughout the Northeast to raise the issue of American involvement in South Africa before elections. The move has led to rallies, demonstrations and teach-ins on campuses throughout the region.

Black acceptances drop tremendous obstacles in enjoying college life, Craig White '79 explained. As so much effort is put into "proving oneself," he said, "it's often difficult to let down one's guard and relax." "I've found that in class discussions," he said, "often being the only black, people expect me to have the 'black' opinion. That's quite a burden."

Although the trend in black admissions is a valid concern for Smith and the Admissions staff, no one is panicking.

When asked if the College would ever accept a black only to fill quota requirements, Smith said: "No responsible admissions staff will ever admit anyone who is not suited to do the work." The College, he noted, does not operate under a quota system. Brock, though, did say that to a certain extent "qualified" black students are judged separately from "qualified" white students, but in either case the academic success of an applicant, black or white, is the deciding factor.

While the decline in the number of black students attending Williams has not yet reached a critical stage, there is little doubt that the issue poses a threat to the diversity the Administration wishes to achieve in the Williams student body.

Williams Sports Briefs

Field hockey

The Williams Varsity field hockey team ended their 1978 regular season play at home Wednesday, losing to a strong team from Dartmouth College 4-0. The Ephwomen, with a final record of 6-6, could not sustain their four game winning streak against the solid Ivy League foes.

Dartmouth scored all four of their goals during the first half of the game; they took a total of 35 shots at Williams goaltenders Blythe Miller and Sue Smith, who combined for 25 saves. It was a totally defensive effort by the Ephs.

The Ephwomen, with an even 6-6 record in season play and a 1-1 record in Little Three competition, will participate in an All-College field hockey tournament to be held at Smith College on Oct. 28-29. At this event, individual team members will be selected to four All-College teams and will be eligible for selection to New England and National teams which compete later this fall.

The Williams JV field hockey team wound up its 1978 season last week with an impressive 8-2 record.

Water polo

Williams Water Polo will travel to New Haven this weekend to compete in the New England Regional Tournament, sporting a 3-1 league record, including wins over UNH, Mansfield State and rival Amherst. The Ephs hope to improve on their sixth place finish of a year ago.

Seeing their first action in two weeks, Williams travelled to RPI Friday night for their final tuneup for this weekend's tournament. Rusty from the layoff, the Ephs were unable to control the Engineers' passing game. RPI ran off five third-period goals en route to a 14-9 victory over the Ephs. Co-captain Brian McDermott fired 9 shots on net, hitting on 4 of the attempts to spearhead the Williams attack. Gordy Cliff chipped in with a pair of early goals, while co-captains Bob Krause and John Trapp and Frosh Bill Hymes put in one each.

Women's soccer

Neither the Williams Women's Soccer Team nor Vassar's booters were able to break a tie in a double overtime leaving the final score 2-2 in their match Friday. The game, played on Williams field, leaves the Ephs with a 5-4-2 record.

Inner Laurie Jones, a senior, provided both Williams' goals, scoring one in each half. Williams coach Judy Zirnicki credited her, along with the entire defense, with strong play.

Despite the final score, Williams dominated the game. The ball was in the Vassar end about three-fourths of the time, and Williams took 31 shots on their goal compared to Vassar's 10 shots on the Williams goal.

Williams' last game of the season will be Wednesday against Dartmouth. It will be played at 2:15 on Williams' Cole Field.

In the College Council article appearing in the October 27 Record, it was incorrectly reported that a referendum will take place November 10 on direct election of the CC secretary and treasurer. That proposal will not be voted on until March. On Nov. 10, students will vote on a proposal to add an impeachment procedure to the CC constitution.

Parking Ban

Joseph J. Zoito, Jr., Williamstown Chief of Police, announced Tuesday a ban on overnight street parking, to be enforced beginning November 1. The ban, which is in effect all year, is only enforced during the winter months when parked cars can hinder snow removal.

Parking longer than one hour between 1 a.m. and 6 a.m. will be interpreted as overnight parking, Zoito said. Violators will be ticketed and subject to fines of $10. Violations during snowfall will result in towing. The owners of the vehicle will be charged for the towing and storage costs, in addition to the fine.

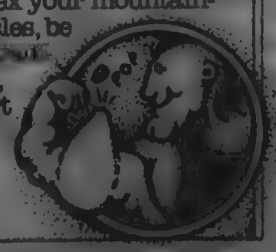
Mountaineering #6.

LORE & LEGEND

Mountaineering is an oral tradition. Over the years, it has been passed down from teacher to pupil, father to son, package store owner to customer. As a result, a folklore – a mythology, if you will – has formed around the mountains of Busch. You, being a student of mountaineering, no doubt wish to acquaint yourself with these truths and half-truths, these stories both accurate and apocryphal. A wise decision. And, as luck would have it, this ad is just the ticket.

One of mountaineering's earliest legends is Bennington Baxter Bennington. Adventurer, international bon vivant and inventor of the phrase "your check is in the mail," it was he who perfected the finer points of expedition financing. While other mountaineers resorted to such bizarre extremes as gainful employment, Bennington subsidized assaults on the Busch mountaintop with creative economics. An amalgam of paper schemes, franchised dreams, dummy corporations and corporate dummies kept him in clover for nigh on 20 fiscal years. Asked at the culmination of his career to reflect upon the secret of success, Bennington revealed his first rule: "Keep all your assets liquid."

Another frequent subject of mountaineering lore is the wildlife. Numerous tales abound, but perhaps the most famous story is that of the 1973 Muncie Mathematics Convention. All 76 prodigies, whiz kids and befuddled geniuses initiated an after hours expedition. It began harmlessly enough. But soon, the Busch mountaineers reached the Moonus Strip, a rarified nightspot catering to nightcrew nightowls. Before the evening was over, several of them were bending the slide rules. Others were smoking big cigars and telling every woman in sight they were agents with an eye for figures dancing.



"I can make you a mathematical model, baby." Talk about your wildlife!

But when looking for sheer courage, W. Dexter Poole must rank in lore among the top mountaineers. Fond of saying "The road to truth goes through bad neighborhoods," Poole enjoyed skirting with danger and approached mountaineering as a test of survival skills. In his most famous challenge, Poole, equipped only with 30 waterproof matches and a major credit card, parachuted into a remote area known as Cleveland. He was up to the task. Within 24 hours, Poole was basking under the hot sun of Antibes, downing the smooth, cold, refreshing mountains of Busch Beer. A credit to his colleagues and a colleague on credit.

What becomes a legend most? That is (one) a matter of subjective judgment and (two) in a constant state of flux. Keep in mind legends are created every day. So when you flex your mountaineering muscles, be true to the tradition. At best, you'll be part of history. At least, you'll be a near-myth.

Mountaineering is the science and art of transiting mountains. The term originates from the Old Norse "fjall" meaning mountain and "skr" meaning to walk on snowshoes. The above mountaineers and these scenes of their exploits were taken by any number of cameras, people with cameras & pens, or incidental.

Don't just reach for a beer. BUSCH Head for the mountains.

Quarterback Lutz sparks 11-8 nipping of Union

by Mary Kate Shea

With just under eight minutes remaining in the game, and with Williams behind by an 8-3 score, injured quarterback Bob Lutz made his first appearance since the Ephs game against Trinity three weeks ago and sparked a 92-yard scoring drive that led to an 11-8 win over the Union College Dutchmen.

Williams will take its 4-2 season record into Little Three action when the Wesleyan Cardinals visit Weston Field next Saturday afternoon.

Williams passing attack proved to be more of a threat than did its running game led by senior Greg Collins (46 yards in 16 carries) and freshman Joey Wheatley (38 yards in 8 carries), the Ephs gained just 81 yards on the ground. Sophomore quarterbacks Bob Stackpole and Bob Lutz combined to complete 14 of 21 passes for 170 yards in the air.

The Dutchmen employed a number of running and passing plays to gain a total of 318 yards, the most yardage allowed in a game by the Williams defense so far this season. Union quarterback Andy Terranova completed 21 passes for 187 yards. Throughout the game, Terranova consistently hit his receivers for short-yardage pickups. Led by the running of halfback Rich Romer with 56 yards in 17 carries, the Dutchmen gained 131 yards on the ground.

The problem of turnovers, which plagued Williams in its previous two games, shifted to the Ephs' opponent as on several occasions Union started drives only to have passes picked off by members of the Williams defense.

On a third down play at the Williams 18-yard line early in the second quarter, sophomore linebacker Brian Benedict snagged a pass across the middle intended for Romer. Defensive backs Mark Eckert and Mark Gerry teamed up to produce an interception on Union's next offensive series. Gerry tipped a Terranova pass and Eckert grabbed the bobbled ball and ran the interception back 21 yards. With less than 0:25 left in the first half, co-captain Greg McAleenan intercepted Dana Johnston's attempted halfback pass and returned the interception 54 yards on an exciting run. The Williams backfield's fourth interception of the afternoon came on the Dutchmen's last series of the game when senior Long Ellis snagged a long desperation pass by Terranova, and ran the ball back 31 yards. Ellis' interception allowed the Ephs to run out the clock to end the game.

Neither team could muster much of an attack in the opening quarter, but Williams managed to get on the scoreboard first with co-captain Ken Hollingsworth's successful 31-yard field goal attempt nine minutes into the quarter.

Union scored its first points of the game on what was perhaps the most unusual play witnessed by Williams fans this season. The Dutchmen got two points for a safety just before the end of the first half when punter Rick Walter chased a snap that soared over his head and kicked the ball out of bounds in the end zone. The play was a smart one of Walter's part since a Union recovery of the bad snap in the end zone would have given the Dutchmen a touchdown.

Union's lead increased to five points with 32- and 31-yard field goal conversions by Jim McDonald in the third and fourth quarters.

Lutz's entry into the game sparked the Williams offense and his passing took the Ephs 92 yards in seven plays for what proved to be the game-winning touchdown. The potent combination of Lutz to Hollingsworth—one that had been so successful in Williams first three wins of the season—showed its magic again as the Eph quarterback hit his favorite receiver four times for 78 yards during the drive. Hollingsworth seemed to be all over the field as he collared passes for 23, 9, 14 and 22 yards.

Following three conservative passes, Lutz called a running play and Collins scampered nine yards through a big hole up the middle for a touchdown that made the score 9-8 in Williams' favor. A successful two-point conversion from Lutz to Hollingsworth on the extra point gave the Ephs a critical three-point lead with 1:52 left in the contest.

Much of the credit for Lutz's success must go to the Williams offensive line. The line gave Lutz excellent protection the entire time he was in the game, as demonstrated by the fact that the Union defensive line did not touch Lutz once in the two series he played.

Union started a drive and moved steadily down the field on the strength of Terranova's passing until Ellis' interception gave Williams possession of the football, allowing the Ephs to run out the clock with the final score Williams 11 Union 8.

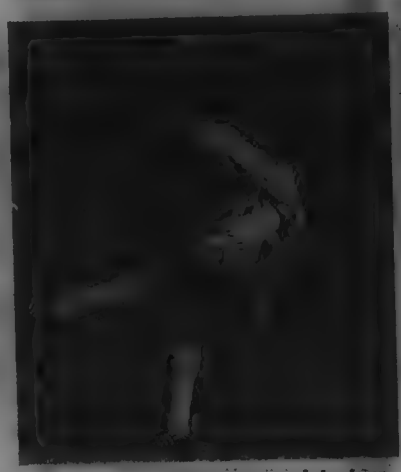
Tenacious booters Eph out victory in 11-goal shootout vs. Springfield

by Dave Barra



There was a turkey-shoot down at Cole Field Saturday and when the smoke cleared Williams had outshot Springfield 6-5. The Ephs are now 6-2-1 and look eagerly ahead to this Saturday's Homecoming match against Little Three rival Wesleyan.

Williams wasted no time getting on the board. Stuart Taylor '81 was brought down in the penalty area by a Springfield defender four minutes into the game. Gregg Hartman '79 took the penalty shot. The Chief keeper made the initial stop but Hartman put in the rebound. Twelve seconds later Hartman crossed a beautiful ball to Peter May '79 crashing in from his wing. The goal was May's first for Williams. The score was quickly 2-0. But Springfield was only warming up. Taking advantage of the confusion caused by whistles from the JV field, Springfield's John Szymko put in a shot after Williams had given up on the ball thinking a call had been made. Several more times Springfield threatened but Gregg Hartman regained the two goal edge with a left-footed shot that surprised even himself. Then, with three minutes to go, Williams allowed a penalty kick. The match went to the half 3-2.

Springfield came out charging and caught Williams flat. The Chiefs scored one minute into the second half. Seven minutes later they scored again taking the lead for the first time. Stung by the quick turnabout Williams came to life. The Ephs dominated play but missed on several opportunities until Peter May made sure on the equalizer thirteen minutes in. But Springfield kept coming. John Szymko got the hat-trick midway through the period and put the Chiefs back on top 5-4.

The Ephs did not give up. Relentlessly they pressured Springfield controlling play hoping for a break. Perry Nelson, senior co-captain, made his own break heading Stuart Taylor's cross into the upper right corner. The game now tied would go to who wanted it more.

Wtih 4:07 left to play, Nelson found a wide-open Dave Barra '79 streaking to goal. Springfield's keeper froze on his line as Barra pushed the game-winner past him. Williams' unbeaten streak goes to seven games. The Ephs host Wesleyan this Saturday at Cole Field.

Runners show strength at Easterns

Men take 5th

Despite crippling injuries, the Williams Men's Cross Country squad ran to a fifth place out of the twenty-one teams at the Eastern Collegiate Championships last Saturday.

The Ephs traveled to Boston's Franklin Park without the services of co-captain and first man Tom Schreck, who was hobbled by an ankle injury. Although his teammates ran hard, the squad did not have the depth to make up for Schreck's absence.

The team maintained respectability largely because of the fine efforts of Mike Behrman and co-captain Steve Polasky. Both runners made strong moves over the last two miles to finish sixteenth and eighteenth, respectively. This qualified them for All-East status. Not far behind in the dense field was Garrick Leonard, who maintained his solid consistency by running to twenty-seventh, just seconds behind the All-East standard. Phil Darrow stayed close after the three mile mark, but his slow start held him back to thirty-seventh. Pat Dobson, running tough with a nauseated stomach, fought himslef home to ninety-ninth, while Rusty Anderson came in 125th. Approximately 150 runners completed the race.

The Ephs will now pull things back together in order to host the Little Three meet on Wednesday. With the return of Schreck and that extra margin of psyche which always accompanies the event, the Purple is confident of their ability to hold off a strong threat from the traditional rival and capture the crown once again. The meet will be run at 3:30 from the Science Quad.

Women - 11th

The Williams Women's Cross-Country Team finished an admirable 11th place in the New England Championships held Sunday at Holy Cross College in Worcester, Mass. A total of 35 teams competed.

The University of Vermont won the race with a low score of 53 points, followed by Harvard with 65, and the University of New Hampshire with 109. Williams had 280 points.

Middlebury's Karin Vonberg set a course record of 17:38 on the 3000 meter run. The unseasonably warm weather, contrasting to snow or sleet of past New England Championship meets, was generally an advantage to the distance runners.

Mary Hakala, a senior, was Williams' first finisher, placing 24th with a time of 19:22. Freshman Sue Marchant ran a strong race, finishing 38th, in 19:54. She was followed by senior Corrie Johnson 61st, in 20:27, freshmen Liz Martineau, 71st, in 20:44, Stephanie Carperos, 86th, in 21:24, junior Annie Ko, 101st, in 22:03, freshman Brenda Mailman, 115th, in 22:35, and Alexis Hamill, 149th, in 23:23.

The field was by far the largest the team has ever competed in. Thirty-five teams and over 300 women from New England colleges participated.

Coach Doug Armstrong said he was pleased and "actually surprised" at the team's strong finish, and noted that the race was "extremely exciting to watch".

This was the culmination of the season for Williams. They will conclude with the Little Three Championships on their home course on November 1.

Golf team drives to victory

The enforced winter idleness at the prestigious Taconic Golf Club will not be difficult to bear this year as the tenacious Eph linksters, the team with the highest winning percentage in Williams College history, ended its fall season unblemished 7-0 record.

After a shaky start, Greg "the Snake" Jacobson reached to the depths of his golfing soul for an elixir of straight shots and holed putts. A 75 at Middlebury, a 163 at Yale, and an 80 in a torrential downpour against Springfield were the highlights of his season.

Ed "Big" Bousa, a gifted junior whose oft erratic play shaves years off a coach's life, produced some spectacular golf this Fall. Fellow juniors Marcel Oudin and Chris Holm delivered some crucial scores, but both suffered from the ravaging effects of that villainous big stick, the driver. With some work on their long games, these impressive upper-bodied swingers could contend for a New England title this spring.

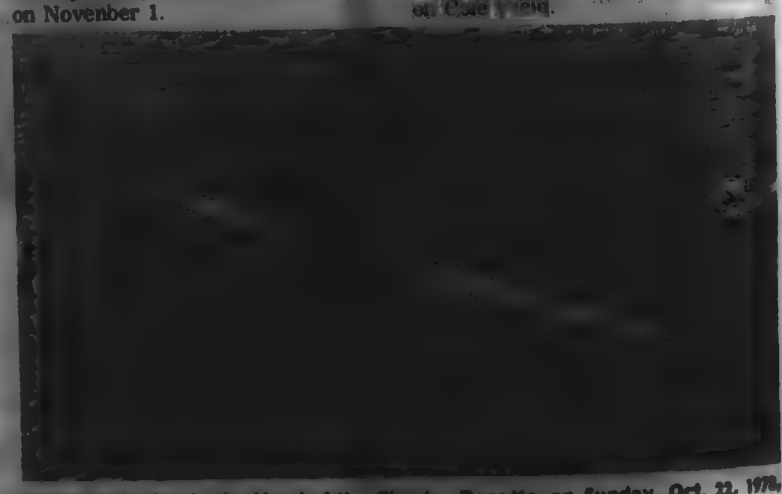
Senior co-captain Dan "Death Bar" Katz, though a consistent top five performer, had a disappointing Fall. Not even Katz's fine ball-striking could make up for a mysteriously recurring spasmodic jab on the putting greens. But at 21 Katz's nerves cannot have frayed beyond the point of no return. Look for his return to health this spring.

If it were possible to selectively breed hand and wrist characteristics for high level golf, Young Bill Sprague would provide the model. Sprague showed flashes of brilliance against Union and Albany State, but knee problems marred the young junior's other outings. A feared rendezvous with the orthopedic knife may be in the offing this winter.

Senior Michael C. Lynch capped his season in a classical way, classical in the sense of the Platonic conception of music of the spheres. On the third hole at Middlebury, Lynch delicately massaged a wedge shot into the hole for an eagle two.

Finally, Bill "Dick Tiddy" Upton capped a fine competitive season with a stunning victory in the 1978 Williams College Golf Championship. With a first round victory over former champion Bill Sprague and a second round nerve-shattering triumph over roommate Mike Lynch, Upton found himself pitted against the formidable Ed Bousa. Upton whittled a 4-stroke deficit to 2 down with 3 to go, and then proceeded to crunch a monstrous drive to par the challenging sixteenth hole. Upton went on to win the seventeenth and easily clinched the match on eighteen. It was a comeback characteristic of a champion.

Eph ruggers rout Berkshire club 6-4



In the battle for Berkshire County supremacy, the WRFC narrowly defeated the highly touted Berkshire Rugby Club 6-4. The play of the WRFC had been sloppy before last weekend's game and and the club has been plagued by numerous injuries. This match was not without its losses, specifically to second row John Svoboda and prop Victor Zerbino.

For the first year in the history of this intense rivalry, the two teams were playing for what will soon be the goal of every western Massachusetts rugger, the soon to be famed Commissioner's Cup. The Berkshire ruggers, a group of highly skilled athletes, faced a band of rejuvenated college ruggers who are just reaching their peak. With only two games remaining on the fall schedule, Boston College and arch-rival Amherst.

The closely contested match was typified by marches up and down the field, which were thwarted by strong goal line stands. The Berkshire club was knocking on Williams' door when scrum-half Yoshi Belash scooped up a bouncing ball and ran the length of the field to score the first try of the game. Ted Cypiot blasted the extra points through the uprights to make the score 4-0.

The Berkshire club came back soon after with four points of its own, but failed to convert on the kick. The score stood for the rest of the game, giving the Ephs a gratifying 6-4 victory. In another closely fought game the B-side narrowly lost to a team consisting mainly of Berkshire A-siders. Freshman standout Kirwin Webb scored their only points on a penalty kick in the first half.

The festivities following the game were dominated by the WRFC as usual. It was highlighted by a thrilling rendition of Eskimo Nell by Bill Green and a chug from the Commissioner's Cup by the captains. The cup will be on display in the Rugby Trophy case in the Log. The team is looking forward to its bout against Boston College on Homecoming at 11 o'clock on Cole Field.

Peter Wells, '79, in the Head of the Charles Regatta, on Sunday, Oct. 22, 1978, was fourth (unofficial) in novice sculls event.

SA Panel re
trustee stater

Four panelists refuted several of the Trustees' statements made last spring about the College's responsibility as an investor in a discussion on the political and economic situation in South Africa last Wednesday.

The four speakers included Stephen Lewis, professor of Economics, Richard Nuccio, assistant professor of Political Science, Clint Willis '79, and Jacqueline Wilson '79.

"The Trustees' statement is a first step," said Nuccio, "but a hesitant one." He claimed that the Trustees require those opposing corporate investment in South Africa to prove investments harmful.

He argued for assuming corporations harmful unless they demonstrate efforts to end apartheid. In addition, he urged a concerted "attack on the structure of South African law."

Forum explores possible alternatives to the College Council

by Eric Schmitt

Citing a need for experimentation in student government, the "Disillusioned Students for Dissolution" held an open forum Thursday evening to discuss the possibility of a referendum enabling the student body to dissolve the present College Council.

Steve Magee '79, spokesperson for the group, said the proposed referendum would be in the form of an amendment to the Williams College constitution. The amendment would provide the mechanism for dissolution of the Council upon a no-confidence vote by the majority of the student body, with two-thirds of the students voting constituting a quorum.

The referendum itself needs at least 200 signatures to be placed on the ballot. If approved, it would become Article 10 of the College constitution.

Magee said that even if the amendment were never utilized, it would make the present constitution a stronger document, holding the Council more accountable to student demands.

"While the people in the Council are good," Magee said, "the structure of the body is weak. We need to identify the needs and wants of the students, and then adopt a structure to fit those needs."

Although "not radical," according to Magee, the proposal raised several questions concerning the consequences of dissolution.

One student acknowledged the limited awareness students have about the function of the Council and warned that students should understand what they are abolishing before abolishing it.

Another student, opposed to the idea of dissolution, suggested that structural changes in the Council should take place within the body itself. Magee retorted that only from increased participation outside the "elitist" Council would any real democratic structure evolve.

In addition to the "no confidence" section of the referendum, notice of any vote would be made using all available College news media two weeks in advance. Ten per cent of the student body would have to be petitioned to initiate the vote.

In the event of dissolution, Magee favors a constitutional convention format with representatives from each house, and four Freshmen Council-appointed members, working out a new constitution in 'town meeting' style.

Magee plans to hold additional meetings to work out details of the amendment and its consequences. The first meeting will be tonight at 8 p.m. in Hopkins House living room.

Leaders of the College Council declined comment on the proposed amendment.

Chandler picks two for Committee

President John Chandler has selected David Bennett '79 and Debra Ferguson '79 to represent the student body on the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility, announced College Council president Bronson Fargo at last Wednesday night's meeting.

Chandler chose the two from a list of four students recommended by the Council last week. The list represented the outcome of two weeks of dispute over whether the individual exemplified the sentiment of the students.

The Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) is considering instituting a two-semester language requirement for students who wish to study abroad, CEP member Julia McNamee '80 reported. Designed to insure that students make a long standing commitment to studying abroad, McNamee said, the requirement would also attempt to guarantee that students know enough of a foreign language to benefit from living in that country.

Concern about the quality of many year abroad programs is behind the administration's drive to institute the two-semester requirement, McNamee explained.

Students on the CEP oppose the requirement, McNamee said, as they feel there are other ways of students can show a commitment to studying abroad. Council members also reacted negatively to the proposal.

Ted Tucci '79 attacked the requirement as "just a way of beefing up enrollment in language courses," while Steve MaGee '79 called it "another voice against experimentation in education."

McNamee pointed out that the requirement would limit students whose reasons for wanting to study in a foreign country did not involve that country's language or culture. Music students who wish to study in Vienna, but have no interest in learning German, are a good example of this, McNamee said.

Council Treasurer John Simpson '79 suggested that the passing of a competency test or the completion of a summer school language program be interchangeable with the two semester requirement, if the institution of some requirement is unavoidable.

In order to "remedy the problems of last spring's election," vice-president Chris Jenkins '80 announced that stricter guidelines on this week's voting on an at-large representative and the impeachment referendum will be imposed. The Elections Committee drew up a complete set of elections procedures, emphasizing constant supervision of the ballots, so that "there will be no excuse for a slip up," Jenkins said.

There is a clear potential that some cheating occurred in the campus election last spring. "This will be a much more respectable election," he stated; "there will be a lot more control than last year."

A motion to send the ever growing problem of vandalism to the student committee on Physical Planning was passed unanimously by Council.

The question of outdoor lighting on campus was also sent to the Physical Planning Committee, as the Council passed a motion for the committee to take to Buildings and Grounds student suggestions on campus areas where lights should be added. Council member Bill Baldiga '80 volunteered to sit on the Physical Planning Committee.

The budgeting of SAT funds will begin in two weeks, John Simpson '79 announced. To speed up the budgeting procedure, organizations' budgets about which there are no questions will be moved as a group, Simpson explained.

Tentative SAT allocations for the week include: $595 for the Williams Action Coalition, $2,341 for the men's Rugby-Football Club, $898.80 for the women's Rugby-Football Club, $4,320 for the Outing Club, $340 for the men's Volleyball Club, $9,349.65 for WCFM, and $1400 for the Williams Feminist Alliance.

Simpson emphasized that this is the final week for applications to be made for SAT funds. He encouraged students to take advantage of a new Finance Committee rule this year, which allows individual students to seek SAT funds for their own projects.

nse pops archrival Amherst

Williams victory, which boosts 'phs' season record to 5-3 and the Lord Jeffs to 3-5, causes a -way tie among Williams, yan and Amherst for the 1978 Three title. The win was a l one for coach Bob Odell's en, since a tie or Amherst y in the contest would have the Lord Jeffs their first Little football championship since Williams has now won the Little six of the last eight years and ied Wesleyan and Amherst for rown this season and in 1976. herst racked up 261 yards in total offense, rushing for 129 yards in 51 carries and completing nine passes for 132 yards. The Ephs combined 114 yards on the ground with an aerial attack that produced just 82 yards for 196 yards in total offense.

Amherst's Bob Steer was the leading rusher on the afternoon with 57 yards in 17 carries. Williams' running game was led by Vernon Davis (39 yards in seven carries) and Wheatley (38 yards in 13 carries).

Williams quarterback Bob Lutz connected on three passes for 76 yards. Lutz's long completion of the afternoon was a 53-yard bomb to Hollingsworth on the Ephs' first series of the second half. Amherst fended off this Williams' threat, holding the Ephs around the Amherst 30-yard line and forcing them to punt.

The fine play of the Williams defense, which continuously thwarted its opponent's efforts to gain yardage on the ground, set up the Ephs touchdown.

Early in the fourth quarter Odell replaced Lutz with sophomore Kevin Hinchey, and the Ephs went to their running game in an attempt to grind out the yards to the end zone. Gains by Bill Novicki, Greg Collins and Wheatley, combined with a 15-yard personal foul penalty on Amherst, brought Williams to the seven-yard line before Wheatley made the most of a big hole opened by the offensive line and went in for the score with 9:30 left in the game.

The Lord Jeffs had their opportunities to tie the game following the touchdown, but they could not get their attack going, due largely to the intense play of the Williams defense. Amherst recovered a Williams fumble, but was forced to punt after five plays.

A critical break for the Lord Jeffs came when a Williams defensive back tipped the ball into an Amherst receiver's hands on a near interception of a long Teare pass. The 45-yard reception brought Amherst to the Ephs' three-yard line with 2:30 left in the game. The Lord Jeffs fumbled the ball at the goal line on the next play as Steer tried to run up the middle. Williams defenders pounded on the ball, and then the Eph offense started to run out the clock.

On a fourth down situation at the Ephs' five-yard line, punter Rick Walter ran around the end zone to use up the time remaining on the clock, then took the safety, making the score 7-2 in Williams' favor.

The B-side rounded out a fine season th a disappointing loss. The defeat s to an Amherst squad loaded with umni ringers, including a member the U.S. National Team. The play and spirit of these young ruggers assure the WRFC of a bright future.

In the previous week's Homecoming action, Williams soundly defeated a disorganized Boston College side 10-4. In a hard hitting game, the Eph line finally came into its own, as Ted Cypiot scored all the points with two trys on super runs around end and one converted kick. Ken Quinn led a fired up defense which held B.C. scoreless until the final minutes, but the outcome was never in doubt.

The B-side dropped a 15-11 game to a predominantly A-side B.C. team. Williams punished them physically but was stopped just short of the necessary points. Trys were scored by Pinto Sheridan and Jeff Samson, and a Kerwin Webb kick rounded out the scoring.

How would Shakespeare have played O'Keefe?

With gusto. And in all seasons.
It is a brew for listening to a winter's tale. It's a liberation in praise of a midsummer night's dream.
It is hearty, full-bodied. It is smooth and easy going down.
And the head of O'Keefe is like the crown of a king.
And all the players act upon the theme, "It's too good to gulp."

The Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL), in response to pressure from the Student Housing Committee and the College Council, will reconsider its proposal of last week to abolish $10 of the $15 House Maintenance Tax, according to Associate Dean Cris Roosenraad. He emphasized that the previous decision would not take effect.

"We acted in haste and didn't realize the implications," said CUL member Chris Diangelo '79, referring to the committee's decision to abolish the tax. CUL had taken this action in response to a "consensus of a great many students," according to Roosenraad, including off-campus

Amherst Presid resigns after 15

by Randy Wa

President John William Ward of Amherst College last Tuesday tendered his resignation to the Board of Trustees, to take effect June 30, 1979, according to Doug Wilson, Secretary for Public Affairs at Amherst.

In a letter to the Faculty, Administration, Staff, and Students, Ward wrote: "First, given the need for a major capital drive in the near future, I think the College will be better served by a new president who can make the minimum three year commitment this effort will entail.

"Second, at age 55, and with 15 years at Amherst, 8 of them as president, it seems the right moment for me to seek a new professional opportunity. The two reasons converge to suggest that now is the time to make the change."

The Faculty of Arts and Sciences at Dartmouth College voted on Monday, Nov. 6 in favor of a proposal to abolish all fraternities and sororities. The 67-16 vote "came as a surprise," said John Neuhaus '79, Managing Editor of the college newspaper, The Dartmouth.

Merely advisory, the faculty vote must be approved by the Board of Trustees when they meet in February. According to Neuhaus, the Board does not have a history of "rubber-stamping" faculty decisions.

The sponsor of the motion, assoc. professor of English James Epperson, admitted his surprise at the outcome. First proposed last May, the motion was "discussed mildly" through the summer, according to Neuhaus.

No single incident sparked the vote, though many perjorative remarks surfaced during the weeks prior to the vote. Among the criticisms Neuhaus cited "anti-intellectualism, rowdyism, sexism, racism, boorishness, and alcoholic overindulgence," as traits attributed to fraternities. Neuhaus described the movement as "cumulative."

"The faculty felt that, well, we're at the end of our rope," said Epperson. He said that a 50-year history of unsuccessful reform left the faculty no alternative.

Inter-Fraternity Council President Ken Beer said that he "cannot even imagine what Dartmouth would be like without fraternities." Beer said that he believes the faculty voted without complete information since the debate missed many of the positive aspects of fraternities.

Prof. Thomas B. Roos, Chairman of the Agenda Subcommittee of the Executive Committee of the Faculty, however, noted that "The students who spoke for the motion were

The tax consists of two portions—$10 and $5. The latter portion, after being pooled, is allocated equally to each house, in amounts of $450, to serve as a "damage" fund. The $10 portion is similarly pooled, but the fund is then allocated to houses on the basis of the number of beds in the house; off campus affiliates do not enter into the count.

College Council Meeting

A mandatory meeting for people interested in off-campus and cooperative living has been suggested by a subgroup of the Housing Committee, reported Rick Moog '79 at last Wednesday's College Council meeting.

He then explained the proposed selection process. As in the past, groups consisting of up to four students can apply for off-campus living. Up to three people in a group can request cooperative living, but are not allowed to specify a particular house.

Under last year's system, Lambert house was filled by one group. "This was off-campus living on campus and defeats the purpose of cooperative living," said Moog.

Each group would be given a number (two points for each Senior and one point for each Junior) and then would be randomly selected. The number of students permitted to live off campus is determined by the size of the College. The number of co-op houses will be determined later in the year, after the Committee on Undergraduate Life evaluates the first year of cooperative living.

The Council postponed a vote on these proposals until representatives have a chance to talk to students.

Rusty Case '80 reported that Dean O'Connor was pleased with the Housing Committee's proposal to have people from the community associated with the houses. The program will probably be instituted in January.

Board of Trustees, accepted the resignation with regret. He felt that Ward, as both a teacher and a president, had been "an outstanding leader" during the past 15 years.

"His excellent stewardship of Amherst College has been characterized by openness, personal integrity, and courage in speaking to and acting from high principles. He has been a fine president," said Shinn.

Ward's plans for the future appear uncertain. "He doesn't know what he will do," said Wilson.

Ward became the 14th President of the 157 year old college in 1971. Under his office, Amherst became co-ed in 1975, with an enrollment of 1500 students.

The Search Committee will give preference to an alumnus in their hiring of a new president, according to Wilson.

Computer Services gets new Univac 1100 system

by Eric Schmitt

Installation of a new $500,000 computer system begins shortly after Thanksgiving Break, Director of Computer Services Larry Wright said.

The Univac 1100 system replaces a pair of outdated units: the IBM 1130, which is 11 years old and the last of its kind in western Massachusetts, and the Xerox 530, a four year old computer.

Wright said the new system has more storage space and computes much faster than either of the two present systems, and is capable of handling simultaneous programs.

The College, according to Wright, will lease part of the Univac system for a year, before purchasing the entire unit over an extended time period. Wright estimated the college will spend around $700,000 on the system over the next five years.

One result of the new system will be greater accessibility to faculty and students. The new system's time-sharing capability allows the computer to do many jobs simultaneously. The present computers operate using the batch mode, in which punch cards are fed into the computer. With this method, the computer handles only one program at a time.

Wright said that about 325 students, primarily those in computer or upper level social science courses, and 25 faculty members presently use the computer services extensively.

"We're hoping," Wright said, "that within a year we can expand the system throughout the campus, setting up a center of four terminals in either Sawyer or Stetson."

Wright anticipated the largest usage increase will come from students and faculty; he also noted the administrative duties will remain the same but instead of the many separate administrative data banks, all information would be pooled into one central data base. This, according to Wright, will cut down on work duplication.

Computer services currently handle such administrative duties as the business account, the payroll, registration figures, admissions data, alumni information and the student loan account.

The initial system will have eight terminals for academic purposes and six terminals for administrative use. The academic terminals will be in the Bronfman computer center, while the six administrative terminals will be distributed among the admissions, alumni, and Hopkins Hall offices. Parts of the new system already are installed and temporarily are connected to the Univac Test Center in Minnesota, but Wright said the transfer of programs from the old systems to the new one will take about two weeks. It will then take six months to a year to work out any transitional problems.

The college will try to sell the two older models, but Wright said there is little market for them and that they probably will be scrapped.

excellent in all ways. I think the ones who spoke against it hurt themselves very badly. The debate itself is what swung the vote."

Prior to the vote, The Dartmouth polled the faculty on their feelings: 29 per cent opposed the motion; 10 per cent supported the motion; 49 per cent did not know; 8 per cent abstained; 4 per cent had no response.

In addition, when queried as to their attitudes towards fraternities: 5 per cent described themselves as "satisfied"; 63 per cent were not satisfied; and 29 per cent did not know.

Students before the vote also responded to the newspaper's poll: 86 per cent opposed the motion; 7.5 per cent supported the motion; and 6.5 per cent were undecided. On their attitudes towards fraternities, the campus students split; 41 per cent were satisfied; 41 per cent were not satisfied; 14 per cent did not know; and 4 per cent did not respond.

College promotes Frost, Goethals and Johnson

by Ann Morris

Williams College president John W. Chandler has announced the promotion of Peter K. Frost, associate professor of history, George R. Goethals, associate professor of psychology, and Eugene J. Johnson, associate professor of art, to the rank of full professor. The promotions will become effective July 1, 1979.

Prof. Frost joined the Williams faculty in 1964 as an instructor in history, and served as an associate dean of the College in the late 1960's. He was the first director of the Associated Gyoto Program for overseas at Doshisha University in Japan, and a co-leader of a Winter Study trip by Williams students to China in January of 1978.

He has published several articles on Japanese history; "The Bakumatsu Currency Crisis," "China and Japan in the Modern World," and "The Golden Age of Japan." A Research Fellow at Harvard University, Prof. Frost is currently working on a general history of the American occupation of Japan.

Prof. Goethals came to Williams in 1970, having graduated magna cum laude from Harvard in 1966 and received his Ph.D. in social psychology from Duke University in 1970. At Williams he served as the chairman of the student-faculty Committee on Educational Policy during the academic year 1976-1977.

Lecturing regularly on the topic of social psychology, Goethals is also an associate editor of "The Personality and Social Psychology Bulletin" and is on the editorial board of "The Journal of Experimental Social Psychology." Prof. Goethals is currently on sabbatical leave at the University of Virginia.

Joining the Faculty in 1965, Prof. Johnson specializes in the history of architecture, particularly that of the Renaissance and the 20th century. A 1959 Williams graduate, he received his M.A. in 1963 and his Ph.D. in 1970, both from New York University.

In 1963-1964 he studied in Italy under a Fulbright Grant, and returned there last year to pursue further architectural research. Johnson is the author of "Sant' Andrea in Mantua: The Building History," as well as several articles on Italian art and architecture.

Taxation and the CUL

For a few days it looked as though the Committee on Undergraduate Life (CUL) was setting out to destroy the residential house system. The committee had tentatively planned to recommend the abolition of the House Maintenance Tax which provides substantial revenue to the upperclass houses. Students from many quarters have voiced concern, forcing the committee to reevaluate its position.

Currently, the College divides the House Maintenance tax into two portions. Two-thirds of it goes directly to the Houses at the beginning of the year, in relation to the number of beds in the House. The House may use it as it sees fit, which usually means it mixes it with its social funds. The College divides the remainder, five dollars per student, into fifteen equal portions, one for each upperclass House, and, after subtracting damage charges that are unassessable to individuals, returns it to the various Houses.

The commotion arose when several off-campus students complained that they, in effect, paid fifteen dollars in social dues from which they derived no benefit. Two years ago the College Council asked the residential houses, as a matter of policy, to refund ten dollars to any off-campus affiliate who asked for it. This has worked smoothly until this year when Perry House, with an unusually large number of off-campus affiliates, refused, claiming that it could not afford to pay.

Students went to the Deans and the CUL to protest. Dean O'Connor and the CUL agreed that this was unfair, and that one possibility might be just to add the five dollar portion of the tax to the room fee, and abolish the maintenance tax altogether.

Since that recommendation, other considerations have come to light which have brought the issue back to the CUL. We feel that these are most important and justify the retention of the tax.

The CUL has expressed concern over minority interests within houses. If houses are forced to raise dues above the means of some of their members, the few who do pay will have increased influence upon house events, and therefore campus social life. The effect will be the suppression instead of the expression of alternative functions.

We sympathize with the off-campus people who have paid a tax for which they receive no benefit. We can find no legitimate reason for depriving them of a refund. At the same time we recognize the plight of the House that would have to pay out of monies that it has not received. We urge the CUL to rescind its original vote and recommend instead that the maintenance tax be allocated in relation to the number of people rather than the number of beds, as has been done in the past, so that Houses can refund the tax.

Whatever the decision, we hope that the CUL will recognize the importance of the Houses as organizers of social activity at Williams, and that it will not act to undermine their ability to fulfill that role.

Sour Pickles

by Peter Rintels

It behooves me this week (as I have not been behooved in some time, and I am beginning to miss it) to point out a little typo in this space last week in which the name Miss Anne Thorpe was printed in lieu of Miss Anne Thrope, the latter intending to be something of a joke and having a great deal to do with what followed. Whether that in fact does qualify as a joke may be a matter of some debate. On the other hand it may not. Such is life. In any case, I have Bronson Fargo's firm promise that if I can find four people who will take a stand on the question, he will sponsor a College Council forum to discuss it. Any volunteers?

As for more immediate matters, I have learned recently that tucked away on the second floor of Jesup is something called the Development Office which, if my information is correct (and I have every reason to believe that it is not) is inhabited by a band of gypsies just arrived from the Transylvanian foothills. Said gypsies, in between dreaming up new recipes for goulash and reading tea leaves (a pastime which I am told can be as interesting as reading the New York Times each morning, although the leaves have fewer letters to the editor from important people) have been known to dash off advertisements or "introductions" of the College to prospective applicants.

I have on my desk here on such production, the script for a multi-media slide presentation. The first slide is to be accompanied by the following: "The Berkshires. Ancient remains of the great mountains of the Appalachian system, these splendid highlands of northwestern Massachusetts are breathtaking in their beauty." This is no doubt true, but a bit syrupy. In fact, there is enough syrup in this document to drown a moose.

But at least things are still recognizable. By slide eighty, though, I've begun to lose my bearings. The text reads: "Williams College is not isolated. In fact it lies right in the middle of the Northeastern educational corridor." If this is referring to the same Williams College where I have spent these past four odd years (just how odd I leave to a later discussion) then it is a seventy mile stroll down this "corridor" to find another school of Williams' ilk, and a 150 mile stroll to a major city. After a similar stroll down the proverbial "musty corridors of time" and I could shake hands with Rameses II, provided no doubt that I had not picked up too much mustiness along the way.

The development folks have also gone out to find a "exemplary Williams student" as a part of this ad campaign and hit upon none other than the Record's own Keron Walker. Keron won the privilege of representing Williams to the world in Atlantic City a few weeks ago, where after scoring high marks in a hard fought swim suit competition, she went on to awe the judges in the talent competition by reading Ulysses cover to cover without missing a single obscure reference to Babylonian mythology. The final coup came when she correctly answered the question put to her by television personality Nathan Schwartz, owner of a prosperous Atlantic City TV repair shop) "What is the greatest evil in the world today, and what would you like to do about it?" The correct answer was, "The piano in Baxter on Record deadline nights. I would like to nuke it." Chip Buckner finished a close second in this competition for proposing merely to take an axe to it.

Beneath their Peaceful Shadows

First, an explanation. It has been pointed out to me that most people don't know where the title of this column is from. It is hardly my own invention: it is from the first line of the final stanza of the Williams song "The Mountains."

That aside, I can pick up where I left off last week: how successful has the College Council been in "finding its own identity?" I will try to keep my remarks within the framework of issues presented in last week's "Outlook" by Julie McNamee and Steve Magee.

Earlier this semester, when the impeachment amendment was proposed to the C.C., a committee of Council members was set up to work it out. Their initial report, supported by Julie, was to allow the Council only to impeach its own members. This seemed clearly out of touch with the sentiments of the 200-plus students who signed the petitions favoring an impeachment clause. I remember thinking that Julie's stand to limit the power of impeachment to such a "select" group was both an act of hubris on her part, and grounds for a low A.D.A. rating.

Since reading her article, and seeing her in action at last week's meeting, I changed my mind. Julie McNamee is one of the most sincere, and ablest members of the Council, a position she shares with Steve Magee himself. Far from defending her stance of "let's keep all decision-making within the Council" with arrogance, she does so out of an honest faith that the C.C. can keep its own house in order, and that the Council "can only be as good as the people it represents."

A question: that there is a lack of student sentiment in favor of the Council is pretty obvious, but is this sentiment directed against the structure of the Council (the Constitution) or the make-up of the present Council? The answer to this question decides who is correct: Steve's "dissolution" or Julie's "using the full potential."

This is a difficult question, and it's the same question lurking behind the recently-passed impeachment amendment. It is also the same issue that came up in the "Mr. Z" WCFM scandal: the college community's horror of discussing personalities.

Steve's argument for dissolution deal mainly with the structure argument. The Constitution gets a thorough drubbing at his hands. But one of the examples he cites of the recent problems deserves closer examination: last Spring's South Africa meeting. Steve points out that at that meeting, "instead of attempting to protect this new flame of student activism, the leadership of the Council used Robert's Rules to stifle debate . . ." Anyone who was at that meeting knows that Steve is quite right. I myself was an eye—and ear—witness to some of the plotting that went on among certain C.C. members for the purpose of deliberately suppressing discussion which was unfavorable to the leadership's position.

But the point shouldn't be lost: as Steve points out, Robert's Rules were used to stifle debate. Everyone knows that Robert's is designed primarily to do the opposite and promote orderly debate. But depending on who is using it, it can either stifle or promote; it can be used, or misused.

The same is true of the C.C. offices, for both the members and the officers, and for the Council and its Constitution as a whole. But any office can be misused, any Constitution can be put to better—or worse—use. The problem wasn't with the Presidency, it was with Nixon. The man determines the job to a great extent. This is not to say that the structure has no effect on those who are in it (see my "Outlook" article on the next page). It is saying that the structural change argument ignores this side of the dialectical relationship of the institution and the people participating in it. No constitution, no matter how good it looks on paper, means anything if it is not put to good use.

This is the point: I don't think a change in the structure—as Steve suggests—would work without including the type of thing Julie is suggesting: using the C.C. to its fullest potential. As it is now structured, I for one see the Council as having the potential to do almost anything we might want it to do. And it seems the only conceivable role the C.C. could have (in light of Dean Steven's insights I quoted last week) is that of a spokesman for the student body. The issue that really concerns Steve is the one that is summed up in the title of his article: making the College Council responsive.

"Making" is the key word. Here's where Julie's suggestions are helpful. She wants 1) more attention to elections (remember last Spring's?); 2) more people at C.C. meetings—meaning more concerned students showing up. These are good suggestions, and even though they sound naive, think how different things would be if they were taken seriously! We also shouldn't forget about the new impeachment amendment.

Two more suggestions. First: the idea of time in regard to the people we elect. Probably nothing determines the quality of a job done than the amount of time out into it. We should only elect people whom we feel can put enough time into the job.

Second: I think the kind of responsiveness Steve wants might be achieved by the Notice

"On November 1, 1978, President Carter signed into law the Middle-Income Student Assistance Act (P.L. 95-566), which was designed not only to increase student assistance to middle-income families, but also to simplify the administration of the student loan program for both lenders and colleges.

The new law eliminates the $25,000 income ceiling for determining federal interest subsidy eligibility. Therefore, any loan disbursements made on or after November 1 will be considered eligible for federal interest subsidy regardless of the family income. In other words, interest is no longer charged while a person is at least a half-time student. If a student received the disbursement of a nonsubsidized loan prior to November 1, the student may repay that loan and apply for a subsidized loan under these new rules.

All students who have state loans currently charging interest for this college year would be advised to rewrite these loans through their local bank. An approach could be made either during Thanksgiving or Christmas vacations."

Williams Reports

Class of '82 profiled

Last year nearly 4,500 applications, averaging 12 pages each, passed through the hands of Williams admissions office personnel. Behind that tide of paperwork lay thousands of miles of travel by the six admissions officers as they visited 300 schools, talking with guidance counselors, anxious seniors and worried parents. Alumni and student volunteers put in countless hours working with prospective students. Then, last August, the admissions staff turned over to the Dean's office 500 file folders—the Class of 1982.

The large numbers illustrate the importance of one of the basic goals of the Admissions Office: the attempt to bring to the admissions procedure the same personalization that characterizes the Williams experience. The high school visits, on-campus interviews and tours, overnight visits, student and alumni involvement—all are designed to make the admissions process as personal as possible.

Similarities now

In reporting on the Class of 1982, Philip F. Smith, director of admissions at Williams, notes the consistency of some admissions statistics. Applications from women hovered around the1,900 mark for the third year in a row. Combined applications from both men and women over the past five years have averaged around 4,500. Exactly the same number of secondary schools has been represented for the past two years. For three of the past five years, SAT averages have been virtually identical (Math 647, Verbal 622) while national averages have continued to decline. As in the past, most students accepted by Williams but choosing not to come here ended up at an Ivy League-type school. For the Class of 1982, 1,021 students were accepted, 500 registered.

Differences in Class of 1982

While admission statistics over the past couple of years look remarkably similar, there are several areas in which the Class of 1982 is statistically different from its predecessors:

- The geographical distribution of the class shows a greatly increased number of New England students, plus a larger group from the midwest. This is a reflection, in part, of increased alumni activity in those areas.

- The Registrar's Office reports that 52 per cent of the class has Advanced Placement status, compared with 46 per cent of the Class of 1981. This would seem to indicate that Williams students are increasingly serious about their studies even before they reach college.

- A major concern in admissions is that the number of applications from Black students fell from 151 last year to 123. Of the 75 accepted, only 24 enrolled. This continues a two-year decline (42 enrolled in the class of 1980; 33 in the class of 1981).

- The number of marginal applications has declined considerably, indicating that students themselves may be more self-selective.

- Male applicants to the Class of 1982 declined 9 per cent from last year, a trend noted in a number of other selective institutions.

- Twenty-three members (5 per cent) of the Class of 1982 are from foreign countries, a substantial increase over the average of 7 for the three previous years.

In concluding his report on the Class of 1982, Smith observed that "the applicant pool remained strong, with the exception of the Black applicant group; targeted projections had worked out well; progress had been made in broadening the alumni network; and the Class (is) a strong one."

Without taking time to catch its breath, the admissions staff plunged into the task of selecting the Class of 1983, and Smith says "all signs point to another lively and strong year . . . and another excellent class."

Football manager Debbie Sacken '81 can look back on a fall sports season that saw her team force a three-way tie in the Little Three while both the men's and women's soccer teams, as well as the men's cross country and women's tennis teams, all won the Little Three outright . . . and the golf team had an undefeated 7-0 season. 'Woman question' first considered in 1871

by Martha Riley Johnson

Library Assistant, Williamsiana

It is probably not widely known that the first movement to admit women to Williams College occurred not in 1969, but in 1871. At that year's annual meeting of the Society of Alumni, the highly respected Prof. John Bascom, a known advocate of women's rights, surprised the gathering with a motion to appoint a committee to confer with the Trustees on the expediency of admitting women to Williams College on equal terms with men. He "made no claim on the ground of abstract right but argued that such a course, if adopted, would improve the opportunities of the college for pecuniary assistance."

Though conservatives made wry faces, Prof. Bascom's proposal was made in such a form that it was hard to resist. It followed a discussion of the lamentable financial situation of the college and loss of students. The 1870's were a time of economic panic and depression. The freshman class had dropped from 45 in 1868 to 23 in 1871. The College, which could easily accommodate 200 students, was reduced to 119. Thus a committee of five was appointed to report on the expediency of admitting women.

Coeducation was only one of many proposals offered to check the decline of that vanishing breed, the Williams College student. Because lack of scholarship funds placed Williams at a competitive disadvantage with other schools, one alumni group set about raising $2,500 from each class for scholarships. Another alumni group resolved to reduce board costs to a new low by raising money for a college boarding house. Students made their periodicals open forums for ideas to save the College from extinction. Editorials urged the College to advertise and the alumni to organize regionally to disseminate information on Williams College to area preparatory schools. They threw down a challenge to alumni to raise the number of students in the next class to fifty.

The woman question, as it was called, was a constant subject of articles and news items. An example is this unsigned comment in an 1872 issue of the Williams Review, a journal about college matters:

> "... She was not made to dabble in politics and maugre her proverbial volubility, she was not designed to shine in the pulpit, at the bar or in the forum; but to create and transfigure the home, to manage the kitchen, to instruct and tranquilize the nursery ... The theory that women should be educated in the same manner as the other sex ... would ... exert a most disastrous influence upon the homes of our country."

Many writers advocated equal but separate facilities for women, saying, in effect, no women at Williams. But student opinion was not unanimous. In a debate on the subject, the philotechnian society voted in the affirmative. When the senior class voted to bar town women from their Saturday catechism class, the more progressive junior class opened their lectures to women.

By the alumni meeting in July 1872, the College's financial picture had brightened. It had money for a boarding house, a number of new scholarships and 45 students in the entering freshman class. The alumni committee on the admission of women was split in its opinion, two for and three against. Majority and minority reports were presented, and the matter was tabled. Prof. Bascom's able presentation of the argument for admitting women at the next meeting in 1873 was to no avail; after much discussion it was voted down. The idea lost its chief proponent when Bascom was called to become President at coeducational University of Wisconsin in 1874.

Students getting $2.4 million in aid

While the cost of a year at Williams College, about $7,200, places it among the most expensive in the nation, the burden is offset, for many students, by a substantial financial aid program.

This year 30 per cent of the student body shares more than $2.4 million in aid. For the freshman class, the average financial aid offer was $4,200 ... well over half the year's bill!

According to a pamphlet just published at Williams, "Financial Aid and Planning for Expenses at Williams College," concern about footing the bill should not "discourage any qualified student from applying. All admission decisions are made apart from, and are in no way influenced by, financial aid considerations."

In recent years at Williams, every student with demonstrated financial need was offered financial aid ranging from $500 to $7,000.

Students applying for financial aid from Williams, as at most colleges and universities across the country, submit a Financial Aid Form to the College Scholarship Service. The Financial Aid Form and the College's own financial aid questionnaire form the basis for aid decisions.

The aid package at Williams is generally a combination of a loan, a campus job and a scholarship. The loan and job make up the first $1,500 to $1,700 in aid with a scholarship offered for the balance of the student's need.

The basic message of the pamphlet, that the $7,200 cost of a year at Williams should not discourage a qualified student from applying, extends to middle-income as well as low-income families. In the freshman class, 44 per cent of the families granted aid have incomes over $24,000. The reason, according to the pamphlet, is that consideration is given not only to income and assets, but also to family size, number of other children in college, and extraordinary expenses.

The financial aid brochure was prepared by Philip G. Wick, director of freshman financial aid at Williams, and copies are available through him at the College Admissions Office.

Interview record set

One of the first indications of the number of applicants for the freshman class each year is the number of personal interviews conducted with prospective students.

A personal interview isn't a necessity, but the College strongly recommends one. It's a way for a prospective student to get a first-hand feel for the personality of Williams, to see the ways the College is different from other schools. The turnout for interviews can also be an indicator to the admissions office staff of how interest in Williams compares with previous years.

Interest has been consistently high. In 1975-76, 3901 interviews were conducted. In 1976-77 the figure was 3,878 while last year the figure was 3,773.

Last month there were 767 prospective students on campus for interviews ... the most ever in a single month. So it appears there will be as much or even more competition for slots in the Class of 1984.

Student volunteers to promote Williams

Fifty students, many of them freshmen, are giving up part of their vacation time during Thanksgiving to work as volunteer recruiters for the Admissions Office.

"Williams students are one of the best admissions resources," says Dan Powell '79 originator of the program. "They're like a magnet in attracting other students to the campus."

The program, authorized by the Faculty-Student Admissions Committee, began last year with a visitation program to high schools. During Christmas vacation volunteers from Williams talked with prospective students, answering questions about social concerns and living conditions.

Christmas vacation turned out to be late for such recruiting. Many of the best students are already committed by that time. So this year Williams students paid visits to the high schools during fall break. Many more visits will be made over Thanksgiving.

To prepare the students for their work as volunteer recruiters, the Admissions Office holds an orientation session on campus. From that point on, though, it's up to the students to make arrangements with the high school staff and follow through with the visits.

"Students don't seem as evaluative as admissions personnel," says Powell. "Prospective students can get most of the facts and figures from the printed material. But some of their more immediate concerns revolve around what life is really like on campus, and students are better able to answer those questions."

Ephs tops at Oxford

Other colleges and universities may have more alumni than Williams, but our 14,000-plus graduates have a way of making their presence felt. Bayard Stocking '51 sent us this clipping from the London Daily Telegraph:

"A surely remarkable Oxford achievement has been marked up by Williams College, a small, 1,200-student (sic) foundation in Massachusetts. Of six of its alumni taking finals at Oxford, four got firsts and two seconds.

"The firsts were two in English, one law and one PPE (politics, philosophy and economics) and the seconds both took PPE."

Charles Karelis, assistant professor of philosophy at Williams and the adviser for Williams students interested in graduate study in England, says it may be even more interesting to compare the performance of the Williams graduates at Oxford with that of Rhodes scholars. An average of only one out of six Rhodes scholars, says Karelis, receives firsts at Oxford. So four firsts and two seconds by Williams alumni is an incredible showing not only among Oxford students in general, but also among U.S. students at Oxford.

Farewell party

Goodbye to Mount Hope was the theme of two receptions earlier this month at the 850-acre estate. The 72-room Elm Tree House, completed in 1928, has been a popular place for conferences and College gatherings since it was purchased by Williams in 1963. Mount Hope is being sold to Mr. and Mrs. August E. Mansker of Macon, Mo. The couple will use the property primarily as a private residence.

Energy use: button up, batten down

It has been a benign autumn ... so far. But talk to the people in the Rocky Mountain states and they'll tell you that the warm weather can turn to cold and snow overnight.

The Energy Conservation Committee has issued updated conservation guidelines. To a great extent, making them work will take individual commitment, the feeling that small things will add up to major energy savings.

Personal involvement initiatives

1. All shades and/or blinds in classroom spaces should be closed each day and particularly on Friday nights and before holidays. Both faculty and students should be mindful of this and should remind one another if they are part of the last class or activity to use a room.
2. The last person leaving a classroom or lavatory should turn off all the lights. All should make sure all night lighting is turned off during the day.
3. Consistent overheating which requires adjustment should be brought to the attention of Buildings and Grounds rather than using the window as a means of temperature control. Storm windows should be in the winter position during the heating season. All windows should be closed during the heating season.

Personal reminders

1. Report all leaky faucets and overheating of buildings or areas within buildings to Buildings and Grounds at once (2301).
2. Ventilation has been reduced to minimum acceptable levels. Smoking should be avoided in classroom and auditorium spaces in order to lower ventilation requirements.
3. Electric heaters are not permitted except by specific authorization from Buildings and Grounds.
4. All persons should use lights only in the areas in which they are immediately working.
5. Making hot water is very expensive; showers should be brief and to the point.

Saving electricity

1. Hallway lights have been reduced by removal of tubes or bulbs in alternate fixtures.
2. Interior lighting has been or is being reduced to conform to the new Massachusetts Code.
3. Ornamental lighting, both indoor and outdoor, such as "wall wash" lights, will be turned off or removed unless they contribute to safe lighting levels for pedestrians.

Williams Reports, published by the Williams College News Office and distributed through the Williams Record, deals with the information which goes into the decision-making process at Williams. The basic material carried in Williams Reports concerns the deliberations of the College departments, committees, study groups and others involved in gathering and evaluating the information leading to decisions which affect life in the College community.

Revitalizing the residential house system

by Dean Daniel O'Connor

I am glad to respond to your invitation to write about the goals the College has in mind for the residential house system. In my remarks to the Housing Committee and the College Council recently, I shared a few worries about the "quality of life" on campus. I'm not talking about an emergency or a crisis—but rather, a sense of missed opportunities and small erosions of previous customs and courtesies. Perhaps it would be worthwhile to attempt here a fresh articulation of the ideal envisioned by those who set up the system in 1963.

As a replacement for fraternities, the residential house system was intended to bridge the gap between academic work and social life. The decision was taken to keep the housing units small enough that each could have its own dining facilities. This was certainly less efficient than moving to one or two large dining halls, but the planners believed that, by keeping the units small and varied, the College would be showing its commitment to an integrated campus life. The very architecture of the buildings and common rooms would encourage students to continue, informally, the learning pursued in classrooms. The living rooms of the houses would be spaces for parties, of course, but they would also serve for occasional panel discussions, slide shows, art displays, musical events and the like. Faculty members would feel welcome in these rooms. They might expect to be invited once in a while to a guest meal or asked to give an informal talk. The houses would not be separate "turf"—cut off from the intellectual and cultural life of the campus.

Affiliation with one of the houses would be by a process that involved both student choice and random selection. The founders evidently hoped to avoid two extremes: the anonymity of impersonal dormitories and the inward-looking exclusiveness of social cliques. Affinity groups of friends entering the room draw would give individuals a base within the houses, the start of larger unities. House spirit might develop out of the interactions of these smaller groups. A balance could be pursued between house unity and the plurality of members' diverse needs and interests. Cooperation or friendly competition between houses or parts of houses might, in turn, give a sense of community—unity in diversity—to the whole student body. Moreover, by interacting with other people of different backgrounds, ethnic traditions, values, beliefs—individual students might find themselves undergoing change a necessary ingredient in any process of education. This was the vision—which, I suppose, will always elude our perfect realization. Still, we can make some improvements by considering the ways in which we fall short.

My perception is that there is not enough interaction between groups. Most individuals find their way into congenial groups, although some report a considerable sense of loneliness on our campus. But not enough people, it seems to me, feel free to move in and out of groups, and the groups themselves show too little interaction. This structural defect is manifest in an increased number of complaints about callous and inconsiderate behavior, and an increased number of requests for housing changes. To the extent that a house lacks unity, its members will find it difficult to offer hospitality to outsiders. As a result, faculty members sometimes feel awkward or embarrassed at house social functions—and even some house affiliates feel alienated.

What's the remedy? The first step is to raise consciousness and give people a sense of possibilities. Perhaps we need a few issues to stir up house discussions. In this sense the current flap about the house maintenance cuts might be turned to advantage. The need to spell out guidelines for residential self-government is a more important and continuing opportunity. Last year, the issues of sexism, investment policies and gay rights provided themes for discussion and interaction. This year we can add to these some possible changes in curriculum and grading policies. The various counseling offices on campus hope to use the increased leisure of WSP to promote a campus-wide discussion of male-female issues: identities, roles, relationships.

I'd like to see more variety in the social and cultural activities going on in the houses. There must be —out there somewhere—new ideas on house parties. If the recent suggestion of adding town affiliates to the houses is carried out, perhaps this will provide the opportunity for re-thinking the institution of guest meal. How about moving it to Wednesday night and playing down the alcohol consumption? A mid-week break as a time for mingling with faculty and townspeople, rather than a boozy, premature start to the week-end? I have the feeling that there is a great wealth of experience and talent in the student membership of the houses which does not get tapped for social events. I'm thinking of things like slide shows of foreign travel, talks about unusual hobbies or interests, displays of art work, musical performances, poetry readings. I remember back in the mid-sixties a dramatic reading of Peer Gynt in the living room of Brooks House, with lights, costumes, make-up.

House meetings are the place to discuss pending actions of student-faculty committees. Student members of these committees should keep the College Council informed of the committees' deliberations. Council members in turn can relay these matters to the houses and bring back reactions. This process happens by itself when students perceive their interests to be involved, as in the house tax dispute or on the question of post-season competition. Why not make this a regular procedure? Perhaps the health of the house system and the College Council are interrelated.

"The issue is not diversity, but barriers"

by Chris DiAngelo

Almost seven months ago I wrote a lengthy piece for the Record entitled "The Freshman Experience . . . Sexism and Separatism." The article caused an immediate outrage, and still makes some people's passions flare. I hope to use this opportunity to take up that argument in a more general fashion, and in so doing, clear up the misunderstandings that came out of "The Freshman Experience."

First, an explanation followed by an apology. My opening paragraph to that article explained why I became a J.A., and included the line "I figured that if I weren't a J.A., an even bigger asshole would take my place." Those remarks were meant as a joke, a joke on myself in the tradition of Woody Allen, and were not meant to rag on any J.A.'s or those who didn't make J.A. Anyone who knows me realizes that a bigger asshole probably couldn't be found anyway. To all those whose feelings this hurt, I really apologize. I hope this clears up one of the many misunderstandings that article caused.

Next: my purpose in writing that piece, which pointed out what I saw to be subtle "evils" fostered by the institution of the freshman year was not to suggest that the system be destroyed. For those who remember the article, you might recall that I made no recommendations one way or the other. I wasn't prepared to do so then, nor am I prepared now.

My only purpose was a far less radical one than is generally assumed. I was trying to point out, using the separate freshman year merely as an example, of the way social institutions, such as the freshman entry system, influence the behavior and the attitudes of those who participate in that institution. Apparently, I failed miserably. Let me try again.

[Chris DiAngelo is a former J.A., and the at-large student member of the Committee on Undergraduate Life.]

Earlier this semester, the College Council decided to hold a forum on "Diversity at Williams." Shortly before that forum was held I was asked to address the Trustees on the same issues I am discussing here.

One of the things I told the Trustees was the continued failure of individuals and groups like the C.C. to recognize that diversity is not the issue we should be discussing. "Diversity" to me refers to the type of people who come here and has little to do with what happens once they are here. Diversity is in the hands of the Admissions Committee and the President, not the Deans, the C.C., or the C.U.L. This is not to say it is not an important issue, for it certainly is—I have long argued that Phil Smith (the Director of Admissions) has more control over what type of place Williams is than anyone else. What concerns us, however, is the question of what to do with what Phil Smith gives us. The issue is not one of diversity, but of barriers to diverse elements on campus.

Anyone who eats in the north dining room at Baxter notices one thing right off in regard to how the races divide: many of the blacks sit mostly at the long table on the right; the whites sit everywhere else. Here you see an example of diversity (both black and white) but also of a barrier—and a rather tangible one at that—to that diversity. This is another example of the type of matter which was at the heart of "The Freshman Experience."

In a very broad sense, here is what I was trying to point out to the college community last May: certain social institutions here at Williams, which are the result of, more than anything else, the whims of history, have been forgotten to be purely arbitrary devices which were either the remnants of something here before, or were institutionalized for a specific purpose while at the same time having ramifications beyond that specific purpose. The freshman entry system is an institution of the former type (a product of the shaky hand of history); the black-white dining arrangement in Baxter is an example of the second type (a specific institution created by design).

The problem with these social institutions is that they (even if they are the result of policy) are arbitrary, not necessary, yet they are all too often perceived as being necessary by the people in them. To the freshman of either race who for the first time enters Baxter north for lunch, the social institution of dining according to skin color does not appear to be based on the arbitrary criterion of color, but upon the necessity of "the way things are." The race division is "really real," or so it appears.

The same is true of the freshman, only their age, not skin color, is the basis for the artibrary distinction which is perceived as necessary. The same is true of homosexuality: the arbitrary criterion of sexual preference is assumed to be a necessary reason for separatism. The same is true of single-sex living arrangements: there, the human race is divided up, arbitrarily, by anatomy. The list goes on and on.

One of the prime arguments used against me in regard to the freshman year was popularity. I was told to stop and think how popular the system was, and that I was seeing (or perhaps causing) a problem that didn't exist. I hope that now it becomes apparent that popularity is not an issue here. Whether the system enjoys support or not interest me or change my arguments. It's not a question of whether we like the distinctions (by age, sex, color, etc.); it's a question of how we see them.

Although I made no recommendations in regard to changing the freshman year, the article admittedly had a certain rhetorical edge. This was mainly because the positive aspects of the freshman year are pretty well known and documented. What I was attempting to point out were the more subtle negative aspects. I had hoped that my arguments would permit a more sophisticated analysis of the costs versus the benefits of the separate freshman year by pointing out costs that were not obvious. I had also hoped that more attention might be given to the dialectical relationship between the social institutions and the participants in these institutions. Apparently, I missed on both of these counts. My intention was not to change the system, but to point out the full effect of the system.

I hope that my remarks here have settled some old misunderstandings regarding my purpose last May. Please tell me about any questions you may still have about my position. I also have copies of "The Freshman Experience" for anyone who might want one.

One final point: National Security Advisor Brezinski has a theory about the future of the world. He believes that, as we approach the twenty-first century, the current East-West balance of power will shift to a North-South focus. This means that for the first time in centuries, American and European leaders will be forced to deal with new civilizations and their leaders as equals. Certainly, one of the most valuable assets Williams graduates can possess will be the talent for breaking down or overcoming the social barriers between those new civilizations and our own.

Williams is, in my mind, the perfect place to begin to cultivate that talent of overcoming barriers, and the best way it can be that is by demonstrating to its students that all barriers between members of the human species, be they the Berlin Wall, fraternity pledge pins or the structure of one's genitalia, are arbitrary distinctions—they are barriers which exist not necessarily, but as products of the mind. Differences are not barriers, but they can be, and often are, mistaken for barriers. There's the problem: these barriers become real.

The College, in its continuing attempt to provide the highest quality education available, should evaluate how well it is performing this task of producing in its students a proclivity not to erect, or even be duped by, these artificial barriers.

Editor's note: For this article, Chris DiAngelo has been declared winner of the H. Ganse Little award for applied sociology. Our sincere congratulations.

Outlook On Student Life

Correction

Steven Magee was inadvertently misidentified last week as the College Council representative from Gladden. Magee represents Hopkins on the Council.

College Council: How Successful?

Record's doing more, or rather, doing something, in regard to "votes of confidence" in the Council as a whole, its specific actions, and its leadership. As everyone knows, public opinion polls are critical in "real" politics out in the "real" world. The Record has, in the past, missed an important opportunity to use its resources to get student sentiment across to the Council. This should be corrected immediately.

My answer to both Steve and Julie is that Julie's optimism should be blended with Steve's cynicism. Furthermore, they both deserve praise for their own hard work and commitment.

Nine actors follow their fearless leader, Jon Von Stolzberg, '79, into the studio theatre. They and the other members of the student production team hurl themselves into the task of preparing Oh Dad, Poor Dad, Momma's Hung You In the Closet and I'm Feeling So Sad for a December 1st opening. A typical Sunday.

Oh Dad, Poor Dad, by Arthur L. Kopit, is the first Cap and Bells production since the Freshman Revue. Directed by VonStolzberg, it will be performed Friday and Saturday, Dec. 1 and 2 at 8:30 in the Studio Theatre in the basement of the AMT. Tickets will be free, and will be available one hour before each performance at the Greylock entrance of the AMT.

Oh Dad, Poor Dad is, VonStolzberg says, a "memory play" showing the relationship between a boy and his mother. It presents a slice of life as seen by the man who was the boy 16 years ago. Because the characters are seen through Jonathan's eyes, they are not realistic, but blown out of proportion, distorted by his perceptions.

Jonathan's relationship with his mother is, to say the least, a bit odd. Madame Rosepetal is slightly eccentric—she has her dead husband stuffed and displayed in the closet—and is so commanding that she becomes a take-off on the classic domineering mother.

Madame Rosepetal affects her son's personality so strongly that it colors his views of all women, including the "hooker-next-door." Julie Nessen, '82, says, "The play deals with people right out of a psychology textbook. They wouldn't be funny if they weren't blown so far out of proportion." The author referred to the play as a "tragicomic-pseudofarce."

VonStolzberg, who directed a segment of last year's Freshman Revue, says the play is "farcical, but grounded in reality." He says it's also fun because it demands interesting stage effects. "The stage directions say things like, 'Plants grow,' 'Fish growls,' and we have to make it work," he explains.

Hudson Plumb, '81, says he enjoys the role of Jonathan. "I'm an exaggeration," he says. He adds, "I have to come up with a lot of energy. I also run the danger of becoming campy."

VonStolzberg says members of the cast have a strong ensemble feeling. It seems clear that as a unit they share with Pinmo the risks that come with non-realistic theatre, and also the energy that is needed to make the exaggeration ring true.

Early American chair is among the furniture on exhibit at the WCMA.

Keno rescues early American furniture

by Jean Nathan

When Leslie Keno '78 transferred to Williams in 1977, he was shocked to see early American tables in everyday use in the Art Department office, bearing typewriters, papers, and other office paraphenalia.

Keno had long been interested in American furniture and stoneware, and saw the use of these pieces as sacriligious. He felt that the American furniture given by Davenport should be treated with the respect shown to works of art. Further, he wanted them "to be recognized by the outside art world."

Keno began research on the pieces, finding dates and origins, and taking pictures of the furniture for the museum files. He began digging out the pieces from storage in the Fayerweather basement and Mather House. Franklin Robinson, director of Lawrence Hall, gave him the go-ahead on making his collection into an exhibition. Patrick Stewart, Assistant Professor of Art History sponsored the project.

Keno chose his pieces from the photographs he had taken. His aim was to make the exhibition representative of the 130 available pieces in the Davenport Collection. Because one-third of the collection were Windsor chairs, Keno decided to include 11 Windsor chairs among the 30 in his exhibit. He chose a knuckle-arm Windsor settee, a high chair, blanket chests, chests of drawers, and tables for come out the exhibit.

Davenport had stripped the once painted furniture down to the original wood, a practice no longer acceptable. However, this facilitated identification of the woods used. Keno called in Bill Fuhrman, a Williamstown carpenter and wood expert who "knows his wood." The results revealed a plethora of woods out of which the furniture was constructed, among them ash, maple, pine and cherry.

Keno's catalogue includes objective descriptions of the pieces. He finished it by October 15 and hand-sewed it shortly before the opening of the exhibit.

The site for the exhibition was designated as the Rotunda and two adjoining rooms. Large "Greek" columns posed a placement problem, as did pieces of the museum's permanent collection which would remain. Keno solved the problem of distracting and conflicting "fixture" by placing the furniture on white boards. He believes that these force the viewer to think of the furniture as objects of art. He has also hung eight pieces around the rotunda to encourage the viewer to look thoroughly at bottoms, textures, and the subtleties in the fabrication.

ARTS BRIEFS

Archer tribute

A musical tribute to the late H. Richard Archer, long-time librarian of the Chapin Rare Book collection, will be presented on WCFM (FM 91.9) at 7 p.m. on Wednesday, November 29.

During the 20 years that Dr. Archer was on the Williams campus, he not only administered the Chapin Library in a manner that earned world-wide attention, but also conducted courses in the Graphic Arts. His special interests included the letter press print shop that he maintained in the basement of his home and an extensive collection of historic recordings broadly representative of the best in traditional jazz and the musical theatre.

The Archer tribute will be presented by Carl Johnson, producer for Williams College Radio of "From Ragtime to Swing". Prof. Irwin Shainman will contribute some personal reminiscences.

Folk music

"An Evening of Folk Music" with Gordon Bok, Ed Trickett, and Ann Mayo Muir will be presented Saturday evening, December 2, at 8:30 at the Clark Art Institute. While not a conventional trio in any sense, the three musicians will perform both solos and ensemble pieces flavored with the texture of their varied repertoire. Sea songs, mountain songs, songs from foreign countries, dances, classical pieces, stories, and instrumental numbers are all part of their offerings.

The concert is being assisted by funds from the New England Touring Program, the Massachusetts Council on the Arts and Humanities, and the National Endowment for the Arts. Admission to the December 2 concert will be $2.50 (students $2) and tickets are now available either at Harts' Pharmacy or by mail through the Institute.

Freshmen scavenge for fun

by John Libertine

What would you do if you had to bring Lasell Gymnasium over to the Rathskeller or arrange an interview with Phil Smith on the subject of economics in ancient Mesopotamia? These and other commonplace activities were given to the freshman class this weekend during the first ever Freshman Scavenger Hunt.

The scavenger hunt was the brainchild of the dynamism committee of the freshman council headed by Marc de La Bruyere. This committee is set up for the express purpose of organizing all non-party activities for the freshman class. The idea behind the hunt was to get freshman involved to do something unusual and enjoyable as a group. The committee wanted to get away from the idea of the typical beer party and concentrate on having a good time.

Aside from the two items mentioned above, the scavenge list included such esoterica as President Chandler in the shower, a chain saw, and an acceptance letter from Harvard. In addition to the hunt itself, each team was required to do some activities at the Rathskeller in front of a panel of judges. Such activities included an eight man (and-or woman) pyramid; streaking; and everybody's favorite, a strip tease.

The freshman council set up a panel of seven judges and seven referees. The referees' duties were to insure that all entries brought in exactly what they were supposed to bring in—after all, would you believe someone who just walks in with a building and claims it is Lasell without checking it out first?

Each freshman entry constituted a team. According to the council, nearly all twenty-six entries took part in the contest, all with varying degrees of zeal and enthusiasm. The winning entry was Fayerweather, second floor. Mention must be made of Morgan Middle East which placed fourth, due mainly, according to one of the JA's, to a coed team of four streakers which made a big hit with the judges. The freshman council hosted a party for the seven top teams.

The council is reportedly very pleased with the contest. Jeff Lissack '82, one of the council members, feels the contest is "one of the best things we've done so far this year." He feels that the contest helped bring the entire class together and hopes that the council can sponsor more such activities.

Napolitano's pizza is Italian, not Greecey

by Susan Hobbs

Looks are often deceiving. Such is the case with the unobtrusive-looking establishment of Napolitano's pizzeria in North Adams. Its facade may be rather ordinary, but inside can be found some of the best pizza, grinders, and Italian food in the Berkshires.

The owner, Carmen Napolitano, stresses that the keys to first class Italian food are quality products and taking time. "Selection of ingredients is very important," he noted. "Inferior products make a pizza greasy." The pepperoni is wine cured to enhance the flavor, and unlike most pepperoni (e.g., Constantine's) it is not at all greasy.

Pizza, made from old family recipes, is Napolitano's specialty. His parents first made it at home, and later established a 10-year pizza business in Bennington. Everything was then passed down to Carmen. He has since expanded the menu to include hot and cold grinders and various types of pasta.

Almost everything is home made, including bread, sauces, sausage, meatballs, lasagna, manicotti, and stuffed shells. What isn't made there is imported from Italy, such as special herbs and certain pasta ingredients. For instance, in his pasta he uses pure semalina, which has practically no starch. Carmen asserts that this "makes all the difference in the world".

Unlike most pizza places, Carmen does not start with the usual cheese and tomato sauce base to which extras are then added, when preparing the pizzas. Instead, according to Napolitano, the cheese must go on the inside "so that the inside won't dry out, and the pepperoni and mushrooms won't shrivel up". Because he starts from scratch, there is necessarily a 20-25 minute wait, but the result is well worth it. After sampling Napolitano's pizza, a UCLA professor who had recently been in Rome declared his pizza to be the best in the world. His customers seem to agree.

Napolitano's, located on 70 Union St. (that's Route 2) in North Adams, is a welcome and superior alternative to the so-called pizza of Constantine. Except Mondays, Napolitano's is open 4 p.m. to midnight daily, and until 1:30 a.m. on Friday and Saturday. The telephone number is 662-2425. It's well worth the trip to North Adams.

Letters to the Editor

No culture

To the editor:

I've been told that this letter is not necessary—that something as obviously wrong as the review of Dresses in the last issue of the Record does not require formal comment. But I think it's important to acknowledge the problem publicly.

As someone who has participated in, and written about, academic theatre, I have always maintained that student-written reviews have no place in the college press. Others may disagree, but I believe that, in general, students do not have the knowledge of theatre or the skill in expressing their opinions that is necessary in order to critique one's peers. Meile Rockefeller's article exemplified remarkably well the level of ignorance prevalent among amateurs.

In the future, if the Record chooses to have student writers judge student performances, I think it should try to avoid hatchet-jobs such as the one in the last issue. I'm not criticizing poor Ms. Rockefeller—she is not expected to know better. The editors, however, must be held responsible for what goes into their paper, and shouldn't expect to get off so easily.

Any review that mingles criticism of the director and cast with criticism of Euripides; that flings about words such as "disastrously," and "superfluous;" that includes personal attacks; any review like that is unjustifiable. The fact that one was printed last week stands out as proof that Williams, in spite of its academic niceties, lacks at least one necessity of civilization—a culturally responsive and responsible newspaper.

Sincerely,
Stephanie Voss '82

Anti-nuke group

To the editor:

I'm writing to make a correction concerning the anti-nuke article that appeared in the last issue of the Record.

To many of you, the mistake may seem like a small one, but for those of us active in the anti-nuke movement, it is not. Lorraine wrote that I was the head of the group, this I certainly am not. We have no 'head', although we have many leaders. After all, a comment at a meeting, the making of a poster, a hand layed on a shoulder, all these things can give those of us in the group the support and direction that enables us to reinforce our commitment to work for a healthier world, and helps us to cope with the pressures and contradictions of the world we inhabit here. Support and direction is the function of leadership, along with coordination. But it is not at all necessary to have a rigid hierarchy and a centralization of power to fulfill leadership needs. We tend to think of leadership in this very limited sense because hierarchy and domination is so characteristic of our society. When we enter school (if not before) we are socialized into a passive acceptance of authority.

Many of us in the anti-nuke movement feel strongly that the passive acceptance of authority is today very dangerous when we study nuclear power and become aware of the dangers and risks involved, dangers to the very survival of the world ecological system and when you then see that so many of the experts and authorities we are asked to depend on, ignore and actively take measures to suppress information about these risks, you become much less inclined to passively accept authority. It should be no surprise to us (nor men who have spent their lives developing nuclear power and corporations who have spent their lives developing ways to make money out of nuclear power, have personal reasons for minimizing the risks of nuclear power.

Suspicion towards experts who make their living off of what they promote (in a society that does not guarantee employment) and the rejection of the passive acceptance of authority, leaves us only one alternative if we want rational and just policies—that is, policies which are in everyone's best interest. This alternative is participatory democracy.

Policies will always serve the interests of those groups or individuals who make them. If we want to be sure that policies are made to benefit all of us, it follows that we must all take part in making them. This in turn implies the need for the creation of sympathetic, honest, thinking, and responsible individuals. But we only gain those skills and qualities by exercising them.

This philosophical approach is practiced in the 'affinity group' structure of the Clamshell and characterizes the aims of many of us who are active in the movement on (and off) campus. The affinity group (cell) structure of organization, which emphasizes concensus and the rotation of roles, is the key to the success of non-violent civil disobedience. I believe civil disobedience is needed to halt the growth of nuclear power because the energy utilities and corporations have too much at stake to agree to stop nuclear power simply on the basis of sound arguments and evidence, and because mere hopeful waiting is likely to have catastrophic consequences.

What are the choices? On the one hand there is the present policy of centralized production of energy controlled by enormous, secretive corporations with assets far greater than the majority of the nations of the world and a power structure to match. It is no secret that only a handful of large oil companies own all the coal, oil, gas and uranium reserves in the US and have very substantial control over many foreign reserves. This energy policy which is the green life-blood of these profit-making corporations has three principle characteristics: 1) The energy policy they sell is based on non-renewable sources of energy. 2) It involves very complex and highly capital-intensive forms of technology that make it increasingly difficult for the non-specialist to fully understand. This highly capital-intensive technology not only creates fewer jobs for every dollar spent as compared to expenditure in just about any other area of production, but helps justify what is not necessary-elitist rule by technocrats. And 3) It is in their monetary interest to encourage the greatest consumption of energy as possible. Three things follow from this latter characteristic. First, that wasteful consumption is encouraged and only a meager effort at recycling is attempted. Second, that industry is encouraged to automate, eliminating jobs which is not in itself bad, but is without guaranteed employment. And third, that these energy corporations can only see America's future as one of constantly increasing growth—an unrealistic and costly assumption.

On the other hand, there is the decentralized approach we advocate where one uses a mixture of mostly locally controlled energy producing and conserving techniques ('passive' solar, solar, wind, waves, wood, hydroelectric, geothermo, biomass, thermo-dynamic, as well as non-renewable sources such as coal, oil and gas during a transition period and perhaps in backup systems) which is ecologically most suitable for a particular place and time. The characteristics of this alternative energy approach are: 1) Only forms of energy which are known to be ecologically safe and efficient are used, so this approach emphasizes the use of renewable sources of energy and the use of electricity only where it is essential (e.g., it is not necessary to heat with electricity). Electricity is a convenient and versatile form of energy, but it is an inefficient use of coal, oil, gas and uranium, because in the production of electricity, much of the energy is lost in the form of heat. 2) It is based on advanced and traditional forms of technology which are labor-intensive and easily understood by everyone. And 3) because these forms of energy are decentralized and the local owners themselves directly bare the cost of wasteful use of the systems, there is likely to be a greater incentive to use energy efficiently.

It is likely that the choice between these two policies is a choice between two cultures. If we are to survive we must stop thinking of nature as private property to be raped and plundered for commercial profit and learn to respect nature as the life-support system our survival depends upon. And if we are to stop the insidious historical movement towards increasing centralization and bureaucratization, and the impersonalization and dominance that follows; and if we wish to relate to each other personally and with tolerance and respect; and if we are to stop the deadly pollution of the nuclear power and arms industry; then we must develop ways of cooperating with one another which reflect these values and aims. In a word, we must pursue democracy.

CFM insults

To the editor:

I for one was greatly offended when last night I heard a recording broadcast over WCFM in which some such theme as "up against the wall motherfucker whitey" was persistently reinterated. It was particularly insulting because the same recording had been played last year and was objected to then.

I think I can safely say a large segment of this campus would be offended upon hearing it. In addition, there was a second diatribe which denigrated another group on campus: the gays. Represented was a typically bigotted, narrow-minded mentality which cannot discern slander from "poking fun". I called the station and asked the person if he had any conception of who might be offended by his selection of subject matter. The lame response: "We didn't hear those four-letter words, and we didn't know what was on the record." The broadcast was cut, and the DJ feebly announced that there had been intended no offense to anybody.

Whether foreknowledge of the content existed is of little consequence here. The fact is that several violations of "reasonable" radio conduct are evident. For one, the material should have been screened beforehand, in any case it was aired far longer than was necessary to determine the offensiveness of the matter. Second, the recording was political, and I do not feel the college radio station should be the medium for what appeared to be personal vendetta or self-satisfaction. It is not "editorial" it should have been so announced. Third, the FCC would not take lightly profanity in that context, either anew or after their recent decision, anti-gay.

A student does have his right to opinions—when stated as such and in the proper place. The radio is for all of us, but when "entertainment" becomes assault, it is the weapon of an ignorant and selfish few.

Administrative Paternalism

by Michael Lissack

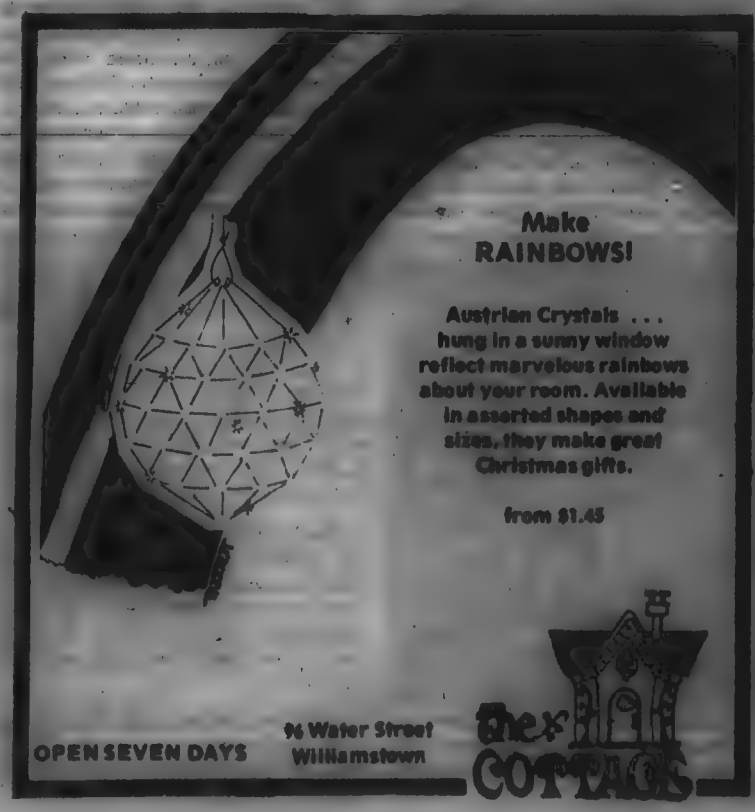
The Administration is paternalistic. They admit it, and we all know it. But, what is responsible paternalism? What is going too far? When is doing something for people more a case of doing something to them?

Students on this campus are fully capable of acting like adults. We don't need a big brother to guide us in our every move. We are, however, catered to and pampered, and most of us like it. The College tries to be a very comfortable place, and tries to fix every individual discomfort that comes up. Yet, by trying to be all things to everyone, the College is hurting us in the long run. It is time we learned to stand on our own two feet.

The CULS's vote last week to eliminate the House Maintenance Tax is a good example. The Committee was trying to fix a problem felt by off-campus people. "Why should we pay ...?" Yet, by fixing that problem, the CUL invited a bigger problem—the disruption of social life, a fragmentation of the campus between those who pay social dues and those who don't, and a disruption of the Residential House system. Doing something for one group, was doing something to another.

What the CUL should have been asking is "what would strengthen the residential houses?" What would get more people involved and make the minority interests more satisfied? The "problem" should have been dealt with by the community—by those directly involved. House Presidents were not even consulted.

Williams is a residential college, because of a commitment to a belief that we learn something from living and sharing with others. That means we have to deal with the others, not run off to Hopkins Hall whenever something goes wrong. The responsibility of the Administration is to provide us with the best structures and institutions they can; it is up to us to use them. If they take on the role of deciding how we should use things, how we should live; what is it that we are supposed to be learning?



My suggestion is that the Administration has gone too far—we are not the children we are treated as. Make us aware of what you perceive of as problems. Talk to us—and maybe we will start talking to you. I have often referred to tunnel vision of the students and the faculty and the Administration. Being part of a community means communicating, sharing one another's concerns. It also means that those most affected by a problem should be part of its solution. Doing things for people can only work, if the people share in the doer's perception of the problem. That applies in the residential houses, in student government, and in a discussion of post-season play.

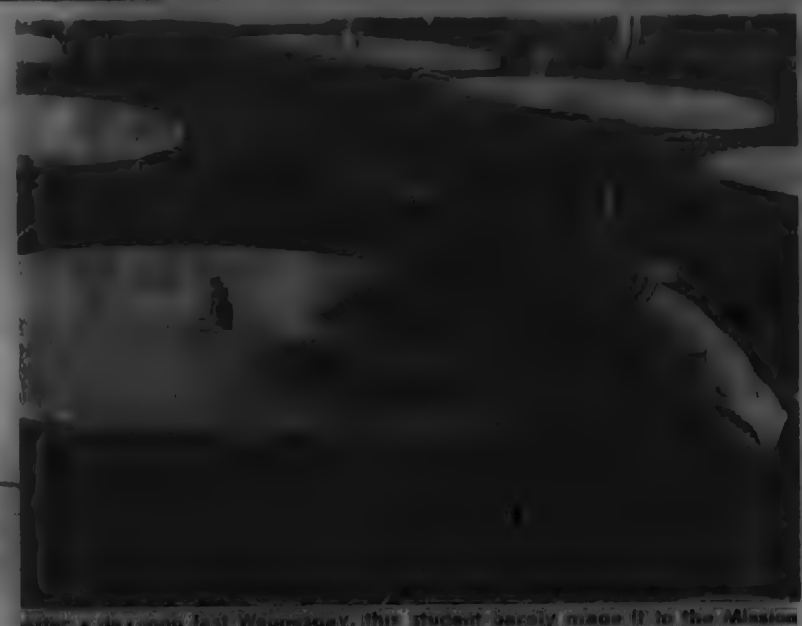
Food fast fazes few

By Janet Ducat



More than 400 Williams College students broke the apparent "0 x" mold last Wednesday when they sacrificed cafeteria meals to participate in the Fast for a World Harvest.

Money that the college food service would have spent on the fasting students—$2.30 per student—will be sent to Oxfam America, a Boston-based national relief organization that funnels funds to developing countries' self-help programs. Including extra donations, about $950 was raised.

But just as important as raising the money, said student program coordinator John Gasperini, was "raising the idea in people's consciousness. Money is important, yes, but the central thrust is fasting for personal awareness."

Degrees of "personal awareness" ran from zero to quite high. Four fifths of the students didn't participate—a percentage comparable to the previous five years of campus fasting.

There were, however, those who did become "aware." Mild, headaches and fatigue troubled many students accustomed to their three meals a day. A sophomore woman wondered, "Can you imagine what it must be like to always feel this way?"

After a day-long fast, Wednesday, this student barely made it to the Mission dining hall only to listen to his stomach crying out for dawn and breakfast.

Committee approves majority of 99's

The Winter Study Program Committee approved 366 "99" projects this year while rejecting 46, Committee chairman George Pistorious announced. Forty seven of these projects, primarily internships, he said, were approved pending proof of sponsorship.

Pistorious explained that the criteria used to judge 99s was not new, though it was applied this year with more "caution and rigor." According to Pistorious, the four basic criteria the Committee uses include: the general educational value of the project, the degree to which the project is focused, the feasibility of the project, and the product which the project would yield.

Each department was urged to reject projects on its own criteria.

WAAC meets anti-apartheid groups

Members of the Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC) joined other anti-apartheid groups from campuses across the country to plan strategy for the coming year at a regional conference at New York University this weekend.

The conference, sponsored by the Northeast Coalition for the Liberation of Southern Africa, brought together students from New York to Berkeley to share ideas and gather information on apartheid

Five Williams students attended the two-day conference, where they helped forge plans for area-wide action early in April. The conference also included workshops on subjects from U.S. foreign policy to connections with American anti-racist and anti-nuclear movements and speakers. The group plans to bring similar workshops and speakers to Williams in a Free University course this January.

The Williams group also participated in debate over the place of divestiture in national anti-apartheid strategy. Ultra-leftists attacked the tactic as a "liberal conscience wash," but the conference reaffirmed divestiture as a means for focusing attention of in the U.S. on American involvement in southern Africa.

Panel weighs nuclear pro's and con's

Opposing opinions about the place of nuclear power in America's future clashed at Phi Beta Kappa's panel debate last Thursday, when the two sides took their positions to a predominantly anti-nuclear audience.

Stephen Blaha of the Physics Department and Jay Pasachoff of Astronomy advocated nuclear power. The two argued that growing demand requires it and that the dangers of radiation resulting from it are less than those from other energy sources, especially coal.

William Moomaw of Chemistry and Al Ell of the Clamshell Alliance countered these arguments and charged that the development of nuclear power lacks adequate safeguards and long-range planning.

Blaha looked to nuclear power to answer long-term energy demand through the world. "You have to go to nuclear energy 200 years from now," he said. He claimed that fossil fuel reserves are diminishing and alternatives—wind, sun and geothermal—are insufficient.

"Absolute statements are not very worthwhile," Pasachoff said, admitting the dangers of radiation, "but what we need are relative statements comparing nuclear power to different sources of energy."

Moomaw noted a steady decline in the number of nuclear reactors projected for 2000 by energy administrators. He claimed the decline is due to failure to solve problems with leaks, waste disposal and safety technology associated with nuclear plants.

He agreed that nuclear plants themselves are probably safe but charged that other parts of the nuclear fuel cycle—from mine tailings to waste—present unsolved hazards to the health of Americans for generations.

Ell attacked claims of nuclear safety, charging that the development of nuclear power must result in increased cancer rate and genetic damage in the American population.

Questions from the audience centered on the problems of waste disposal and on alternatives. The nuclear proponents argued for disposal of glassified wastes deep in geologic formations. Ell and Moomaw in turn demonstrated the present unfeasibility of this system and the problems of containing wastes over the centuries.

Students elect Spencer; pass ouster procedure

by Ann Morris

With a turnout of 56 per cent, the student body elected Kiki Spencer '79 to fill the vacancy on College Council as an at-large representative, and passed the constitutional referendum establishing impeachment procedures with a large majority. The Council approved both of these votes Wednesday night.

Although the election was held Thursday, November 9th, and Friday, November 10th, a mix-up in Perry House delayed their vote for two days. Chris Jenkins '80, chairman of the Elections Committee, cited a "misunderstanding on their part" as the cause of Perry's two day tardiness in voting. "It is unfortunate that Perry did not vote at the same time as the rest of the College," Jenkins said, "but the election is not questionable in terms of validity."

All other elections procedures went smoothly, Jenkins pointed out, as the constant supervision of ballots eliminated any possibilities of fraud. "It was very important to conduct a respectable election," Jenkins explained, referring to alleged irregularities in last spring's College Council election. Jenkins said he did not expect the Perry House delay to hurt the Council's image.

The 56 per cent turnout was "very good," Jenkins emphasized, considering the general lack of publicity for the candidates and the election. An average of 62-66 per cent of the student body voted in the Campus spring election.

The Elections Committee is working on a new set of elections procedures, Jenkins said.

Holding the election at a central location is one possibility being considered, but this option, while discouraging cheating, would probably hurt voter turnout.

Jenkins explained that the system of separate house voting insures a higher turnout but risks fraud.

Vandalism

Several measures have been taken to improve safety and prevent vandalism on campus. Student monitors will be stationed in the Berkshire quad, Greylock, and Mission Park Thursday through Saturday nights from 10 p.m. to 3 a.m. In addition, more lights will be installed around campus.

Guest Meals

A decrease in the number of faculty being invited to guest meals has caused some concern among the administration. Dean Chandler reminded the Council that "one of the purposes of guest meal is to encourage student-faculty gatherings outside of class."

Chandler reported that guest meals may be moved to Tuesday night. With the sale of Mount Hope, more organizations and departments will use the Food Service for social functions. The change in guest meal would alleviate a pile up of demands for the Food Service. The Council raised no objections.

Football team names Gee, Massucco '79 co-captains

Juniors Dave Massucco and Russ Gee officially became co-captains of the 1979 football squad Thursday night at the team's annual awards banquet. Seniors Steve Rogers, Don Rice, Bruce Wilson and Mark Eckert and freshman Jeff Desmond also walked off with major honors at the dinner which officially ended the 1978 season for the Williams gridders.

Massucco scored seven touchdowns and led the Ephs in rushing with 407 yards in 104 carries during the 1978 season. Gee is a two-year starter at the defensive end position for Williams. This past season he made 26 solo tackles, assisted on 28 more, and led the team's defense in sacks with five.

Defensive tackle Jeff Desmond was awarded the Charles Dewoody Salmon award, given to the player who, in the opinion of the coaching staff, has made the most significant contribution to the team in his first year of eligibility. Just a freshman, Desmond started at tackle for the Ephs and had 15 unassisted tackles and 22 second hits in eight games.

Don Rice, a senior middle guard, was given the Michael D. Rakov award as the team's most improved lineman. The Dr. Edward Coughlin award, given to the player who has contributed to the team despite injury, was shared by seniors Bruce Wilson and Mark Eckert.

Hollingsworth sets pass receiving marks

Senior Ken Hollingsworth, co-captain of the 1978 Williams College football team, broke two school records in the pass receiving department this season.

Hollingsworth caught 47 passes for 706 yards in the Ephs' recently-completed 1978 season, breaking the college's single-season reception record of 40 catches for 509 yards set by Herb McCormick '78 in 1976.

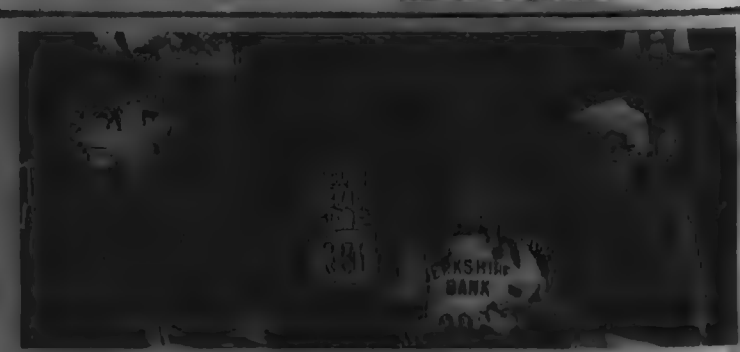
The receiver's strong performance this year also enabled him to break the modern Williams career record in two of the four receiving categories. Hollingsworth has snagged 83 passes for 1334 yards and seven touchdowns in his three-year career as a split end for the Ephs. Dave Parker '76 still holds the career records in two receiving categories with an 18.6 yards per catch average and 12 touchdown receptions in his three seasons at Williams.

In addition to being the Ephs' leading receiver in 1977 and 1978, Hollingsworth has also been the top scorer for Williams in the past two seasons. He compiled 40 points in 1977 and 48 points this past season, largely on the strength of his place kicking ability.

Peter Gluckin caught this long one in WUFO's 13-6 victory over Amherst last weekend. WUFO went 4-3 on the season with a little luck.

Basketball Preview

Coming off a disappointing 1977-78 season, basketball coach Curt Tong says that his players will have to make up in determination and hustle what they will lack in speed and height if they hope to improve upon last year's 9-12 record.



Tong expects this year's squad will be a better shooting one than last year's team, but he says rebounding will be a big problem for the Ephs since the tallest returning Williams player, co-captain Matt Spangler, is only 6'4".

Williams has lost three seniors from last year's team: captain Brad Wolk, forward Tom Balderson and reserve guard Bill Wheaton.

Returning to lead the squad are co-captains Gerry Kelly and Matt Spangler. Last season Kelly was the Ephs' high scorer averaging 13.9 ppg. Spangler, who averaged 12.3 ppg., also pulled down a team-high 7.2 rebounds-game.

Joining Kelly in the backcourt will be returning starter junior Andy Straka. Straka averaged 9.8 ppg. during the 1977-78 season. The Ephs will rely heavily on his ballhandling and outside shooting prowess.

Tong will count on sophomore Dean Ahlberg, a 6'1" forward to provide Williams with much-needed strength on both the offensive and defensive boards. Ahlberg started for the Ephs as a freshman and averaged 6.1 ppg.

College Council passes SAT budget requests

by Ann Morris

College Council passed all of the Finance Committee's recommended Student Activity Tax budget allocations in its last two meetings. The Council distributed more than $105,000 to 45 student groups.

On recommendation from Finance Committee chairman John Simpson '79, the Council passed 34 organizations' budgets as a package. These budgets provoked no questions from the organization or Council members. The members, however, debated the larger and more controversial budgets.

The Finance Committee budgeted the ACEC $11,800.12 of its requested $13,561.12. Having lost more than $8400 in its first two concerts this year, ACEC co-chairman John Svoboda '79 contended that the remaining funds would not cover the popular Winter Carnival and Spring Weekend [illegible].

Svoboda expressed concern about the "long-run role of the ACEC," given its 25 per cent budget cut from last year, a year which he described as "the ACEC's most successful."

Responding to Svoboda's assertion that the ACEC needed an additional $1000 to sponsor two more big concerts, the Council discussed possible cuts in other organizations' budgets. Reaching no agreement on cuts, the Council also voted down Jon Ballan's motion to cut one per cent from all other budgets for this purpose.

Budgeted $2000 of its requested $2903, the Student Course Guide, represented by chairman Rick Moog '79, challenged the allocation. The allocation reflected an existing debt from this fall's guide. Moog questioned the Finance Committee's decision to print fewer guides, a decision based on the assumption that students use the guide in groups.

The Spring Course Guide will be distributed only to residential houses and entries, though many copies will be available on reserve in Sawyer Library. Moog expressed doubt whether printing several hundred copies would even be worthwhile. He said, "I don't think people will go out of their way to use it, but will use it if they have it."

The Council passed the $2000 budget, while approving the printing of as many copies of the Course Guide as possible. The spring guide will contain a full year's selection of [illegible].

The Boat Club's allocation of $4000, its initial request, also brought Council discussion. Members questioned why SAT funds should have to cover the Boat Club, as it is a major College athletic activity.

Ted Tucci '79 proposed that the College make crew into a varsity sport. Simpson informed the council of Provost Neil Grabois' statement that the College was not prepared to donate more money for the sport, though, he said, Grabois maintained the possibility of future discussion. The Council reluctantly passed the $4000 budget.

In other allocations, the Jewish Association budget of $754 was passed with the removal of earlier stipulations. The GPU's budget of $1020 received a cut of $150, due to the finding of another sponsor for the group's presentation of a lesbian musician.

The Record's budget of $12,309 was passed with the agreement that next year's budget would show a considerable increase to cover rising printing costs. This year's budget did not include the requested salaries for students on the Record who pasted up the paper.

The Council plans to develop in the spring a comprehensive policy on which student positions are to be paid.

WCFM's budget of $9,349.65 was also approved with the commitment by the Council to cover future increases in production costs.

The Council made two stipulations to speed up the notoriously slow budgeting process. Only main motions to approve a budget or send it back to the Finance Committee for reconsideration were allowed. Any Dean Dan meets with students Thursdays from 3:30-4:30.

Walk-in hours please parties

by Ann Morris

Both President Chandler and Dean O'Connor this year have instituted a "walk-in hour;" an hour each week during which students can come to see them without appointments.

Chandler and O'Connor agree that the walk-in hour, which was created in response to student charges of lack of communication between the administration and students, has been a successful innovation. "The very fact of having it creates a different atmosphere," O'Connor explained.

Chandler, who developed the idea last year, said the walk-in hour serves to "resolve barriers." It is an attempt, he continued, to be responsive to students who have concerns but perhaps feel too inhibited to make an appointment.

The reasons students come to see him vary, Chandler said, though most students want to discuss institutional policy relating to residential or social issues. Occasionally students see him to discuss personal problems, such as taking time off from Williams. Chandler emphasized that these discussions remain confidential.

Concerns about the College's policy on broad questions also bring students into the President's office. He cited the environment and energy as topics about which students have expressed opinions. Anywhere from three to nine students are apt to drop in during the weekly walk in hour which lasts from 3:30 to 4:30 on Tuesdays.

Chandler noted that not all the students who enter his office come with problems. An exchange student, he said, came simply to "express delight in his Williams experience." Another student, the first to use the walk-in hour, had quite an unusual reason for wanting to see the president: he was trying to sell him something.

Students come to Dean O'Connor with "more specific student-life problems." Although he has mostly seen students with small, individual, or policy-related problems, the Dean noted, several students have stopped by with good suggestions for changes.

Burns' book backs Parties

by Tim Jones

James MacGregor Burns' name has appeared with unprecedented regularity in the nation's top newspapers and periodicals since the October publication of his latest work entitled Leadership.

As the author of ten books on twentieth-century American politics and the recipient of the National Book Award and the Pulitzer Prize, Burns provides unique insights into the American political scene and leadership roles.

The weakening of American political parties has recently gripped Burns' attention. "Party organization is steadily deteriorating and in many states disappearing," he said. "Parties have lost control of the nomination process to special interests and faddist groups."

"They cannot back up their promises and are unable to unite and stabilize government," he continued. "Parties classically have been sources of leadership in this country by recruiting leaders onto the national landscape."

Today they are no longer able to effectively function in this role. He offered the example of Jimmy Carter, who did not work closely with the national Democratic Party organization during his campaign.

To express his concern about the health of political parties, Burns chairs the Committee for Party Renewal, whose membership includes political scientists and several Congressmen. Over a year ago, Burns read inside the Jefferson Memorial in Washington, D.C. a statement of warning composed by the committee.

It predicted that the decline of parties "would mean the end of potentially the most powerful political organization acting for the people as a whole—all of those who lack specialized political organizations of their own.

Burns believes that the low rate of voter participation in elections at all levels of government reflects the increasing impotence of parties. "One reason that you had an 80 per cent voter turnout around the turn of the century, compared to around 55-60 per cent today, was because the parties got people out to vote."

"There voters are so turned off that they don't show up (at the polls) despite all the media activity, it would seem to be very serious," he continued. "(There is) a lack of excitement about politics because great issues don't seem to be posed or fought over. (In fact), I think we're in a period today of relatively minor issues that seem major in the absence of transcending ones."

The current paucity of galvanizing issues and the resulting lack of voter interest directly reflect the apparent ineffectiveness of modern heads of stage. Burns believes that "the nomination by either party of a person of strong idology would bring about sharper conflict over issues (from which) great leadership develops."

To illustrate the positive symbiosis that occurs between a true leader and his followers, Burns spoke of the exchange that can go on between students and teachers under ideal circumstances.

"One of the best examples of the leadership I'm talking about is the teacher-student relationship, particularly at a place like Williams." He emphasized the [illegible] 'engagement' that may occur when a teacher brings out the hidden potential of a student while the student simultaneously brings out the best in the teacher.

"Then you have an ongoing relationship between the teacher and the student in which the student is sometimes the leader and the teacher—the follower," Burns said.

Burns explained that many of the ideas introduced in Leadership were derived from discussion that took place in the class he taught on "Political Leadership and Historical Causation."

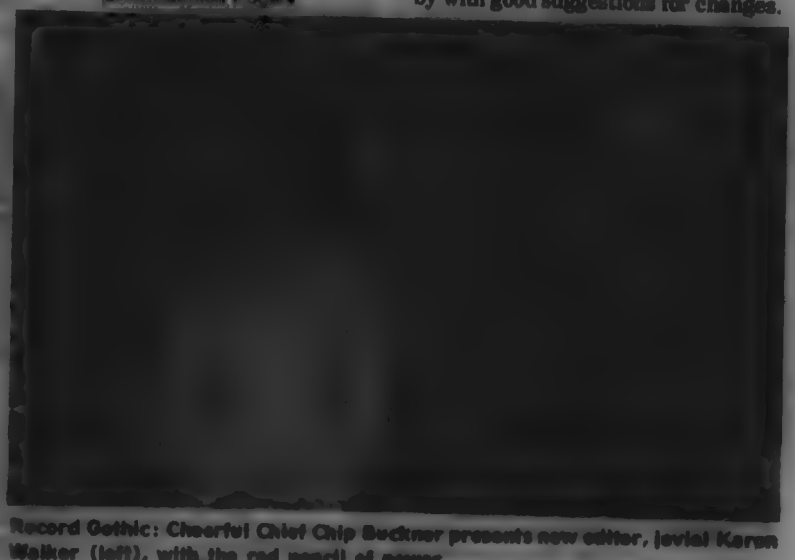
Record appoints 1979 staff

Record Editor Chip Buckner '79 announced the promotion of eight members of the Record staff. The editorial board, which retires at the end of the year made the appointments, effective January first.

Karon Walker '80 will become editor-in-chief for the coming year. Nancy Richman '80, Randy Wang '80 and Susan Hobbs '81 will comprise the editorial board. These four will serve as the official decision making body of the paper.

In addition, Buckner announced the appointment of seven department editors. Ann Morris '81 will run the News Department. Tim Jones '81 will head up a new Analysis section. Stewart Massad '80 will take over the Curious page. Jon Lebenzon '80 and Sally Mudge '81 will continue in their respective capacities as Arts and Features editors. Jamie Speyer '81 will edit the sports page. Mike Snyder '81 will take sole control of the Layout staff while Peter Buckner, Judy Gass and Marc Johnson, all sophomores, will continue to run the Photography department.

Buckner announced that he had appointed himself subscription manager, saying that "it's about time I got paid for working on this thing." There were no other changes on the business staff in which Mike Berhman serves as Business Manager and Bill Bursche '79 acts as Advertising Manager. Traditionally, he said, the editorial board changes its business staff in the spring.



Buckner, Executive Editor Dave MacGregor, Outlook Editor Peter Rintels and columnist Chris Diangelo, all seniors, will remain on the staff as Contributing Editors.

DiAngelo will continue his column, Rintels and Buckner expect to do more features work, and MacGregor plans to work on investigative reporting.

Walker joined the Record staff in the fall of 1977 as a member of the news department. She quickly demonstrated her versatility and expertise by assisting at layout sessions and writing sports as well. In January she became an Associate News Editor, and at the end of that year previous Editor Scott Dean named her Rookie of the Year. She served as Managing Editor during the past year. For the past five years she has worked as a writer and paste-up artist for the Nantucket Inquirer-Mirrer. "Karon is," Buckner said, "an awesome individual. We chose her because she is the best at getting things done." Every year, he said, the board looks for someone who can coordinate the various departments. "Walker's varied experience makes her the natural candidate."

New editorial board member Randy Wang joined the Record staff as a news writer in the fall of 1976. He earned a position as an Associate News editor a year later, and was cited as Best News Writer the following semester. He was appointed News Editor at the beginning of the year and has, Buckner said "done the

Apres moi le deficit

At first glance, the College Council's unamended approval of the Finance Committee's budget recommendations would appear to be a tribute to the committee's thorough examination of each allocation. However, on closer examination one begins to wonder whether the council's unqualified approval might be due more to the pressure of time than to any extraordinary meeting of minds between the council and the committee.

Budgeting is traditionally a lengthy and involved process, and has never been completed efficiently and quickly in recent memory. This year, however, the Finance Committee has managed to reach a new level of careful and unhurried deliberation. In fact, we half expected them to be carefully and unhurriedly studying budgets in January.

We are less than rapturously confident in the wisdom of the council in allocating funds, but our only available representatives at least deserve the opportunity to consider 45 budgets in more than two meetings the last full week of classes. In the event, two organizations were discussed at length on Sunday, and the remainder received only cursory discussion at the next meeting before being rubber-stamped.

It would be far better to organize a Finance Committee at the start of each calendar year, make Finance Committee recommendations in the spring, and budget in September. This would allow organizations to know their allocation before they began to spend it, and give the council time to consider funding more thoroughly and make last-minute changes. Every year a battered Finance Committee urges it, and every year a busy College Council fails to carry it out.

The need for this reform is more evident than ever this year. Let us hope the council acts decisively this time, or next year's organizations may very well be defending their funding requests during the spring CC elections.

Sour Pickles

My source for this story first contacted me by telephone several weeks ago. He gave his name only as Antonio Pagliacci di Guicciardini and claimed he was the biggest name in organized crime in the history of Williams, beating his would be competitors to this title by a good three syllables.

"You the guy he writes Sour Pickles?" he asked.

I confessed that I was.

"You want to hear the biggest story of your life?"

I replied that I already knew the story of my life, having been a witness to the event, and didn't see what purpose a rehash would serve, especially a big one.

"You know what I mean," he said. "I can give you the low down on organized crime for your column, if you're interested. Just meet me this Thursday at 2:00 a.m. in Pittsfield," He then gave me an address and hung up.

Skeptical but curious, I followed up the tip. At the appointed hour, I showed up at the address, a dimly lit parking garage. Inside I find a shadowy figure waiting and introduced myself.

"You're talking to my shadow, ya knothead," a voice from behind me said. I turned and saw Mr. Guicciardini silhouetted by a light bulb behind him.

"Sorry," I said, getting out my notebook. "What's your story?"

"To begin with, there was a numbers racket, back in the fifties."

"Run by the Math department?"

"Of course. There were three professors, Vita "Lucky" Angelo, Alberto "Unlucky" Garbanzo and Tony "Not so lucky but luckier than Alberto" Medici. They ran the whole operation and took ten per cent off the top.

"They really play for keeps don't they?"

"It's a rough business. About the same time, the psychology department began running a brainwashing operation. You may have wondered why so many alumni from back then wear House of Walsh pants to all the Homecoming football games."

"I had wondered about that," I admitted. "Was that all, just brainwashing?"

"After a while they expanded and started doing shirts and suits and even offered a special one-day service."

"Were there any other big rackets?"

"In the late sixties, there was a protection racket run by some philosophy majors. If you didn't pay up, they'd prove you didn't exist." It worked for a couple of years until one of the majors saw a hole in the proof and began passing it around. The others were going to send him to the bottom of the Housatonic in cement overshoes, but it never came off. You see, they hadn't read their Whitehead and . . ."

"You mean . . ."

"Yup. It was the fallacy of misplaced concrete."

I repeated the line to myself in disbelief, and decided to rapidly conclude the interview and take off. The next day I returned to Pittsfield with some religion majors who had read their Whitehead, looked up Mr. Guicciardini, and rendered him his due.

Beneath their Peaceful Shadows

In The Second Ring of Power, Carlos Castenada relates a conversation with don Juan, the Yaqui Indian sorcerer who has revealed to him the meaning of life:

"I asked him once, overwhelmed by the realization that I could never pay him back for all he had done for me, if there was anything in the world I could do to even the score. We were leaving a band, after exchanging some Mexican currency.

"'I [illegible]' 'I don't need you to pay me back,' he said, 'but if you still want to pay back, make your deposit to the spirit of man. That's always a very small account, and whatever one puts in it is more than enough.'"

It was Christmas Day, 1974. I was working, pumping gas at the Hess station. The shift was an unusually long one: 10 to 10. I was with Mike, Al, and Larry. We used to call Al "Moss Teeth" since he never brushed his teeth. Holden Caulfield's term.

In mid-afternoon the traffic had slowed down considerably. Everyone had arrived at their uncle's or grandparents'. They were all settling down to the quiet warmth of a fireplace, food, family.

As long as business was slow for a while, I decided to clean the men's room. The three other guys could handle the customers.

First, the walls. Tile walls can get quite a bit of dirt in between the tiles, and you have to use a pretty stiff brush. Next, the mirror. Then the sink.

Occasionally I would poke my head out to see if they needed me at the pumps. I had to look between the legs of the large plastic Santa in the front window to see out to the islands. Hess supplied the Santa.

Next, the toilet. We used a special cleaner for that, a pleasant-smelling red liquid. Its brand name was "Bowl-O."

Business was now very slow. Almost everyone had gotten to wherever they were going. Chestnuts, ham. Drambuie in cordial glasses. Pumpkin pie. Ice cream with Creme de Menthe.

The urinal. I could never get that thing as clean as I wanted it. I squirted in the Bowl-O. The Comet cleanser. Comet white-with-green-sparkles" cleanser. Red Bowl-O and green Comet. Red and green, Christmas colors. Really quite festive.

This was the best Christmas in three years. A year earlier, I had lost my stepfather in December. Two years earlier, I had lost my mother right before Thanksgiving. And here I was, cleaning a urinal in a Hess station in Poughkeepsie, New York, on Christmas Day. Gloria in excelsis Deo! Glory be to God on high!

"Chris!" Mike yelled, "There's someone here to see you." I come out of the men's room. "Christine Comins!"

I barely knew Christine. She had graduated from my high school six months earlier. The salutatorian. M.I.I., class of '78.

"I heard you had to work. I brought you some cookies." She stayed for over an hour. Mike tackled the floor in the men's room. Larry and Moss Teeth took care of the motoring public.

After she had left, I still couldn't believe she had come. I barely knew her. Over an hour, an hour she should have spent at home, or with her boyfriend. Drinking brandy in front of the fire.

"Christmas is too commercialized;" so they say. But not for everyone. Not even for most. Probably only for a few. Even though it's only one day a year, it's a day when people act like they know they should act every day.

The spirit of Christmas, the spirit of man. One day a year to pay back to the spirit of man. "That's always a very small account, and whatever one puts in is more than enough."

Merry Christmas, Happy Hanukkah, Happy New Year. See you in Winter Study.

CFM response to Read

To the editor:

In response to Mr. Read's letter on WCFM being used as "a weapon of an ignorant and selfish few," a few points need clarification. For one, the DJ involved announced his intended one-hour special tribute to Gil Scott-Heron. This special was not intended as political, but rather as a tribute to a controversial, yet widely-respected figure. Secondly, while such language is abrasive, it does not violate any FCC rule given its context. Moreover, the DJ did remove the material from airplay when Mr. Read called in and informed the DJ that the material was offending him, a polite gesture that was by no means necessary.

As an educational radio station, WCFM often airs viewpoints that are controversial in order to challenge perspectives drawn from limited impressions and-or experiences. I do not submit that WCFM management lauds Gil Scott-Heron, but that only through transmission of selected controversial viewpoints and material can radio allow us as a community to better understand the problems of ourselves and our society.

General Manager, WCFM

More Observations

To the editor:

I have just read the "observations on South Africa" of my colleague Steve Lewis (Record September 19th). As personal reactions to South African society and the complex South African situation they cannot be faulted, indeed they are both sensitive and fascinating. However, despite the title, Mr. Lewis' remarks offer prescriptions for action but carry with them the presumption that his observations correspond to South African historical and social realities in ways significant enough to offer rational guidance for action. It is with this presumption that I must differ.

From his vantage point in Botswana Mr. Lewis has [illegible] key elements of the rationale for apartheid, elements that correspond but partially and misleadingly to conditions in South Africa.

Berkeley takes a right turn

by Jeff Nelligan

A group of U.C. Berkeley students recently took Chancellor Albert Bowker to court over the misuse of their registration fees for the funding of political groups, the suit specifically naming several leftist groups. Berkeley students are marching again. Long known as the seat of student rebellion and radicalism, U.C. Berkeley is slowly moving away from its politically turbulent past. The majority of students here today are directing their energy away from controversial domestic and international issues and towards campus matters directly related to their education. This interest in campus concerns reflects a growing change in attitude. Admittedly there is pride in the tradition of protest at Berkeley and the school does have a unique position with respect to national issues. But today's student simply does not have an active interest in off-campus issues. He or she is practical, career-minded, and is taking education very seriously.

The rapidly diminishing number of campus radical groups are desperately trying to maintain Berkeley's leftist tradition by attacking policies of the University. A small number of students here are leading a crusade for economic and racial justice in white minority-ruled South Africa. U.C. investments there are not within the jurisdiction of state officials as in most other states but are controlled by a University supervised Board of Regents. Thus the student denunciation of apartheid policies is aimed at a highly visible and accessible university administration. The University operated Los Alamos and Lawrence-Livermore Laboratories designed the neutron bomb and 85 per cent of the nuclear weapons produced for the United States military establishment. Lawrence Laboratory is a brief stroll from campus; it has daily tours, and like the university administration, is [illegible] visible. The precedent setting Bakke case on reverse discrimination began less than 100 miles away from Berkeley at a sister campus U.C. Davis. The "Reverse the Bakke Decision" cry, begun after a state supreme court ruling in favor of the white pre-med student, was taken up by only a few socially concerned Berkeley students.

There is no doubt Berkeley abounds with social causes. But are these causes actively supported by a large student following? Not anymore. Students at Cal are concerned with their own futures. Controversial issues remain far away from the student battling for grades, a job, a successful career. Whales in the North Atlantic and blacks in South Africa are as distant as a campus nuclear weapons lab and state politics. Closer to home are registration costs, alternative grading systems, job placement, and final exams. One student says simply, "I want a job, I want to learn. That's it. Let someone else worry about baby seals." Increasingly, students see the manifestations of these social crusades—nagging handbill hawkers, noisy, unwelcome rallies, and even class interruptions—as a nuisance. The lack of organization and infighting on the part of activist groups results in a diffusing and weakening of efforts. Overexposure dulls the impact of the causes and alienates students otherwise open-minded (highlighted this split on the left was a much publicized brawl between two Marxist student groups earlier this year.

Probably the most accurate indicator of growing student conservatism and concern for campus issues came this spring. In a surprising upset election, a new, fraternity-sorority based, conservative, campus oriented party called Common Sense swept all five student government Executive offices, including Student Body President, from a group in power the previous twelve years. Down in flames went the Progressive Coalition, a liberal group long seen by many as a rubber stamp for liberal positions on outside campus issues, and not concerned with hum-drum campus inequities. The new Student Body President calls himself, "... Republican at heart," and plans to concentrate solely on student needs such as educational standards, registration fees, and campus parking. He will steer away from largely symbolic action on divestiture, arms control, abortion, and Supreme Court decisions.

Nelligan transferred to Williams this fall after two years at Berkeley, where he was on the staff of the Daily Californian, the Berkeley student paper. This article originally appeared in somewhat altered form in the November 24th issue of William F. Buckley's National Review. Nelligan swears he is a liberal anyway.

A number of incidents exemplify this emphasis on purely campus issues, as well as growing conservative attitudes. During the furor over the Bakke case, the school's newspaper, The Daily Californian, came out pro Bakke. When two influential State Assemblymen debated the controversial Jarvis-Gann property tax proposal, an initiative designed to reduce or cut many of the state's social programs as well as reduce university programs, less than 50 people filled the mammoth 350 person auditorium. ROTC, bitterly criticized during the 1960's, its buildings almost burned down, today enjoys a resurgence and an acceptance on campus. Berkeley, long the bastion of Third World activity and sympathy, has reported a 20 per cent decrease in minority enrollment. If this isn't enough to disgust the least sentimental liberal, the Greek system, involved in an anti-Semitic incident regarding the thrashing of a local Jewish house, is making a comeback at the rate of two chapters a year.

The times they are a 'changin'. The Free Speech Movement, Mario Savio, and Peoples Park are readily dismissed. "Oh yeah, that was pretty neat," says a girl here. Berkeley's past is written on the walls and in the history books. But little of that heritage remains in the hearts or minds of students shuffling through Sproul Plaza, worriedly pondering Grade Point Averages and Board scores.

Outlook On Activism

Is ideology the issue?

Editor's note: The following article is more or less an extended editor's note written in response to, though certainly not as a rebuttal to, Jeff Nelligan's article on Berkeley.

by Peter Rintels

Whenever I get around to talking campus politics these days, I feel more and more compelled to begin by flashing my liberal credentials, so here they are. I am a card carrying Democrat, literally. I have found Democrats generally more sympathetic and more likely to represent my own liberal point of view than Republicans and have consequently been making modest contributions to the party's campaign war chest the past two years, for which I received a DNC membership card. I have also sent modest checks to Amnesty International and the ACLU. In 1972, I was a strong McGovern supporter, and in 1976, I was in Mo Udall's camp until he lost the Democratic presidential nomination to Carter. By just about anyone's standard, my heart has done its share of bleeding.

Consequently, I am less than thrilled about reports of a conservative trend among Americans in general, and particularly among college students. Jeff Nelligan's piece about Berkeley, appearing elsewhere on this page, is particularly discomforting, speaking as it does of a "growing student conservatism" at the one time bastion of student activism. Yet when I look over my own liberal credentials and my own lack of enthusiasm for most of the local "activist" causes, I can't help but wonder if something more complex than a conservative shift is going on here. A conservative shift suggests that some sort of ideological change is taking place, but if my own attitudes are typical (and I make no claim that they are), then ideology has not been a substantial issue in a lot of campus political discussions.

Chip Buckner, for example, recently pointed out to me that most of the recently elected house presidents have been conservatives, which presumably indicates growing conservative attitudes here. But I have never voted for a house president on the basis of ideology, and to do so would be absurd. I view house presidents as primarily social functionaries, and I have invariably voted for the person that I thought would pursue the job with the most energy and enthusiasm. I would no more vote for a house president on the basis of ideology than I would vote for a house treasurer because he had vowed to "hold the line on spending."

On the considerably less trivial matter of Williams' South Africa related investments, basically the same thing was true; I did not consider ideology the issue, but practicality, and I know that I am not alone in this. I have yet to meet a person on this campus who is a supporter of South African apartheid, but I have met many who do not support divestiture. I am one such person myself. Is this conservatism? In my case at least, not at all.

In my view, the only real issue in the South Africa debate was whether divestiture would have made any dent in apartheid. The effects didn't necessarily have to be direct; as a symbolic gesture divestiture might have meant something as well, but before I could support it as a means of dealing with our South African related investments, I insisted that it be shown to my satisfaction that some concrete results would follow. Otherwise, we would not be divesting for the benefit of South African blacks, but for our own benefit, to make ourselves look and feel less "soiled" by contact with something we abhor, and doing so at a hefty cost. That struck me as being neither in the true spirit of activism, nor as especially wise.

I became rapidly disillusioned by the whole South Africa debate when I heard more and more voices insisting that Williams was morally obligated to divest to save black South African lives when no one had in fact shown any connection between the two actions. A Record of last spring, for example, contains a photo of a banner hanging from a room in the freshman quad which read, "Save lives, divest now," and shortly after the College Council passed a resolution calling for divestiture as a last resort six members of the Williams Jewish Association signed a letter to the editor of the paper which read in part, "Given our religious ideals, we too cannot sit idly while a nation is oppressed [...] Having read the College Council resolution we feel that it is the most effective course of action to take. But effective how? While I am in complete sympathy with oppressed people, as I am sure virtually everyone else here is, I could not accept these vague suggestions that divestiture was "effective action" toward relieving anyone's oppression without better proof.

The Record offered another reason for questioning the wisdom of divestiture in its May 9th editorial on the subject. The editorial pointed out that divestiture would cost a minimum $100,000 in transfer costs and asked, "... is this the best way to spend our money? Should we put that money into financial aid, the Williamstown chest fund, or should we sell the stocks and send the money to a Wall Street stock broker?" The editorial concluded by reiterating what I have said above, that before divestiture should be undertaken, "the burden rests upon the pro-divestiture people to demonstrate that their plan is more than a one-shot fireworks display that attracts attention, but accomplishes nothing."

There was a swift, and to my mind very disconcerting response by several Record staffers in the next issue. The editorial, they said, "will only strengthen the cynical view of some in the College community that the Record is ... the product of an allegedly conservative clique of shortsighted editors." Quite aside from the dangerous implications that has for student journalism at Williams (i.e. by suggesting that the Record should only run editorials of an ideology students are likely to approve of, which strikes me as enormously conservative itself) the statement gives the Record's divestiture views an ideological bent that I don't think they deserve. The Record said in essence, "we don't think divestiture will accomplish what the pro-divestiture people claim it will accomplish," and left the door open to reassessing their views if the claims could be proved. The debate from my perspective and from that of the paper was not ideological, but would be better likened to two scientists debating whether the data from a particular experiment better supported one model of, say atomic structure, or another. To be sure, the status of South African blacks is much more emotionally charged than atomic structure and right or left leanings undoubtedly affected the way many people evaluated the evidence on divestiture, but my point is that it was possible to be a liberal and still take the so-called conservative view on the subject which makes one wonder if it is really so conservative as some people insist. The divestiture debate is still going on, although with no where near the intensity of last spring, so the final word on it has by no means been said, (see, for example, Professor Baker's letter to the editor on page [illegible] and Professor Lewis's reply) but to look upon what has been said so far in predominantly ideological terms misses, I think, a great deal of the complexity of the thoughts and feelings expressed certainly in my case. I suspect this is true of a great deal of the debate on many other issues as well.

Even with this much said, however, it would be foolish to insist that there is no conservative trend either among college students or in the nation. No doubt we are seeing at least in part the political consequences of the so-called "me generation," and the "looking out for number one" attitude. Certainly that is what was behind a great deal of the Proposition 13 sentiment in California. (Warren Feldman's article in the current issue of Back Talk makes some interesting points about this and while I don't agree with what he says about the Bakke decision, I highly recommend his piece to anyone interested in the social implications of Proposition 13.)

Yet what I find a great deal more disturbing, and more pronounced than the trend toward conservative politics is the growing lack of interest in politics of any kind. This past election saw the lowest off year voter turnout percentage than any since 1946, according to U.S. News and World Reports. Locally, I have no data on how College Council election turnouts have been recently, but it is interesting to note how few students last year showed an interest in CC offices, to the point that last year's CC president did some very active and very controversial recruiting of candidates. Another bad sign is the declining interest in campus humanitarian organizations. The Lehman Service Council, for example, has seen a 25 per cent drop in participation in some of its activities this year.

My very subjective impression is that if more students here were politically active, they would (on the most part be supporting liberal causes such as gun control and the ERA, and probably in numbers close to what one would have found five or ten years ago. Moreover in many cases where they wouldn't embrace the usual leftist view, I suspect it would be less out of lack of liberal ideals than out of a difference sense of the complexities of the issue, as for example with my own views toward divestiture.

Just in light of my own political thinking over the past two years, I can't help but wonder as a liberal if in the trend toward campus conservatism, there is not a great deal less to worry about than meets the eye, and in the trend toward campus complacency, a great deal more.

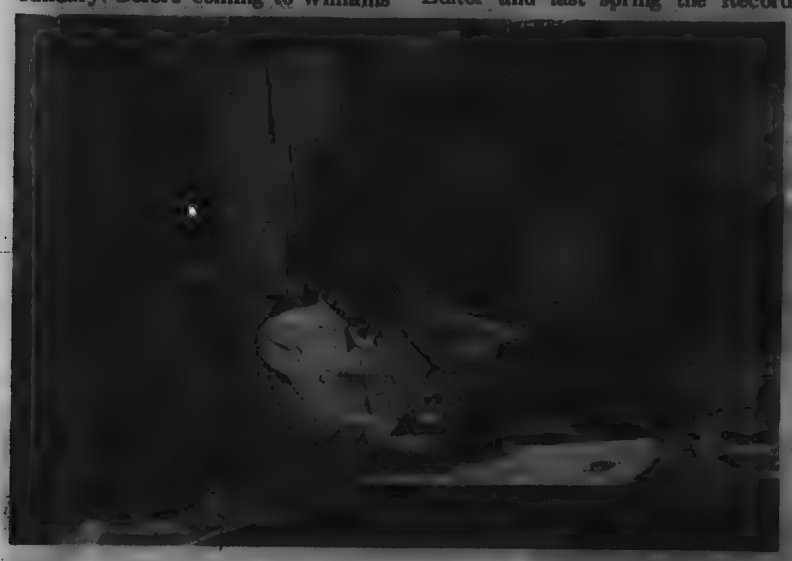
The Record promotes eight best job of anyone at that position for a number of years." Before coming to Williams he served as Sports editor of the John Burroughs' World in St. Louis, where Walker edited.

Susan Hobbs began her journalistic career at Williams. She joined the Layout staff in the fall of 1977. A year later the Editorial Board promoted her to Layout Co-Editor and in that position "she impressed us with her ability, dedication and organization" to such an extent that the Record moved her to the Editorial Board, Buckner said.

Nancy Richman joined the paper in September 1976 as a news reporter. In January she became an Associate Editor and was subsequently named that year's best News Writer. She then co-edited the Arts page for a semester and became Managing Editor last January. Before coming to Williams she was Editorial Chairman of the Phillips Academy Phillipian. "Nancy is an idea person," Buckner observed. "She comes up with the suggestions that other people act upon. She and Karen will make an excellent team. We're glad to have her as our executive editor."

Ann Morris started with the Record in the fall of 1977. She wrote both Arts and Features before becoming, in successive semesters, Associate Features Editor, Co-Features Editor, and Associate News Editor. "She is one of the finest writers on the staff," the Editor said. "We hope she can pass some of her talent and enthusiasm on to the other members of the News Department."

Tim Jones began writing news in September 1977. At the end of the semester he became an Associate Editor and last spring the Record cited him as its "Rookie of the Year." When he initiates the Analysis page, Buckner said, "We hope he will both do the longer in-depth news stories, at which he is best, and do some work in measuring and reporting student opinion."



"Stewart Massad," Buckner continued, "is one of the more politically active student on campus. We hope that he will use his ties to solicit a variety of opinions and carry on the excellency of our Editorial page." Massad has written news since fall 1976. He has served both as an Associate Editor and, during January 1978, acting News Editor.

Arts Editor John Libertine has "markedly improved the quality of the page over the year. If he could keep his obnoxiousness under control he could make a real contribution to the paper," Buckner said.

Sally Midgely returns as Features Editor. "We've had more and better Features this past semester than the entire previous year," Buckner asserted. "We look forward to even more for the coming semester."

Jamie Speyer will take over the Sports department. He moves in from the Layout Department with which he worked this year. "He has assisted with Sports editing throughout the semester," Buckner said.

Mike Rayder moves from Co-Layout Editor to run the department by himself. He was promoted to co-editor. Status at the beginning of this year. "He's learned the skill very quickly," the Editor said. "We think that now he is in the position both to do more good work, and to train others."

The two new managing editors, Susan Hobbs and Randy Wang, promise service with a smile. (photo by SBB4)

Early Decision applications fall

According to Philip Smith, Director of Admissions, 450 prospective students submitted early decision applications by the November 15 deadline. Smith added that acceptances will be mailed out on December 15.

Presently setting the ceiling at 30 per cent of the projected class size of 490, Smith plans to accept 144 applicants. The projected class size, based on the use of the six regular freshman houses, may change if the administration decides to use West College.

The number of early decision applicants declined from last year's total of 529, and the peak in 1973 of over 600 applicants. While Smith had no explanation for the drop, he speculated that because last year, for the first time, the College rejected outright some applicants, some less qualified applicants this year may have been "scared off."

The smaller projected freshman class, as compared to the size of this year's class of over 500, reflects the expected leveling off of the number of students going on exchange. The College this year opened with a total of 1900 students, a greater number than anticipated, because many prospective exchanges decided to remain on campus.

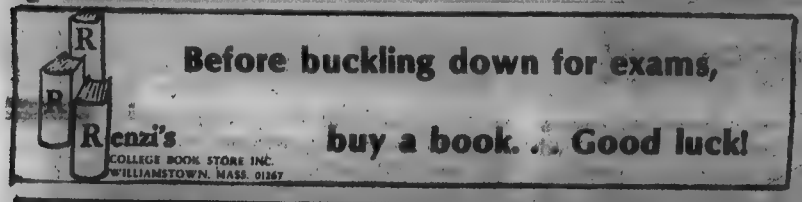
Endangered species

Lecturer blames Congress

By Stu Massad

George Jacobsohn, biologist and staff member of a Senate environmental subcommittee, analyzed the pasage of this year's Rare and Endangered Species Act in his talk Wednesday. He blamed both environmentalists and pro-development Congressmen for the legislative shenanigans that preceded the bill passage.

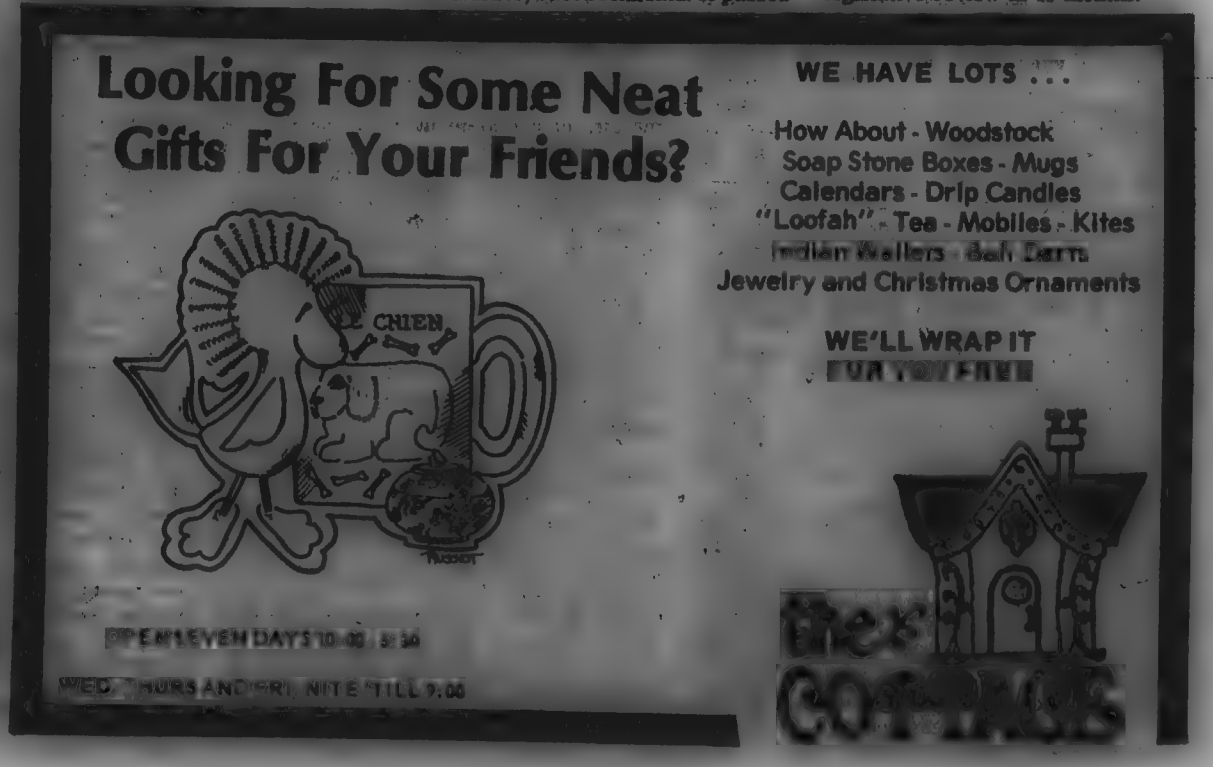
Initially, the environmental lobby urged that the bill be retained in its original 1973 form. Because this act forbade federal projects from destroying any endangered species, many legislators called for a new, more lenient version.



Jacobsohn and other Senate staffers looked for a compromise since they foresaw a swarm of conflicts between the need for endangered species habitats and federal development plans.

Their compromise, requiring a year-long evaluation with cabinet-level approval, faced many difficulties, Jacobsohn said. It passed the Senate amid attacks from both conservationists and conservatives.

According to Jacobsohn, the bill did not reach the House floor until the last week of the legislative year, when hastily added amendments greatly weakened it. A joint-house conference reconstituted the original plan, and the bill finally passed on the last day of the session.



Jacobsohn, an environmental partisan, rapped the environmental lobby for inflexibility regarding the Endangered Species Act. He charged that the lobby's uncompromising insistence that all endangered species be protected at any cost served to strengthen the position of the bill's opponents and nearly resulted in its defeat.

Congress is "generally pro-environment," Jacobsohn said. He expressed high hopes for future environmental protection bills, but warned that the present Endangered Species Act will face further legislative review in 18 months.

motion which suggested to the Finance Committee that additions be made to an organization's budget were required to be complemented by a motion to cut an equal amount from a specific portion of another organization's budget.

These rules enabled the particularly strained budget, which, according to Simpson, contained "no fat," to move through the Council in just two meetings.

Co-op and Off-Campus Housing

Rick Moog announced at last Wednesday's meeting the specifics of the report on off-campus and co-op housing. Contending that a definite limit on the number of students who apply together for these options should be kept, Moog proposed three as the top number for co-op housing and four for off-campus.

Keeping the groups small, he said, insures that a one-group self-selected majority will not take control of a house. With seniors receiving two points and juniors one point, Moog explained that groups with the highest accumulation of points would be chosen first.

Although this rule may limit the degree to which seniors choose to live with juniors, he said, it gives seniors, the best chance. The draw represents for seniors their last opportunity to live in co-op housing.

Council approved the report, though amending the maximum number of students applying together for off-campus living from four to six. The amendment also allows the Housing Committee to accept a group of more than six if the students can present a specific house which they would be available.

This is the last issue of the semester.

Publication will resume the second week of January.

GOP club hosts Bateman

by Steve Pillara

Raymond Bateman, the former President of the New Jersey Senate, and unsuccessful candidate for The New Jersey Governorship, will speak tomorrow night, December 7, in Driscoll Lounge. Bateman will address "The future of the Republican Party across the nation." He will then open the discussion for questions.

Bateman will also speak the following morning at Driscoll Lounge to the junior and senior political science majors and faculty. The topic of that talk will be "Where the action is ... the interplay [illegible] of the states in the Federal System."

Bateman's talk at Williams is sponsored by the Williams Republicans Club. Despite difficulties in years past, the Williams Republicans Club is growing steadily as it encompasses both Liberal and Conservative elements of the Republican Party. This year, under the leadership of Chuck Hursch '80, the club is making an effort to provide forums for student expression and [illegible] at Williams.

— News Briefs —

JA Committee

Non-Junior Adviser members of the classes of '79, '80 and '81 who wish to serve as Advance Representatives to the J.A. Selection Committee should submit applications to the Dean's office no later than January 10th, 1979. Students who will be off campus during January should be certain to submit applications before leaving for Christmas break.

Applications should list class, residence, and residence freshman year. Applicants should also state their other time commitments, and their reasons for applying to the committee.

No application form is necessary. Committee meetings will begin in February.

Student course guide

Questionnaires will be in student mailboxes soon for the Spring edition of the Student Course Guide. As in past years, questionnaires will be collected by designated representatives in each of the residential houses and in freshman entires. Off-campus students will be asked to return their questionnaires to the mailroom in Baxter.

Some professors have agreed to allow distribution of the Guide in class where student response usually averages over 90 percent. Rick Moog, chairman of the Guide, asks that students take a few minutes to fill out a questionnaire for each of their courses. "The higher the response we get, the better a guide we can produce for the students."

The spring edition of the guide will be distributed to each house and to freshman entries rather than to each individual student. Additional copies will be on reserve in the library. Last year's guide was able to cover over 70 per cent of the courses offered on campus.

Truman Nominees

The College has nominated Debra Pearlstein and Grant Parker, both members of the present sophomore class, for the national competition called the Truman Scholarship. Winners of this prize, set up as the nation's official memorial to honor the 33rd President of the United States, receive a large scholarship to enable them to finish their undergraduate degree and go on to graduate study in a field which prepares them for a career in government service.

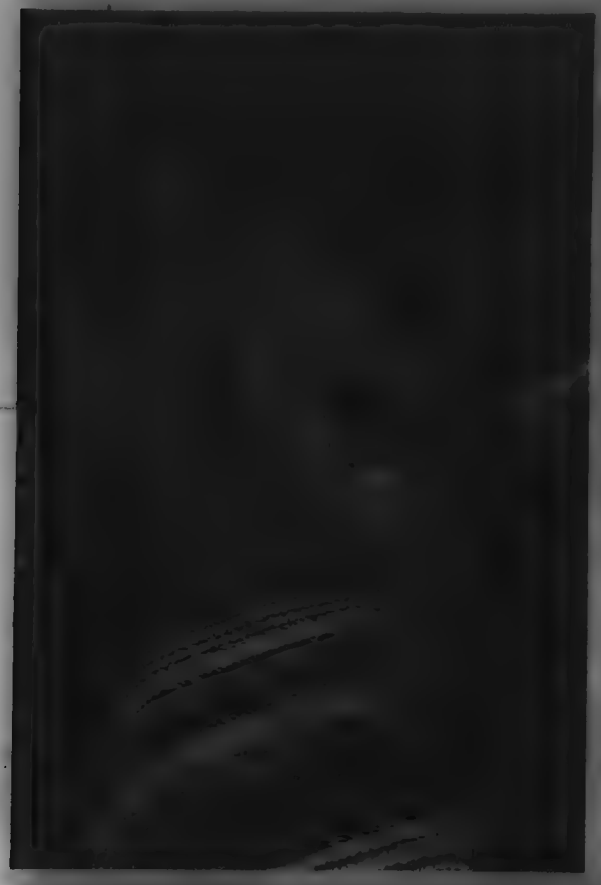
This Christmas vacation:

☐ Hang around the house.
☐ Fight crowds on ski slopes.
☑ Go to Europe.

$260 roundtrip. Reserved seats. No standing in line.

Take advantage of National Airlines' new "inter-National" fare from New York to Amsterdam this vacation.

This is not a stand-by fare. It's on a regularly scheduled National Airlines nonstop transatlantic flight. It's a guaranteed reserved roundtrip seat with inflight meal service. It's on a big, beautiful National wide-cabin DC-10 jet.



So why hang around the house when you can hang around the mellow "brown cafes"? Why fight crowds on the ski slopes when you can fight your way into the Paridiso or Voom, Voom, two of the wildest discos east of Studio 54? Come with us to Amsterdam. It's one of the most student-oriented cities in Europe; it's where English is everybody's second language.

National's "inter-National" fare is good on a substantial, but limited, number of seats on every National New York to Amsterdam flight starting December 13. Just pay for your tickets when you make your reservations. (There is a $3 federal departure tax, and $50 is non-refundable if you change or cancel reservations. Fare subject to change without notice.) See your Travel Agent now or call us at 1-800-327-2306.

The bigger we get, the brighter we shine.

Professionals perform Albee

Two of Edward Albee's award-winning plays, The Zoo Story and The American Dream, will be performed by a professional touring company on campus in January. This presentation is sponsored by Cap and Bells, Inc. The performance is one of many in the nationwide tour of Albee Directs Albee, a company of six actors performing in repertory eight of Albee's one-act plays, all directed by the author himself. The tour began in September of this year and has since been hailed as "spellbinding," "excellent," "an experience not-to-be-missed."

Albee, twice winner of the Pulitzer Prize for his playwriting abilities, has also gained recognition for his talents as a director. One of his more recent successes was the latest Broadway revival of Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf; perhaps his most famous play. This project, Albee Directs Albee, has as its aim a clear interpretation of the plays through the eyes of a man with the perspectives both of director and of playwright. Current reviews indicate that the process has been very successful.

Five actors will appear in the two plays to be presented at Williams; Wyman Pendleton, Stephen Rowe, Eileen Burns, Catherine Bruno, and Patricia Kilgarrif. The performances will be in the Adams Memorial Theatre at 8:30 P.M. on January 11, 1979.

Chorus to sing X-mas Vespers

The traditional Christmas service of lessons and carols will be held on Sunday, December 10 at 4 pm and 7:30 pm in Thompson Memorial Chapel. College chaplains Jane Geffken Henderson and Michael L. C. Henderson will conduct the service. The Williams Choral Society, under the direction of Prof. Kenneth Roberts, will sing Christmas music drawn from diverse periods and composers.

Stolzberg directs powerful "Dad"

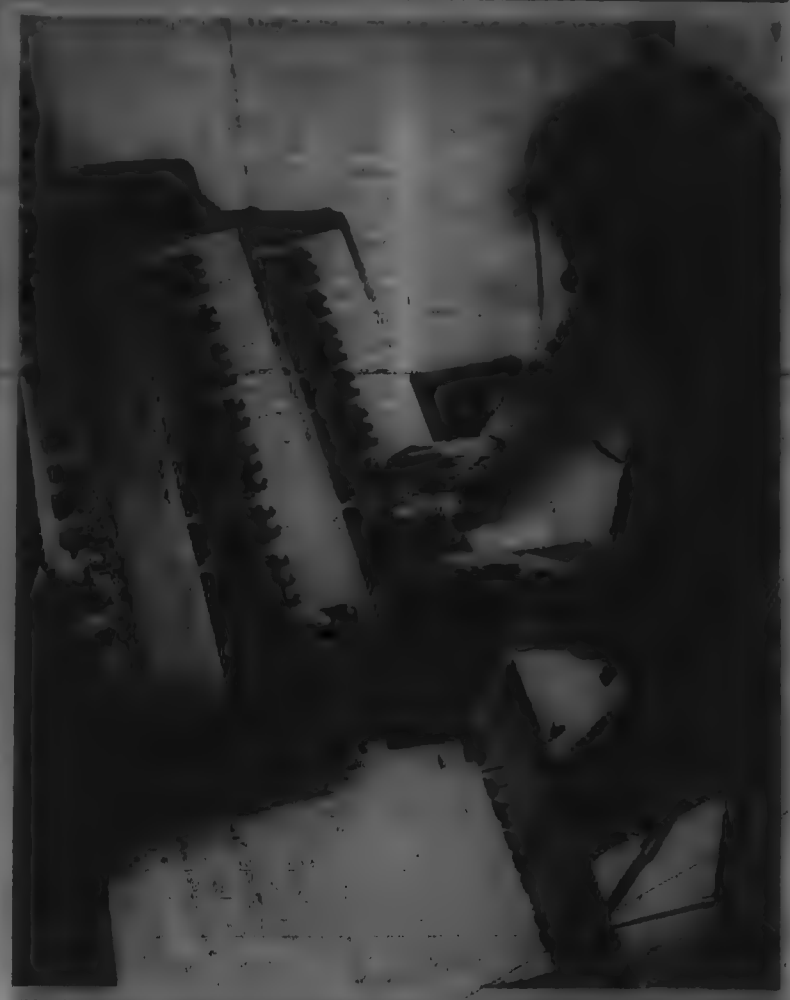
By Merle Rosenzweig

Jon Stolzberg, '79, directed a subtle yet powerful production of Oh Dad, Poor Dad, Momma's Hung You In The Closet and I'm Feeling So Sad. He successfully blended Arthur Kopit's terrifyingly absurd script with his own new interpretations.

The Jonathan Rosepettle of today, a Stolzberg addition to the play, is a writer looking back sixteen years to three crucial weeks of his life in He becomes a shadowy figure played by Charles Pardoe, '82, who moves around his memories with ease. The characters appear only as they affected him; their traits are exaggerated versions of the real people in his past.

His mother, Mrs. Rosepettle, is played by Susie Hayes, '81. She is a domineering woman who believes that life is a beautiful bird ready to let go its droppings on unwary heads. Her fanatical protection of her son Jonathan includes keeping him in a cage, literally when he was born, figuratively now, by locking the hotel door. Hayes manages to tread a fine line between the madness of an insane cackle and the horrible logic of a woman who hates men and life. Her finest moment occurs when she calmly invites her latest "conquest", (Charles Pardoe as the commodore, to view her late husband—stuffed and in the closet!

Mrs. Rosepettle's dominance over her son is challenged by the friendly neighborhood tramp, Rosalie. Played by Julie Nessen, '82, Rosalie is a self absorbed gallop whose sensuous interest is pieces by Jonathan's innocence. While Nesser's role is essentially two-dimensional as seen through Jonathan's older eyes, she does create a real lust and humor as tension between her selfish desires and his troubled questioning. The spontaneous disco-dance in the final scene is electrifying.



The central role, R. Hudson Plumb '81, is one of exaggerated and complex emotions. Plumb is the young Jonathan both secure and repressed by his domineering mother. He expresses his conflict in an almost puppy-dog attachment and violent stuttering at her glance. The arrival of Rosalie transforms him into an eager, energetic boy, who only slowly realizes that he must choose between the two women. The agony of the choice is apparent in his silent scream for help—and no one answers. First he frantically murders his mother's bizarre pets, and then in desperation, murders Rosalie, the other option. He has thrust himself into manhood by rejecting both women. But, as his slow fall through space indicates, what does he have left?

Stolzberg has created a drama between death and life. Both women represent a form of living non-existence; the mother through her rejection of all that is not pure, and Rosalie through her gluttony for life's sordid side. Jonathan's struggle for a different kind of life leaves Rosalie and every living thing his mother cared for, dead. But his struggle is not yet finished. His final pose is almost antagonic. Stolzberg, who intends to direct another play in the spring, leaves the play hanging with the question "What's the meaning of all this?"

Amidst this shattering drama, Oh Dad, is also a comedy. Stolzberg introduces three bellboys, Carlos Peay '80, Kevin Davis '81, and Bill Webster '79 whose solid sensibility sums up the madness in the play. They are permitted, as the other actors are not, to wonder about life-size human Venus Fly-traps, and growling piranha-fish. They shine revealing flashlights on Hayes although she pretends they don't exist. While each of the three defines his own character—Webster the laconical lieutenant, Davis the master of ironic inflection and Peay engagingly himself—they are a unity which prevents the play from becoming overly tense or melodramatic.

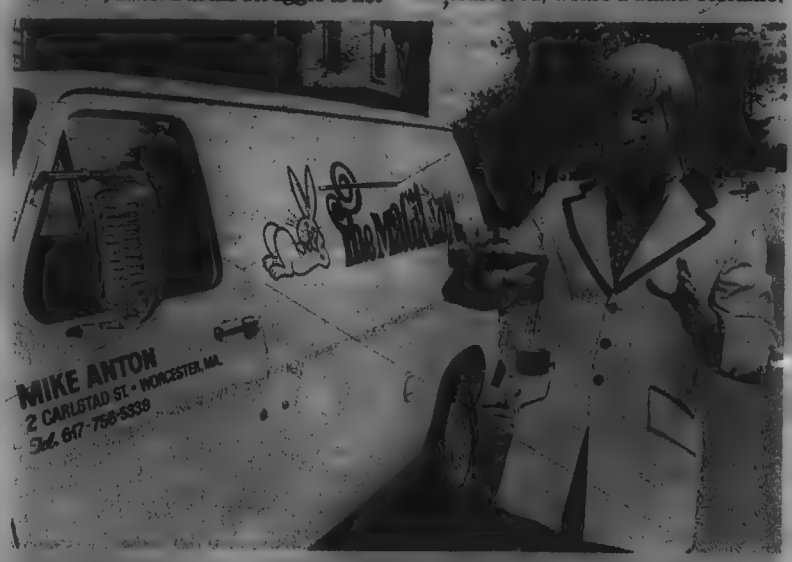
Perhaps one of the most telling and subtle moments of the play is the scene-change with the Venus Fly-traps. Trish O'Rourke '81, and Lisa Lufkin '81 encircle Plumb and pull him from side to side, revealing the internal agony he must resolve.

In this scene, as throughout the play, the music and lighting assist the depiction of the impulses tearing Plumb apart. Technical director Mitchell Katz, '79, used spots and blue lights to highlight the actors solitude and the unreality of the memories. Wardrobe managers Christel Albritton and Kathey Dread contribute to the distorted memories by their choice of costumes. The two women, vividly remembered, wear bright colors, while Pardoe, less well remembered, wears a bland costume.

Keyboardist Clyde Criner, '75, entertained a large audience at the Coffeehouse Saturday night.

Johnston's photos display strength

By Jim Lewandowski



Marcia Johnston's exhibit in the Dodd Student Art Gallery is one of the most impressive displays of student photography to be seen there in a long time. Although the prints date from last spring to the present, it is quite evident that this show is a culmination of several years of serious effort.

Subjects range from nudes in which Johnston quite ably portrayed the human body as an art form to Paris Street scenes. Also included is an exploration of various natural scenes in which a combination of delicacy and strength blend to produce points of exceptional detail and beauty.

The strongest print of the show is the final one entitled "Breath". Using a time exposure of one or two seconds, Johnston captured the subtle shadow of a breath on the nude body of a woman. Another exceptional print entitled "From the Beauborg", is a unique study in perspective in which Johnston explores the three dimensions of a row of Parisian houses viewed from above.

The show, as a whole is the product of a concentrated effort. The prints support each other in such a way as to make the whole greater than its parts. All the prints are the products of many hours in the darkroom, which is clearly evidenced by the surprisingly high level of technical competence. Meticulously mounted on heavy archival (See Alyce Kaprow for details) rag board, the prints appear to be of museum quality.

The over one hundred students and faculty members present at Johnston's opening received a true visual treat. The show will continue in the Dodd Gallery through December 11. The show is well worth taking a study break from Sawyer and all are urged to experience Johnston's superb photography.

Magician Mike Anton delighted the large crowd which jammed the Rathskellar Saturday night.

Trivia giants clash tomorrow

Wednesday night at midnight over a quarter of the campus will have their radios tuned to WCFM for the twenty-fifth semi-annual trivia contest. This semester's offering comes from Bomo, which won the right to put on the extravaganza after defeating two dozen other teams last spring.

Briefly, Bomo will ask a trivia question over the air. (For example: Who was cartoon character Tom Terrific's dog?) The team will then play an oldie from WCFM's record collection. ("Who's peaking out from under the stairway, Call her the name that's lighter than air ....") Participants have the duration of the song to call WCFM, answer the question (Manfred the Wonder Dog) and identify the title and artist of the song (Windy, by the Association).

"Trivia," the sage said, "is something you know and almost remember." Traditionally, questions come from sports, television, movies, advertising and Williamsiana, but the sixth realm of miscellany includes anything that evokes "megatons of nostalgia."

That collective brain which is Bomo, always puts on a good contest. This should be no exception.

Although dark horses always emerge, the old-timers predict a four way race.

Alphabet Soup (Perry House) won the contest last fall, and was therefore running rather than participating in the last contest. Insiders say that they are ready to win again.

Maximbs Drott (Bryant House) named itself after a disco and a construction crane. Last spring they finished second to Bomo. This year they maintain that they are out for a good time, (like last spring.)

Twelve O'Clock High (Wood House) always finishes near the top, but has yet to pull it off. They lost no one to graduation, but now have a bunch of seniors determined to win before leaving Williams.

Knights of Ni (Prospect House) is another power. They lost several starters to both graduation and Twelve O'Clock High, but one member claims that they have a freshman with a photographic memory who will more than make up for the loss.

On December 9 from 10 AM - 2 PM on the Mainstage of the Adams Memorial Theatre, there will be a sale of props and costumes from recent Williamstheatre productions.

Prepare for the holiday season—buy an elephant for your favorite professor!

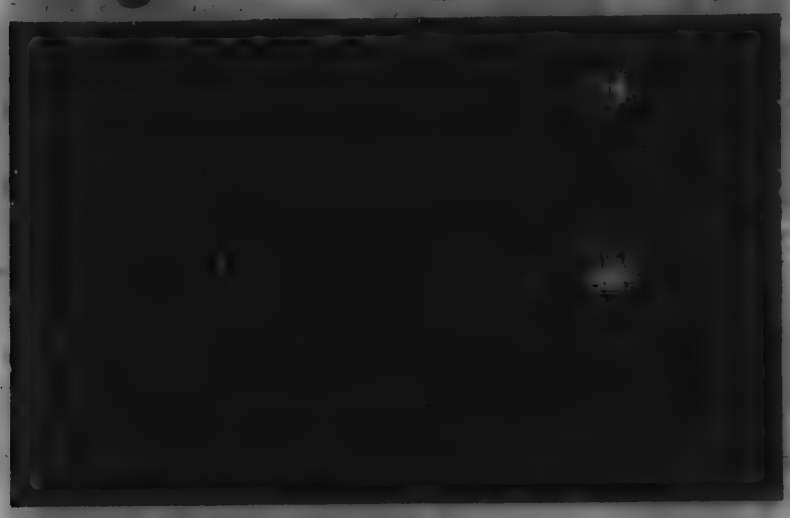
Lehman Service Council enhances the season to give

by Bruce Castle



Even though a cursory description of Williams College would fit a number of similar small New England liberal arts institutions, Williams seems to differentiate itself in certain important ways. Not only is Williams College socially prestigious (Record, Nov. 7) but also socially aware.

Amidst the avalanche of work there are some who realize the relative ease of student living and the need of the community which surrounds their academic world. The Lehman Service Council encompasses a far reaching range of programs from the Big brother-Big sister program to a lesser known group of nearly 20 students who work at the Berkshire Farm For Boys.

The Berkshire Home For Boys is a private institution run in Canaan, New York. The home is only thirty miles away from Williamstown but the distance is one more of psychological import than geographical significance. The boys at the Home range from the ages of twelve to seventeen and the average length of attendance is thirteen months. Boys are sent to the Home by local juvenile courts for various legal offences ranging from vagrancy or running away from home to armed robbery. The costs of running the Home are provided by the legal jurisdiction which sends funds from New York State, and private contributions.

The boys live in eleven cottages with about twenty to each cottage. All cottages have one fulltime staff member who is referred to as the cottage coordinator. The Home has no gates or fences and lock-up or isolation techniques are unheard of. A system of rewards replaces this modern method of containment. There is a public school on the grounds and intramural sports are a major extracurricular activity. Intramural teams play other public and private schools in the area.

The Williams men and women who travel to the Home once a week hope to break up the monotony of this routine. In some cases Williams women are a welcome relief from the all male environment of the Home. The activities students partake in range from playing pool or cards to simply spending time with the boys. What the boys all desire is a little companionship and a new friend. As Sue Ada points out, "It is good for both the kids and us. We all benefit from the experience." The boys are sometimes brought to Williams to watch sporting events or attend small private parties with the full time staff members who always accompany them when they leave the grounds. While runaways may be a problem it is not a serious one, and the recidivism rate is not high. Most volunteers feel that the boys leave the Home with a new perspective and a better attitude towards themselves and their place in society. The boys always look forward to these visits and the trips. The requests for beer, wine or dope are perennial but infrequent. It is the companionship and attention that they respond to. Why not think about helping others out? Now may not be a good time but there is always winter study.

Billsville co-op serves 120 families seeking alternatives to rising costs

by Sally Midgley

As an inexpensive alternative to retail stores, the Williamstown Coop, now in its fifth year, provides its members with a viable means of combatting steadily increasing food prices. The coop is now servicing approximately 120 households in the Williamstown area. "At this point we're at a high," comments David Fowle, '76, former coordinator of the coop.

Consumer cooperatives date back to 1844, when 28 English laborers pooled their savings of approximately $50 and began business with $20 worth of sugar, flour, meal, and butter. Since then, the idea of cooperatives has spread throughout the world. Although the concept is more developed in Europe, the United States has experienced a rise in the number of coops in the past few years.

Fowle pointed out that there have been "several coops in Williamstown which have come and gone over the years." The reason for their failure, he said, is lack of enthusiasm. "Coops die because they depend on the energies of the people who are coordinating and buying from them," he said. The present coop, however, is going strong. The last order was over $3,000, an amount which has doubled since November 1977.

Although the Williamstown Coop does not supply fresh produce, meat, or dairy products, it does offer a wide variety of grains, nuts, dried foods, peanut butter, and cheese. Lower prices, very high quality and interesting variety of organic and nonorganic goods lure consumers away from the often over-priced local stores such as the Slippery Banana and the Grand Union. Fowle cited an example of standard cheddar cheese prices: approximately $2.20 a lb. at the Grand Union, versus $1.50 a lb. through the coop. "Furthermore," Fowle added, "the coop cheese is infinitely superior in taste."

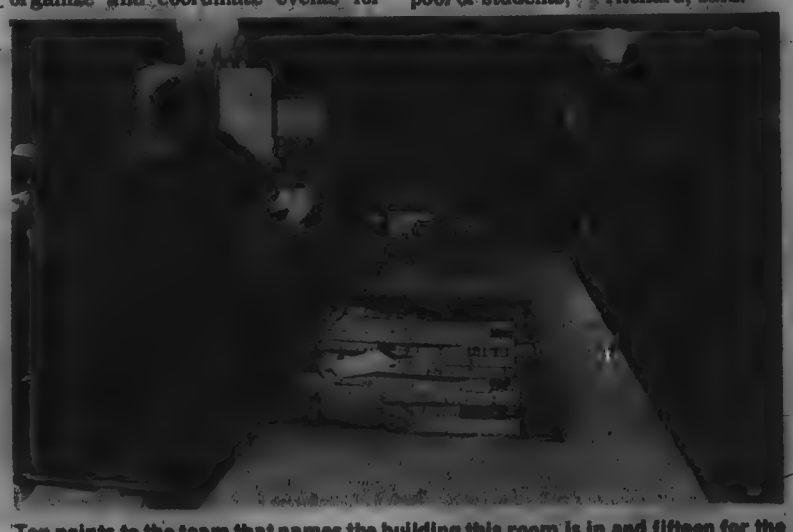
The basic idea of the cooperative is that, through the elimination of the middleman, direct purchasing from a distributor enables lower prices. Although the organization is based on the concept of shared work responsibilities, Fowle initiated a program to include non-working members into the cooperative also. Working members, making up the majority of coop participants, are required to do one "job" every two months. Jobs range from tabulating order forms to unloading the delivery truck, and usually involve a two to three hour time commitment. Working members pay a 5 per cent markup on their orders, which covers bags, truck fees, and other costs. To equalize workers and nonworkers, the nonworkers pay a slightly higher markup. The additional revenue, serving as operating capital, is used to build up the inventory and may eventually offset the costs of opening up a cooperative store for the members.

The Williamstown Cooperative buys its goods from the Western Massachusetts Cooperative, an anti-profit organization which serves as a "coop of coops." "While we do buy in some type of quantity," says Fowle, "even buying as an individual is worthwhile." A number of the cooperative patronizers are members of the Williams College community, Fowle remarked, naming Bev Stevens (coordinator), Kim Bruce (distribution manager), and Ed Epping (tabulator) as examples.

Development Office beefs up funds

A glance at the title "Development Office" on a second floor door in Jesup may arouse a passerby's curiosity. "Development Office" refers to the administrative branch of the college in charge of capital fund-raising for, specifically, the areas of endowment and building construction.

Over twenty years old, the office was created to meet the needs of the rapidly expanding college. As Williams' enrollment and subsequent building demands increased, the president and trustees were unable to devote enough time to appeal for financial support from foundations and agencies. Currently, Director of Development John Pritchard and seven co-workers are involved in various activities to raise money for the capital base. Building projects include the construction of Sawyer Library, the Lawrence extension, and the music building. Money in the endowment fund is used for scholarships and salaries.



The Office is in the midst of a major campaign begun in 1974 with the intent of raising 50 million dollars by 1980. So far little over 36 million dollars has accrued. Another area of fund-raising involves the Office's appealing to government agencies, private foundations, and corporations for support of curriculum projects in specific departments such as science and environmental studies.

In addition, the Development Office often serves as a liaison between faculty and contributors as it strives to match college needs with the particular interests of the funding organizations.

Pritchard and co-workers also organize and coordinate events for alumni visiting the campus. Class reunions, especially the twenty-fifth and fiftieth, and special weekends such as Homecoming require a great deal of planning and reservations for returning alumni.

Currently the Development Office is helping produce an audio-visual slide show depicting life at Williams. The show will be used in high school presentations and distributed to regional alumni associations.

"A continuation of the high quality of education depends on an excellent pool of students," Pritchard, said.

Letters to the Editor: continued

1. Homelands. While sensitive to "interim effects" and beneficial potentialities, Mr. Lewis leaves unstated the obvious: the homelands policy is a brilliant device for the effective disenfranchisement of the black majority in South Africa. It is aimed at pushing the black majority to the margins of South African society and at diverting energies by focusing them on incremental gains [illegible].

2. Racial groups. While it is important not to ignore the variety of ethnic groups in South Africa, such ethnic sensitivity must not be allowed to obscure the fact that the essential and brutal division is black versus white, with whites accorded a superior and blacks an inferior status.

3. Tenacity of the Afrikaaners and special character of their institutions. Undoubtedly, like all societies that of South Africa makes legitimate claims to the specific character of its people and institutions. However, along with an appreciation for local features it is helpful to remember that the minority Afrikaaners have erected a powerful political-economic order based in essence on the subordination and exploitation of the black majority. Their interest in defending such an order is clear enough without reference to their ideological self-justifications. There are abundant comparable examples elsewhere—although perhaps none with as uniquely pervasive a rescist dimension. Moreover, the mysteries of the behavior of South African institutions evaporates if their place in that order is empirically determined, i.e. labor unions are creatures of the state, with independent black unions illegal; the Dutch Reformed Church is a pillar of the Afrikaaner community, etc.

Let us not render matters unnecessarily complex.

Well informed action on the South African question demands attention to crucial features of the political landscape there that go unnoticed or at least unmentioned by Mr. Lewis. Let me make my point here with but two examples: 1. the existence of a continuous movement of black resistance, a résistance that is itself both tenacious and durable. South African blacks have had their heroes and martyrs from Albert Luthuli to Steve Biko. 2. the undoubted, crucial and sustaining support for the apartheid system that foreign investment provides, whatever its mildly reformist programs in employment practices.

Mr. Lewis own intimations as to appropriate government and individual actions it seems to me are based on a selective and in that sense, highly political view of the costs of social change in South Africa. He argues: "Because the costs of trying to impose change through force are so great it is essential to seek and to promote peaceful change." Two factors are overlooked here. First, the present social order maintains itself at the price of enormous suffering and dying by the black majority, however conceiving those costs might be in the statistics for black infant mortality, industrial deaths, forced relocation, and accidental deaths in jail. Any judgment based on the anticipated violence of forced change, if it is to be more than a half truth, must weigh that expected cost in human suffering against the violence already built into the present order. It is in such a calculus that the difficult moral and political judgment comes.

I can only agree with Mr. Lewis that the Nationalist Party is unerringly choosing actions that further disintegrate S.A. society. I can only second his plea that we stay informed and involved. But I would urge different actions:

1. increasing pressures in all appropriate forums for American disengagement from complicity in South African apartheid;

2. active support for black South African resistance, through human rights, church or political groups.

Assoc. Prof. Raymond Baker,
Cairo, Egypt

Professor Lewis

Apparently I have been more than usually obscure in my "Observations," if my colleague in Cairo can misinterpret some of them so fundamentally. In particular, the assertion that I have "absorbed uncritically the rationale for apartheid" is not even deserving of rebuttal.

On Mr. Baker's point No 1, I did not think it necessary to state the obvious. On No. 2, when any change violent or not, takes place in South Africa, the ethnic diversity will be a major factor conditioning how that change develops. On No. 3, the point regarding Afrikaaners is that all major instruments of power are held or directed by this unsually tenacious group. This simple reality cannot be ignored, as it is by some external observers or advocates.

I agree that the black resistance movement is both tenacious and durable. I do not agree that all foreign investment provides "undoubted, crucial, and sustaining support" for apartheid. To lump all foreign investment into one category grossly over-simplifies reality and is not helpful in ascertaining the best means of promoting change in South Africa.

Finally, my own weighing of the costs of violent change as against those of slower but more peaceful change is quite clear from my statement. Mr. Baker apparently weighs them differently; this obviously leads to different conclusions as to desirable actions by American individuals, institutions, and our government. My views are of course political, as are his and so, I should think, are all matters of choice on important issues.

Maintenance Tax

To the editor:

Regarding the House Maintenance Tax controversy:

1. The HMT provides a significant fraction of each upper class house's social funds. Being collected and distributed on what is generally a democratic basis (overlooking the ultimate source), the HMT gives each house member a certain amount of inherent money to be activities of his-her house, thus contributing to house participation and unity. These results are desirable, to a degree, so the HMT should be supported.

2. Presently, students living off-campus are billed for the HMT, though they live far from the houses with which they are affiliated and are unlikely to derive any substantial benefit from their contributions to the HMT. Consequently, the College has ruled that each house refund the HMT of those students affiliated with it that live off-campus. The idea of a refund seems fair.

3. The share of the HMT that a house receives, however, is independent of the number of off-campus students affiliated with that house. So it seems unfair that the houses should have to refund the HMT on this basis.

I suggest that the business office deduct the HMT from the term bills of those students who live off-campus. As far as I know, this should be as simple as deducting room and board expenses. And it would surely eliminate alot of hassle and inequity, while preserving an important institution, the HMT.

Response to Read

To the editor:

I would like to respond to Christopher Read's letter of last week. Specifically, he raises two points about college radio policy which I would like to dispute. I paraphrase him on these issues.

1) "Political recordings should not be goon of self-satisfaction". Is this not a meaningless statement? All music is political: the value system embodied in a song is its politic, whether broadly or expressly stated. So, what I hear is "Politics which I don't like shouldn't be the tools of someone else's satisfaction". We must fight this myopic maxim. Perhaps when enough challenging politics are given them, the more insulated students will see the validity of "up against the wall motherfucking whitey" views. Some wallpaper which Chris sees will never be found- his search will only uncover music whose politics are more in line with his own.

2) "A student opinion should not find expression on the radio". Again, I hear not offense, but whining. Students' views and their dreams are always present in their choice of music, their lifestyle, their clothes. They are frequently confronting their views on the Berkshire County every day, by the DJ's choice to play Billy Joel over Gil Scot-Heron or Bartok. The general acceptance of (striving for?) such lifestyles as are glamorized in Billy Joel and his peers, leads us to think there is no opinion present.

I put it that every day, unchallenged views of this type are expressed, and that this leads to an ignorant and selfish many. We need to expand, don't we? No one has yet cornered the correct or complete set of answers. I want them to be expressed—I came to learn.

Suggestions for Council

To the editor:

I thank you for four recent copies of your newspaper. I know not why you have sent these to me other than perhaps my function as President of the Williams Class of 1981. Whatever the case, after reading several articles on the problems confronting the College Council, I have the following reaction.

I would suggest that those students who serve on faculty-student committees elect one of their number to meet once a month with the College Council, with vote, to bring issues before the College Council being considered by their committee. In turn, they could carry concerns of the broader based College Council back to their committees for consideration and discussion.

The Council at its other regular weekly meetings could continue the discussion of matters most pertinent to the general student body but they would also have an opportunity to make input on those faculty-student committees which impact on specific areas of their college life.

I would also suggest that rather than having an amendment to the College Council Constitution to permit the recall of the entire Council it would make more sense to allow ten per cent of the students to ask for a referendum vote on any issue voted on by the Council. This would give the students an opportunity to overturn votes taken by the Council without throwing off the duly elected members of the Council—it seems to me that you would then get into a battle of personalities rather than issues.

One has to admire those who volunteer to serve on committees and the College Council at some sacrifice of their own free time. Many who are the most ardent "second-guessers" are often those who are too busy to serve as elected representatives or volunteers on house or college committees.

Sincerely,
[illegible] '81

Swimmers swamp Amherst in promising opener

by Peter Howd

In what many expected to be a tough meet for a graduation-riddled Williams team, the Eph natators paraded their way to a convincing 68-46 triumph over arch-enemy Amherst in Muir Pool Saturday. Versatile and determined upperclassmen and inspired freshmen blew the Lord Jeffs out of the pool and managed to win a few races as well.

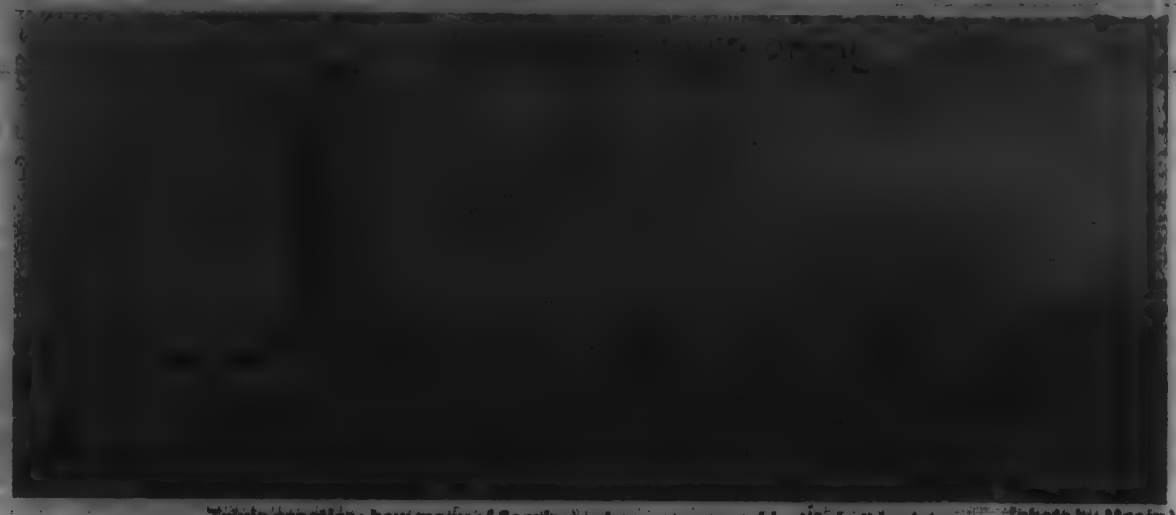
Williams rose to the occasion immediately as Don Cameron led off a victorious medley relay team in a blazing 54.8 backstroke leg. Senior Sean McDermott extended the lead in the breaststroke with a personal best of 1:01.9 and James "French Fry" Goff demoralized Amherst by leaving their All-American flyer wondering whose wake he swallowed. Dave Amlicke clinched the win with a fine anchor leg.

Bill Kelly copped both diving events in the Ephs' victory over Amherst Saturday.

John Adams increased the Ephs' margin as he nabbed second in the gruelling 1000 freestyle. Brothers Tom and Bill Beckett finished one-two in the 50 free with identical times of 22.9, leaving at least one spectator trying to tell them apart. Freshman Mike Regan and sophomore Keith "Swill" Berryhill combined to sweep the 200 free, recording times of 1:50.5 and 1:51.7, the two fastest pre-Christmas times in that event in Williams history.

With Toddy Piper no longer at Williams, Peter "Two Ton" Howd was finally able to win the IM, but had to overcome a strong challenge by his very little brother, freshman Tom.

Divers Bill Kelly and Geoff Benson took first and third to give much needed strength in the required diving event. Bill, who dove in the national championships last spring, performed very well at this early point in the season.



The second set of swimming events saw Amherst stage a mild rally. Gordon Cliff and French Fry Goff finished second and third in the 200 fly, followed by an Amherst sweep in the 100 free. In the 200 back co-captain DC Cameron and the incredibly versatile Dave Amlicke finished two-three. Freshman enthusiast Bill Hymes attempted to stage a counter-rally in the 500 free, but faded after 350 yards of heavy sprinting and had to settle for third just behind 2nd place Tex Berryhill and an unidentifed Amherst swimmer.

Brian McDermott got Williams back on track in the 200 breast with an impressive come-from-behind victory bolstered by Jay "1000 Yard" Thomas's excellent attempt to break the American record in the 50 breast. Unfortunately, Jay forgot that a race was only half the race.

Bill Kelly easily won the optional diving with a sobering performance that clinched the meet for Williams. The relay team of Peter Howd, Don Cameron, Dave Amlicke, and Mike Regan rounded the meet with a going away 400 Free Relay victory in the time of 3:30.3.

Coach Sam, who as always was his jovial self, said that the team's hard training this fall and its "carnival approach" to swimming accounted for the win.

Williams will travel to UConn tomorrow afternoon for what can always be counted on to be a close meet.

Marks fall as women drown Jefflets

The Women's Swim Team swept eight of fourteen events, set four new college records and qualified one member for the AIAW nationals next spring as the Ephwomen whipped Amherst 86-36 in their season opener Saturday afternoon.

Co-captain of the team Karon Walker broke two of her own Williams standards as she won the 100 freestyle, 55.9 and the 50 butterfly, 27.3. Both times qualified Walker for the 1979 nationals in Reno, Nev. this March.

Freshmen Laurie Vuylstecke and Barbara Good split top honors in the breaststroke events, each winning one and setting a college mark in the process. Good took the 50 Breast in 34.0, while Vuylstecke smashed Sue Tuttle's 1978 standard by 4.5 seconds in the 100 yard event. Good took second in the 100 and Vuylstecke took second in the 50. Good also won the 100 IM in an excellent early-season time of 1:06.3, with Vuylstecke right behind her, 1:06.4.

Another outstanding freshman prospect, Katherine Hartley, managed to take the 100 Fly in a quick 1:03.6 and the 200 Free, 2:08.7, in spite of a virus which dogged her all weekend. Katherine Pearsall, perennial favorite in the 500 free against Amherst, won that event handily and took second in the 200. Fellow soph Linda Reed copped the 50 backstroke, and co-captain, four-year veteran of the team Nina Murphy ran away with the 100 yard event of that stroke, Senior Laura-Ellen Marrack placed second in both backstroke events.

Amherst picked up points in the 200 Free Relay, the 50 Freestyle and the Diving event, but couldn't manage to mount a strong attack against the superiorly conditioned Ephwomen.

"The lineup was perhaps not as strong as it could have been," captains Walker and Murphy told the Record. Murphy believes that the strong, young team, revitalized this year by a particularly strong freshman contingent, could be a top three or four contender in this season's New England championships.

The Ephwomen expect to become Little Three Champs in their second meet of the season tonight when they will meet another young team, Wesleyan, in Muir Pool at 7:00.

Guards lead hoopsters to tourney 2nd

by Mary Kate Shea

The Men's Basketball Team opened its 1978-79 season with a second place finish in the Whaling City Invitational Tournament at Connecticut College last weekend.

In its first contest of the tournament Williams took on a Connecticut College team that was vastly improved over the Camel squad the Ephs saw in Williamstown last winter.

Guards Gerry Kelly (20 points) and Andy Straka (18 points) led the Williams scorers. Straka's outside shooting combined with the inside work of senior Sterling Kinsale gave the Ephs a 40-33 halftime lead over Connecticut College. Straka hit 12 of his points in the first half while Kinsale contributed eight of his 10-point total.

The second half saw the Williams' lead increase to almost 20 points midway through the period, then fluctuate between 10 and 15 points until the final buzzer ended the game with the score 71-58 in Williams' favor. The Ephs outscored the Camels 39-33 in the second half largely on the point production of Kelly and senior forward Jeff Brinker. Kelly combined several drives and outside shots with eight successful free throws for 16 points in the second half. Eight of Brinker's 12 points on the night came in the second period.

In the game before the one between Williams and Connecticut College on Friday night the Coast Guard Academy, winner of the first three Whaling City Invitational Tournaments, squeaked past Manhattanville College 38-33. The Williams win set the stage for the final game on Saturday afternoon.

In the 66-47 loss to the Coast Guard Williams missed the rebounding and inside shooting abilities of co-captain Matt Spangler who was unable to play due to a preseason knee injury and sophomore Dean Ahlberg who suffered a bruised tailbone in the first game of the tournament.

The Coast Guard led at the half by just a four-point margin, 24-20, but the Bears dominated the boards and turned on the offense to outscore Williams 42-27 in the second period.

Combining a fast break attack with a more patient, wide offense designed to spread the Ephs defense, the Coast Guard was able to score many of its second half points on lay-ups. The Bears offensive tactics worked as they connected on 85 per cent of their shots in the second period.

Straka and Brinker contributed eight and seven points respectively in the Ephs' effort to stay in the game in the second half, but by the midway point in the period the Coast Guard's lead stood at 11 points. For the remainder of the half the Bears controlled the game, increasing their lead to as much as 22 points with one minute left in the game.

Straka, who was named to the All-Tournament team for his play in the two-day event, was Williams' high scorer against the Coast Guard with 12 points. Brinker had nine points and Kelly, Kinsale and freshman Jeff Fasulo each contributed six points.

The Ephs open their regular season with a home game against Norwich tonight at 8:00.

Squash lacks experience but improves daily

Last year's squash team won a fourth consecutive Little 3 title, compiled an 8-3 record, and earned a No. 5 national ranking. Lost from that team through graduation are Captain and No. 1 Arnie Cogswell and 4 seniors—over half of the starting lineup.

However, Coach Sean Sloane claims he is looking forward to the new season; "Our new players have the physical ability and the desire, and their skills are improving daily. Practices have been excellent and spirit is high; all we lack is experience, but our two matches this week should give us a valuable start in the right direction, especially if we can overcome first-match jitters."

Captain Martin Goldberg will lead the Ephmen against Tufts on Tuesday (3:30) and Navy on Thursday (12 noon) from the No. 1 position. Goldberg carries a lifetime dual match record of 27-3 into his senior year, but one of those losses came in his first intercollegiate match, against against . . . Navy! Does he remember? Does he thirst for revenge? Is the Pope Catholic? Also anxious for wins against both Tufts and Navy will be junior Chip Lindquist, recently ousted from No. 1 by Goldberg.

Seniors Jon Saunders, Mitchell Reiss, and Peter Thomsen hold down the 2, 4, & 5 slots and there promises to be heavy competition between them this week for the coveted "MBG" award ("Most Beautiful Gallery").

Juniors Wally Miller and Mark Lanier lead the rookies at Nos. 6 & 7, while Senior Bill Whitney and Freshman Flash Kenyon Miller round out the lineup at Nos. 8&9. Senior Doug Gernert and Junior Will Ballew are pressing the starters closely, while Juniors Jon Hammond and John McGovern and sophomores Matthew Bronfman, Steve Colt, Dave Minus, and Clark Wagner will form the heart of two JV teams to play Middlebury (4:30) and Vassar (5:30) on Tuesday.

In a disgusting display of depth, Coach Sloane plans to field 26 different players for the three matches scheduled Tuesday. When queried as to the coach's rationale for fielding 9 different teams on the same day, when all other participating teams will select with the same 9 players for all 3 matches, Seniors Saunders, Reiss, and Thomsen all replied, in unison, "When you've got it, flaunt it!"

Ken Miller and Will Ballew will be the contenders, along with Captain Martin Goldberg and junior Chip Lindquist on the '79 squash team.

(photo by Mason)

Rookie manager Jody Tabner, also slightly nervous about her first start, suggested that the number might reach 27 if Baloo can master the reverse corner by Tuesday. Namesake Will Ballew observed that "he's a good dog, but his return of serve is still a little shaky and he blockers when he's ahead—but we're training him to bite any Navy players who act up on Thursday."

Thursday, in case you were unaware, marks the 39th anniversary of Pearl Harbor. Will the Navy sink again? Be at the squash courts at 12 noon when Navy (National ranking last year: No. 6) and Williams collide!

Bomo seems to have enjoyed running last semester's Trivia contest, in which Maximus Drott emerged as victor. (photo by Tokar)

Trivia climaxes with Maximus effort

by Eric Schmitt

The 25th Semi-Annual Williams Trivia Contest, won by Maximus Drott December 7, signified not only the conclusion of first semester classes, but illustrated the extent to which trivia has reached a quasi-institutional status at Williams.

"The contest's appeal lies in its timing," Mitch Katz '79, a member of the contest's host team, Bomo, said. "After a tough semester, and just before finals, a frenzied eight hour (midnight to 8 a.m.) nostalgia contest is incredibly satisfying."

Trivia Night, a regular event for 14 years, brings together friends, united only at trivia time, for what Katz describes as eight hours of performing the "tip of the tongue phenomenon." Trivia "friendships" tend to form in the freshmen year and consequently result in entry associated teams—as in the case of Maximus Drott, many of whose players are Lehman alumni.

A team's organization varies from small, nine-member groups to the sprawling 60-member Drott, best described by Drott member Vic Zerbino '79 as "organized chaos." The larger teams tend to have established reputations and, in Bomo's case, a ritualistic aura that borders on what Katz calls the "metatrivial."

"We are always psyched for trivia," Katz said, "but the intensity usually increases just before a contest. Last year, we had some people at the phones, ready to go, 24 hours before the contest started. We would have almost a religious service before the contest, culminating in a rendition of the 'Gilligan's Island' theme song."

While each powerhouse team—Bomo, Maximus Drott and Alphabet Soup are the acknowledged Big Three—occasionally comes up with a trivia ringer, most questions, according to Katz, are answered through the teamwork of three or four people "jogging each other's memory."

While a good trivia contest constitutes having "something for everybody," according to Bomo member Bob Berry '79, many players simply dial phones, run "munchy runs," or, as Zerbino said, act as "gusto" people, keeping team members awake.

As winner of the spring '78 contest, Bomo became the sponsor for this fall's classic. "That meant during the summer everytime I came across a good question, I'd write it down," Katz said. "When we (the team) got back in the fall, we had three meetings to discuss questions and actually organize a contest."

Two days after hosting the contest, in which 35 teams tallied points—Drott, Soup, Twelve O'Clock High, Little Rascules, and Magilla's Wife achieving top honors—Bomo had the opportunity to compete in Amherst's trivia contest.

"Playing in a contest is a lot more fun than hosting one," Katz said. "There's a lot more running around and more satisfaction answering questions than giving them."

Six Williams trivia enthusiasts (five Bomo-ites, one Souper) combined with three Amherst friends to win the Amherst contest for the second time in two years.

"They play a totally different game," Berry said. "While the

The Ad-Hoc Working Group of the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) has proposed to dramatically revise the non-major part of the curriculum, Julia McNamee '80 announced in her report to College Council Thursday night. She emphasized that the suggestions, purely tentative, would not affect any students now on campus.

Under the proposed changes, freshmen would be required to take a two semester, non-disciplinary, uniform syllabus "Great Works" course. In addition, those who demonstrated deficiency in basic skills would receive remedial tutoring.

The proposal would also require all students to elect two semesters of a foreign language or a foreign culture, a lab science, a mathematics course, and a course dealing with science and mathematics as expressions of human values.

Reporting on the December faculty meeting, Ted Tucci '79 announced that the Winter Study Program Review Committee has endorsed Winter Study with three recommendations. These recommendations include introducing a limited grading system; lessening the faculty work load by requiring that professors teach one of two, rather than two out of three years; and requiring another review of Winter Study within three years.

Tucci also reported that the CEP will require students to submit a statement explaining why they want to go abroad. The faculty decided to uphold the present policy on post-season play, while including grievance procedures in the 1979-80 Student Handbook, Tucci stated.

John Duffield '80 raised the issue of whether the Council could take any action which would stop the decline in minority applications and enrollment. To investigate this problem, the Council decided to invite a member of the Black Student Union and Admissions Director Phil Smith to the next Council meeting. The Council plans to present its ideas on the subject before its meeting with the Trustees in January.

The Council discussed upcoming student referendums. On January 23 and 24 the student body will vote on a proposal which would create a mechanism for dissolving Council. Acceptance of the proposal would not spell the elimination of the present Council, only the possibility of the student body doing so in the future. The second referendum, which will be the subject of a forum at Dodd House on January 15, concerns a review of the College Council constitution.

The Council drew up a list of problems concerning residential housing which will be presented to Dean O'Connor later in the year. Concerns included the use of house maintenance tax, house autonomy, distribution of minority groups, house diversity, off-campus and cooperative housing, and the prevention of vandalism. In an attempt to make houses more responsible to their members, Katie Phillips '80 suggested that a dean who receives a complaint from a student concerning house affairs should meet with both the house president and the student about the complaint.

Chris Jenkins '80, acting president in Bronson Fargo's absence, reminded members of the classes of '79, '80, and '81 who wish to serve as at-large members of the JA Selection Committee to submit applications to the Dean's Office no later than 4 p.m. on Wednesday. Jenkins also announced that the Council meetings for January will be held Wednesdays at 7:30 in Greylock C.

. . .studies overhaul as offered by CEP

The Ad-Hoc Working Group's proposals derive from the College faculty's goals for the non-major segment of the liberal arts curriculum. These aims include basic skills in English and numerical reasoning, knowledge of "Great Works," and exposure to non-Western and pre-19th century cultures.

Additional aims include exposure to a foreign language, and an understanding of modern science and mathematics as expressions of human values. Course selection should be varied but include some form of common academic experience. The faculty further believe that the relationship between these goals and the requirements should be clear.

The Committee's study of the classes of 1975-78 revealed that 54 per cent of the students took no foreign language courses. Fifty-nine percent of Division II and 61 percent of Division III students took no foreign language. To remedy the situation, the committee suggested that the College require either that students demonstrate competence in a foreign language or that students receive exposure to a foreign culture by taking a two-semester course.

The committee also found that 7 percent of Division I and II students never took a lab science course or a math course. The committee recommended that students satisfy the two Division III courses requirement only by lab science or mathematics courses.

The committee questioned how systematically all students confront "Great Works," as 38 percent of the class of 1978 (and 47 percent of

OCC holds publishing panel

by Katie Springer

Students interested in any aspect of publishing, from writing books to editing newspapers, will have the opportunity to meet with some of the most successful professionals in these fields on Thursday and Friday.

Sponsored by the Office of Career Counseling, the program is entitled "Pathways to Publishing: the World of Books, Magazines and Newspapers". It is designed to inform students about a wide range of career opportunities, through panel presentations and informal discussion periods.

Thursday's program will focus on careers in publications with a panel discussion at 7:30 p.m. in the Dodd House living room. Sharing their experiences will be Charles Whittingham, publisher of Life Magazine; Porter Bibb, publisher of Us Magazine; Lorraine Gracey, fashion copywriter for Vogue; Stan Swinton, international vice president of Associated Press; and a New York Times staff writer. A question and answer period will follow the presentations.

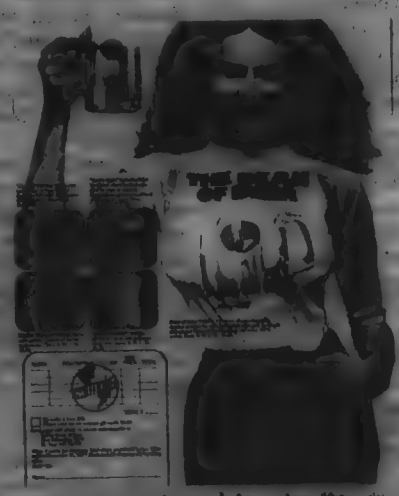
On Friday the emphasis will shift to book publishing with a panel discussion in Weston Language Center at 10 a.m. Speakers will include Patrick Filley, senior editor of Times Books; Lindy Hess, editorial manager of Doubleday and Dolphin Books; Dan Okrent, packager and former editor in chief at Harcourt Brace and Jovanovich; Michael Baxendale, publisher of Optimum Books, and David Hartwell, editor of the Science Fiction and Fantasy Department of Pocketbooks.

Among the topics for Friday's discussion will be Filley's "Breaking in at the Bottom" and Okrent's "On Being a One Man Publishing House".

Beginning at 1:30 p.m. Friday the guests will be available to answer individual questions and critique portfolios at the Office of Career Counseling. There will also be a Writers Workshop to allow students to speak informally with a group of talented creative writers. The workshop will begin at 3 p.m. at Career Counseling.

Male, female roles to be examined by panel

A discussion of Male-Female Identities tomorrow night at 7:30 in Driscoll Hall begins a series of informal presentations of Male-Female Issues. Sponsored by the Dean's Office, the Chaplains, and several other groups, the panels will question the "traditional definitions and expectations" placed on the sexes by our culture, explained Daniel O'Connor, Dean of the College.



If you stand somewhere between these two extremes...

"Gender identity" characterizes the basic theme of the series. "Various cultures put different constraints, limits and expectations on what it is to be male or female," O'Connor said. "They assign varying roles to the sexes and have different expectations of how the sexes should relate to each other." He suggested that "it's time to begin formulating and testing our attitudes and plans for self-development."

The topic arose in response to no specific event, although the fervor over sexism during the fall of 1977 illustrated the need to explore the issues. The next two forums will discuss Male-Female roles and Male-Female relationships.

The other participants include the College's clinical psychologists and representatives from the Career Counseling Office. In addition, various student representatives, from such organizations as the Student Support Group, Peer Health Counseling the Feminist Alliance, and the Housing Committee will express their views.

...you may not want to miss the upcoming series of male-female [illegible].

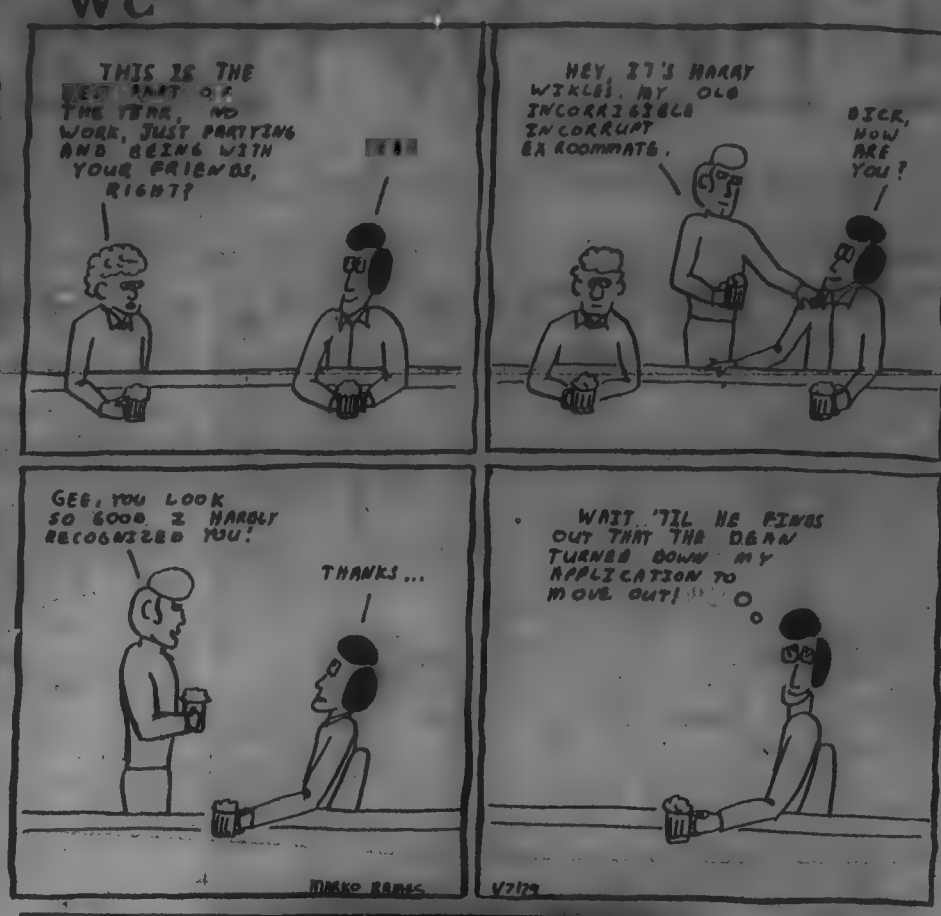
Editorial Policy

In this, its first issue under new management, the Record would like to restate its editorial policy. As an information center and a forum for ideas in the College community, we welcome the opinions of students, faculty, staff, alumni, and other interested persons. We will attempt to stimulate discussion through editorials and solicited commentary on controversial topics.

Editorials, printed in large type on page two, appear in one of two formats. If unsigned, they are written by the editor, have been approved by the editorial board, and represent the opinion of the Record. Initialed editorials also represent the opinion of the Record and are approved by the editorial board, but are written by another editorial board member or a department editor.



Unsolicited material intended for publication may be directed either towards the Outlook Department or as a Letter to the Editor. We require that all such material be typewritten and signed by the author. The deadline for a Tuesday issue is 2:00 p.m. Sunday.

The Outlook page will try to deal with a range of national and campus political issues. It cannot treat all the facets of every issue; space and the availibility of writers limit in-depth coverage. If readers feel that a necessary view has been omitted, well-written, signed articles will be considered for publication.

The Record reserves the right to refuse to print unsolicited material, the right to respond in an editorial or an editor's note, and the right to edit material for length.

Readers may not respond to a Letter to the Editor in the same issue unless the author of the letter has been notified prior to publication.

The Record will continue to be published on a weekly basis in order to further increase the scope and depth of its reporting.

In Other Ivory Towers

Kevin Eischner won Miami (Ohio) University's first annual freshman beard growing contest last month when his six-week old beard received highest marks on a scale of 1-10 for softness, coloring, fullness, length and overall appearance from female judges. A special reporter for The Observer at Case Western Reserve University said although 1100 men were challenged to take part in the contest, only eleven remain for the final judging. "While many started out with good intentions, most never made it to the finish . . . One freshman quit when the little hairs on his chin started to itch . . . Others gave up hope when their parents came to visit on Parents' Weekend . . ."

Hundreds of students at Oberlin gathered at the Wildern Bowl in front of the college library just before finals last semester to take part in "Communal Moan," a mass exercise in primal scream therapy organized and directed by conductor Pribyn Gregory. The moan, which was punctuated by wails and piercing screams, lasted about twenty minutes.

The Editor of The Daily Cougar at the University of Houston was chastised last month by a ten-member disciplinary committee for printing a photograph of a man exposing himself at an off-campus art festival. The Committee said that her action reflected "bad editorial judgment."

Lori Korleski, the editor in question, said, "The newspaper has printed plenty of nude photos before, but they've all been of women. I think the campus community reacted like that because this picture was of a man."

She did, however, regret the decision to print. "I wouldn't do it again. It didn't get the point across."

99's are 'hit or miss'

To the Editor:

In light of the fact that grades will soon be distributed and in in response to Dean O'Connor's vow to reverse the current upward trend in the Williams GPA, we would like to offer the following suggestions.

Grade inflation is a classic example of the economic theory of externalities, in that students perceive only the private benefits of each additional "A" while not paying the costs which they impose on others by diluting the value of such a good grade. A combined tax-rebate system would easily solve the problem. Students receiving grades below the established median, say "C", would get massive tuition rebates. To finance this plan, those earning "C-plus" or above would be forced to pay graduated GPA taxes.

Though the above plan would be irresistible to our friends in Fernald, other departments might prefer other schemes. Poli. Sci. could circulate Nixonian "Enemy Lists" targeting those students earning high grades for harassment, and could hold neo-McCarthian public hearings to expose the traitors. The Psychology Dept. might choose to condition students, a la Pavlov, to expect a piece of red tender meat in exchange for adequately low test performance. However, this proposal might strain Food Service's capabilities to the limit . . .

Chemistry could launch intensive research into intelligence - stifling drugs. Since such drugs seem to already exist, it might be easier to simply reorganize Chem. 101-102 as Advanced Mixology, with mandatory cocktail parties preceding all exams. Admissions could effect great changes by two simple policy changes. First, instead of seeking the 'Scholar Athlete', Williams might look for the 'Athlete-Scholar' (e.g. Dumb Jock). Dartmouth and Amherst seem to be succeeding with this plan (if only they could hold on to the ball . . .). Second, current admissions standards could be altered so that only a small fraction of the Freshman class would show any academic promise.

Lastly, the Math Dept. could construct the theoretically optimal grade distribution curve. Computer programs would then be devised to introduce 'random' correction factors to grades earned that do not meet college criteria. Since this is the means by which upperclass housing is assigned, there is no reason why grades could not be similarly [illegible].

Perhaps students should be required to fail at least one WSP as a major requirement, thus increasing their academic burden in the following semester and bringing all grades down. And since WOOLF trips seem to be the highlight of the Freshman year, they should be extended to last at least one month. Participating Freshmen would be hopelessly behind and chances for even the shakiest C-minus would be questionable.

As a combined attack on the GPA and energy problems, we suggest closing the library and all classrooms at 8 p.m., and making all final exams self-scheduled within a six hour period. This would save six days of heating and insure insufficient time for those of us with more than two exams.

As a stopgap, "Separation for High Scholarship" should be considered . . .

We feel that these measures constitute a constructive, if not too "zealous" attempt to restore mediocrity to its proper place in the Williams community. Indeed, through the efforts of the Associated Colleges of New England (ACNE), perhaps everyone in collegiate New England will be able to painlessly enjoy a more blemished academic record.

down with GPA's

To the Editor:

In contributing to the recent crusade to improve Winter Study, this year's WSP Committee managed only clumsy progress. This fall the committee members reviewed student 99 proposals more critically than they had in the past. This in itself is not a bad approach. Strangely, however, the committee waited until after the students were rejected to inform them of the criteria for evaluation. The criteria should have been made available prior to the writing of the proposals, rather than handed to the students as a postmortem epitaph. As it stands now, submitting a 99 is a hit or miss proposition.

Even less useful than the committee's timing were the criteria cited in the rejection letter: "1) Educational value. 2) Feasibility. 3) Focused statement outlining clearly the purpose and objectives of the project." Surely all the projects ought to be focused, feasible, and of educational value. But could any group of people agree on the meaning of these words, or their applicability to a particular project? If frequent disagreements between committee members are a measure of confusion (one member told me that confusion and dissent were common at meetings), then the need for a clear, defined, and meaningful basis for decision making becomes obvious.

Assuming a rejection disgruntling, could a student initiate an appeal? Personnel including deans and Mr. George Pistorius, the committee chairman, insisted that no such appeals machinery existed. If the student felt plucky enough, ignored these discouragements, and decided anyway to make an appointment with Mr. Pistorius, he would have been told, lo and behold, that he could make an appeal. Was this awkward process intended to keep the appeals machinery a secret from all but the more insistent and disgruntled students? No announcement concerning the availability of appeals were made. Was the committee interested in granting all its rejectees a fair chance of appeal? Was the committee simply interested in saving itself extra work? In any case, the less aggressive students lost out.

Let us hope that the inequities and confusion can be avoided next year. Mr. Pistorius and the committee must draw up serious, clear, and detailed criteria which can be consistently applied and made available to students and advisors alike. The bureaucratic kinks must be worked out. If the administration wants to strengthen Winter Study, the WSP Committee is the place to start.

Eric Wiking '81

"Fear of failure leads either to little activity or to great activity of the wrong kind."

The forum on diversity at Williams held last fall and recent conversations with students have helped me to articulate a problem of which I have been vaguely aware since I came to Williams over two years ago. Instead of talking just to other teachers or to a few students about this problem, I would like to share my reflections more widely so that, if they have any value, we can all start working together to solve the problem.

The problem is failure. I do not refer to actions which result in failure but to the fear of failure which leads to no action, or to the wrong kind of activity. Faculty and administrators at Williams are not immune to this fear of failure, but I will talk first about students' fear. A number of students at Williams, and probably at similar colleges, seem so afraid of failure in their courses (and perhaps in other areas of their lives) that they do not take risks or become adventurous. While they usually work very long and hard, complete most of their assignments (or learn a a respectable form of the necessary art of "faking it"), and put tremendous efforts into tests and papers, they are often timid about expressing innovative ideas in class and in papers, taking courses outside of familiar or comfortable areas, and following unconventional tacks. Thus, students' fear of failure leads either to little activity in areas or modes of analysis which are new and challenging, or to great activity of the wrong kind. I say "of the wrong kind" because you can bet that when Mark Hopkins sat on a log, the student at the other end was not asking, "Will that be on the test?" or "What should I say in my paper?"

Williams College fails to give students a liberal arts education not only if it does not teach them how to handle failure, but if it does not actually encourage them to fail. Without a willingness to fail, we leave unexplored whole subjects and ways of thinking. Moreover, through failing at some endeavors, we learn our limitations, and we cannot even appreciate the value and significance of our successes without a sense of those limitations. Most importantly, in discovering our limitations we are forced to confront the question which we must all face sooner or later anyway if I am not perfect, if I am in fact riddled with faults, weaknesses, and inadequacies, and everyone knows that I am, am I still worthy of respect and love, from myself and others?

Even at Williams

Our society, of course, has made a god of success, and we are all subject to society's general influences. But I think that most men and women who come to Williams suffer from the peculiar disadvantage of enormous intelligence, talent, and the opportunities to have exercised both and to have received recognition. That is, students who come to Williams are people unfamiliar with failure and accustomed to success. That success generally has been hard-won and well-deserved, to be sure, gained initially by having taken risks. But the continued experience of success may lead people to think that they are respected and loved for their successes. They may even come to love and respect themselves for their successes. They may even come to love and respect themselves for their successes. Failure then comes to represent the possibility of losing love and respect, and if understandable becomes a most fearful thing, to be avoided at all costs. Success once gained by taking risks must now be maintained by taking few new ones, for they may lead to failure.

We should examine closely our use of the words "fail" and "failure. Like the words "relevant" and "relevance," which were popular when I was in college, "fail" and "failure" are often used in a way that begs the questions: to fail at what? failure at what? failure to do what? When we speak of failing a course, we really mean—or should mean—to say that we have failed to meet certain requirements of that course. If you fail a biology course (and at Williams, "fail" often means to get a D, a C, or even a B), you do not fail to meet the needs of biology, as you might be said to fail a friend. Nor have you failed in some cosmic sense, as a human being. You have simply failed to master certain skills and information, the mastery of which constitutes the definition of success for this case. In so failing (especially if you "fail" with a C or a B) you have nevertheless probably learned some valuable and interesting skills and information. And you have learned something about your own limitations. You must now learn to like and respect yourself in spite of those limitations.

The meaning of honors

Many people at Williams worry about the large number of seniors who have graduated in recent years with Latin honors. I hope that their concern is not a veiled form of prostration before the altar of Success. We should not fear lest people from outside Williams say derisively, "Oh, everybody who graduates from there gets honors." I suspect that Newsweek and Time are dismayed by "grade inflation" largely because they do not want to see the badges of success cheapened by appearing on everyone's lapel. After all, if everyone could afford designer clothes, even a Halston would lose its mystique, designer clothes, even a Halston would lose its mystique.

I have different reasons to be concerned about the proliferation of Latin honors. I believe that a high grade point average should be available to all but attainable by only a few, for only a few people can possibly possess the intellectual talents, and the interest, both to take plenty of risks and to succeed consistently in the narrow terms of academic achievement. If a large number of people get Latin honors, then a large number of people are failing—failing to take risks, to be challenged, and to grow.

In case some of you have found yourselves nodding in agreement as you read this, and in case you have thought, "Yes, and that's why WSP is so important; then at least we can be adventurous," I would like to digress briefly to explain my disagreement. We cannot compartmentalize the willingness to be adventurous and to risk failure into one month of the year. The very act of compartmentalizing risk and adventure may even increase the tendency to avoid difficult challenges in the semester courses. In any case, since the possibility of bearing responsibility for failure is virtually nil during Winter Study, the process of coping with failure will not take place then: "risk" which involves no consequences is not truly risk at all.

I wonder if some of the shortcomings of WSP, at which many students and teachers now feel distressed, are not in fact due to our habits of caution and success-mongering during the rest of the year. If in courting success we avoid adventurous challenges for eight months, we may dull our sensibilities for risk and exploration. We may not any longer know how to take risks in a creative and disciplined fashion. Come January, in lieu exhaustion from the labors of the fall term unrewarding except insofar as they have brought us success, we regard the relaxed atmosphere of WSP as an opportunity to take it easy; at least we can allow ourselves a little failure. But this kind of failure, just as it carries few consequences, brings little reward, for it does not stem from stretching ourselves until we have met our limitations.

Lest I seem to chide or preach, let me say emphatically that I recognize the extent to which students fear failure for very practical reasons having nothing to do with the profundities of love and respect. And I sympathize with such problems as the severe competition for admission to graduate and professional schools. But I insist that Williams should not serve as a pre-professional training school. Rather as a liberal arts college, Williams must encourage us to take risks and to accept challenges so that we expand our awareness of life's possibilities, and it must encourage us occasionally to fail so that we learn our own limitations.

The faculty role

Notice that I said Williams should encourage "us," not just "you." All of us, faculty and administrators as well as students, must be willing to risk and to fail. Teachers must be willing to experiment with new teaching methods and new courses. They must risk "losing control of" the classroom by opening it up to students who may express unorthodox ideas. Instead of "packaging The Truth," teachers must face the pedagogical challenge of inculcating intellectual discipline and the ability to ask good questions.

Teachers must also resist the temptations of grade inflation. When students place their identities on the line at grading time, many teachers fear to give a low grade lest they seem to be telling the student, "You have failed as a person." We teachers must make clear that our grades are based on a particular and rather narrow set of criteria involving the mastery of specific skills and information. We must encourage excellence in these admittedly narrow but important terms by keeping standards high. We must be willing to explain to our students, and to ourselves, how these narrow terms are important, and we must at the same time stress that academic achievement by no means has exclusive claims on our respect and encouragement. We must not fail our students by robbing them of the opportunity to fail at some things so that they can grow.

Students may fear failure because they think that their parents, teachers, and friends respect and like them for their success. If so, these students are underestimating the other people in their lives as well as themselves. Teachers may fear helping students to discover their limitations because, in doing so, these teachers may have to confront some of their own limitations (judging requires self-confidence on the part of the judge), and because they may fear losing students' "love." (The SCES, a powerful barometer of students' love, also threatens us with the loss of our fellow teachers' respect.) If we teachers harbor such fears, we underestimate not only ourselves but also our students.

Failure is painful, but avoiding failure at the expense of new experiences and insights removes the sense of joy which should generally inform our academic pursuits. The absence of this joy is perhaps the most subtle yet disturbing way in which the fear of failure daily makes its presence felt among us.

—Meredith Hoppin

Hoppin is an assistant professor of Classics. Since coming here in 1976, she has been active in debates on feminism and sexism. She was one of the panelists in last fall's College Council forum on diversity and in the past has decried what she sees as a strong strain of preprofessionalism at Williams.

"It is grades that rule on this campus"

A month ago, with papers due and finals coming up, grades were the focus of student life at Williams. Every final required a course average calculated beforehand to mark out how far off the A was—or how close the D. Every paper demanded first an analysis of the professor's pet theories and a conscience struggle over whether to follow them.

But between vacation and the day grades come out, nobody talks about them. For some first semester, once endured, is best forgotten. Others, waiting for a four-line judgment of three months work, don't like to remind themselves what they're waiting for. Nobody can quite put first semester in its place and move on until grades close down the hopes and fears tied to it.

Whether we focus all our energies on them or try to ignore them, grades run Williams. They drive students to extremes of late-night masochism that whips and wild horses couldn't push them to. Grades fence off professors and students as the distributors and the recipients. They strangle friendships, create stereotypes and pervert morals.

Despite all the lofty pronouncements, liberal arts is only a weak puppet at Williams, a genteel front. Although people may enjoy knowing how to think—few courses even try to teach that—they need to eat, and few students here forget that for long. With grades at least seen as the key to grad schools and jobs, it is grades that rule on this campus.

Of course there are students who rebel, who really do care more about understanding a subject than about knowing facts and theories. There are a few here who defy the tyrany of grades to be creative and explore the world of thought.

But people who have the courage to defy one system often defy all systems. The students here who can ignore the call to build for a career and who instead experiment with the potential of thought in class and outside are a fringe group. Paradoxically, the people who best embody the Williams liberal arts philosophy are the ones most reject the Williams way.

Still, there is a middle ground. Even tired pre-meds like me kick against the intellectual deadweights of course requirements and grad school pressures. While few of us can ignore the demands of a career quickly closing with us, few of us are really mercenary. We face a choice between supposedly exciting intellectual exploration and uninspiring demands for the future. Time and again the uninspiring wins.

Granted, nobody at Williams is really suffering from this. But something is missing. There is a gap between liberal arts ideals and the fact that Williams students have to cope with a demanding society. The lack crops up in conversation all the time. It shows up in campus alcoholism and drug abuse. It shows up in the classic Williams lifestyle, with its cycles of studying and partying.

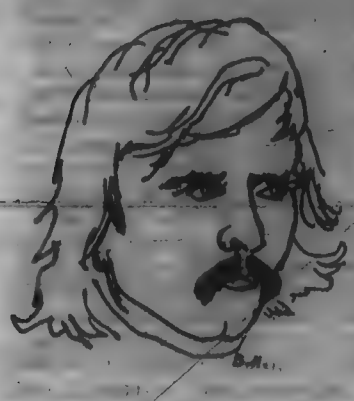
The rejection of Williams' liberal arts philosophy for the dubious rewards of grade-grubbing manifests itself most clearly in the fear of failure, Meredith Hoppin points out. Attempting to cover ourselves—both to enhance our postgrad options and to guard our investment of time, sweat and hope—we avoid academic risks.

The ultimate goal of coursework for most of us is an A, not depth of understanding. We tend to stick to subject areas we have proven ourselves in and fail to explore new modes of approach. We search out gut courses—introductory Classics and Astro are notorious. We fear to test the bounds of the great minds we're all supposed to bring here, lest we come up shockingly short.

Liberal arts pronouncements notwithstanding, the structure of Williams academic life further inhibits strengthens this intellectual narrowness. Williams prides itself in its low student-faculty ratio. But very rarely does individual, personal encouragement cross the barrier between professor and student—from either side.

There is no substitute here for grades as a reward for three months' work, nothing else to reassure us that the struggle was worth the effort. The alleged benefits of intellectual exploration seem tenuous beside the consequences of failed risk. Everybody at Williams wonders sometime whether this is the place to be, whether a student's life is the one to lead. And we get almost no comment on these questions from faculty save the blunt evaluation of grades. Piled atop postgrad demands, this emotional importance makes the pursuit of high grades paramount on campus.

So what should we do to minimize the importance of grades? Should we burn our syllabi in protest? Should profs hold love-ins after class to assure students that despite poor marks self-worth should shine undimmed? Doubtful, and it seems that the common way of coping with grades pressure is escape—in booze, dancing, roadtripping, skiing off to the mountains.



The tyranny of grades is a state of mind. The alternative has to be that too. I'd like to say we should regard grades as a peripheral nuisance in the pursuit of understanding, but that's not true. At a centralized, highly structured school, in a success-oriented society, there probably is no alternative. Coping with grade pressure is a long struggle itself; trying to transcend it would probably send us all to the crazy house.

Professors, as Ms. Hoppin suggests, can try to inject flexibility and creativity into their classes. But that takes work, and in too many cases it seems that professors, like students, have better things to do. In the Williams academic atmosphere, where research and departmental politics seem more important than inspiring teaching the chances that the quality of teaching will shoot up tomorrow or this year look dismal.

Students have to open themselves to professors' tentative offers to permit creativity in coursework if we want to free up the sludge that has frozen academic life. These offers are tentative often because they are so rarely taken up. We have to take the initiative more often, breaking out from mass mediocrity. We have to be willing to take risks—risks that demand yet more work on our part and seem to gamble the remainder of our halfterm.

Albee directs himself

Five members of a professional touring company will perform two of Edward Albee's award-winning one-act plays, The Zoo Story and The American Dream under the direction of the author himself this Thursday evening at 8:30 in the Adams Memorial Theatre.

The performance is one of many in a nation-wide tour of the project, Albee directs Albee, which began last September. Reviewers have hailed it as a "spell-binding" attempt to enhance the interpretation and presentation of a play by combining the sensitivities of director and playwright in one man.

The two one-act plays to be presented are Albee's most famous short plays, The Zoo Story and The American Dream.

The Zoo Story deals with the confrontation between two men on a park bench in Central Park and the subsequent consequences of their interaction. The American Dream is concerned with the values of an American family and the effect that this has on the three generations involved.

The cast for these two shows is composed of five actors from New York: Wyman Pendleton, Stephen Rowe, Eileen Burns, Catherine Bruno, and Patricia Kilgarrif. Described by one reviewer as "competent professionals" and "a company of kings," the talented company is expected to give an excellent and exciting performance.

Albee, twice winner of the Pulitzer Prize for his plays, has also gained national recognition for his directing talents. One of his more recent successes was the latest Broadway revival of Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf, perhaps his most famous play, which was written when Albee was a professor of psychology here at Williams.

General admission for the performance is $3 for Williams students with IDs and $5 for the general public. Tickets will be available from 1:00-4:30 on weekdays through Thursday, January 11 in the lobby of the Adams Memorial Theatre. For more information, call the Cap and Bells office at 597-2459.

Clark features 'Cities of Art'

The popular "Cities of Art" Sunday afternoon lecture series at the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute in Williamstown this year will visit a major city in Germany, Italy, England, and, for the first time, the Far East. The series began last Sunday and will run each Sunday through February 4.

John Coolidge, Professor of Fine Arts at Harvard University, opened the series with a talk on "London in the High Victorian Period."

The other talks in the "Cities of Art" series will begin at 3:00.

Jan. 14 Munich, by David Cass, Assistant Curator, Clark Art Institute.

Jan. 21 Kyoto, by Peter Frost, Associate Professor of History, Williams College

Jan. 28 Paris' Louvre (film)

Feb. 4 Mantua, by Eugene J. Johnson, Associate Professor of Art, Williams College.

Admission to the lectures is free and the public is cordially invited.

Auditions

Theatre auditions for Calderon's LIFE IS A DREAM directed by Jon Stolzberg will be held on Sunday and Monday, Jan. 14 and 15 from 7:30-11 PM in Greylock A. LIFE IS A DREAM will be performed in the Studio Theatre of the AMT on March 2 and 3. Scripts will be on two-hour loan in the Production Office of the AMT. Anyone interested in technical aspects of the production should come to Greylock A during auditions, or contact Fred Penzel at 2439. For further information call 458-8408.

Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee will present a folk blues music concert on January 10 at 8 p.m. in Chapin Hall.

Terry and McGhee sing blues

by Sally Midgley

Returning to Williams for the third time in ten years, Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee will present a concert on Wednesday, January 10 at 8 p.m. in Chapin Hall.

Terry and McGhee have enjoyed an unbroken partnership and friendship since 1939, playing a special blend of folk blues music. Described by the New York Times as "the greatest exponents of black folk blues," the duo has recorded 45 albums, and has toured extensively, including the US, Canada, Europe, and Australia. Along with Bruce Springstein, Bob Dylan, and George Benson, Terry and McGhee were recently featured in a PBS special tribute, "The World of John Hammond."

"Mockin' the trains was about the first piece I learned . . . I used to hear the freight trains comin' by," reminisced Terry. Having lost his eyesight as a child, Terry used his free time to develop a unique harmonica style. He can recreate images as diverse as the faraway whistle of a train and the baying of hounds on the scent. "Dogs run like the fox, and I used to listen to that barkin'—ketch a whole lot of ideas from that," Terry claims.

McGhee, learning to play the piano, pump organ, and guitar, was an accomplished musician by the age of eight. He worked with Blind Boy Fuller, Leadbelly, and Lonnie Johnson. "Each place had a different type of music, but they all seemed to like blues," McGhee commented. "There were no amplifiers in those days and people listened to what you were singing."

First appearing at Williams in 1969, Terry and McGhee were rediscovered by the ACEC in 1973. Tomorrow night's concert, however, is not an ACEC event, but is instead an independently organized performance. The individual in charge saw a need for a "coffee-house atmosphere, with the music on a larger scale." Sponsoring groups include the Afro-American Council, the Black Student Union, the College Council, the Lecture Board, and several residential houses.

Tickets for the concert by Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee will go on sale at Chapin Hall at 7:15 p.m. on January 10. There will be no advance ticket sales. The price will be $3 for general admission, $2 for Williams faculty and staff, and $1 for Williams students.

Dodd shows architecture

by Melle Rockefeller

The conventional word for today's design-approach is 'holistic'. The suppression of the parts to achieve the integrity of whatever is designed became the cornerstone of the Modern movement, resulting in such orthodox architectural successes as the Seagram Building in New York, and in sterile failures nicknames the 'glass-box' style.

The holistic approach revels in unity with the environment and deplores the delineation of internal and external space. Its manifesto was Mies' photo-montage of views with no architectural elements and its apex was Johnson's ephemeral glass house which exists only to keep the weather out.

But something has escaped these architects. They no longer created spaces for people but captured space in order to insulate the outdoors. The beauty and energy of the external environment was empirically declared unalterable and unimprovable and merely pulled indoors. The negation of architectural elements eroded architecture itself to sublime non-existence and functional minimalism.

Lee Hirshe assigned his senior architecture students a project in designing first an environment and then a house within. That most architects are not so lucky in choice of sites is of no matter. The fact remains that the union of the two was paramount for the three students: Mimi Dore, Judy Dayton and Hilary Hodgson. The means by which they resolved this task reveals the extent to which Modern architecture has seeped into every cranial nook, and is now on display at the Dodd Student Art Gallery.

The houses, depicted in well-constructed models, are set in dispate climates. Judy Dayton's is nestled into pine forests, Hilary Hodgson's is located on a craggy Connecticut island, and Mimi Dore's is entrenched in an arid desert. They are situated above, on and below the ground, respectively. Each of the student architects has placed primary importance on the incorporation of native materials into the esthetics and structure of their building.

Despite the evident variety, there is a philosophical similarity to the three houses. Their response to the environment is an almost unrelieved blending and union, as if each house had demanded to be treated as no more than a continuation of the parent earth. Access to Judy Dayton's free-op house is achieved through the surrounding hill. Mimi Dore's house has crept underground for reasons of energy as well as maintenance of the natural horizontal emphasis of the desert. Hilary Hodgson's Connecticut house jumps from level to level as it jumps from rock to rock.

What unites these three designs is the acceptance and incorporation of the environment in true Modern fashion they glory in the given, only to suppress the added, even the necessary addition of an architect's creative structuring of space. Judy Dayton's and Mimi Dore's houses, in particular, are captured spaces, [illegible]

Music in the Round to play

This Friday, Jan. 12, Music in the Round will present its third concert of the 1978-1979 season with a program dedicated to pieces of the Romantic era.

Certainly, the most significant to be performed is the Mendelssohn Octet (four violins, two violas, and two cellos). This work composed at the young age of sixteen is the most famous among Mendelssohn's early works. It is unique among chamber works of the period not only for its unusual instrumentation but for its adaptations: popularity demanded its arrangement as a piano duet while the scherzo was orchestrated and incorporated into a symphonic concert. Mendelssohn manifests the many facets of his blossoming talent in the merry but graceful first movement, the staccato, pianissimo scherzo, and the fused unison and contrapuntal finale which simplifies the extreme complexity of the different voices into a flowing, elegant sound.

The Schumann Trio in G minor, opus 110, is a product of his stay in Dusseldorf in 1851. Though the work does not represent the peak of Schumann's use of the stringed instrument or control of the piano's voice in chamber music, this trio reflects a blending of the classical tradition, as inherited from Beethoven and Mozart, with the romantic lied. Rounding out this excellent program is a more modern work by Villa-Lobos, Sonata-Fantasia No. 2 for violin and piano.

There may be more to life than water fights and panty raids

Tired of water fights? Bored with panty raids? Do goldfish turn your stomach? Apparently many Williams students, past and present, have felt the same way. Their imaginative pranks and practical jokes have almost become underground legends which command great respect.

Students pulled off one of the more ingenious pranks four years ago when they removed the admissions office sign from Mather House and replaced it in front of Perry House. For an entire morning nervous applicants came to Weston to be interviewed by a group of students in their best Ivy League attire, while Phil Smith despaired that all prospective students had lost interest in the College. Fortunately (for all concerned) the applicants were told of the joke and sent back to Mather House, where they enjoyed the pleasure of their second interview in one day.

Another admissions-related incident occurred in the freshman quad while a group was touring the campus. Charlie Gledhill leaned out his window in Williams C screaming that he could no longer stand the pressures of the school. He then withdrew to his room, and a moment later his roommate Steve Alpert threw a dummy out the window, which landed in front of the horrified group. Moments later Security appeared, and within five minutes a North Adams ambulance had arrived to remove the unfortunate suicide victim from the scene.

A similar prank was played on another prospective student who came to Williams to visit a friend. Apparently concerned with the academic aspects of the Williams experience, the visitor asked his host about the intensity and handling of pressure. The next night, the two were sitting quietly in a third floor room in Sage. Suddenly a neighboring freshman cried out in despair: "I can't take it anymore!" and jumped out the window. Unknown to the student, the supposed suicide victim actually landed on the second floor balcony below. The prospective freshman ran out of the room and never returned to Williams.

On the lighter side, a series of Great Pumpkin episodes occurred over a three-year period. The first year the President received a huge pumpkin through the mail. The following year literally hundreds of pumpkins were strewn on the President's lawn. The third Halloween an enormous plastic pumpkin balloon was placed on the lawn, with a note which read "the third and final act."

The President was also involved in the Scavenger Night sponsored annually by Brooks House. One year the list of desired items included President Chandler in his pajamas. Some ambitious students persuaded the President to accompany them to Brooks in his red flannel nightshirt. The points were tallied and the students continued their search for the other items. The President was long abandoned and had quite a difficult time avoiding the odd stares he received as he crossed Route 2.

That same scavenger hunt featured a request for a cow to be brought to Brooks. The wish was fulfilled by a group of adventurous students who somehow lured (or more likely forced) a poor cow into a Volkswagen Beetle and drove her back to the campus.

Ten years ago during Christmas vacation, a security officer who had been assigned to room inspection discovered an entire Volkswagen on

Announcing FAPJC

Now that we've got you thinking, we'd like you to put your thoughts into action in the First Annual Practical Joke Contest, sponsored by the WILLIAMS RECORD. We are looking for original practical jokes, which will be judged by the RECORD staff on the basis of their humor and taste. The contest will run from January 16-31 and will be featured in the first February issue, when THE RECORD will award prizes for the top three practical jokes.

In order to be considered for judging, participants [individuals or groups] must submit an outline of their proposed practical joke to THE RECORD on or before Monday, January 15. Besides a description of the joke, the outline should state the time and place so that a photographer can be present to record the event. All proposals will be kept strictly confidential.

This contest is meant to be run in the spirit of Winter Study and good, clean fun. No pranks involving property damage or personal injury of any kind will be approved. We hope for sophisticated yet humorous jokes which will command even greater respect than those of yore.

Moon Barn renovation is big step for Williams

by Sally Midgley

Mention of the Moon Barn in the Hopkins Forest often results in puzzled curiosity. Assumptions regarding the purpose of the structure range from a storage house for lunar exhibits to a hideaway for Moonies. In reality, however, the Moon Barn is simply an affectionate and abbreviated name for the Hopkins Forest Farm Museum.

During the late 1800's, Alfred Moon owned a 60-acre tract of land located in the middle of the Hopkins Farm. In contrast to Hopkins' large and prosperous cattle farm, Moon's property was used essentially for subsistence farming and consisted only of a small barn and house. Although the Moon farm was included in the College's acquisition of Hopkins Forest, it was virtually ignored until several years ago.

In 1975, Peter McChesney, '75, decided to renovate the deteriorating Moon complex as a Senior Honors Thesis in History. Funded by townspeople and the State Bicentennial Foundation, McChesney planned and executed the conversion of the Moon property into a museum. The project involved dismantling the barn and farmhouse and assembling a renovated structure at the edge of the Hopkins Forest.

McChesney designed an elaborate plan to establish a student committee to maintain the museum, create exhibits, and expand the archival collection. However, lack of further consistent student interest left the museum at a standstill after McChesney completed his project. Not until spring, 1978, did renewed enthusiasm toward the farm enable the execution of an exhibit for the museum.

Connie Carpenter, '78, and Stuart Deans, '78, designed and executed a display of American handicrafts last year. The exhibit, depicting methods and utensils, allowed visitors to participate in the craftwork themselves and included arts such as sewing, embroidery, weaving, carpentry, and candle-dipping. "The American Craft Tradition" was displayed at the Moon Barn from June through August and attracted over 300 visitors.

Leslie Heerman, '79, ran the Museum during the summer and continued her involvement with the Moon Barn by designing a fall exhibit, planning Crafts Day in October, and writing up the 1978 annual report. The fall exhibit, "Putting By For Winter," included methods of food preservation, herb usage, and harvesting tools. Crafts Day (October 1) incorporated the fall exhibit and offered demonstrations of weaving, spinning, lace-making, smithing, and pressing apples for cider.

This year, Prof. Allison points out that "There is an enormous amount of student interest this year compared to last year." The museum is basically maintained by a student who is hired to run the museum during the summer and then continues its upkeep throughout the academic year. Professors Allison and Art provide continuity and administrative support.

While Allison admits that "the Museum essentially goes into hibernation over the winter," Heerman predicts that "this spring it's going to be a little different," citing spring projects as proof: an exhibit of antique wooden containers, a display of American quilts, and a spread of archeological finds from Hopkins Forest. Plans for winter study include a contra dance and a moonlight cross-country skiing party with the Barn as a warming hut.

Practical Jokes

the fourth floor of Garden House. It had, the officer said, been dismantled and reassembled in a student's room. Because the prank went unannounced, the student returned to school after Christmas to find his car still taking the place of his bed. Shortly after, the car disappeared from the room and reappeared [illegible].

Prof. Whitney Stoddard's Art 101 lecture on William architecture used to include a comment that the only purpose the Faculty House should serve is that of a gas station. Following the lecture, a group of students quickly blessed themselves with a prank that has been retold by many. Late at night, Stoddard received a mysterious phone call providing the brief message: "We did it!" The next morning, the Faculty House was serving the purpose which Stoddard proposed: a Mobil sign and two gasoline pumps had been added to the exterior decor.

Those who prefer "good clean fun" would have appreciated the transofrmation of the huge clock on the gym into a Mickey Mouse watch, complete with hands and face, and, of course, Mickey-Mouse ears.

There's a practical joke for everyone. So don't suffer or bore yourself and others with the same old pranks. Use your imagination!

This trivia team does not appear to have much gusto.

categories in our contests are restricted to media-oriented subjects, e.g., movies, comics, TV, sports, and songs, they were using minutia—bad trivia—like 'How many dimples are on a golf ball?' or 'When is Amy Carter's birthday?' It's a difference between obscure reference and something you're familiar with."

"Good trivia"—megatonnage in the trivia lover's lexicon—"is something that gives you a high," Katz said. "A good question, whether you know the answer or not, should make you say 'Oh, shit! That is incredible!' "

The unbounded enthusiasm, and in some cases, fanaticism, towards trivia exhibited by more than just a select group of students elevates trivia's status at Williams from the fad or cult position to a unique level of acceptability.

The basis of this acceptability possibly lies in Trivia Night's anitithetical relationship with its preceding four months: after a semester of studying, the contest's goal is to have everyone rolling in nostalgia for eight continuous hours.

Curriculum

Division III students) had never taken a single course in Philosophy, Religion, or the History of Ideas. In addition, the committee found that 32 percent of the class of 1978 graduated without taking any non-major course in either a Western or non-Western topic before 1800. The study also revealed many students graduate without instruction in areas outside the cultural mainstream of the West.

Grouping the deficiencies together, the committee proposed the institution of a two-semester, non-disciplinary uniform syllabus "Great Works" course, to be required of all freshman. The focus would be on the pre-1800 Western tradition, but would draw on many works outside this tradition.

While English literacy appeared in the study to be a relatively small problem, 40 percent of Division I and II students in the class of 1978 took no math courses, and 37 percent only one math course. While few are seriously deficient in either area, those who are so deficient face debilatating problems academically.

The committee suggested that the College locate students with serious problems through testing during Freshman Days. These students would take remedial tutorials in addition to (or in conjunction with) their regular course load. A flexible approach, the tutorial would not impede on the regular Freshman curriculum, and students could be excluded or included at any point in the semester.

The committee decided not to change the existing three Division structure, but proposed that the distribution requirements be satisfied by the end of the Sophomore year. It believes that the student's "general education" serves as the foundation for the choice of a major and non-major courses.

As in all early, formative work, Modern prototypes are in evidence. Mimi Dire's garden oasis and buried living spaces echo Paolo Solari's underground studios. His insulated, inward-turning protection from the desert is subtly portrayed by Mimi's semi-circular patio peeking out from a sheltering dune. An intimate and caressing acquaintance with the Connecticut water reveals the tie between Hilary Hodgson's design and Wright's Falling Water. Both are organic in the sense that they develop on many levels from the water—Hilary's, however, contains a crown to the sunrise.

CFM plans new news

WCFM is looking to put together a well-organized, informative news program focusing on college and community news. The ideas of the 1979 staff include a daily 30 minute show reporting not only on national news, but on issues and activities which concern students at Williams and the Williamstown community as well.

Although news often focuses on distant issues, the Community Affairs Department is concerned with stories which will appeal because of their local relevance. With at least 15 minutes each day devoted to Community Affairs, the radio is available to all members of the community wishing to state their opinion or to share their view toward any college or community related issue. Students, faculty and townspeople are all urged to share their knowledge, interests and hobbies with the public in the form of short, informal broadcasts. Anyone interested in investigating a particular issue or in covering a special event is encouraged to contribute.

By presenting a more thorough news show, WCFM hopes to better serve its listeners but it cannot do it without your help. Reporters are needed for local events, issues, organizations, and cultural activities. Writers are wanted to write general interest stories based on either personal or shared experiences: Ideas for any interesting subjects for broadcast are welcome. Community Affairs reporting is a great chance to get started in radio by enabling you to pursue a subject which interests you and which you would enjoy to investigate. The possibilities for programming are extensive and the information provided will be educational and enlightening to all.

Looking to expand its radio image beyond that of a music station, WCFM is anxious to know what our listeners can contribute to this kind of community news show. Please address any questions and all ideas immediately to: Director of Community Affairs, WCFM-Baxter Hall, Williamstown, Mass. 01267

Coast Guard sinks grapplers

The Williams College wrestling team, in their first outing of the new year and second of the season, lost to a strong U. S. Coast Guard Academy squad this past Saturday. Although the Ephs forfeited three weight classes (167, 190 and heavyweight), making a victory impossible, rookie coach Hal Zendle (substituting for Coach Daley, who is on leave second semester) claimed that there were numerous encouraging individual efforts. "Sophomore Scott Frost (142) was our lone victor with a well earned 10-6 decision and junior Mark Welch wrestled well. We're glad to have him back in the lineup. (Welch spent first semester at the University of Arizona.)," Zendle added. "Exceptionally strong efforts were produced by freshmen Mike Rosenfelter (126), Rich Olson (158), and Jeff Kiesel (177), who were defeated by experienced opponents. Also, Sophomore John Tim (134) won an impressive semifinal match."

In pre-break play, the Ephs dropped a dual meet to the University of Hartford and Plymouth State.

The grapplers' next outing, pits them against a tough W.P.I. squad at Worcester this Saturday. Their home opener is on January 20 against the University of Bridgeport.

Rusty track team splits meet

by Phil Darrow

The Williams College Winter Track team, looking somewhat rusty in its first outing of the season, split a home meet with Fitchburg State and Westfield State on Saturday. Fitchburg overcame a powrrful start by the Ephs to finish first with 66 points, while Williams had 60 and Westfield 40.

Outstanding individual performances were turned in by two of the Ephs' three captains. Greg McAleenan grabbed a second in the long jump and ran the fastest leg of Williams' mile relay despite a case of the flu which had him reeling at the end of the meet. Tom Schreck also set a fine example as he easily won the 1000 yard run. The third squad leader, Lee Jackson, was sidelined with a pulled leg muscle, an injury which definitely hurt the Ephs.

Another outstanding individual was freshman Micah Taylor, who not only won the long jump by nearly two feet, but also took a close second in the 60 to Fitchburg All-American Mike Farnsworth. Micah showed that he is a team man, however, by returning to run a grueling leg of the mile relay, an event he has never trained for.

Other individual winners for Williams were Scott Mayfield in the pole vault, Jim DeSimone in the shot put, Vernon David in a fine 60 high hurdles race, and Phil Darrow in the mile run.

Victory snatched from Williams' Jaws

by Peter Howd

The men's swim team saw its record drop to two and one following Saturday's 57-55 loss to an emotionally charged Hamilton squad. After two hard weeks of training over Christmas vacation, the team chose not to decrease workouts prior to the meet; while they were in excellent condition, the Ephs lacked the fine competitive edge that carried them over their two pre-Christmas opponents.

The first event provided Williams with its only break of the day as the winning Hamilton relay was disqualified for a false start. With the advantage given to thjem, tthe Ephs managed to maintain a slight lead throughout the meet, only to see victory disappear in the last relay.

Despite the loss, there were individuals who showed flashes of brilliance. Senior distance swimmer John Adams, known in the past for flashes of a different nature, swam two excellent races, recording personal best times in both the 1000 and 500 freestyle swims. Bryan Volpp, back after taking a semester of leisure inCalifornia, showed that that state can indeed produce swimmers by placing second in the individual medley and first in the breaststroke.

Sophomore Gordo Cliff was very impressive in his come-from-behind win in the 200 butterfly. Don Cameron also surprised everyone with his imitation of Olympic Gold Medalist Rick DeMont as he also came from behind to win the 200 backstroke. Freshman sensation Mike Regan, inspired by learning the Hamilton coach was from his hometown of Haverhill, won the 100 free in a quick 49.1, not far from the frosh school record. He was joined in the sprints by Tom and Bill Beckett who accounted for first and third in the 50.

Prior to vacation, the tables were turned as Mike Regan led the team in pulling out a 57-56 decision over the Univ. of Conn. at Storrs. Regan won the 100 free and anchored the relay which decided the meet. Fine performances were also turned in by Keith Berryhill in the 200 free, Bill Hymes in the distance events, Bill Kelly in the often overlooked diving events, and Brian McDermott in the breaststroke.

Next weekend the men's team travels in tandem with the sun-streaked women's team to Southern Connecticut.

Lutz. The remaining points in the Eph's burst came two apiece from sophomore and freshman forwards Dean Anlberg and Jeff Fasulo, both scored on follow-up shots after offensive rebounds.

At the start of the second half both teams were shooting well, and with 8:09 to play and Hamilton leading 56-56, it was still anyone's game. Then, after exchanging hoops, Hamilton All-American Cederick Oliver drove for a three-point-play which opened the Hamilton lead to five: 65-60.

With 3:00 remaining Hamilton, still holding a five point lead, went into a freeze pattern. Williams responded by bringing its 1-3-1 zone defense out to double-team the Hamilton ball handlers, but was forced to foul, and the Continentals connected on enough free-throws to hang on for a 74-69 win.

Deserving of special mention is Eph forward Sterling Kinsale, who, despite being outsized, scored ten points, and collected a team-high seven rebounds.

The loss drops the Ephs' record to 2 and 3. After taking 2nd place in the Conn. College Invitational tournament and before Christmas break, the team split two games, easily defeating Norwich University 63-52 on December 5, and losing a tough contest to the Tufts Jumbos, 74-66, on December 7.

Rogers, McAleenan named to all-star team

Williams College senior Steve Rogers (Chicago, Ill.) has been named to the ECAC Division III New England region All-Star team for his performance during the 1978 football season. Williams College defensive back Greg McAleenan (Grand Rapids, Mich.) named to the Kodak All-America Team earlier this week, has also been named to the ECAC All-Star squad.

The 6'3", 215-pound Rogers, a starter for the Ephs for the past two seasons at the offensive tackle position, was also awarded the Belvidere Brooks Memorial Medal at the team's annual awards banquet. The medal is presented to the member of the team whose playing during the season has been "of the greatest credit to the College."

McAleenan, who led the Williams team in several statistical categories during the three seasons as a starter for Williams and head coach Bob Odell, is widely regarded as a pro prospect. The 6'1", 175-pound senior was co-captain of the 1978 team.

The Kodak award caps McAleenan's superb career for the Ephmen. "It's a tremendous honor for Greg," said Coach Odell. "He's had three outstanding years for us, and the selection by Kodak puts Greg's talent into perspective."

Ephs skate over Hamilton

by John Kresse

Four straight goals by the Williams College hockey Ephmen in the first thirty minutes of the play proved too many for the Hamilton Continentals as the latter team succumbed 4-2 Saturday afternoon. The victory raised Williams' season record to 4-1 in Division II and 5-2 overall, while Hamilton dropped to 0-7.

Williams' leading scorer Chris Egizi's slapshot goal from Tom Resor at 9 seconds of the opening period highlighted the Eph pucksters' first win over the Continentals in their last four contests. Hamilton's skaters applied strong pressure throughout the period, outshooting Williams 13-4, but failed to illuminate the red light behind Eph goalie Mike Moulton. Williams' freshman Greg Jacobson from Egizi and Resor notched a power play goal at 12:01 to finish the first period scoring.

In the second stanza, Williams increased their lead to 4-0 on goals by Pete Barbaresi from Matt St. Onge and Jacobson, and Tinker Connelly from Resor and Jim Rooney on another power play. But the Continentals soon beat Moulton twice—at 10:30 and 14:47 of the same period. Sophomore Jim Wall profited from Williams disorganization and found the net with a low screen shot. Then Steve Carmen, another sophomore, blocked a shot at his own blue line and broke away to fake Moulton and tally what came to be the last goal of the game.

Close checking in the final twenty minutes resulted in numerous penalties to both sides, and very few shots on goal. Junior goalkeeper Al Roberts had replaced Caswell soon after Williams scored their final goal and turned back every Williams shot from that point on. Moulton for Williams finished with a total of 28 saves and reduced his goals against average to 2.16 over five ECAC contests.

Ephs win but Sullivan injured

Although the final score of the game was Williams 5, Boston State 2, the Williams College hockey team lost a lot more than they won last Wednesday night as co-captain Dan Sullivan sustained an injury that will keep him out of action for much of the season. The injury to Sullivan occurred with only five minutes left in the game. "Sully" was knocked to the ice by a clean, solid check and lay there, writhing in pain. Surgery was required to set his right arm, which had been broken in three places.

Before being hurt, Sullivan scored the tying goal and set up Mark Lemos' winning goal. In addition to scoring six points in Williams' first four Div. II encounters, the captain had been a hard-hitting defensive player. His all-round play will be sorely missed by the Ephmen. On the brighter side, the game produced several fine performances from several men who remain on the active roster. Matt St. Onge scored the opening goal and played well throughout. In addition to slamming home the winner, Lemos copped an assist on Dan Rooney's insurance goal. Rooney also gained an assist. This led to Sullivan's tying goal.

Soccer's Hartman emerges All-American

Williams College senior Gregg Hartman of Paoli, Pa., who set numerous all-time records as a member of the Williams soccer team, has been named honorable mention All-American.

"It's a tremendous honor for Gregg, says Williams head soccer coach Jeff Vennell, "especially when you consider that there is only one All-American squad in collegiate soccer. There are not separate All-American squads for the three NCAA divisions...just 55 All-American soccer players in the country and Gregg is one of them."

Hartman led the Williams team in scoring this past season with seven goals and seven assists. His total of 14 points is an all-time single-season Williams scoring record. His seven assists also set an all-time single-season mark. Hartman also set a career record for assists with 11, while his 26 career points is the second-best in Williams soccer history.

Squash squads swat out multiple victories

Senior sets sail

by Lindsay A. Beaman

This January, when the Berkshires are suffering through another New England winter, Williams College senior Jeb Boucher will be sailing in the South Pacific. But it will be no pleasure cruise. Boucher has qualified to compete in Perth, Australia against 115 other sailors from 40 countries in the Laser World Championship Regatta.

The Laser, a light single-masted dinghy about 14-feet long, is designed to "plane" or skim over the waves. The vessel is fast and very maneuverable. "Sailing is not a leisurely sport," says Boucher. "It is aggressive and physically demanding."

At Williams College, Boucher helped resurrect sailing as a club sport after a six-year period in which there had been no team. Now the club has about 50 members. As the team's captain, Boucher helps organize races with such other schools as Harvard, Yale, MIT, Brown, the University of Rhode Island and the Coast Guard during fall and spring seasons.

Boucher says he looks forward to meeting his fellow sailors as much as to the competition itself. And whether or not he returns to Williamstown this February with a trophy, he says "at least it will have been one month of winter wind without the Williamstown snow."

Women versus Middlebury

by Mary Tom Higgs

In the opening match of the '79 season, the Williams women's squash team overran Middlebury's squad, 7-0. The Saturday afternoon match, played on Williams' own home courts, was a confidence builder, for the women forfeited only one game out of all 25 games played.

Becky Chase and Mary Tom Higgs, claiming the No. 1 and No. 2 positions respectively, easily swept their opponents in three quick games. Co-captain Leigh Costikyan conceded the third game of her match, but she managed a successful recovery in the fourth game. Costikyan won 15-6, 15-12, 14-17, 15-7.

Seniors Barbara Ernst, Kristen Johanson, and co-captain Marcia Johnston, playing positions 4, 5, and 6 respectively, required only three games to topple their Middlebury rivals. At No. 7, Ellen Panarese, an exchange from Vassar, won in three games, as did exhibition player Hilary Meyers. Pam Hansen was out with an injury.

A truer test of Williams' strength will come next Saturday, however, when Williams faces a tough Harvard team at home, 2 P.M.

Men down Hartford club

by Jackson Galloway

The men's squash teams brought the New Year off to a good start last week with victories for both the varsity and freshman teams. In a tight 5-4 victory, the varsity established a two match winning streak against the Hartford Golf Club, last year's win being the first in ten years. Scoring for the Ephmen were team captain Martin Goldberg at the number one position, Jon Saunders at number two, Chip Lindquist at number three, and Peter Thomsen at number five. The key victory came at the number nine slot with Doug Gernert winning 15-12 in the fifth game. Coach Sloane observed: "Doug's victory is really encouraging. It could mean more points from the bottom of the line-up." Sorely missed from the traveling squad was Baloo, laid up battling a cold.

On Saturday afternoon, the freshman squad overcame a severe, in some cases almost fatal, case of first match jitters to blank Taft 7-0.

Both squads will be leaving noon Wednesday for a match with Harvard. The varsity will also be playing number one ranked Princeton here at 4:30 Friday afternoon.

Hamilton outsurges Eph hoopsters

By Stan Parese

After a furious first half comeback, the Williams College basketball team fell victim to some equally furious second half streak shooting by Hamilton Continental guard John Magee, who hit fifteen of his nineteen points in the final half.

The Continentals jumped out to an 8-0 lead and for the next seventeen minutes played a tough man-to-man defense. The Ephs got no closer than five points, and at one point trailed by eleven.

Severely outsized along the front line, Williams coach Curt Tong chose to play a harassing 1-3-1 zone defense, with senior Gerry Kelly, (a towering 6'1"), playing the baseline. The Ephs played Hamilton even, after the opening minutes, but despite their intensity and hustle, could not close the gap as the Continentals controlled the boards; getting second and third shots off the offensive boards, while limiting the Ephs to one shot and then triggering the fastbreak off the defensive boards.

With only 3:17 remaining in the half, and the score 21-9, Hamilton center Joe Southworth injured his knee and had to be replaced. During the time remaining the Ephs outscored Hamilton 14-3, and took a 25-34 halftime lead. During the spurt the Williams backcourt caught fire as junior guard Andy Straka hit two deep jumpers and a pair free throws for six points (he finished the night with a game high twenty points) and Gerry Kelly, (fifteen points on the night), accounted for four more, two on a driving layup and two more on a slick assist to sophomore forward Bob

CAP recommends tenure for two professors

by Chip Buckner

The Committee on Appointments and Promotions (CAP) has recommended that the Board of Trustees grant tenure to two assistant professors and deny it to two others.

Susan Dunn and James Wood received favorable, Alexander Woodcock and Edwina Cruise received unfavorable, recommendations from the committee. Wood and Woodcock confirmed the CAP's decisions. Cruise was unavailable for comment. Dunn refused to comment.

Susan Dunn

James Wood

This list is not necessarily complete.

About one in each "five or six" people coming to Williams gains a tenured position. This figure has remained the same over the last ten years or so, Oakley said. The number of people tenured in a given year, however, varies "radically"

The Board of Trustees will vote on these recommendations on January 27. They have the authority to overturn a CAP recommendation, but in practice they almost never do.

According to several trustees, their role is to supervise the decision making process and to intervene only if the process itself is unsatisfactory. The board "would face a rebellion of the faculty" if they attempted to intervene in an individual case, said one trustee. The faculty is far better qualified to make individual decisions than are the trustees, he added.

The CAP makes tenure recommendations annually based on recommendations from individual departments, and any additional information that the CAP decides is necessary. Although unusual, the CAP can and has reversed departmental recommendations.

The CAP consists of one tenured professor from each division, the provost, the dean of the faculty, and the president. Faculty may appeal decisions to the Steering Committee, which is composed of one tenured and one non-tenured faculty member from each division.

The departments and the CAP weigh three factors in making recommendations, explained Francis Oakley, Dean of the Faculty. These are teaching ability, scholarly development, and involvement in the College community.

Of these, the most important is "the capacity to teach well, and the promise of likelihood to continue" to do so. Next comes "scholarly strength and promise."

College policy requires that each department's report on a faculty member include an evaluation of student opinion of his teaching effectiveness. This may take the form of a quantitative questionnaire, interviews with students, unsolicited student comments, or a combination of these methods.

In assessing scholarly development, the CAP relies primarily on close readings of an individual professor's research by colleagues knowledgeable in the field and on observation of his performance in colloquia, paper readings, and other scholarly efforts. This assessment looks especially at the individual's intellectual capacity and ability to follow through a given project.

Although there are no "quotas" on the number of professors tenured in any department, Oakley said, the departments and the CAP do look at the size of the department, the ages of the faculty members, and the distribution of fields of expertise. There are, he stressed, "no absolute limits."

Treasurer investigates lost funds

by Peter Rintels

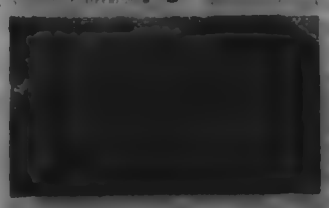
Nearly three months after former WCFM president Steve Jackson was expelled for allegedly embezzling radio station funds, the money involved is still in limbo.

College Council Treasurer John Simpson spoke with members of the administration last week, however, with the hope of persuading the College to take over all or part of the loss if the money cannot be recovered. The exact sum involved is not available because of the secrecy surrounding College disciplinary proceedings, but it has been reliably estimated at upwards of a thousand dollars.

A source close to the case said that the administration has been in touch with the Jackson family about the question of repayment, but refused to say what had been discussed. The administration cannot make any public statements about the case according to the source because of the possibility of litigation. The source said that there is almost no possibility that the College will initiate any court action since the legal fees involved would be far greater than what would be gained from it. If there were any litigation, it would be a suit brought by Jackson to gain reinstatement to the College, most likely charging that it had somehow violated its own regulations in its handling of the matter. Consequently, the administration is being very careful about any actions it takes or statements it releases.

As things stand now, if the College cannot recoup the money it claims is not accounted for, the burden of the loss will fall on the radio station and the College Council, from which the station gets most of its funds. Simpson met with President Chandler last Wednesday to try to persuade him to have the College take on part of the loss.

"I indicated to him, (Chandler) that I did not think it was fair that the SAT (Student Activities Tax, from which the CC derives its revenues) should bear the full burden if restitution is not made," said Simpson. "I urged Chandler to pursue collection if it were at all possible, but if it weren't, it seemed fair to distribute the burden evenly" among as much of the community as possible—ideally by tapping general College revenues.



Simpson said that Chandler "indicated his concern and said he thought it ought to be considered," but that the President made no firm commitments. Chandler is busy preparing for the upcoming Trustees meeting and told Simpson that he could not immediately look into the matter, but Simpson expects to be back in touch with him in a week or so.

The matter has not come before the College Council yet. Simpson said he considered it a "low priority" item for last Wednesday's meeting, but only because he had nothing to report on at that point. He expects to bring it up at this week's meeting.

CC Vice-president Chris Jenkins, who is presiding over the Council while Bronson Fargo is pursuing an off-campus Winter Study project, said that he considers the question of who should swallow any possible loss "a matter to be handled between the administration and the Finance Committee." Asked if he agreed with Simpson that the College should take on the loss, he said he had no comment.

CC schedules referendum

Proposal increases the SAT by at least $3

Provost Neil Grabois will propose to the Board of Trustees an increase of at least three dollars in the Student Activities Tax, reported Finance Committee chairman John Simpson '79 at last Wednesday's College Council meeting.

The increase would raise the tax to $59, creating an additional $5000 to distribute to various student organizations. Simpson noted, though, that such an increase would only stave off the effects of inflation on group budgets.

Grabois will meet with the Trustees at their gathering here the last weekend of this month.

Simpson also reported that off-campus and cooperative-housing students will not be billed for a House Maintenance Tax starting second semester.

Simpson announced that voucher forms for expenses incurred before January 1 must be returned by February 1. The Council granted $100 to the Chess Club, and $100 to the Ultimate Frisbee Club for transportation.

In other business, the Council agreed to hold a referendum January 23 and 24 on an amendment that calls for the direct election of the Secretary and Treasurer (See Box page 7); in the past, the Council members chose these officers. Subsection C proposes a restriction to ensure that the Treasurer possesses the necessary skills.

Subsection E specifies that the elections occur in the beginning of the second semester. The earlier election time provides a one month "break-in" period which allows the officers-elect to become familiar with their offices and duties prior to taking over after spring recess.

At the same time, students will vote on another proposal which would create a mechanism for dissolving the College Council (see Box page 7). Acceptance of the proposal would not spell the elimination of the present Council; the amendment represents only a safeguard against the rise of an entrenched or unresponsive council.

The Council agreed to experiment with a centralized voting location in Baxter Hall for this January ballot. Chris Jenkins '80, Vice-president, believes that this new procedure should reduce the chance of fraud, mishandling of ballots, and other election irregularities.

Representatives earlier rejected Simpson's challenge of their right to review all student votes on referendums, elections, and constitutional amendments. The Council decided, however, that automatic approval would occur if 50 per cent or more of students on campus voted on the January ballot. A smaller turnout would allow the Council to retain its option to review the outcome of the vote.

Forum raises questions over sexual identities

by Pamela Harff

"We all live in a time of cultural shift in which definition of masculinity and feminity are undergoing possible change," said Daniel O'Connor, Dean of the College, in his opening remarks to "Identities," the first in a series of panel discussions entitled "Understanding Male-Female."

In a discussion of stereotypes, Barbara Joslyn of Psychological Services said that a woman "is held back by the notion that she should get her identity from her family, from being a wife and a mother." Karen Eppler '81, however, saw another side—that a woman's nurturing ability makes her "more of a support system." Michael Henderson, co-Chaplain, wanted to be part of this system, and disagreed with statements such as "men aren't good at bringing up children."

The audience rejected the notion brought up by Ben Sanchez, '79 about the possibility of living as a genderless society. The audience, while recognizing the variety of possible characteristics saw a need for some differentiation between the sexes. "Everyone has his own sexuality," said Jane Henderson, co-Chaplain.

Peggy Sloane, Director of Career Counseling, noted a study from the Sixties which asserted that although all individuals are not "typically" male or female, they are usually channeled toward being one or the other from birth.

Kathy Schwartz '80, co-director of the Feminist Alliance, then questioned "how many of the so-called feminine qualities are considered inferior because they actually are or because they are related to a woman." O'Connor cited a study in which experts, when checking those traits they considered good for the human race, listed traits that generally are attributed to males.

Dr. Eugene Talbot, College Psychologist agreed with Joslyn, who felt that women have great power because they raise children—the future of society. Talbot said that "this power may be one of the reasons why in the past as well as presently, women have been subjugated by men."

Williams accepts 134 ED applicants

Director of Admissions Phil Smith announced 134 of 450 Early Decision applicants were accepted through the admission office's Early Decision process.

Of the remaining 316 applicants, 74 were rejected and 242 were deferred until the regular selection announcements in April. Male applicants represented 247 of the candidates, 74 being accepted, while female applicants accounted for the remaining 209 positions, 60 of the women being accepted.

Seven black candidates were accepted through the Early Decision process, an increase over last year's three.

Smith said that while this year's Early Decision pool represents a significant decline from last year's 529 applicants—144 of whom were accepted—this year's pool is a stronger group academically.

At the present time though, Williams, along with such schools as Harvard, Princeton and Yale, has received more total applications than at this time last year, prompting Smith to comment that "students are attracted to what they perceive to be educational quality and an academic sense of community."

What's in a name

Last fall the Record broke the controversial story concerning former WCFM president Steve Jackson's alledged embezzlement of radio station funds and his resulting expulsion. In this issue, reporter Peter Rintels elicits the chances for the recovery of the money involved. The editorial board of the Record considers this matter newsworthy because the recovery of public funds is of inherent interest to that public. In making our decision to further discussion on the subject of recovery by printing Rintels' article, we made another to publish the name of the individual concerned with the original matter, reversing a previous vote of the Record's governing body.

Any newspaper which claims autonomy must function as a complete source of information on issues and events which it considers a matter of public interest. Only integrity and thoroughness culminate in reports which must, inevitably, dispel rumors, misconceptions, and false accusations. The decision to publish any piece of information must be based on these standards, and on those of good taste. If a newspaper comes upon its information legitimately, presents it fairly, and does not seek to injure innocent people, then it is justified—indeed, obligated—to publish its fullest report for its readers.

The decision to print Jackson's name follows directly from these tenets. We see no reason to protect Jackson in our reports of Honor and Discipline Committee decisions, nor in followup articles.

We cannot agree that Jackson's personal privacy has been violated. The actions of elected student officials must be open to public scrutiny if the interests of the students are to be protected.

Nor can we agree that the Record, in its previous vote to publish the original story, violated the confidentiality of the Honor and Discipline Committee. There must be a distinction between the decision-making process in that committee and the decision itself. The Record has no right to influence the former, but every obligation to report the latter, which is of inherent concern to every student at Williams. Withholding such information is more dangerous than publishing it, for it punishes those involved with the misinformation and rumors which circulate in place of confirmed facts.

We have heard, too, the argument that we are needlessly dragging Jackson's name through the mud, and again we cannot agree. Jackson's reputation was soiled not by reports in the Record, but by the decisions of the administration and the Honor and Discipline Committee that his actions were serious enough to warrant his expulsion. We have in fact never so much as reported that Jackson did anything at all; the shroud of secrecy surrounding the events of this case leaves us far too removed from the evidence to even begin to make judgments about what actually happened, although we like to think that those people who voted to expel Jackson did not do so without good cause. In any case, we do not feel that any legitimate interests would be protected by our failing to report any facts that we are willing to vouch for.

Beneath their Peaceful Shadows

This year, as a senior, is the first time during my college career in which I've felt I was a member of the Class of 1979. As a freshman, I suppose I somehow knew that I was a freshman through-and-through; but it was a murky sort of feeling, not really the sharp realization that makes a senior so class-oriented.

During the freshman year, although everyone knows he or she is a freshman, there doesn't seem to be much of a class yet. No character has developed. It's something like the state of nature as described by Hobbes: the war of all against all. Freshman are, understandably, too distrustful of one another. Think of what went through your mind upon meeting your freshman roommate: is he going to be valedictorian, or perhaps captain of lacrosse? Does he have any money? Is he a virgin? Does he lie? et cetera.

When you think about it, freshmen actually get along extremely well. To put 500 total strangers together in a place like Williamstown and expect them to be great friends after three days is quite unrealistic, but it really doesn't work so badly.

Still, though, there's that underlying feeling of mistrust that comes from ignorance of each other. That's one thing about seniors: they have few secrets.

The sophomore year I found to be the wasteland that everybody always says it is. The school is still unfamiliar, and the other sophomores are still pretty unknown quantities. The first semester is especially useless. Then, second semester, what amounts to the third most important event (after Freshman Days and Commencement) in a class's college history takes place: the selection of junior advisors. For the first time, the class seems to take on a character in its own, as well as others' eyes. This event also ushers in an era of responsibility for the class, as its members begin to assume roles of substance in the workings of the College.

At about the same time, the class becomes divided into majors. Even though this is a quiet event, compared to the volatile J.A. selection, it is quite important, since it both partitions up the class (especially senior year) and draws majors in the same discipline closer.

The junior year firms things up. Now, for the most part, you know who the valedictorian, the lacrosse captain, and the virgins and liars are. Once those hurdles are passed, people become less competitive and more resigned to their positions. Also, most organizational and committee positions are filled during the junior year, establishing the "campus leaders." At this point—the end of the junior year—the class's character is pretty well set; it only needs to be put into action.

That happens during the senior year. But something else happens as well. The competition among class members, which began during Freshman Days, has stopped for the most part. The only real friction between the members comes from medical and law school admissions, but 99 per cent of the class seems to handle the problem with tact. There's always at least one who feels he must announce his acceptance to, say, Harvard Business School to all the campus, but luckily by the senior year most have language requirements

To the editor:

We would like to clear up some inaccuracies or misunderstandings in account (January 9, 1979) of the recommendations of the Working Group on the Non-Major Curriculum.

First of all, our report contains no recommendation that Williams "require all students to elect two semesters of a foreign language." It does note the alarming extent to which Williams students neglect or avoid foreign language study. But as the report indicates, the members of the Working Group have not yet made up their minds about whether to recommend a "language requirement"—or about what sort of "language requirement" might be appropriate. The report outlines what we see as the range of possible responses in this area, but does not endorse any one of them.

It should also be understood that our report is a preliminary report. Its purpose at this stage of things is to serve as a catalyst for formal and informal discussion, by students and faculty, of the issues with which it deals. It is only after being informed and advised by such discussion that the Working Group will make its final recommendations to the Faculty.

We welcome the Record's coverage of our preliminary recommendations; such coverage will clearly play a useful role in encouraging community discussion of the non-major curriculum at Williams. And each of us stands ready to answer the questions, or hear the opinions, of anyone interested in our deliberations.

Winter Study apathy

To the editor:

We were the student members of the Winter Study Review Committee which has recently completed a proposal for changes in the Winter Study program. This proposal will be discussed by the Committee on Educational Policy and is subject to faculty approval.

The results of a poll conducted last spring showed that one of the main drawbacks of Winter Study as perceived by the faculty is a lack of student and faculty motivation. Analysis of faculty attitudes led the committee to conclude that the lack of faculty enthusiasm for Winter Study is directly related to what many faculty perceive as inadequate motivation and willingness to work on the part of a substantial number of students. Yet our poll of the class of 1978 showed that the very large majority of students believe most of their Winter Study projects have high educational value.

Whether or not our proposal is adopted, the future success of Winter Study clearly depends upon the enthusiastic support of both faculty and students. We would therefore urge our fellow students to demonstrate this month their belief in the educational value of Winter Study by approaching their projects with enthusiasm and with the determination to work effectively.

"fear of failure"

To the editor:

I think I can elaborate on Prof. Hoppin's "fear of failure". Coming from an innovative, flexible secondary school, I was appalled by some of the unimaginative work my first semester instructors demanded. Granted, I chose courses in departments in which I was fairly comfortable, but I was loathe to cater to the dry assignments those courses involved. Willing to risk the grade for self-satisfaction and creativity's sake, I intentionally avoided the simple-minded answers my professors expected and which I knew I was fully capable of providing. It didn't work. Even in my so-called gut course my energy was misinterpreted. I am not frustrated by the mediocre grades I received for the semester, only with the conventionality of my very establishment professors. I took Stu Massad's risk but got no encouragement whatsoever. I doubt that I will try it again.

nuclear power

To the Editor:

A recent issue of The Record, you carried a front page photo of a group of people staging a nuclear "radiation accident." I would like to present another point of view concerning nuclear power, one expressed by Paul Johnson, former editor of The New Statesman (1965-70). The point is signigicant because Mr. Johnson was, for many years, a leading member of the intellectual left in Britain and a member of the British Labor Party.

In an address entitled, "Has Capitalism a Future? A Historian's View," Mr. Johnson says this: "Now it is a fact, a very remarkable fact in my view, that throughout the West (we have no figures for Russia or China) the nuclear power industry is the only industry, which over 30 years has contrived to avoid a single fatal industrial accident. Its record is unique, and has been achieved by the efforts of the industry itself, and the responsible governments, without any assistance from the ecology. But of course, they would like a few fatal accidents. That would suit their purposes very well."

Until [redacted] become a widespread reality, we will have to depend on proven sources of energy, of which nuclear power is a clean, safe and inexpensive example.

"The committee felt the program had to be shored up"

Winter Study was inaugurated ten years ago with much fanfare among both students and faculty. Since that time, student enthusiasm for Winter Study has remained high, while the faculty has become increasingly critical. Last April, President Chandler established the Winter Study Review Committee to determine if any changes should be made.

The committee polled every member of the faculty and last year's graduating seniors to determine how WSP is received by the College community. To no one's surprise, the polls indicated that there is widespread criticism of WSP among the faculty, while the students overwhelmingly approve of the program.

The faculty's major complaint was that students display a lack of rigor and seriousness in approaching their Winter Study courses. It was felt that the apparent lack of enthusiasm among students tends to reduce faculty morale, which further reduces student enthusiasm.

On the other hand, many faculty members believe that WSP offers many benefits such as a change of pace, the chance by students and faculty to explore new areas, and the opportunity to concentrate in one subject. Most members of the faculty did feel that some change has to be made in WSP however.

Although students in our poll overwhelmingly approve of WSP, many feel that student commitment to their courses is too low. One interesting result of the poll was that students who put more time into their Winter Study courses tend to find those courses more enjoyable and more valuable educationally.

The committee agreed that the major benefits cited in the faculty poll were among the most valuable aspects of Winter Study. We also believed that a major benefit of WSP is that students can take advantage of activities on campus that they would not have time for during the semester. The committee recognized the problems of WSP and felt that the program had to be shored up.

Joel Smith '79 is a student member of the WSP Review Committee. He has also served on the CUL and the College Council.

The proposal to introduce a "low pass" to the grading system is aimed at the problem of lack of student rigor. Students doing just the minimum of work required, but displaying little enthusiasm or commitment toward their course would receive a low pass. Stuidents receiving a low pass would get full credit for their WSP, but the grade would be a black mark on their transcript.

One reason for making this proposal was that the pass-fail system apparently was not working very well because almost no one fails WSP. Significantly, this posposal does not call for the creation of a "high pass" or "honors pass" grade. The high pass was rejected by the committee because its implementations would probably cause students to be more competitive and therefore would discourage experimentation in the selection of courses.

Reducing the faculty teaching requirements from teaching two of three to one of two Winter Study Periods is a response to strong faculty sentiment. Faculty members believe that the teaching of WSP sacrifices valuable research time. They argue that giving the faculty more time to do their own research would improve the quality of regular semester courses.

While not entirely buying this argument, the student members of the committee agreed to allow the implementation of this proposal provided that student faculty ratio in WSP remain unchanged. The loss in faculty teaching time in WSP would be made up for by bringing in more outside instructors. One benefit for students in this proposal is that the use of more outside instructors most likely will increase the diversity of course offerings.

As a guideline, students should be expected to do (and therefore faculty to assign) a minimum of 15 hours of work per week on their WSP courses. The main justification for this was the student poll, which indicates that as students put more time into their Winter Study course, they tended to find them more valuable.

The committee feels that if the very easy courses were eliminated, students might begin to take Winter Study more seriously. By requiring only about two hours of work a day from students, a great deal of free time is still left to pursue other interests. This proposal is only a guideline because it would be impossible to administer uniformly.

These and the other proposals of the Winter Study Review Committee are not only significant for what they do, but for what they do not do. By not calling for a full fledged grading system and by keeping the required workload relatively low, the committee proposals will not alter the pace of the Winter Study Period. The atmosphere of Winter Study will still be a relaxed one in which students will have time to take advantage of campus activities. By making these proposals we are trying to alleviate the problems of Winter Study while maintaining the valuable aspects of the program.

Proposals to reform WSP

The Winter Study Review Committee recently released its recommendations on the future shape of WSP. Although these are only suggestions, they are the first step in a comprehensive reevaluation of the College's curriculum now underway in the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) and other administrative groups.

"It appears that the Faculty will not be asked to take any formal action relating to Winter Study until March or April," explained President John Chandler. The CEP will await proposals of the Working Group on the Curriculum before making a final assessment of Winter Study recommendations. Chandler added that "there will be provision for informal discussions of the WSP proposals during the next couple of months."

These are the proposals put forth by the Winter Study Review Committee at last month's faculty meeting:

"All WSP projects be graded on a pass, low pass, fail basis. A student failing a winter study project in the freshman, sophomore or junior years be allowed to make up the deficiency by taking two projects during the next WSP period. A senior will take an extra course in the spring semester.

"Faculty teaching loads be reduced to offering a project during one of every two WSP's instead of two of every three. January taken as part of a full year leave would not be taken into account in determining WSP teaching obligations. In the case of one semester leaves, only one out of every two taken consecutively would be reckoned as a WSP.

"The number of qualified staff members, spouses, alumni, and other non-faculty instructors who teach WSP projects be increased with the aim of meeting the reduction in the number of courses offered by faculty during WSP.

"A tenured member of the faculty be appointed Coordinator of Winter Studies for a three year period to serve as the principal administrative officer of the program and chairman of the Winter Study Committee.

"The Winter Study Committee consists of three faculty members, one from each division, including the Coordinator who will be chairman and three students appointed by the College Council. Although the Coordinator will have broad discretionary powers, all WSP courses, projects and budget allocations must be approved by the committee.

"After three years of operation under the changes recommended above, the WSP be reviewed again by the faculty in order to determine the viability and effectiveness of the program."

The review committee also evolved a series of guidelines to be "the basis for normal operating procedures affecting students, faculty and those dealing with the administration of WSP."

These include suggestions that students put in a minimum of 15 hours a week on projects, that grading "not usually be based exclusively on expertise . . . but also on the effort and seriousness of purpose which students have devised." Freshmen would be discouraged from taking 99s, and all students encouraged to take an internship WSP as an upperclassman. Further, the guidelines propose helping to organize 99s early in the semester and prohibiting approval of 99s proposed after publication of WSP course listings.

For faculty the guidelines recommend instructors gather student reactions and refrain from setting "arbitrarily low enrollment restrictions." Also, the review recommends that all instructors submit preliminary project descriptions by the end of spring semester.

99's, faculty reductions hit

The proposals of the WSP review committee have paid more attention to faculty misgivings about a program which inconveniences them than to student suggestions to improve a very important part of the academic year.

The report states that the WSP Committee "will set up a timetable that will encourage students to organize projects as early as possible in the fall semester." The emphasis should be on encourage as well as on early. Students should be encouraged to think about and above all organize their 99s earlier than they often do. They should be encouraged to put together 99s, early or not.

Ninety-nines are less often the vacations than they are imagined to be, and when they are, the solution is to enforce some guidelines rather than discourage independents altogether. A well put together 99 is the ideal solution for professors who want more time for their own work and who are concerned about minimal efforts on the part of the students.

The 99 is above all the best outlet for a lot of inquisitive energy. Students could experiment on group projects as well as on individual ones. This would cut down on the number of projects to be sponsored, freeing faculty time.

With the combined talents of the student body and a guiding faculty, there is no reason for 99s to be a waste of time. At present, many departments feel that they are a waste, and indeed many discourage discovery projects, which involve exploration into fields with which the student is not already familiar. As an added incentive to faculty, sponsorship of 99s might be made a substitute for teaching a WSP course.

These are all suggestions which were made at the widely attended meeting on the Winter Study program held last fall. The review committee sponsored the meeting to probe student opinion and gather insights, as well as publicize faculty concerns, in preparation for their report.

The report suggests that students not be allowed to choose the 99 route after the publication of the WSP catalog. Publication of the catalog is not some sort of magic unveiling at which all fates must be decided. It is ridiculous to expect everyone to decide whether to design an independent before seeing the alternatives. Despite hopes, catalog courses cannot satisfy everyone. Greater flexibility and participation in 99s—while maintaining high standards—might come from publishing the WSP catalog earlier in the semester with a common late October deadline for submission of all project proposals.

The report further falls into the usual Williams nonsense when it suggests that freshmen be discouraged from posposing 99s and prohibited from having off-campus 99s. Freshmen are perennially treated by the College as babes in the woods. The College would be wise to realize that freshmen are often more adult than many upperclassmen and therefore treat them a little less paternalistically.

The committee also suggests that the Winter Study "coordinator" or Winter Study act as sponsor for faculty members wishing to teach courses outside of departmental jurisdiction. It is unfortunate that faculty are not simply given leeway to teach what they want to teach. After all, their experiments benefit the entire College. There is no need for departments to demand that professors teach courses only within their discipline, as some now do.

Winter Study should de-emphasize departmental distinctions and dry academics. Many students at the fall WSP forum said Winter Study should be a time when things are different, with different modes of learning, more cultural events and more time to socialize. Williams shouldn't be a club, but WSP shouldn't fall victim to concerns that it is not academically rigorous.

Faculty demands for more time to prepare spring courses and to conduct research have been partially met by the reduction in the WSP faculty course load from two out of three to one out of two years.

A reduction in faculty requirements for WSP reduces the number of faculty available in a given January term. To avoid increasing class size and decreasing course offerings—something this change could bring about—the committee has wisely recommended the use of more non-faculty instructors. This is not only a pragmatic solution but one very much in the spirit of Winter Study. By bringing in outsiders, the College will foster a more non-academic Winter Study program.

The committee's idea of nominating an administrator for the program who would recruit visiting staff members and expand the possibilities for internships is another sound one. The administrator should be active in recruiting people who are prominent in their fields. Winter Study is an excellent time to establish concentrated seminar programs in a variety of fields. More consideration should be given to finding the means to finance lecture programs and seminars with national figures.

Internship programs need to be fostered. Many students come to Williams expecting Winter Study to be a work-study period. Proposals have been made to organize an OCC January internship "bank" with a listing of contacts for volunteer positions and already organized programs.

Some of the committee's proposals—such as the limitations on freshmen and the arbitrary deadline on 99s—are silly. Others allay justified faculty concerns. Winter Study can only be improved, however, if the proposals answering student concerns are rigorously and carefully implemented. While the review committee has followed many student concerns, it cannot ensure that these concerns will survive in the arena of faculty politics.

enough class to refrain from public announcements designed primarily to hurt the feelings of the less lucky.

Seniors, especially at this time of year, begin to miss each other, and the school as well. Contrary to underclassmen's impressions or speculations, most seniors don't go through the year in abject horror of the future. Perhaps most of the comfort, corny as it sounds, lies in the fact that Williams is a school to which recruiters still come. Maybe that $7000 a year pays off in the end. I doubt if UMass seniors are so calm.

The sense of an ending weighs heavily on the senior class, encouraging the view that, no matter what has happened during the other three years, we're all in the same boat. College, like life, is "nasty, brutish, and short." Much too short.

Cap and Bells sponsors Albee's theatrical coup of the season

by Nina Murphy

After months of financial negotiations and ecstatic expectations, Williams' own Cap and Bells has pulled off the theatrical coup of the season with last Thursday night's presentation of "Albee Directs Albee: The American Dream and The Zoo Story."

Produced by internationally renowned Mark Hall Amitin and directed by the author in absentia, "Albee Directs Albee" boasts a competent cast and a repertoire of all seven of Edward Albee's one-act plays. Both The American Dream and The Zoo Story are among the playwright's earliest works and laid the foundation for Albee's reputation as perhaps the greatest dramatist in contemporary American theatre. Happily, the current revival of these two plays remains scrupulously faithful to the wonderful dramatic complexity of the original scripts, no doubt due to the very palpable directorial presence of the author. Both productions triumphantly evoke that unique blend of macabre comedy and poignant pathos that characterizes the best of Albee's works.

The American Dream is both a hilarious and sardonic expose of the hypocrisy, materialism and flaming idiocy inherent in the modern American household. The three major inmates of Albee's familial asylum include Mommy, an irrepressible harpy with a nifty penchant for castration; Daddy, an emotionally emasculated milksop whose only function is to supply enough dough to assuage Mommy's thirst for conspicuous consumption; and Grandma, a spunky old moralist who has a bon mot more at the ready than she can stand. Add to this charming picture the presence of one Mrs. Barker, the local socialite and "professional woman," whose idea of emancipated socializing is doffing her dress so as to be "more comfortable," and you have the makings of a very bizarre and very funny play.

The theme of the play is sterility, encompassing both the sexual and social spheres of the drama. Mommy and Daddy are about as sexually attractive to both the audience and each other as a couple of clammy codfish. Mommy unabashedly informs the audience that Daddy's desire has been conveniently excised by the surgeon's scalpel: "Daddy has tubes now, where he used to have tracts."

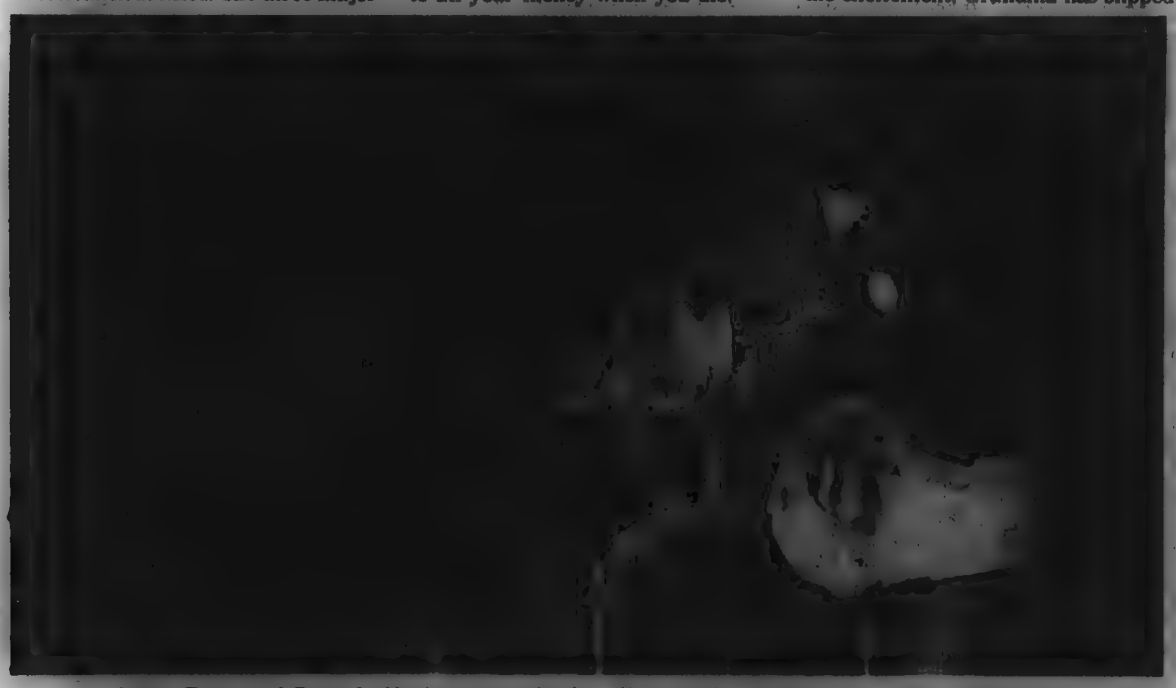
Take the three major inmates: an irrepressible harpy, an emotionally emasculated milksop and a spunky old moralist . . .

No longer does Mommy have to worry about fulfilling her half of the marital arrangement. Sex for Mommy has been a distasteful but necessary means of obtaining financial security. She announces to Daddy "I have a right to live off of you because I married you, and because I used to let you get on top of me and bump your uglies; and I have a right to all your money when you die."

In this atmosphere of Love American-Style, Grandma decides to blow the rap on the family skeleton, and relates to Mrs. Barker the story of her grandson. Many years ago Mommy and Daddy decided it might be fun to have a child, but mutual impotence forced them to resort to the Bye-Bye Adoption Service, then under the direction of Mrs. Barker. Through her efforts Mommy and Daddy managed to procure a "little bumble of joy," aptly named since it soon became the bane of its parents' existence. It seems that the trials and tribulations of Bringing Up Bumble tried Mommy's patience a bit too far. Whereas Daddy's potential as a male threat was erased through psychological castration at his spouse's hand, poor Bumble suffered the physical equivalent of Mommy's wrath. Grandma's description of Bumble's gradual dismemberment marks one of Albee's greatest moments of grotesque comedy, and is a furiously funny attack on the blatant inadequacies of American parenthood.

According to Grandma, Mrs. Barker has been summoned again to grant Mommy and Daddy "satisfaction" after their terribly disappointing experience with Bumble number one. Mrs. Barker is saved by the doorbell as in walks The American Dream, an unemployed but self-assuredly gorgeous boy. Strangely enough this prospective Bumble number two appears to be none other than the long-lost twin brother of the late Bumble number one. Through his sympathetic identification with "his twin, The American Dream has been left emotionally crippled by his brother Bumble's physical dismemberment. But Mommy and Daddy aren't put off by such a silly trifle as that; they are ecstatic with their conveniently full-grown replacement, so much so, in fact, that they hardly notice Grandma's absence. During the excitement, Grandma has slipped out, presumably in order to die so that she might permanently free herself from her progeny's madness.

Patricia Kilgarriff portrayed a delightfully despicable Mommy, while Wyman Pendleton's Daddy was hilarious in his ineptitude. The accomplished Eileen Burns created a perfectly inane Mrs. Barker, although a few muffed lines cast some shadows on an otherwise shining performance. Stephen Rowe was credibly pompous as the preening new Bumble, but his rather bedraggled and paunchy appearance fell quite short of the ideal man in my eyes, unless, of course, Albee was intending an ironic comment on the degenerating quality of all our American dreams.



Catherine Bruno provided the sole disappointment as Grandma. Her unmistakably juvenile voice belied her character's eighty-five years by at least six decades. Unfortunately this glaring anomaly cannot be attributed to Albee's intention of disguising a youthful spirit in wrinkled clothing; it is simply bad casting.

. . . and you have the makings of a very bizarre and very funny play.

Both Pendleton and Rowe came into their own in The Zoo Story. Albee's story of one man's desperate attempts and failures at communication is both explosive and bittersweet. Stephen Rowe, as the guilt-ridden homosexual Jerry, created a powerful character tormented by private fears and loneliness. In the course of his wanderings homeward from the Central Park Zoo, he happens upon Peter, a conservative, elderly book-publisher played by Wyman Pendleton. In a captivating series of tirades, verbal provocations and harrowing soliloquies Jerry manages to capture and hold the attention of the ineffective and fearful Peter.

During their decidedly one-sided conversation, Jerry forces his horrible life story upon his unwilling acquaintance. Through several sly allusions the audience realizes that Jerry has submitted himself to the squalid, tortured existence of a homosexual prostitute, allowing himself only the most superficial and demeaning contact with other human beings. His desperate cries for salvation remain unanswered; he is left only "with God who is a colored queen," referring to his neighbor and probably lover in his filthy tenement.

Wyman Pendleton's Peter was a marvelously complex creation. The raw power of Jerry's personality and plight might easily dominate the play, but Pendleton's evocation of an introverted, stagnated executive was very effective in balancing the drama. Peter is revealed as something of a corporate failure, forever trapped in that no-man's-land of middle management. He, too, is riddled with private fears. In the final explosive climax of the play, he is forced to recognize Jerry against his will . . . by killing him. Jerry's manipulation of Peter as the means of his suicide-murder is revealed as the only possible conclusion to this sordid drama. As Peter holds Jerry's knife in defense against the latter's final, fatal tirade, Jerry rushes Peter and impales himself. Through the ambiguous complicity of this suicide-murder, Peter is forced to recognize the existence of a human being he might have otherwise ignored completely.

McGhee, Terry sing blues

by Ben Gruder

Brownie Maghee, accompanied by himself on guitar and on harmonica by Sonny Terry, sang the type of blues that most people, including myself, are familiar with. The terms I can think of to best describe it are introspective and meditative. Maghee did not stand apart from his music. He spoke through his guitar. I have rarely heard anything so beautiful as his free solos, especially in "I'm just a stranger in town". He is comfortable with playing softly and silently. He also had his playful, if not downright suggestive, moments, as in "Jelly Roll". At times, it seemed that he was performing for himself, and the audience was there to eavesdrop.

Sonny Terry posed a problem for me. I don't remember having heard his brand of blues before. He has been quoted as saying that the first piece he ever learned was mocking trains. I would say that his rhythm literally had elements resembling a locomotive. His voice was rough and untrained, which seemed to be appropriate. When he wasn't singing, he was playing one of six harmonicas or tapping the microphone. Sometimes he did all three, one quickly following the other. His acrobatics on the harmonica were impressive. Still, it was a challenge for me to listen to his music. I had to drop the expectation of hearing full-sounding chords, the regular rhythm that is possible on the guitar, and a neat, polished structure to the songs. As I did that, I began to appreciate it more.

The huge, very psyched crowd seemed a little out of place. When I have heard blues sung, it has been in a small group of people. It was hard to get used to the idea that the crowd had not assembled to hear the usual loud and driving bass.

The audience, in general, had a good time throughout the concert, despite the fact that, true to the nature of blues, it heard only three different chords. It is encouraging seeing Williams students getting into something not usually heard on the radio. This concert featured true folk music in an unspoiled form, and I think it touched all of us.

Singers start group

by Cassy Killpe

Soon joining the ranks of musical organizations like the Ephlats and the Octet will be a new female singing group. Organizers Kristan Dale, Kyle Doherty, Amy Winterer, and Kathy Oram are gathering a collection of show tunes, Barbershop Quartet songs, and oldies but goodies for the approximately twelve members.

The group's repertoire will emphasize the musical sound of the eras when women's groups like the Andrews' Sisters were popular. According to Dale, there is evidently "a need or a want" for such a group since twenty-five students have expressed interest in auditioning. Dale hopes to schedule a performance "at least after a month of practice."

The sign-up sheet for auditions will be posted in Baxter mailroom on January 17. Tryouts will be held January 24 and 25, February 1 and 2.

Changes advised in Winter Study

Has the Winter Study Program been heading downhill?

During the past couple of years, this question and others have been raised about the academic value of Winter Study. So last spring a committee was appointed to thoroughly review the program. After detailed analysis the committee concluded that Winter Study deserves to stay, but that some changes should be made which would enhance its educational value.

Biology Professor William Grant was made committee chairman. He directed a survey of the faculty, the Class of 1978 and prospective students to determine attitudes toward Winter Study.

There was an exceptionally high (96 per cent) faculty response to the survey. Three major concerns emerged:

1) There seems to be an increasing lack of student motivation, breeding a parallel decrease in faculty commitment.

2) The workload on the faculty is excessive.

3) Course standards appear to vary. Some courses are easy, others exceptionally difficult.

While a sizeable majority feels the Winter Study period has obvious advantages, says Grant, "a rather substantial number of faculty called for abolition."

Grant says that the student response, while not as statistically high as the faculty's, was predictably unanimous in favor of Winter Study, though some students voiced concern about the commitment of others.

Prospective students rated Winter Study a factor in their decision to apply, but not the most important one. Admissions Director Philip F. Smith agrees, but points out that Winter Study can be an especially strong determinant in a "head-to-head" situation, between Williams and a college which does not offer a comparable experience.

The Winter Study Review Committee has recommended a number of changes in the program to President Chandler. He is asking the College Committee on Appointments and Promotions and Committee on Educational Policy to study them and to make recommendations to the faculty about Winter Study changes.

A New Grading System

1) The Winter Study Committee has recommended that projects be graded on a pass, low pass and fail basis. Adding low pass to the grading system would give faculty a way of evaluating "students who do indifferent or perfunctory work. The assumption," according to the report, "is that students are concerned enough with what appears on their transcripts" that they will "avoid a low pass on their record." An honors, pass, fail system was not recommended because the committee feared it would "tend to introduce unproductive competition for grades."

2) The committee recommended that a student who fails a Winter Study project in the first three years be allowed to make it up by taking two projects in the next Winter Study period. A senior would take an extra course in the spring semester.

Reduced Teaching Loads

1) Faculty members now teach two out of every three Winter Study periods. The review committee has recommended that the teaching load be cut back to one of every two periods. The committee believes that in order to "attract and keep good faculty it is important that faculty members be allowed ample time to pursue professional activities, and to prepare courses for the regular semesters."

2) Since there would be a reduction in the number of courses offered by faculty members, the Winter Study Review Committee is recommending an increase in the number of qualified staff members, spouses, alumni and other non-faculty instructors who teach Winter Study courses.

Winter Study Administration

1) The committee recommends that a tenured faculty member "be appointed Coordinator of Winter Studies for a three year period to serve as the principal administrative officer of the program and chairman of the Winter Study Committee." The chairman would be one of three faculty members, one from each division, on the committee. Three students, appointed by the College Council, would also be members. Currently the chairman serves for only one year. So each year the Winter Study Committee loses its most experienced member.

Review Of The Program

The committee has recommended that the Winter Study Program be reviewed again by the faculty after three years to determine how well it is working.

Free University topics diverse

The idea behind a January institution at Williams, the Free University, is teaching and learning ... just for fun. No grades. No academic credit. Just learning.

According to Kathanne Wray '80, coordinator of the Free University, about 700 people have signed up for this year's courses. They run the usual gamut, from things like an introduction to modern Greek to juggling. While most students are from Williams, this is a program open to the public. The price is the same for everybody ... almost nothing.

And the most popular? Ask the 200 people who signed up for jitterbugging, or the disco dancers, who are in second place. There are 40 Free-U courses altogether.

There is no official connection between the Free University and Williams, but the unofficial ties have become quite strong. Many of the courses are taught in College buildings. The minimal costs of things like the catalog and publicity are subsidized by small grants from the College Council and the Winter Study Committee. Students pay for the materials they'll need for classes like watercolor, needlepoint, bread making and wine tasting.

Beyond the teaching and learning of new skills, the Free University presents forums for discussion of serious topics, including nuclear power, perspectives on southern Africa, abortion rights and bioethics.

All that's needed is a subject, a teacher and a student—almost a modern version of Mark Hopkins and the log.

Financial aid widens January's horizons

Winter Study seems to offer a lot for a little This year the Winter Study Program has a budget of $16,500. But only $9,000 of that is used for things like instructional costs, films and off-campus speakers. The remaining $7,500 is earmarked for financial aid students.

The philosophy has been that Winter Study projects should be equally accessible to all students. Financial aid students in regular Winter Study courses receive half the cost up to $250. The remaining funds are distributed to financial aid students doing 99's, based on academic merit.

There was a substantial demand for financial aid this year because more courses involved expenses. A total of 106 financial aid students received funding, compared to only 61 last year.

Obviously the Winter Study option that is the most expensive and therefore has the most unpredictable financial aid requirements is foreign travel. This year 16 financial aid students received a total of $4,000 in foreign travel stipends. Costs are held down by allowing each department only one major travel project per year, limiting the total number of travel projects and limiting the number of students per trip. One cost the Program used to absorb—travel costs for the instructor—is now often a part of the package arrangement offered by travel agencies.

Alumni teach, study during January term

A little-known Winter Study sidelight is that the size of both the faculty and the student body gets a little larger each January. The additions are a few alumni who return to Williams to teach, and to learn.

It's not a very large number; after all, it involves an entire month. Gene Webb '41 is teaching a course on "The World Bank," drawing on his experience in the legal department of that institution. Steve Satullo '69 teaches "Defining a Documentary Aesthetic." William Cummings '71 instructs a course in "Human Ecology in the Humid Tropics," while Massachusetts Superior Court Judge Charles Alberti '50 is teaching "The Trial Process."

Without a doubt, the record for alumni participation in Winter Study goes to Kay Buttenheim, wife of Donald V. Buttenheim '37. Kay has attended six Winter Study sessions, starting in 1971 when daughter Judy was a junior. Judy wanted to take a course in "Parent-Child Relationships," and the pre-requisite for each student was an accompanying parent! Unfortunately, not enough parents were available, so the course was cancelled. But by that time Kay was hooked on the idea of coming, so she signed up for a course on the geology of Williamstown.

After the first week of studies with her six male co-students, she learned that they were going to choose buddies and go out in the field. Kay said, "I could see these six pairs of eyes wondering who was going to get the old lady!" She decided that both she and they would be relieved if she passed up the field work and she switched to a "Critical Analysis of the Holy Bible."

Since that time she has participated in Winter Study courses in "Can a Person Change?," Scandinavian culture, raku pottery, the Incas and, this year, "Lizzie Borden Took an Axe." Since his retirement, Don has also become a Winter Study student. Last year he studied "Death and Dying" and this year he is enrolled in "The Ascent of Man."

The Buttenheims say they thoroughly enjoy the intellectual stimulation, the chance to learn how today's college student thinks about various topics, and the reasonable price ($150 for one, $200 for a couple). Even a mention of the rigors of Williamstown in January doesn't daunt them. They clearly believe they have discovered a very good thing.

In 1857 the Lyceum of Natural History travelled to Florida for some first-hand learning. Winter Study offers a perfect time for travel, and in 1979 two WSP classes are in Florida. Others are in China, Israel, Russia, England, France and Italy. One class is riding the rails in this country via Amtrak.

Activities initiated by students augmented 1800's curriculum

By Martha Riley Johnson

Library Assistant, Williamsiana

The courses and trips to distant places which are characteristic of the Winter Study period had their counterparts a century or more ago. But since the curriculum then had no electives, the trips were strictly extracurricular.

One way students could pursue a subject not offered by the College was to bring in a course of lectures by private subscription. In this manner Amos Eaton, famous geologist, Williams 1799, was engaged to conduct field studies in mineralogy and botany in 1817, and Ralph Waldo Emerson was invited to give a series of lectures on "American Life" in 1865.

The College's attitude toward these activities varied. When Eaton appeared classes were suspended so students could take full advantage of his visit. In 1865, however, use of the Chapel for the purpose of Emerson's lectures was denied.

Another way to pursue studies was through more permanent associations. The Lyceum of Natural History, founded in 1835, was a notable example. Members prepared talks on scientific matters and formed field expeditions to Nova Scotia in 1835 and 1853, through Berkshire County in 1840, Newfoundland in 1855, Florida in 1857, Greenland in 1860, South America in 1867, and Honduras in 1870. Students even raised money for their own building, Jackson Hall (razed in 1908 and since replaced by Driscoll).

At first members of the expedition met most of their own expenses, but with the longer trips, beginning with Florida in 1857, help was sought from alumni and others through a circular offering shares in the trip. The cost of each expedition was divided into 50 shares and the inducement for buying them was the spoils or specimens left over after the Lyceum's cabinet was filled. Another inducement for buying shares was the opportunity to go. In early years trips were scheduled during vacations, but with trips lasting 2-3 months, no vacation was long enough and appointees had to be excused by the faculty in order to go.

99's show wide range of individual interests

Where are the 99's this year? All over the place, and doing an incredible variety of things.

Many Williams students, for a number of reasons, decide not to take one of the Winter Study courses in the catalog and structure their own instead. This year the results of that kind of creativity range from "Introduction to Film Making" and "Mathematics for Economists" to "Einstein: Life and Work" and "Written Japanese."

More than 250 students are at work on 99's this January. Every student who wants to pursue one must first convince a faculty sponsor of its academic merit. Then the faculty member's department reviews and approves the project. Finally, the members of the Winter Study Committee read each proposal—a time-consuming process considering that recently there have been close to 400 proposals each year.

WSP stands test of time

When the Winter Study Program began 12 years ago, it was a unique experiment in education which had only come about after five years of debate. It was, after all, a major step to devote an entire month to the study of one subject.

The idea was that Winter Study could allow students the opportunity to concentrate their work on one topic, perhaps through an independent course of study, without the sense of competition which accompanies the traditional grading system. And a pass, fail system could encourage students to be adventurous in choosing their courses. For the faculty, Winter Study could be an opportunity to experiment, both in what they teach and how they teach it, without concern about how the course might fit into individual departmental offerings.

A couple of trends developed as the Winter Study Program moved through its first decade. One has been a rising number of courses teaching skills or offering new experiences. Another has been a dramatic increase in the number of 99's, the student-initiated projects.

Winter Study involves a lot of extra work for participating faculty. Is it worth it? Many continue to think so. The appeal of experimentation and new experiences remains strong. As one faculty member commented: "The significant failures of Winter Study could yield more important and more lasting results than its easy successes."

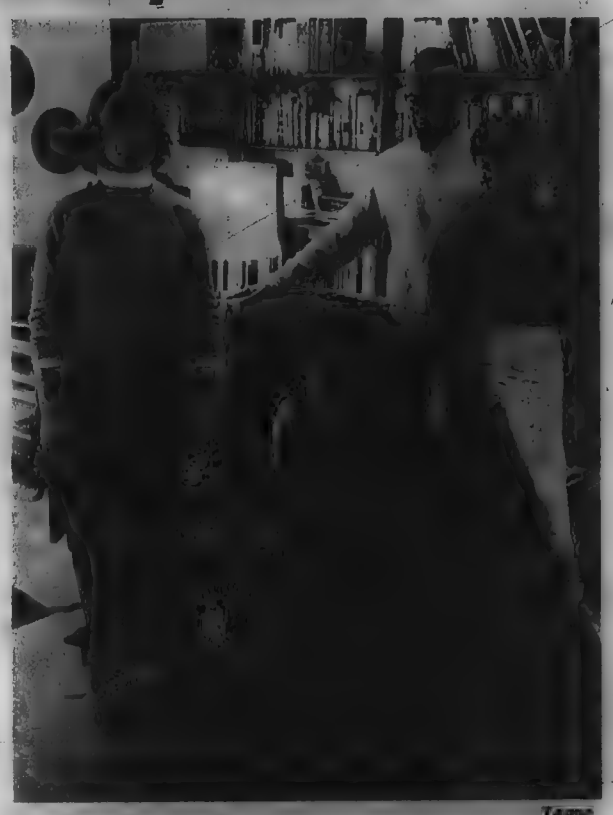
Lewis experience in Botswana was an 18-month family affair

While we slog through the January snow and slush, Economics Professor Stephen R. Lewis, Jr. is in the nation of Botswana in southern Africa. He is no stranger to the country. Lewis, his wife Gayle and their three children lived there for 18 months during 1977-78. Lewis was on leave of absence from Williams, serving as an economic consultant to the government of Botswana.

It may be hard to picture a nation in that part of the world where things seem to be going right. But that is what Lewis and his family found. Unlike its neighbors—South Africa, Rhodesia and Namibia—Botswana, according to Lewis, is not in political turmoil, but rather has a democratically elected black government and even-handed law enforcement.

The extended stay was not Lewis' first to the African nation. In 1975, sponsored by the Ford Foundation, he was in Botswana for a month as consultant to the Ministry of Finance and Development Planning. Two other short trips followed, before the entire family embarked in January, 1977. "Our departure from the U.S. was delayed a day because we were snowed in," said Lewis. "We left in sub-zero weather. Five days later we were baking in Botswana's 100 degree heat."

Botswana challenges stereotypes



The Lewis' lived in Gaborone, Botswana's new capital. A modern city located near the South African border, Gaborone was built after the country became independent in 1966; the administrative capital in colonial days was in South Africa.

Lewis says Gaborone was hardly a hardship post. The family was provided with a three-bedroom cement-block house with most of the amenities of home. But he says a key element of American life—chocolate chips—was missing. Other than that, though, Lewis says the lifestyle was pleasant. The Ford Foundation provided a car. But like most Batswana (Americans are from America, Batswana are from Botswana) the family members did their local travel by bicycle. The children all went to schools which were within a mile of their home.

In the 1890's the chiefs of the three major tribes in Botswana appealed to Great Britain for protectorate status. The chiefs were afraid of being overrun by their neighbors. That possibility, according to Lewis, remains Botswana's principal problem. Its neighbors are not noted for political stability.

Lewis says "Botswana likes to think of itself as an example to white-dominated African nations, proving that blacks can govern in a non-racial way. And they are doing a first-rate job. I was in close contact with the people who were making policy and they are both extremely capable and genuinely fair-minded."

Through Lewis, and now through Associate Professor of Economics Earl McFarland, who is on leave this year to live and work in Botswana, Williams College has invested a great deal of time in the small African nation. Lewis feels it pays off for the College, too. "By coincidence," he says, "I have become knowledgeable about a part of the world that will be increasingly in the news. I can be a resource as people here try to understand events in southern Africa. Also, the things I was actually doing—assisting the Finance Ministry as it borrowed on the Euro/dollar market, advising on aid and trade policy questions—are all topics in political economics courses at Williams. From the actual experience I can bring new ways of looking at things to the classroom.

Tague

Professor Stephen R. Lewis Jr. with Virginia, Mark, wife Gayle, Deborah and family pet Samantha.

"In addition, of course, the experience creates a new set of contacts, both in Botswana and in other countries." Williams for the past 18 years has been closely connected with a large number of Third World nations through the Center for Development Economics. Mid-level government officials from developing nations spend a year at Williams studying the economic problems facing emerging nations. They earn the Master of Arts in Development Economics degree offered by Williams. Members of the College faculty who take leaves to live and work in the developing nations are uniquely qualified to teach at the Center.

Lewis' obvious affection for Botswana heightens his concern for its future. "Botswana's evenhandedness in racial matters will be tougher to uphold as life on the other side of its borders becomes more violent," he says. With another trip planned for spring break, Lewis hopes to continue his assistance to Botswana "as long as they feel it's useful."

He says he found a great personal satisfaction in working for the Batswana. "They have a real sense of purpose," he says. "After all, they are a relatively small number of people trying to make a decent country in the middle of the chaos around them. And they've got a marvelous sense of humor. Maybe it's because their problems are so serious they can't afford to take themselves too seriously."

Music concert wavers

by Jackson Galloway

The third concert of the Music in the Round series seemed like the Williamstown weather, to have its ups and downs. At some moments, everything seemed to jell, and the performance was enthralling. At others, the ensemble degenerated into a rough assemblage of notes.

The program began with the Schumann Trio No. 3 in G minor. This work, although not especially notable, was performed well with few exceptions. Occasionally, the cello rasped out of the continuity of accompaniment to drown out the violin melody, but Mr. Moore achieved a superb blend with both the piano and violin nevertheless. The strings were particularly effective in the Rasch and Kraftig movements in their pizzicato passages which seemed to bounce above the piano's more solid tone. The Trio achieved excellent dynamic control, especially at the swell and fall of the final note in the Ziemlich Langsam movement.

It seems the fewer instrumentalists involved the better the musicianship. In that vein, the Villa-Lobos sonata was truly the highlight of the evening. Even though at times the piano voice lacked some sharpness and definition, the blend between the two instruments was superb, the piano providing a steady base for the flights of the violin. The plaintive sweeps of the violin as they built up towards the finale were well rendered by Mr. Hegyi. He masterfully avoided the sentimentality of excessive rubato through strict tempo control and dynamic expression.

The Mendelssohn Octet proved to be a great disappointment. Probably the best piece of music on the program and a work truly indicative of its composer's genius, the Octet in this performance was a chore to hear. In a couple of instances, the ensemble did manage to produce the fullness of a string choir mixed with the tight, compact sound of a quartet, but the usual effect of the octet was of a fuzzy, amorphous texture. The andante movement was simply run into the ground through lack of innovative treatment of recurring melodic ideas. The scherzo movement was marred by an almost total disregard for the composer's directions on performance and some very sloppy technique on the part of several of the instrumentalists. The scherzo is to be played "staccato and pianissimo throughout" in the composer's own words; nevertheless, his request was only honored in the last few bars when the dynamic level descended from a solid mezze-forte to mezze-piano. Closing the work, the presto movement provided a touch of the classical in some of the quicker passages. Even though the violas and cellos tended to rasp out and cover some of the more delicate first violin lines, the third and fourth violins seemed timid in asserting themselves in the exchange of subject among the voices. On the whole, it seemed that the performance could have used more attention to the finer points of technique and ensemble sound production. In any case, the beauty of the Mendelssohn Octet was undeniable, even in this tarnished performance.

Neil Armstrong will present a 90-minute recitation of poetry by Jean Cocteau Thursday.

Cocteau on Cocteau

Neil Armstrong, Boston, actor, will present a one-man show with the works of French poet Jean Cocteau in translation on Thursday, Jan. 18 at 8:30 pm.

During his 90 minute performance, Armstrong asks his audience to believe that he is the poet himself, reciting and commenting on his own works.

Admission is free.

Hill plays Bach

Harpsichordist Victor Hill will present an all-Bach concert at the Clark Art Institute on Friday, Jan. 19 at 8 pm. On the program are the complete "Two and Three-Part Inventions," the "Italian Concerto," and two shorter works.

Admission is free.

Mime at Clark

The Pocket Mime Theater's cast of four will offer an evening of mime at the Clark Art Institute this Saturday, Jan. 20 at 8:30 pm. The group has received the Silver Medal Award from the Association for the Performing Arts for three consecutive years.

Admission will be $2.50, $2.00 with Williams I.D.

Show features kaleidoscope of characters

Senior creates images of women

by Stephanie Voss

"Kaleidoscope can mean a series of colors, images, or events, as well as the object," explained Cecilia Rubino, '79, as she discussed her up-coming senior honors thesis—a one-women show in which she will present a series of images of women.

Entitled Alice's Kaleidoscope: A Collection of Voices, the show will take place Thursday, Jan. 18 and Friday, Jan. 19 in the AMT studio theatre at 7:30 p.m.

Throughout last semester, Rubino gathered and adapted material about "as many different sorts of things as possible." The characters in her kaleidoscope range from Cleopatra to Anne Frank, and are culled from a variety of sources, including literature, drama, poetry and real life.

Sitting in the snack bar about a week before her opening night, Rubino tried to explain the stack of typewritten pages she held, filled with the images and words of Yeats, Joyce, Eliot, Woolf and others.

Her goal with this project, she said, is to, "extend the limits of myself as an actress." It is more of a challenge than a goal, she claims, but quietly, matter-of-factly. There is not much of an air of doubt about Cecilia Rubino.

Having decided to create her own role, ("I wanted something I could always have," she explained) Rubino "narrowed down" the kaleidoscope by restricting it to women's voices. Then she chose two "polarities" to focus on. The main voice is that of Alice in Alice in Wonderland ("I grew up with her"); the other is Molly Bloom of Ulysses.

Alice will appear often throughout the work, tying bits and pieces together. It is she who asks the opening question—"Who in the world am I?"

Rubino has Alice look for the answer by seeking mirrors of herself in other people. The encounters will take place on a small set, in the course of about an hour, as Rubino portrays first one, then another "possibility."

Last week, still busy working out acting problems, it was a bit difficult for Rubino to evaluate the show as a whole. It was easier for her to talk about the separate aspects of the project so far.

Rubino said she enjoyed very much the opportunity to read an array of works during her search for material—although much of what she read did not find a place in the collection. She said she is also enjoying the chance to "do" a range of characters that actresses rarely get to play.

The difficulties come, she said, because the voices are only snatches of characters. "It's not sustained," she explained. "It's a bit like a survey course—it's hard to avoid being superficial with just a glimpse of this person and then this one."

Most of the difficulties, it is clear, are self-imposed. The work as she described it is a collection of high points, demanding a great deal of energy. Rubino's comment: "Well, people don't write about boring times . . . they're all rather vivid moments." She added, "as an actress, I decided I was going to choose the hardest pieces for me to do."

Rubino elaborated for a moment on the challenges involved in a one-person show. She said, "the energy has to be sustained and within yourself; there's no one else to take over for a moment and give you a chance to breathe . . . It's sort of like a marathon." Then she gathered up Alice, Molly and company and prepared to leave, presumably to rehearse what she terms the "possibility" of woman—of person.

It was a reminder that the project is a performance; that the voices won't exist until there is an audience to hear them. Rubino smiled, acknowledging, "the final result is going to be a surprise."

Jazz groups enrapture all

On Monday night, Jan. 8, the Williams Jazz Ensemble and its guest, the Potsdam New Varsity Jazz Band performed both contemporary and standard jazz works to a large and appreciative audience at the Rathskeller.

The Potsdam Band, under the direction of Steve Constantino, displayed remarkable ensemble playing and execution. The highlight of the group was their female vocalist. Her rendition of "God Bless the Child" brought a near standing ovation.

The Williams Jazz Ensemble, sparked by the great showing of student support, had one of their best performances of the season. The solos; were particularly well done; the sectionals were also well executed. The night ended with a well deserved standing ovation and encores.

This concert marked the beginning of a busy schedule for the Ensemble. Student-run and conducted by Mike Battistelli, the group's repertoire includes works by Herman, Basie, Ferguson and Kenton. On Jan. 17 it will hold a joint concert with the Ephlats. Later in the month, the Ensemble will for the first time represent Williams at the Glassburo Festival. Concerts are also being arranged with UVM, Potsdam and Bennington.

The Williams Jazz Ensemble is working to bring good quality jazz music to the Williams campus, but it needs student support in order to do this. The Monday evening concert proved that with substantial student support and quality performance, contemporary music can flourish at

Amtrak trains carry on romantic US tradition

News Editor Ann Morris, who has been crossing the country by train for her Winter Study project, wrote this article last Wednesday while passing through Nebraska.

Presently on the way to New Orleans, after a stopover in San Francisco, Morris hopes to be able to mail in her reaction to the homes of jazz and trolley cars before returning to Williamstown.

by Ann Morris

McCook, Nebraska, Jan. 11—"A close-up way to see the U.S.A.," Amtrak's poster advertisements proclaim from walls of ancient train stations. Close-up is right; there's the Midwest, with its endless rows of corn and occasional small towns, right out of my window. Today I saw my first grain elevator; yesterday, my first Great Lake. In an airplane I would have missed it all. The knowledge that train travel is a dying institution not only saddens me; it truly puzzles me.

Last night I watched Illinois, then Iowa, speed past from Amtrak's latest second tier glass "dome car." The train lights bouncing off the snowy fields have a mesmerizing effect, and the dark car was silent. But it wasn't an unfriendly, awkward New York City subway silence. It was a quiet that the car's passengers shared out of an unspoken respect for the beauty of the countryside, and the powerful machine that was racing us through the midst of it. Though none of us had met yesterday, and will be parted by tomorrow, last night we were bound close together in the peculiar intimacy that only a train can create. No one aboard a train is a stranger.

Since Amtrak is eternally late, and no one can do anything about it, most people learn to enjoy each other and the countryside. People converse as if they've known each other for years, and on a twenty hour trip, there's enough time so that the conversation isn't hurried. And what a diverse group of Americans; generalizing about a train traveler is impossible.

First I met Mike, an organic Californian on his way to Sacramento after a trying visit ("I found myself getting too heavily into the carbos") with his family in Chcago. Writing his PhD. thesis on junk food addiction, Mike gave me a look of pity when I admitted this was my first trip west. Complete with beard and backpack, he explained he was riding the train to reflect, meet the people, and "figure out the next phase of my life."

At breakfast the steward seated us with a father and his four year old son, both named Adam. The bigger Adam, returning his son to his divorced wife in San Francisco, was born and raised in New York City. Except for when he was serving in the Army during

Hydrotherapy program helps handicapped

Free University has brought Disco fever to Williams. The males, taught by Gary Pooh, seem a little uncomfortable in comparison to their female counterparts, taught by Jackie Logan. Over 150 people will soon be trying out their expertise on the dance floor.

(photos by Gast)

by Ann Reuman

Think for a moment what it would be like to be mentally or physically handicapped. Imagine having permanently stiff leg muscles that make bending your knees painful, if not altogether impossible. Imagine having limited control over jerky body movements, or imagine being slow to learn what others learn more readily. Consider the difficulty and frustration in learning a task as "simple" as sitting on the floor, climbing into a pool, or coordinating your arm and leg muscles enough to swim or play baseball. These are daily hurdles faced by people with cerebral palsy.

Hydrotherapy—perhaps more accurately called Swim-Gym therapy—is a volunteer program organized by the Northern Berkshire County Cerebral Palsy Association which helps handicapped individuals to overcome some of these obstacles. Though partially funded by the Lehman Service Council, hydrotherapy is essentially a community project which draws volunteers from North Adams State, area high schools, and active members of the community as well as from Williams.

Hydrotherapy, says student director Dan Powell, is "a chance to deal with real people of different economic strata;" it provides "exposure to the community," an opportunity to step beyond the bounds of the Ivory Tower of Williams College. Volunteers deal with participants ranging in age from 5 to 40, and in degree of impairment from stiff limbs and speech impediments to severe central nervous system problems and intellectual deficiencies. Handicapped participants come from various economic and home life situations, including lower-middle class and welfare families as well as broken homes.

Hydrotherapy offers the opportunity for a cross-section of college and community members to enjoy participation in a community service.

The primary function of the organization is to provide a relaxed atmosphere which emphasizes communication and participation, and where handicapped people receive individual attention, swimming instruction, and a chance to join in gym and pool activities. For volunteers, the program is both a learning process and a community service. Volunteers develop bonds of friendship with mentally and physically handicapped people who were previously avoided or ignored. Interest in learning and pleasure in success are shared by volunteers and participats alike.

Outlook for hydrotherapy is bright: local handicapped individuals, who welcome and appreciate the help given through the service, look forward to the social and instructive Thursdays of Hydrotherapy at the Northern Berkshire YMCA in North Adams. Says volunteer Whitney Woodruff, "Hydrotherapy breaks the barriers between the handicapped and the rest of us; it dissolves outward differences and brings people together. The enthusiasm shown for the program assures its success and continuation."

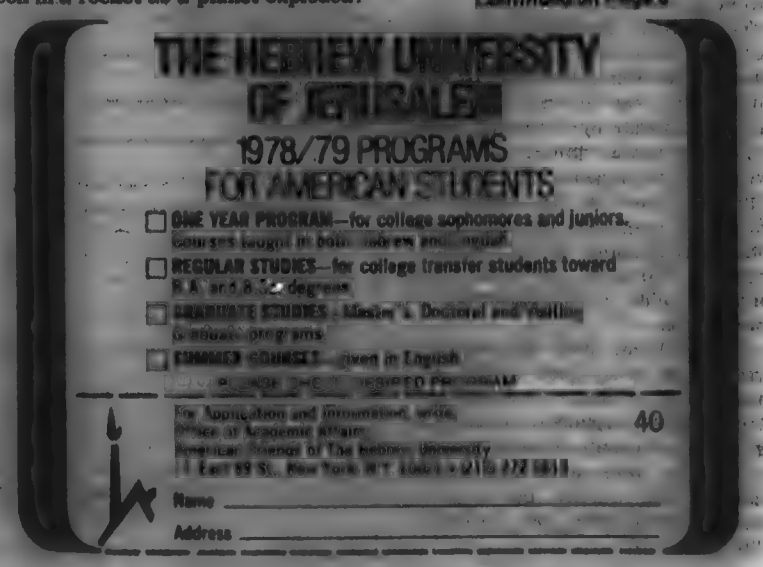
Metamorphoses

Everyone has seen "Superman," we are told. The film is a national phenomenon, according to Newsweek. Apparently that venerable journal has chosen the Man of Steel as Man of the Year. So everyone has seen "Superman." Except me.

Honest, when it comes to hype, I'm as gullible as the next guy. In fact, I sat next to the "next guy" at "Star Wars" and stood behind him in line to buy my Pet Rock. But I refuse to go along with the masses this time. After reading of Marlon Brando's plans for the movie, I could no longer take the project seriously. As you no doubt recall, he wanted to play Jor-el, Superman's father, as a bagel or a green suitcase.

Such ambition is surely laudable in one of our great screen actors. Neither Lord Lawrence Olivier nor Red Buttons ever dared attempt such a thespian feat. Of course, there were certain logistical and logical problems. For example, how could a piece of baked dough with a hole in the middle sire an infant? Would an article of luggage possess the calmness and foresight to send off its son in a rocket as a planet exploded?



So out of respect for the belief that fathers and sons should belong to the same species (or at least both be animate objects) I declined numerous chances to see the movie over Christmas break. However, I did spend time giving thanks that Marlon hadn't come up with such schemes earlier in his career.

Imagine, if you can, "On the Waterfront" starring the voice of Marlon Brando coming from a hat-rack, or "Mutiny on the Bounty," with Mr. Christian portrayed as a talking breadfruit plant. Julius Caesar as a salad, or perhaps as an Ide of March. Of course, some possibilities are suggested by the titles of the films. In "A Streetcar Named Desire," he could have played Stanley Kowalski as a trolley, a foreshadowing of the later "My Mother the Car." Finally, in "Last Tango in Paris," Brando could have been . . . Well, I'll leave that one to your imagination.

So with the time I didn't waste standing in long lines to see "Superman," I was able to waste time over vacation in a more traditional Williams' way: watching television. Of course, at school this is a luxury

Journalists describe careers

Futures in magazines

by Dori Goldman

"Magazine publishing careers don't exist but have to be made," said Porter Bibb, publisher of US magazine last Thursday at the OCC panel discussion entitled "From Here to Publishing: Pens, Papers, Publications." Other panelists outlined a college graduate's chances of securing a job in the field.

Charles Whittingham, publisher of Life, listed circulation, advertising, and promotion as the best areas to enter Life, or the publishing business in general. He also stressed the importance of knowing what other areas are expanding.

"You must do research before you apply for a job to know where the openings may be," said Whittingham. He also stressed the money-making side of the business, saying, "Great journalism is important, but you also have to make a profit."

Bibb, cited the magazine industry as one of the few cottage industries left. "The business is open to entrepreneurs," he said. "Nothing can stop anyone from putting out a magazine. The cost isn't that much and printers will give you a few free issues to see what happens."

Bibb used himself as an example, having started Rolling Stone on $2500. To those who do not wish to start a magazine, but just to work for one, Bibb emphasized motivation:

Lorraine Gracey, copywriter for Vogue, rejected the traditional rules for getting jobs such as staying at your first job for a year, presenting a resume, and being satisfied with your job and just doing it well.

"The longer you allow yourself in a small job, the longer your superiors will think you are unpromotable," she said. Noting that all New York City first jobs are "low paying and boring," she added that "one should try to exercise your talent as soon as possible. Ask for everything!"

David Hartwell, editor of the Science Fiction and Fantasy Department of Pocketbooks, concluded the panel, stating that he published not to make money but because he "loved it."

Opportunities in books

by Peter Struzzi

Prospective authors should write as much and as many things as possible, from essays to movie reviews, Gary Cohen of Heron House Publishers said last Friday at the "From Here to Publishing" seminar.

Organized by the Office of Career Counseling and Peter Verstappen '58, Chairman of Heron House Publishing Company, the seminar featured five representatives from the publishing world, who spoke to students on prospective careers.

Patrick Filley, senior editor of Times Books, described his experiences, emphasizing the "long hours, typing and answering phones," that preceded any promotion.

Lindy Hess, editorial manager at Doubleday and Dolphin Books, highlighted job opportunities in today's publishing world, listing such areas as designing book jackets, and covers, sales, publicity, the writing of press releases, and arranging author tours and television interviews.

According to Hess, Doubleday hires college seniors as trainees, in different departments and will give juniors the chance to work over the summer to get a "sense of exposure" to the many areas of publishing.

Cohen commented on the importance of using "simple, elegant language that does not alienate a reader and advised college students to make professors criticize not only their ideas but also the expression of those ideas.

Dan Okrent, packager and formerly an editor at Harcourt Brace, spoke on the particular problems and rewards of being a "one man publishing house."

David Hartwell, in head of science fiction at Pocketbooks, commented on the state of mass-market paperback publishing, and on the industry in general, which he described as a "nervewracking, intense" business filled with a "rapid turnover of events."

All the speakers stressed the fact that while publishing is a fascinating business, getting a job and advancing in the industry is "very tough."

Electoral Officers

ARTICLE III

Section 1:

a. The President and Vice-President shall be directly elected concurrently from a field of the entire Junior and Sophomore classes at the time of the election. The President and Vice President can not serve two terms of office.

b. The Secretary and Treasurer shall be directly elected concurrently with the President and Vice-President in the beginning of the second semester.

c. Candidacies for the position of Treasurer must be of have been members of the Finance Committee. When these qualifications cannot be met, nominations will be open to the entire student body.

2. The Council shall fill any vacancy in the above offices by means of a special election, to be held two weeks after such vacancy becomes official.

3. The officers-elect shall sit on the Council as non-voting members until some recess at which time they shall assume office. The Treasurer shall assume office upon Council approval of the elections.

Section 2 is hereby repealed.

Constitutional Amendment

Article 10: Dissolution of the Council

Section 1—The College Council shall be abolished upon a vote of no confidence by more than fifty per cent of the student body. A quorum of two-thirds of the student body shall be required for such a vote.

Section 2—Two weeks notice through all available publicity channels shall be required before such a vote.

Section 3—A vote of no confidence may be initiated upon specific petition of at least ten per cent of the student body.

Section 4—Constitutional Committee

a. In the event of the Council's dissolution, one person from each house affiliation and four Freshman shall be elected, forming a constitutional committee. The Freshman representatives shall be elected at an open meeting of the Freshman class organized by the upperclassman representatives of the committee.

b. This committee shall draft a new constitution and shall be responsible for a meeting or series of meetings of all interested students, who shall have the power to amend the proposed constitution. The rules for such a meeting shall be determined by the elected members of the constitutional committee.

c. The amended constitution must be put before the entire student body and shall become the new constitution if approved by more than fifty per cent of the student body. A quorum of two-thirds of the student body shall be required for such a vote.

Section 5—In the interim, present members of Student-Faculty committees shall remain in office. The former College Council shall serve the sole function of allocating the Student Activities Tax until a new constitution has been approved by the student body.

members discussed the proposed CEP changes in the non-major segment of the curriculum. Reporting on discussions with residential house members, the representatives objected most strongly to a possible two-semester foreign language requirement.

Clarifying the proposed changes, Julia McNamee '80 said that students could fulfill the two courses in the Division III requirement by taking either a math or a lab science course; lab inquiry then would become the focus.

Most members expressed support for the concept of a "Great Works" course.

Self-Nominations Due

All College elections will be held on the 14th and 15th of February, 1979. Self-nominations for the following positions must be submitted to the Dean's Office no later than Monday, February 5th, 1979 at 4 P.M.:

Students who would like to serve as College Council Treasurer, Secretary, or as members of the College Council Finance Committee (Student Activities Committee) should submit applications to the Dean's Office no later than 4 P.M., Monday, February 5th, 1979.

Applicants should list name, class, residential house, reasons for applying to the Committee or office, related experience, specific proposals and ideas for the committee or office, and any other time commitments.

No application form is necessary, although suitable forms are available from the Dean's Office. For questions or details, contact Chris Jenkins at ext.

CUSTOMER INFORMATION FROM GENERAL MOTORS

WHAT "STICKER PRICES" REALLY MEAN

HOW TO GET THE BEST BUY ON THE CAR THAT'S BEST FOR YOU.

Every GM dealer is an independent businessman. No one can tell him what to charge. Not the government, and not the manufacturer.

But the government can and does require that manufacturers post a suggested retail price, or "sticker price," on every new car we build. It's a good idea, because it makes it easier for you to compare one car against another.

Remember, the "sticker price" is only the suggested price. The actual selling price may be different. That's because the law of supply and demand affects the prices of cars, just as it affects most other prices. And market conditions change all the time.

For example: a very popular model may sell at the suggested price, but frequently cars will sell for less, because the automobile business is highly competitive.

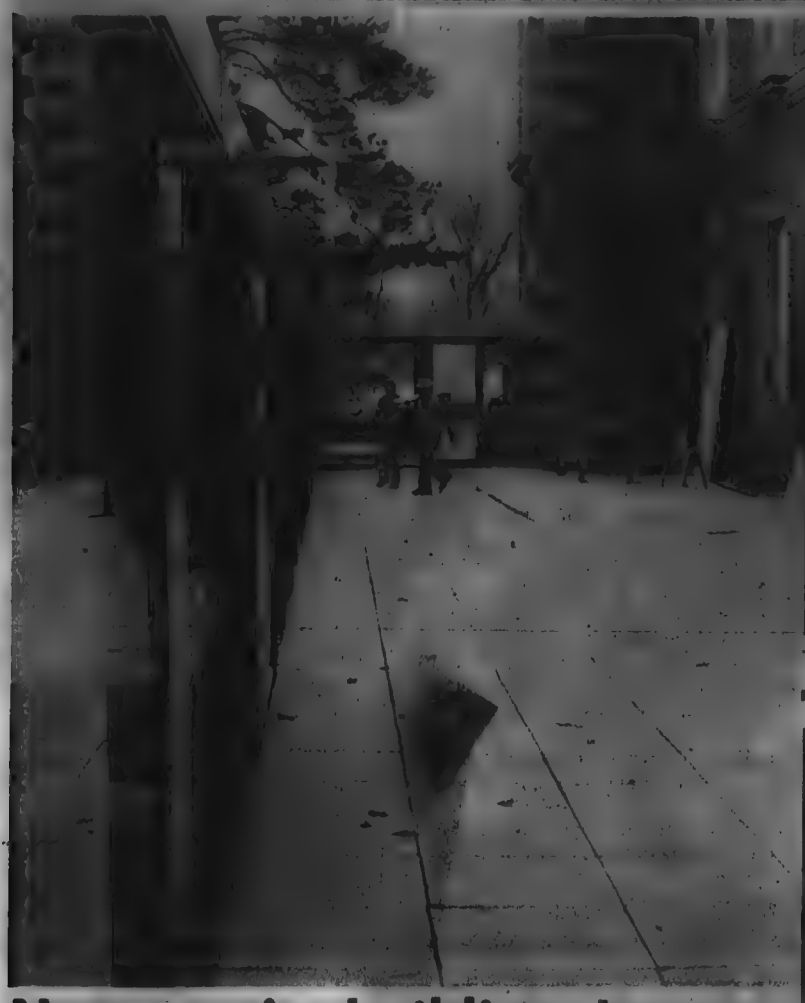
The difference between the "sticker price" and the wholesale price—that's what the dealer pays us—is called the markup, or dealer's discount. This changes from time to time, but as a general rule the markup on small cars is lower than on full-size cars.

The dealer's markup helps to pay his rent, taxes, salaries, utility bills—all that it costs to run a business. And he also has to make a profit, or he can't stay in business. Last year, GM dealers reported about two cents profit on each dollar of sales. As you can see, competition doesn't leave the average dealer a very big margin of profit.

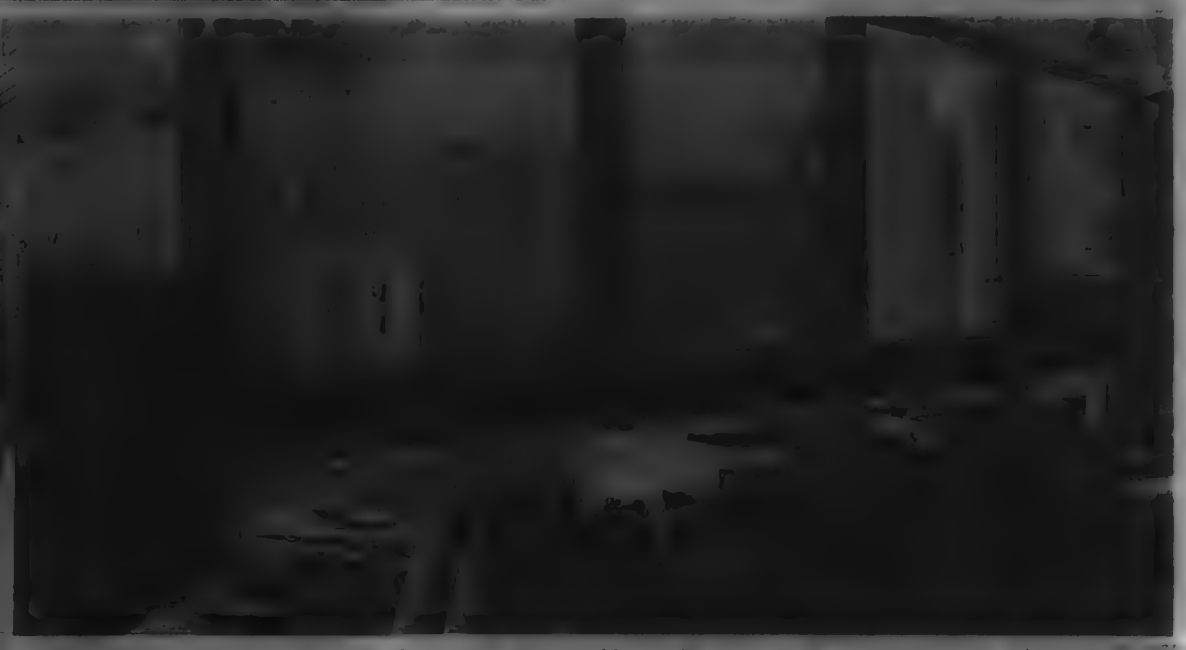
You can affect the price you pay. It depends on the marketplace, for one thing. You may get a bigger break if you choose a slower-selling model or a car the dealer already has in stock. The latest sales figures published in many newspapers will give you some idea of how cars are selling, although the demand for a particular model may be greater or less in your area.

How much optional equipment you order on your car also makes a big difference in its price. Go over the list carefully, and equip the car just the way you want it. Then it will have most value for you, and you'll enjoy it more. You shouldn't buy what you won't use, although much of the equipment you add to your new car will make it worth more when you decide it's time to trade it in.

Most buyers trade in a used car when they buy a new one. And the value of used cars varies according to demand as well as to their condition. Performance and appearance count, so it's a good idea to maintain your car and keep it clean. The more you can get for your old car, the less will be your out-of-pocket cost to replace it with a new one.



But whichever car you choose, the price should never be your only consideration. The dealer's reputation and his service capability are also important.



Our interest is in helping both you and the dealer to get a fair deal. We want you to be satisfied with your car. That's good for you, good for the dealer, and good for us.

New music building boasts more space, good accoustics

by Katie Springer

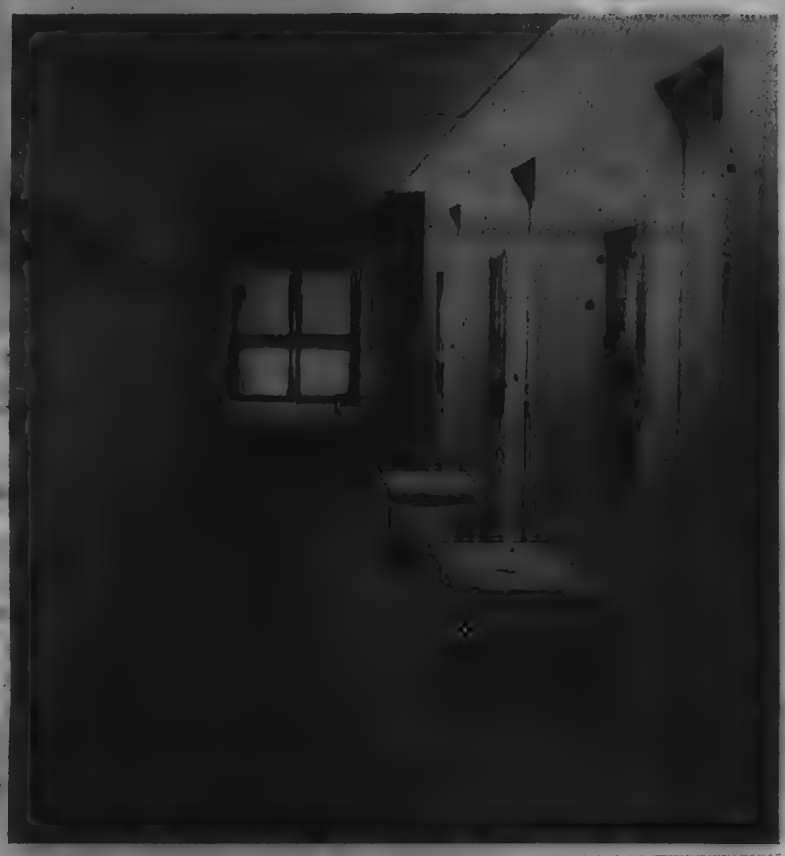
With the new addition to the Chapin Music Building nearing completion, the Williams Music Department will no longer be spread out in basements and back rooms across the campus.

"For once we'll be under one roof," says Kenneth Roberts, chairman of the music department.

Since the department started about 30 years ago, classrooms, offices, rehearsal and performance areas have been in Chapin Hall, Currier Hall, Thompson Memorial Chapel and the Adams Memorial Theater. Lack of space and accoustical problems were among the factors which prompted the building of the Chapin addition.

According to Roberts, the basic construction on the new building should be completed by the end of January, although some of the final stages such as installing seats will require additional work.

Although the building was originally supposed to open in September, the expected completion date had to be moved to January 1 and then to the end of the month because of a delay in obtaining materials. Planning for the building began 3½ years ago, with the ground breaking in August, 1977.



The construction of the new music building marks the final phase of a project started in 1974 when practice rooms were built in the basement of Chapin Hall.

"The entire project cost about $2½ million," says Roberts. "The first half million was spent underground in Chapin, 1½ million went toward basic construction costs for the new building and a half million were for equipment and furnishings," he adds.

Chapin Hall and the new addition are connected by glass hallways with a small courtyard in between. Inside the new unit are several specially designed rehearsal and performance halls including an amphitheater for choral rehearsals. An orchestra hall features a sound absorbent wall which doesn't allow the music to diffuse and "bounce around," Roberts explains.

On the ground floor are the departmental offices, which also have specially designed walls. Between each of the nine offices are insulated double walls, since music lessons are often conducted in the office.

A classroom seating 50 and an office for student organizations are also included on the first floor. Upstairs, a large lobby will alleviate the crowded conditions at intermissions, Roberts noted.

Currier rooms may provide more housing

by Katie Springer

Several offices and classrooms recently vacated in Currier Hall may be converted into student rooms next year, according to Peter Welanetz, director of student housing.

The five rooms previously used as offices for the music department have opened up as the department members move into their new offices in the addition to Chapin Hall. The department will also vacate three classrooms, as well as a few smaller rooms, says Welanetz.

An administration committee will review all of the space that might become available for student housing before making a final decision about use of the rooms. If approved, the rooms should be ready for occupancy next fall, he says.

Also under consideration is a proposal to convert the classrooms into a student lounge area. According to Welanetz, the offices and classrooms are well suited to student living, so the change could be made at a comparatively low cost.

"The conversion into a student residence area would involve considerable alteration and renovation, but would still be relatively inexpensive," he says.

The music department took over the basement of Currier Hall in 1957 when it outgrew its facilities in the Adams Memorial Theater. The office area had been a kitchen for the dormitory, while the largest classroom served as a dining hall, Welanetz recalls.

Trains carry on tradition

Vietnam, Adam said he'd never traveled out of the city. (We spent the better part of breakfast trying to decide what hay actually is.) For this trip he'd bought a two week rail pass, and was planning to see as much of America as he possibly could.

Others ride the train for less aesthetic reasons. The marine sitting behind me, who keeps complaining about the "boring" scenery and the late schedule, can only be riding the San Francisco Zephyr to save money. He seems more intent on the female scenery inside the train than what's outside, anyhow. It's hard to be nice sometimes for twenty hours ...

But it's not hard to be a train traveler, and for now, my identity is only that. No one has heard of Williams, and somehow I'm glad. There are no stereotypes for me to fight, and no expectations for me to live up to. When Mike asked me if I knew a Pat and Dave who went to school "somewhere in Massachusetts," I realized just how insignificant Williams is to most of America, and how often we let ourselves forget that. I can tell what I've learned in just three days is far more valuable than anything a Winter Study in Williamstown could have given me.

Perhaps it's the unlikely mixture of people, land, and motion, that makes train travel so uniquely American. Trains, once such an integral part of the American character and American culture, have faded almost completely into folklore. But at least Amtrak is still on the tracks, and riding a train is still a special experience. As Tom Wolfe writes nostalgically of train travel in You Can't Go Home Again: "One enters naturally into the lives of all these people, caught here for just a night and hurtled down together across the continent at sixty miles an hour, and one becomes a member of the whole huge family of the earth. Perhaps this is our strange and haunting paradox here in America—that we are fixed and certain only when we are in movement."

most cannot afford. Classes are inconveniently scheduled during the best soap operas and the Log is unfortunately open during prime time.

Only at home can one witness such media events as Fred MacMurray's commercial for the revolutionary Korean finger counting method. "Turn your child's hands into a calculator. Money back if not delighted." Shame on you, Fred. Would Uncle Charlie be delighted if Chip and Ernie's hands were transformed into a mechanical [illegible]?

The media, for good or ill, have created images in the public mind which should not be tampered with. Fred MacMurray is Mr. Douglas, the father of his three sons, not a huckster for Oriental mathematical wizardry. Superman's Kryptonian father, while technically not a human being, at least resembles a man more than he does a product of American Tourister.

The idea of Superman is marvelous enough in itself. Far be it from me to advocate the elimination of fantasizing. Otherwise, we would hear such ads as "Superman. The Movie. You will believe a bird can fly." A flying man is one thing, but a talking bagel is another kettle of fish entirely. Marlon, you've gone too far this time.

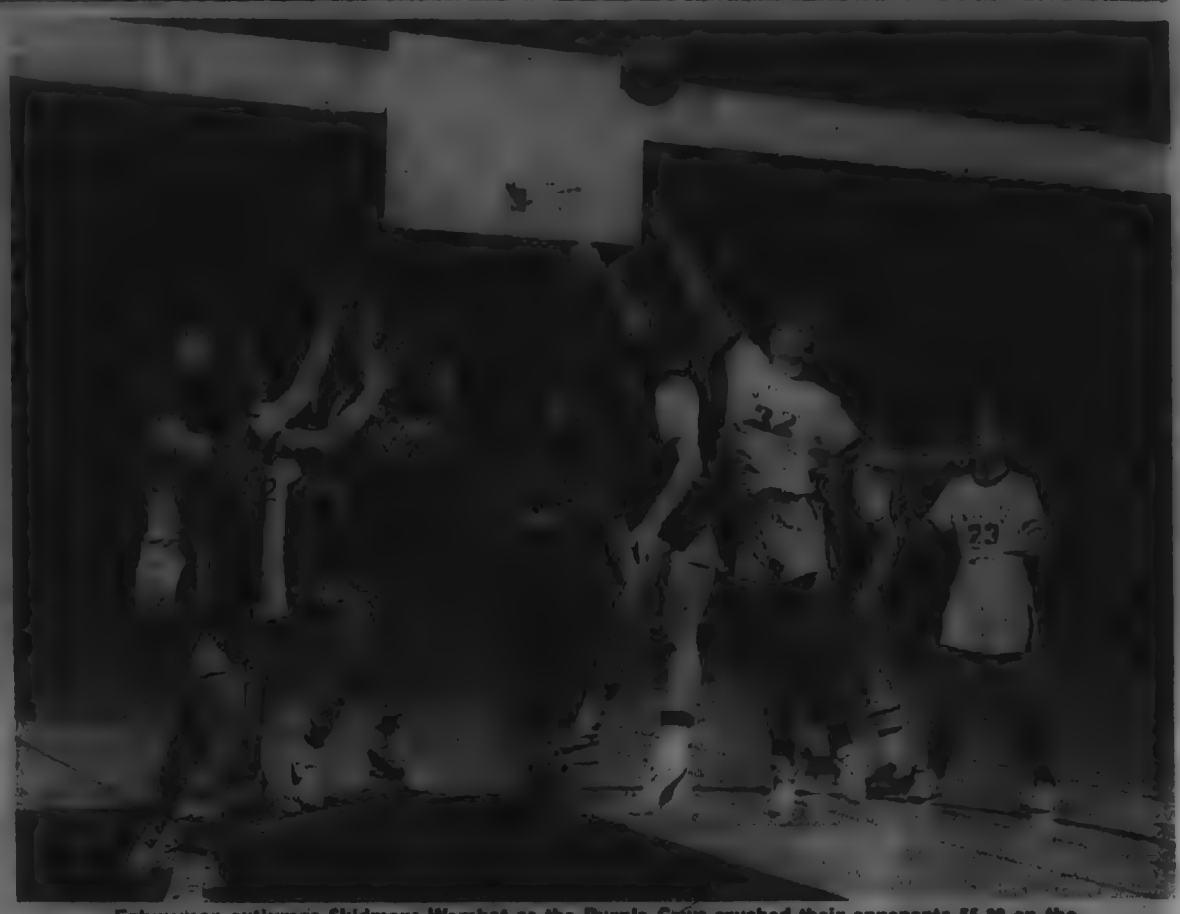
Trackmen spike MIT, 72-64



by Phil Darrow

In a tense meet which was not decided until the last lap of the last relay, the Williams College Track team upset the M.I.T. Engineers at Towne Field House on Saturday. The final score was 72-64 in the Ephs' favor.

After M.I.T. had built a slight lead at the end of the field events, Williams came surging back with some surprisingly easy victories in the sprints and middle distance events. Still, with only the two relay events remaining, the mile and two mile, Coach Dick Farley knew he had to win at least one in order to pull out the victory. M.I.T., closing in for the kill, sweated out a narrow two yard victory in the mile relay to set the stage for the most inspiring performance of the day. After three legs of the two mile relay, co-captain Tom Schreck took the baton behind his opponent and raced evenly for three laps before bursting ahead on the backstretch and grinding it home in his third race of the day. He was mobbed at the finish by a Purple squad which had just defeated M.I.T. for the first time in history.

Besides his strong anchor leg in the relay, Schreck also took an easy first in the 1000 yard run and a second in the mile. Other outstanding individuals for Williams included doublewinners Micah Taylor and Phil Darrow. Taylor, a great all-around performer so far this year, once again took both the long jump and the 60 by easy margins. Darrow cruised to a win in the mile and then came back to grab first in the 880 with an exciting last second kick from DeSimone and Vernon Davis also continued their winning ways. DeSimone, the team's top weight man, again took first in the shot put and added a second in the 35 lb. weight throw. Davis had no trouble in the 60 High Hurdles, his specialty. Although he has raced a couple of good hurdlers so far, he hasn't been touched and looks to have a great season. The final individual winner for Williams was freshman Joel Richardson, who along with teammate Calvin Schnure put on a tremendous burst over the last 20 yards of the 600 to edge out a strong M.I.T. runner. Both Ephmen are improving rapidly which should boost a middle distance corps which has lacked depth.

The Ephs, now 2-1, will return to Towne Field House on Friday night for a meet with Union, Middlebury and Hamilton which will begin at 7:00.

Ephwomen whip Wombats

by Timothy Clark

The Williams Women's Basketball team emerged from the past busy week with its first defeat and an impressive victory over Skidmore.

In the most recent game, played here Saturday afternoon against Harvard, The Crimson staged a fierce rally late in the second half to upend the scrappy Williams squad, 59-47.

The Ephs opened up an early first half lead as they jumped out to an 11-4 advantage and then held on to take a five point lead at the half. Harvard, however, came out of the locker room firing and took a 44-43 lead with six minutes left in the contest. Led by high scorer Wendy Carle's 21 points, the Crimson dominated the final minutes of the game, widening their lead to twelve points.

Freshman Terry Dancewicz paced the Ephs with thirteen points and eight rebounds while twin sister Anne and Junior Monica Grady each threw in 10 points. Sophomore Laurene Von Klan dropped in eight and led the team with four steals.

In the contest last Thursday night, the Ephwomen had an easier time of it. Using a balanced scoring attack and a tough defense the Williams women hoopsters stopped Skidmore 55-38. The Ephwomen quickly jumped out to a 14-2 lead that proved too much for the "Wombats".

Williams easily solved the 2-1-2 defense of Skidmore with sharp passing and strong inside work by Ann and Terry Dancewicz and Laurene Vanklan. Skidmore meanwhile could not penetrate the harassing 2-1-2 Ephwomen zone. The defensive work of the guards, Leslie "Flash" Milne and Monica Grady, was especially impressive. Their hustle and quickness forced numerous Skidmore turnovers. Williams' overall first half dominance was reflected in their 31-16 halftime lead.

In the second half the Ephwomen started out sluggishly. The Williams women were no longer getting the good shots and the rebounds. Skidmore, led by the rebounding of co-captain Ruth Hinchey and the hustle of the other co-captain Edna Killeen, went on a furious spurt in which they outscored Williams 10-2. The closest they could get, however, was 7 points behind. The Ephwomen showed their poise by continuing their tough defense and regaining their crisp passing. Terry Dancewicz led the Ephwomen's team effort with 14 points and 11 rebounds.

The Eph cagers take on a tough Dartmouth team tonight in Hanover. Their next home game is Jan. 24 against Vermont.

Swimmers struggle in defeat

by Dan Cameron

Coach Samuelson's men's swimming team fell quickly behind New England swimming power Southern Connecticut State College as a result of a disqualification in the opening medley relay Sunday. The squad never regained the lead as they lost 64-49.

As a result of a full week of double sessions, the Williams swimmers appeared somewhat flat, although several fine performances were turned in.

Junior Bryan Volpp turned in excellent times of 2:07 and 2:20 in the 200-yard individual medley and 200-yard breast stroke, placing second in both these events. Brian McDermott also returned to form as he clinched third in the hotly competitive breaststroke race with a time of 2:22, a full second better than his time at the New England Championships a year ago.

Freshman Michael Regan dominated the field in the 100-yard freestyle and was followed by teammate Tom Beckett, who took second. Regan also turned in a season's best in the 200 meter freestyle while placing second in the event. Sophomore Keith Berryhill followed Regan in third.

The 50 freestyle, the most impressive event of the day for Williams, saw Bill and Tom Beckett together destroy the Southern sprintmen in a splendid 1-2 finish. Bill, the victor, turned in an impressive time of 22.1 seconds.

The distance events were handled for Williams by Bill Hymes and John Adams. Hymes stroked to a seasonal best of 10:46 in the 1000-yard freestyle, placing second. Hymes, though well known for his swimming prowess, is probably better known as a sponsor of keg parties in E11 Morgan. Bill would like to take this opportunity to inform the Williams community that a keg will always be on tap in his room and to extend an open 24-hour invitation to come see him and use this unique opportunity. John Adams placed third in the 1000 and came back to place second in the 500-yard freestyle with a time of 5:09.

In the remaining events, sophomore Gordon Cliff copped a second in the 200-yard butterfly. Don Cameron secured a second in the 200-yard backstroke. Bill Kelly took third in the optional and required diving.

In the final event, the 400-yard freestyle relay, the quartet of Keith Berryhill, Tom Beckett, Don Cameron and Mike Regan blew away the opposition in a fine middle-season time of 3:20.

WPI drops stalwart wrestlers

by Janet Harman

Despite stalwart performances by Joe Carrese and Scott Frost, the Williams grapplers lost to a tough W.P.I. squad last Saturday at Worcester.

The two Williams wins in the match were encouraging. With a last second reversal, the 120 lb. Carrese came from behind for a dramatic victory, taking a 10-9 decision. Frost at 142 lbs, took a commanding 10-1 lead, then pinned his man early in the second period.

Coach Hal Zendle summed up the key points of the meet: "Carrese's match was definitely the most exciting of the season. Joe never stopped wrestling the entire match. And Scott Frost was nothing less than spectacular. He is a joy to watch on the mat. John Turi gained valuable experience against one of the toughest wrestlers we have come up against." Turi, at 139 lbs., lost a decision to two-time All New-England champ Dave Wilson.

The matmen take on a much improved SUNY-Albany team tomorrow at Albany and then meet Lowell this Saturday in their first home meet. The match starts at 7:00 p.m., in Lasell.

Ivys crawl all over Williams

by Jackson Gallaway

In what will undoubtedly prove to be their toughest back-to-back matches of the season, the men's squash team lost twice last week. Both defeats came at the hands of top-ranked Ivy League teams.

Last Wednesday, the varsity and freshmen traveled to Cambridge to meet Harvard. The history of Williams-Harvard squash matches goes back to 1937, and in that period Williams has defeated Harvard only once. Though the only victories came at the number one slot, with captain Martin Goldberg defeating Harvard captain Havens, and at number two, with junior Chip Lindquist defeating his opponent, Coach Sloane was pleased with the team's performance: "Anytime we win a single match against Harvard, we've done well. Wally Miller's match, in which he went five games before losing, is encouraging. It again indicates more strength at the bottom of the line-up." Also playing well for the Ephs was Mitchell Reiss at number four in his five game loss.

Goldberg's victory, though, was the real story of the match (from Williams' point of view, at least), for it was just two years ago that Havens beat Goldberg 15-1 in the third game for the match. In addition, Havens was the top junior in the nation when Martin had not even picked up a squash racquet.

The freshman team's loss, 9-1, was not as heartening as the varsity's. As Coach Sloane described it: "The freshmen ran into a buzzsaw. Most of the Harvard players have several years of prep school experience." The one bright spot was Phil Adams' victory, 17-16 in the fifth game overset.

On Friday, the Ephmen fell to a number one ranked Princeton squad. Despite losing all the matches, Ken Miller, Wally Miller, and Mark Lanier played hard four and five game matches. Coach Sloane added, "The team showed great composure in the face of an unstoppable force."

On Saturday, the freshman team, playing a line-up of players mostly from the bottom of the ladder, blanked Williston. In the afternoon, a JV team composed of players from positions 11-30 on the varsity ladder shut out Middlebury's varsity.

This Thursday, the varsity and freshmen travel to Yale.

BBall boys driven to victory

by Shawn Pierce

After losing on the road at Springfield College last Tuesday night, the Williams College men's basketball team returned to a typically pandemonious Lasell gymnasium on Saturday night and showed the slightly partisan fans the definition of a "team effort," in beating a strong Merchant Marine Academy team 78-68.

The visitors played a "box-and-1" defense—a four man "box" zone with the fifth defensive man playing man-to-man defense on one offensive player. Senior guard Gerry Kelly drew the man-to-man coverage, and as a result the rest of the Ephs had to pick up the offensive slack.

Junior guard Andy Straka (16 points) responded by hitting six of the Eph's first eight points on long jumpers. But it's common knowledge that you can't win basketball games relying solely on low-percentage outside shots, so with 12:00 to play in the half, and Williams trailing 21-14, Coach Tong called on hot shooting sophomore forward Dean Ahlberg (team-high 17 points), who hit three mid-range jump-shots and narrowed the gap to 23-20.

Throughout the half the Ephs were patient on offense, but when the patience was tending toward stagnation, Tong went to freshman flash Al Lewis. Lewis a 5'9" guard, showed a great blend of quickness and control in helping to snap the Williams offense back to life, working the ball around the defensive perimeter, and penetrating sharp passes to the front line.

The last 6 and of the half was all Matt Spangler as the senior co-captain, playing his first full game after being sidelined by a pre-season knee injury, hit for 10 of his 12 points, and the Ephs jumped out to a 44-41 halftime lead. As Coach Tong said after the game "Matt definitely gave us a spark." The 6' 4" forward was a great asset all over the court and his fine play is a much welcomed addition to the Eph's attack.

At the start of the second half, the visitors took their box-and-1 defense off of Gerry Kelly (10 points on the night), and the senior co-captain proceeded to score three straight hoops as the Ephs jumped out to a 50-41 lead.

The Merchant Marine promptly went back to the "box" defense and played the Ephs even until with 13:00 left to play, the Andy Straka Show began, and the junior guard hit four long jumpers to extend the Williams lead to 62-49.

With 9:00 left to play, holding a 82-68 lead, Williams went into a semi-freeze offense and showed impressive team ball handling and clutch shooting as they ate up the clock minutes at a time, and were able to increase their lead for a final score of 78-68.

At one point during the freeze, Williams displayed its great depth at guard as senior Gerry Kelly, junior Joe Flaherty, sophomore Ray Whiteman, and freshman Al Lewis were in the game at the same time. After the game Coach Tong said he has confidence in all of his players this year, and anticipates going to the bench often during the season."

The Ephs are now 3-4 on the season, and play Babson on Wednesday night, and then return home for a game with Yale University on Saturday. Upperclass fans who at all remember the legendary Williams upset of Yale two years ago in Lasell gymnasium shouldn't even think of missing this Saturday's game.

Harvard flicks women aside

by Mary Tom Higgs

In their second match of the season, the Williams Women's Squash team won only two matches in an unexpected 5-2 defeat by the Harvard racquetwomen. The result of Saturday's confrontation on the Williams home courts leaves the Ephs with a 1-1 record.

Both Beckie Chase and Kristin Johanson, playing the numbers 1 and 7 positions respectively, battled through four close games to tally Williams' only wins. At the No. 2 spot for Williams, Mary Tom Higgs tied 2-2 with her Harvard opponent before losing the fifth game 15-11. Also struggling through a close five game match was co-captain Marcia Johnston at No. 6.

Second-year squash coach Renzie Lamb noted that the loss of these two tight matches for Higgs and Johnston was the turning point, which allowed Harvard to triumph.

Eph girls flex muscles

Although their record dropped to 2-2 after meets against Dartmouth and Southern Connecticut last week, the women's swim team outswam their first Ivy League and Division I opponents ever in dual meet competition.

Southern Conn outdove the Ephwomen 73-57 Saturday afternoon in an otherwise hotly contested meet in New Haven. Southern Conn took both the 200 Medley and Freestyle relays, but the Williams tandem of soph Linda Reed and senior co-captain Nina Murphy swept both the 50 and 100 yard backstroke events. Reed copped the 50 in 32.1, and Murphy took first in the 100, 1:08.9.

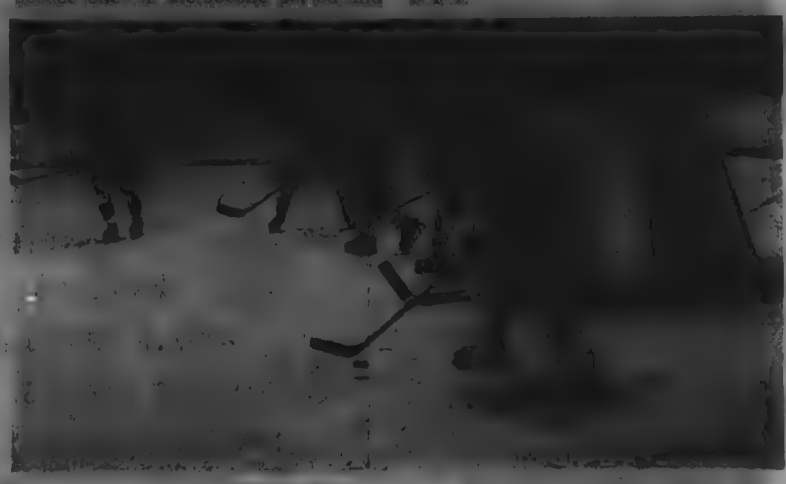
Junior co-captain Karon Walker was the meet's only double-event winner for the Ephwomen. She took the 50 free, in 25.4, and the 50 Butterfly in 27.6, barely touching out her major rivals for the New England Championships in those events, Sherry Williams and Janet Zabora.

Frosh Katherine Hartley, Barbara Good and Lori Vuylstecke also added points to the Williams effort. Hartley placed first in the 100 Butterfly, 1:04.3, and third in the 50 yard event of that stroke, Vuylstecke took two seconds in the 100 and 200 Individual Medleys. Good, as usual, was a point-getter in the breast strokes and the 100 individual medley.

Dartmouth managed a victory over the Ephwomen in Hanover last Tuesday, but just barely. With no Williams entry in the optional diving event, Dartmouth picked up more than the six points they finally prevailed by, 66-60.

Barb Good and Karon Walker were double winners for Williams, Good taking the 50 Breast stroke and the 100 Individual Medley, as Walker won the 50 Butterfly and the 50 Freestyle in 25.4, a time which qualifies her for her fourth event in this year's National Championships. Katherine Hartley also won the 100 Fly, 1:02.4.

Girls' hockey looks sluggish



by Lisa Russell

The Williams College Women's hockey team got their season off to a slow start Saturday as they lost to a well-prepared Middlebury College squad, 7-2. Williams, a club team with an expanded 10-game schedule, is looking for a winning season under coach Tony Stall.

The Middlebury Wildcats dominated the first period of play, and the score was 3-0 after the first frame. Freshman Martha Livingston put in the first Williams goal in the second period, on an assist from junior co-captain Becky Webber. Williams' other tally came in the third period on an unassisted goal by senior co-captain Marty Taft. Middlebury scored once in the second period and three times in the third to bring the final score to 7-2.

The Eph loss was attributed to the skating expertise of the Middlebury team and to the inexperience of the Williams squad. "It was our lack of hard pre-season conditioning," explained coach Tony Stall, a senior at Williams. "Middlebury jumped on us in the first period, but we came back and played an even game for the last two periods."

Stall says the team will work on speed and stamina as they get ready to skate against Dartmouth Wednesday evening in Hanover, N.H. The women's hockey team's first home game is on January 26 against B.U.

Eph skaters shoot into first

by John Kresse and Shawn Lovley

Dramatic victories over Army, 6-3, and Holy Cross, 4-3, last week moved the Williams College hockey Ephmen into first place in the western section of ECAC Division II competition. The Purple record is 7-2 overall and 6-1 in the division and Coach McCormick's skaters lead second place Middlebury, their next opponent, by two games in the win column.

Four third period goals on 17 shots sparked the Williams pucksters to their 6-3 win over Army's cadets before 1500 happy fans in Lansing Chapman Rink last Tuesday night. The triumph was the Eph's second straight since losing last year's MVP Dan Sullivan '79 to a broken right arm against Boston State January 3rd.

For Williams, one junior, two sophomores, and one freshman provided the goals for this young team. Senior Chris Egizi and sophomore Tom Resor helped out with three assists each.

Army's Keating started the scoring at 1:42 of the first stanza, but Williams' Jim Rooney tied it at 13:01 with his first of two goals. Army never led after that point. Sophomore "Tinker" Connelly's goal at 5:51 of the second period gave Williams a lead they only relinquished for two minutes as Jim Knowlton temporarily knotted the score for Army with 1:15 remaining in that same period. By 3:24 of the final twenty minutes the Ephs had jumped ahead 4-2 as Connelly garnered his second and then brought the crowd roaring to its feet as he set up linemate Mark Lemos after a full-ice rush.

Keating again made it tense for Williams at 6:38 after Williams' goaltender Mike Moulton got caught coming out of his goal. But Eph freshman Greg Jacobson's goal provided insurance at 15:11 from Matt St. Onge after Rooney blocked an Army shot at the Williams blue line. Rooney's second not two minutes later iced the triumph for the hosts.

Three nights later, the Ephs had a slightly tougher time of it against a hyped-up Holy Cross six.

Jim Rooney opened the scoring at 15:56 of the first period when he tallied on an assist from Matt St. Onge. That's the way it stayed until mid-way through the second stanza, when Rooney tallied again, this time on an assist from Tim Connelly. Holy Cross fought back with their first score at 15:25 on a pile-up in front of the Williams goal, as Cross junior Bob LaBossiere poked the puck just over the line for the score.

The Crusaders then tied the game with a power play goal at 17:05 as senior Peter Amnell shoveled a vicious slapshot from the right point that just got by Williams netminder Mike Moulton. Following a rash of penalties in the period's closing minutes, Williams soph Tom Resor found the net with just 24 seconds left, and the Ephs took a 3-2 advantage to the locker room after two periods.

Williams tallied again at 10:07 of the final period on a breakaway by St. Onge. Holy Cross' Bob Shea banged home the game's final score to close the gap to 4-3, but Moulton denied the Crusaders again and again in the closing minutes as the Ephs held on for the win. Coach Bill McCormick's Ephmen will try to continue their winning ways Wednesday when they travel to Middlebury.

Wary students eye Mass. drinking age proposal

by Eric Schmitt

The key elements of the proposed state drinking age bill, currently in the state house of representatives are as follows:

The legal age for service and sales of alcoholic beverages would be raised to 19 years of age, effective immediately, upon Governor Edward King's signature of the bill. At the conclusion of the six-month phase-in period, the legal would become 21.

The legal age for holding a liquor license would be raised on the same schedule as the drinking age level.

The employment age of waiters, waitresses, and employees of liquor warehouses would remain at 18. However, bartenders and package store employees would have to be of legal age.

The bill, one of King's many gubernatorial campaign pledges, cleared the legislature's joint Committee on Government Regulations February 7 and the House Ways and Means Committee February 9.

The measure was expected to go to the House for Senate yesterday before moving on to the Senate tomorrow, and then immediately to the governor for his approval.

A snag in the timetable would occur only if the House and Senate disagreed over any proposed amendments to the bill.

One such approved change, made by the Government Regulation Committee, entailed lowering the penalty for a person procurring liquor for underaged persons from a felony charge carrying a $500 fine and up to three years in prison, to a misdemeanor offense carrying a $500 fine and-or a six-month sentence in a correctional facility.

Effects on students

Responses ranging from a prediction of impending doom to a shrug and "they'll get it somewhere else," greeted the question put to college and community officials, "What effects on Williams students will a 21-year-old drinking age law have?"

An immediate effect on Williams students would be the closing of the Log after this semester when the six-month, 19 year-old phase-in period expired. According to Log manager, Mike Masi, between 1200 and 1500 people use the Log during a busy week. A quarter of those students would be excluded by the 19 year old drinking age, Masi said, and, of course, all students would be affected by the Log's closing.

"It would be a regrettable decision," Dean Daniel G. Conner said of the proposed law. "What I fear most would be an increase in traffic accidents involving students driving back from New York or Vermont (18-year-old drinking age states)."

Conner said there have been no highway fatalities on or near the campus since the 18-year-old drinking statute became law in 1973.

Williamstown Police Chief Joseph Zoito disagreed with O'Connor on the drinking-and-driving theory.

"I don't see the validity of that argument," Zoito said. "I don't think they—college officials—are putting any faith in the students' judgment. I regard the students as adults with more common sense than to drink and drive."

Zoito favors the proposed bill for the reason "that if it saves one life, it's worth it," referring to the bill's effect of keeping alcoholic beverages out of the high schools, where the major problem lies.

"The way the cycle is now," Zoito explained, the high school senior, who's 18, gives (the alcoholic beverages) to the 17, 16 and 15 year-olds. If it goes back to 21, the 21-year-old may give (the alcoholic beverages) to his friends, who are 20, 19 or 18, but those 18-year-olds aren't going to give it up."

Walter O'Brien, Williams security director, believes the bill's passage would result in more lounge parties.

"It would be legal for a house party to serve alcoholic beverages," O'Brien said, "but only so long as the beverages were not sold, and that the party was open only to house members."

An increase in house parties could result in increased property damage, O'Brien said, and subsequently, a need for more security personnel to prevent such damage.

In a Friday Boston Globe editorial, Donald Howard, associate dean of Southeastern Massachusetts University, reported that Massachusetts has the sixth lowest fatality rate per one thousand licensed drivers in the country. The five states with lower fatality rates all have laws allowing 18-year-olds to drink. All states with a minimum drinking age of 21 have higher fatality rates.

Howard struck at the heart of the issue's irrationality. "There is an undeniable logic that says that those who have the right to vote, the right to own property, the right to marry, and the responsibility to bear arms and die for their country, should also have the right to drink. ... Do we take the Damage due vandals rises; Jankey evaluates countermeasures

by Karla Springer

A recent increase in the number of reported incidents of vandalism on campus has prompted a reevaluation of measures currently used to deal with the problem.

According to Charles Jankey, director of Student Housing, damage to College facilities in the 1977-78 academic year totaled $11,500, while the total for previous years was usually close to $8,000.

Although some of the increase reflects higher costs of repair, Jankey believes that vandalism is a growing problem which deserves careful examination.

One of the prime targets for vandalism has been Mission Park, which accounted for $2,500 of the $6,700 damage to upper class houses last year. Much of the damage occurs in the main hallway, which does not belong to any one particular house.

"The building lends itself to the type of vandalism that's been going on," says Scott Blair '80, president of Armstrong House. "There is a constant exchange of people moving in and out of the building, and a lot of the damage is done by non-Mission Park residents."

Both Dean Roosenraad and Blair agree that a great part of the problem may be caused by townspeople who are attracted by the pinball machines in the main hallway. Because so many students live in Mission Park, they may not know when someone doesn't belong, Roosenraad said.

Student monitors have somewhat alleviated the problem on weekends, when most of the vandalism occurs. In addition, two student monitors are on duty every night in other areas of the campus.

Jankey emphasizes, however, that in Mission Park, as in other houses, the burden of responsibility lies on the house residents, who are too often hesitant to speak up when damage occurs.

"It will take an effort on the part of the student community to let us know when people are getting out of line," he says. "They have to let the offenders know that this is not going to be tolerated."

Blair believes that Mission Park residents tend to be apathetic about the building, an attitude he feels could be changed if the building were more aesthetically pleasing.

According to Blair, the presidents of the Mission Park houses are in the process of forming a "United Front" against vandalism, which he hopes will encourage peer pressure directed at those who vandalize.

In cases where the person responsible for the damage cannot be identified, each house must pay out of a fund set aside from student house maintenance taxes. The money from each house is pooled and divided in 15 equal parts, so that larger houses receive proportionately less. As a result, while most houses receive some money back at the end of the semester, some may be forced to take money from the house social dues, Blair says.

A proposal that houses pool their house maintenance funds to cover certain instances of vandalism was rejected because smaller houses argued they would lose money. Some also argue that by having a general pool to draw from, houses might lose the incentive to encourage restrained behaviour at parties.

In most cases, persons involved in the vandalism can be identified and charged for the damage, Roosenraad says. In cases involving major damage, students may be brought before the Discipline Committee, but Jankey says this happens only in rare instances.

Jankey believes that stiffer disciplinary measures should be taken against offenders, and especially in cases involving fire safety equipment.

There is little agreement by those questioned over the extent to which vandalism is related to student drinking. According to Jankey, a large part of the damage occurs at impromptu parties, where students have been drinking and no security guards are present.

Blair feels that although much of the damage occurs at parties, this is not necessarily linked to alcohol consumption.

The rest of the campus is not immune to vandalism; damage has ranged from stolen tape decks in the Greylock parking lot to small bonfires in Lasell Gymnasium. Over the past 12 months, the College spent an estimated $2,500 on broken seat backs in Bronfman Auditorium.

Chinese adventurers describe impressions

by Peter Struzzi

"There is no way you can have a preconception of China," said Jody Goldstein, '82, one of 18 students and 11 alumni who spent Winter Study there. "There is nothing there that is like the United States. Our two cultures are totally different."

History Major Bill Couch, '79 was most surprised by "the sameness" of China and the Chinese.

For Denise Harvey, '81, the visit only intensified her view of China as an underdeveloped country. She was particularly shocked at the lack of cultural arts. "I always thought of China as having magnificent wealth in the arts, painting, silks and music. But there is nothing in China in the way of art museums of any type."

"I think that trips like this are part of the great value of the Winter Study program," commented Romuald Misiunas, faculty representative on the Winter Study trip to China. "You can learn only so much about a culture by reading about it, and you can't beat something like this trip from an experiential standpoint."

After a one-day layover in Hong Kong, the group made a two-week tour of Mainland China, from Canton to Kwellin, to Changsha to Peking. Although each of the participants received a briefing packet from the U.S. liaison office discussing Chinese government, cities and geography, their impressions of the "sleeping giant" were influenced most by their experiences there.

"You sense a real warmth, a real concern for others among the Chinese," Goldstein commented. They emphasize working for the group—a sense of cooperation that we just don't have in the U.S. At the same time, there is no individuality and it is discouraged in art, in personality—in general, individuality is clamped down on."

Everyone dressed and wore their hair alike, and it would have been shocking to see a "girl with braids or a couple walking down the street," the group noted. These are rare phenomena.

Phil Stevens, '82, noted a sense of "group pride" among the people, but also a total lack of individual achievement.

The group found the fact that everywhere they went they were the subjects of long stares by the Chinese a little disconcerting. "We never escaped the stigma of being real intruders," Phil remembered.

Council approves new constitution

by Steve Willard

College Council approved a new constitution in its meeting Wednesday night, thus taking the first step towards its adoption. The student body will vote on the revised constitution along with College Council officers in this week's election.

The new constitution was the result of work done by the Council's special Constitutional Review Committee, chaired by Ted Tucci '79. The Committee's recommendations on changes in the constitution were accepted by the Council with only minor changes.

A large portion of Council's discussion of the document centered around the proposed addition of five new members to the Council, one from each of the major house groups (e.g. Greylock, Row Houses, etc.). Mike Lissack '79, a member of the Committee, defended the proposal. He argued that the addition of new

Walker: a break from the past

On the basis of the Council sponsored debate Sunday night, the Record endorses Byron Walker for president. All the candidates echoed student sentiment in stressing the need for radical change: Walker, as an outsider to Council, with promising ideas, offers a creative alternative in an election marked by traditional campaign appeals.

Specifically, Walker aims to create an endowment supported by alumni to fund what he calls the "sacred seven"—those student organizations with the largest budgets. The benefits are obvious: the SAT fund would be freed to encourage the development of smaller, experimental groups.

Walker, a resident of Pittsfield, also hopes to improve community relations by inviting local spokesmen to Council meetings. He noted the issue of Spring Street noise as a problem that might have been avoided with more communication.

As an outsider to Council, but an active participant in many student groups (Purple Key, Adelphic Speaking Union, BSU, and others) Walker offers a fresh perspective imperative for Council to establish itself as the true voice of the students. "Council's responsibility determines students' perception of Council," he said. With his aggressive program, Walker can provide the necessary leadership.

Although we recognize the value of experience, we believe that this is the time for innovation and a break from the ineffective methods of the past.

We feel that Walker would best lead the Council in the direction signaled by the candidate for vice-president, Mark Lanier: "The Council needs to move outwards—out of its own innerworkings, where creative people are tackling problems." Instead of "bogging down in questions of form rather substance," Walker will challenge the very conception of student self-government at Williams.

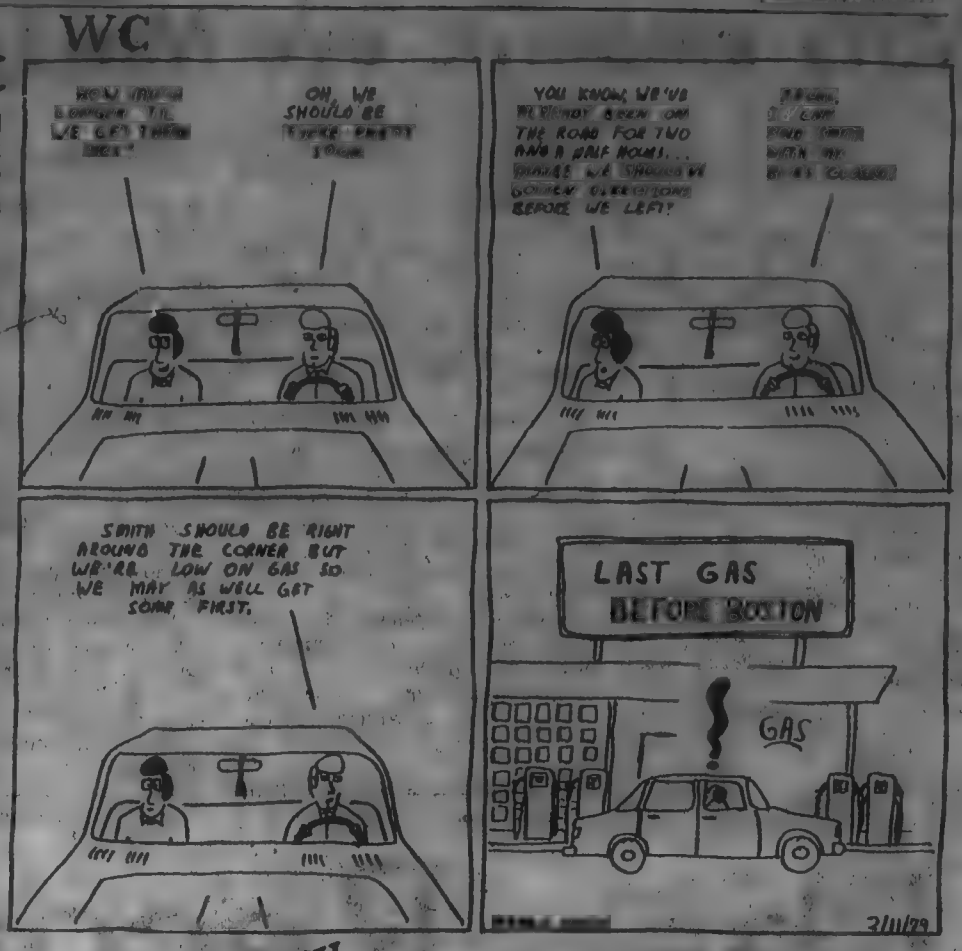
Vote Responsibility



No longer can students berate the College Council for being unresponsive or ineffective. The proposed new Student Body Constitution offers them the opportunity for legislative powers in the form of the Student Assembly. The question remains: are students willing to accept the responsibility?

The quorum level of 100 should convince students that even a small number can make a difference. The College Council, with a two-thirds vote, can veto any action, but would be cautious in doing so—in challenging the voice of their higher authority: the students themselves.

By focusing on a single issue, this assembly would be able to act swiftly and promptly on an immediate concern. In the past, such a mechanism has been sorely missed. How different the outcome of debates on Sexism, South Africa, and sexual orientation clause would have been had students themselves had the opportunity to take their stand with legislative authority. The Council itself cannot devote such minute attention to issues of interest because of its full weekly agenda.

By approving the proposed constitution in the elections this week, students can take responsibility for their own government.

Beneath their Peaceful Shadows

Starting next week I will be doing something new in this column. Rather than focus exclusively on campus events, I will begin a weekly commentary on world and national news. I do this for two reasons: first, there is no hint in this newspaper that anything besides Williams College exists, except for some other schools out there somewhere. Second, I have probably succeeded in offending everybody on campus at one time or another during the past year, and it's probably time I was either shot or forced to read, at one sitting, everything I've written. I'll try a compromise, which is more correctly called a big change.

But, this week, my last column on College affairs forces me to take up everyone's favorite topic, the College Council.

The Council as a whole, led by members who were sincerely concerned about how the Council, the student body, and the college community could all work better, was engaged in a year-long process of uncovering weak spots in the Constitution, abuses the Constitution permitted, and of redefining the Council's role and identity. The result is the new Constitution, which I hope you will all actively support.

The past year, starting with last spring's unusual election followed by the South Africa meeting, provided the usually un-self-critical Council with many opportunities to see exactly how out-of-touch the old Constitution was with present realities. The Council was prompted from without—Goerlich's and Beardsley's direct election of the Secretary and Treasurer drive—and from within—Magee's dissolution and McNamee's questions on ethics.

In short, the Council's biggest achievement during the past year was getting its own house in order by writing the new Constitution. The student body now has the ball: we must approve the Constitution and elect responsible people to carry it out.

Before I turn to the elections, let me point out two other achievements of the past year. First, the recent change in the chit system which the Council managed to wring out of Food Services. Second, (and this directed more towards a single individual) the changes Treasurer John Simpson has brought about in Fin Com to insure that organizations stay within their budgets. Apparently, the idea of bookkeeping never occurred to anyone before, and it is to Simppon's credit that the change was made.

On other matters, the Council was lethargic. This was certainly true in an active sense: the Council did not go out looking for interesting issues (those "forums" do not prove the contrary), nor did they handle with much gumption or creativity those issues which they passively received. The leadership of the Council was notoriously "laid back" during the past year, which probably accounts for a large part of the inactivity.

As for the coming elections: if there's anything we don't need at this particular time, it's a laid-back leadership. The new Constitution, when it passes (which I am sure it will) makes great demands on the Council to be more go-getting in regard to issues. Some lively officers could be a great help to the success of the enterprise, while a passive group of officers might well spell disaster.

I offer two suggestions which you might find useful as a guide in making your choices. First, look for substance. This is not a popularity contest; it really is serious. Real things can happen with the right people (for example, Simppon's bookkeeping), so please, vote in earnest. Second, having myself served in various organizations and committees, I have found the most important component of a job well done is time. Nothing—not even creativity or brains—can make up for spending too little time at the job. When you vote, ask yourself how much time each candidate would devote to the job.

Well, then, enough of the campus. Next week, the world.

Commentary on the proposed curriculum

The report of the Ad Hoc Working Group on the Curriculum represents a growing trend away from freedom of choice in college-level education in this country. Educators in this country have examined the results of academic laissez-faire and have registered their dissatisfaction. According to the Committee, student's non-major course choices have developed in a way which has eliminated for many of them, a broad-based liberal arts education.

To remedy this situation, the Committee has proposed a number of changes in the curricular requirements at Williams. These include a two-semester Great Works Course required of all freshman and a restructuring of the Division III requirement. Under the new system, only math courses or courses which included a lab could be used to fulfill the Division III distribution requirement. In addition, the Committee seeks to require of all Juniors and Seniors a course which deals with, "the distinctive nature of scientific inquiry as an expression of ancient and modern culture."

Contrary to popular opinion, the Committee did not propose that a foreign language requirement be instituted. The group has not yet reached consensus on the matter.

The Committee's report, and the premises upon which it is based, raise too many questions to be dealt with in this space. The problems which seem most a propos center around the issue of choice in a liberal arts education.

Many would argue against a Great Works course on the grounds that it represents a cultural value judgment. Such decisions pervade the atmosphere of this, and indeed of most, educational institutions. Value judgments dictate that we study D. H. Lawrence instead of Xaviera Hollander, Mozart instead of Meatloaf. The entire notion of the liberal arts rests upon a set of assumptions forged in the cauldron of the Western socio-cultural tradition. In coming to Williams, the student accepts—to a very large degree—the biases and tenets of this institution. If an individual finds the academic perspective oppressive, perhaps more careful deliberation before matriculation is the answer.

The main problem with the proposed changes is that they unduly limit the individual student's freedom of choice. The Committee justifies this in the name of the quest for a "common academic experience." Why is there a need for this at all? Williams students seek a myriad of different goals and experiences during their four years here. Standardization and conformity probably rank low on this list of priorities. A required Great Works course would breed contempt and apathy. There are, for example, many Division III majors who may feel that they have had enough exposure to the "seminal" works of Civilization. Is it fair to make them spend one-eighth of their freshman year in a course which they may consider irrelevant to their academic goals? A forced situation, such as that engendered by the Great Works proposal, would lead to stulified discussion and massive absenteeism. Rather than excite an interest in the material at hand, the course may come to be viewed as a burden, endured for the sake of a Williams diploma. This would do more harm to nascent cultural sensibilities than does the present system of choice.

A more efficacious way of guaranteeing at least some exposure to important works would be to reorganize existing courses to include Great Works. A one-semester requirement of one course chosen from a list of ten or so offerings in various departments (Classics, Philosophy, Religion, History of Ideas, English) would allow a student's interest to guide his choice. Instead of having to face a monolithic syllabus, the student would be free to concentrate on those works which he would find most pertinent to his own situation. A common experience would not result from this approach, a more satisfied student body would.

The proposals concerning Division III blend the same insensitivity towards and lack of respect for student judgments with the establishment of needless restriction. The argument concerning math and laboratory courses boils down to the old truism, "Pain builds character." If a student's academic and-or career goals leave him undesirous of a math or lab experience, such a requirement would indeed be meaningless. The hour spent titrating solutions, counting bacteria colonies or playing with a slinky will be looked back upon with distaste.

The idea of a required Division III course in the Junior or Senior year is also very short-sighted. This is the period of time when most students are trying to narrow their course work to fit in coherently with their major. A requirement would tend to disrupt this process of specialization. Furthermore, most students would surely resent the paternalism of such a requirement. The restriction of the requirement to the final two years of one's study at Williams seems illogical: the student's right to map out his own schedule of courses should be preserved as much as possible.

Although a language requirement is more openly advocated in the Committee's report that possibility is also disturbing. Swedish, Hindu, Mandarin Chinese, Italian, Portuguese, Swahili, Japanese, Hebrew, and Arabic are all languages which many students prefer over the four modern tongues taught here. Yet such a diverse language curriculum is clearly beyond the limited resources of Williams. It seems then an act of utmost hubris to require exposure to one of these four languages. A requirement within the context of a broad selection of courses might have meaning. At present it would be a travesty.

The winds of change

A full oil tanker truck arrives at the college heating plant every day this time of year. It returns, empty, to the Hess tank farm in Albany, which is awaiting a small tanker shipment up the Hudson from a refinery somewhere in New Jersey, which is awaiting a supertanker full of Arabian crude from Kuwait. I don't know if this is real, it's so far away. But the ready watt, available from handy sockets campus-wide, is even less tangible. Like some huge nervous system, the New England regional electric grid (NEPOOL) has ganglions everywhere—a nuclear one at Rowe, twenty miles east, for instance—though some say there's no brain.

But back to Kuwait, or somewhere. The reverse flow—that of "petro-dollars"—ends here: Williams College chipped in $350,000 last year. That's only part of the picture; the toal energy cost here was over $725,000—about $375 for every student. This is 2½ times the cost seven years ago, and there's no telling where it will stop. The college has a responsibility to do whatever it can; the first step is gaining some control over the energy production process.

Two years ago, Reed Zars '77 had an idea: wind power for Williams. The College owns an especially promising site for wind turbines—2200-foot Berlin Pass, north of the College ski slope. The pass has a marked funneling effect on the prevailing westerly winds—an effect which the U.S. Department of Energy's Wind Systems Branch is actively pursuing in its wind measurement program.

Reed's study included measurements on a tower atop Mount Raimer, two miles north of the Pass; these yielded an estimated average windspeed of 14 mph. Signs point to stranger winds at Berlin. The detailed economic analysis assumes only 14 mph wind at the Pass, with three 200-kilowatt electric generators entailing a total initial investment of slightly more than $500,000. (Kilowatts a unit of power, the rate at which energy is delivered, equal to 1000 watts).

These cost estimates, consistent with Department of Energy figures, yield a payback period of ten years. The National Energy Act of 1978 provides for grants of up to 50 per cent to schools and hospitals for "measures for conversion to solar or other alternative renewable energy sources." The payback period could thus be halved to five years—a tempting opportunity on pure economic terms.

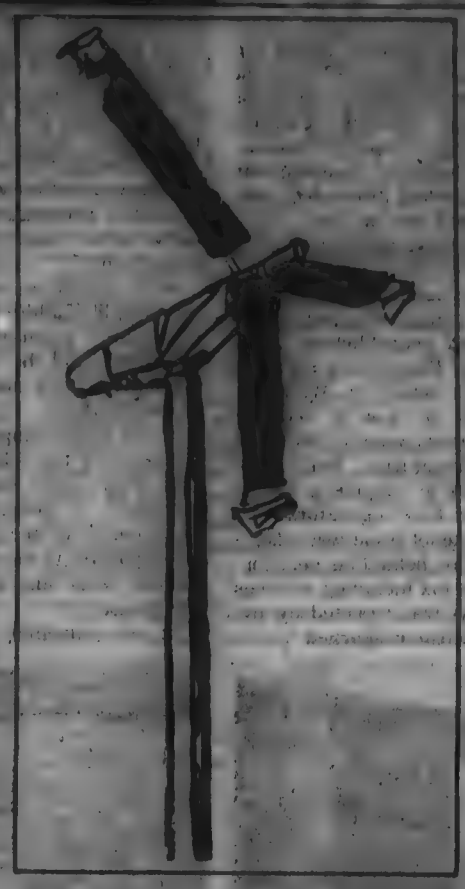
But the advantages of energy sources such as wind extend beyond the economic arena. First, these so-called alternative sources do not deplete non-renewable stocks of our mineral resources. They rely on energy flows which are always there whether or not we tap them, like sunlight, wind and vegetation.

Second, they are generally clean and versatile in scale and application. They offer an unprecedented opportunity for self-sufficiency in an industrial age, with a potential for reversing the increasing trend toward alienation of people from technology.

The federal government's programs for alternative energy development have largely overlooked these characteristics of alternative sources, concentrating increased appropriations (from almost zero to $400 million in six years) on exotic schemes and large-scale technologies which would "plug in" to existing energy networks as exact replacements for older systems. The approach is changing, but slowly. Wind energy, a proven technology providing the cheapest solar electricity today, still receives only 12 per cent of the research fund of the Solar Energy Division, which in turn gets only a small portion of the D.O.E. budget.

Some of the most encouraging innovation has come from outside the underfunded, rather misdirected federal program. A private engineer, Charles Schachle, developed his own medium-scale design, which attracted the eye of Southern California Edison, a utility very dependent on oil-fired capacity. A scaled-up version of Schachle's design, with a 3000-kilowatt peak output, will be put into operation three months from now at San Gorgonio Pass near Palm Springs, at the cost of $1 million. The utility estimates that subsequent machines would cost only half as much. If so, this would generate electricity costing 3¢ per kilowatt-hour over the machine's lifetime. (Kilowatt-hour: a unit of energy equal to the use of one kilowatt for one hour's time.)

Williams College now pays about 3.7 cents per kilowatt-hour for its electricity. With utility fuel costs and the skyrocketing cost of new nuclear and fossil-fuel power plants, this figure is sure to climb. How much, no one knows, but we do know this: we have very little control over Western Mass. Electric's rate regime or policy decisions—about as much influence as they have over OPEC.



As Metz and Hammond (Science magazine staff) point out, "solar energy is democratic. It falls on everyone and can be put to use by individuals and small groups of people." Well, not absolutely democratic.

Donald Wilber '79 last semester researched alternative energy sources for Williamstown and the area and will continue his work this semester. He also is environment chief of the Outing Club and a leader in campus environmental groups.

We in Williamstown, lying at the south end of the Green Mountains, are in one of six areas identified by wind expert William Heronemus of U.Mass. as the most promising regions for exploitation of wind energy.

We might have a site with winds comparable to San Gorgonion Pass (annual average 18 mph) at Berlin. Only further wind measurements will tell. To this end, the ten-meter tower which used to house a small windmill atop Baxter has been taken down and will be moved to the Pass and equipped with recording anemometers. It is vital that good data be accumulated on the full range of velocities; annual or even weekly averages are only crude estimates of the power potential. Power output mounts disproportionately as wind speeds increase. For instance, an 18-mph wind yields twice as much energy as a 14-mph breeze, because power available is proportional to the cube of wind velocity. Further, although the capital costs of wind generators are relatively high, we must bear in mind that operating costs are minimal. Little maintenance and no fuel need be paid for.

Aside from aesthetic blight (no more than the microwave transmission towers that already scar the hills) and possible interference with TV reception in the immediate vicinity, windmills have a very low environmental impact. Of course the net effects are excellent, as implied by the tongue-in-cheek analysis above. The more power windmills feed into a utility grid, the less oil and coal are burned. In the long run, fewer new power plants are necessary. Conventional wisdom used to assume that wind-generated capacity would fluctuate so greatly that it would make no dent in the amount of peak capacity that power companies would have to provide. However, it is now apparent that if enough wind turbines are fed into the same system, the variation in winds experienced by individual units will even each other out over a wide geographic region. Thus, the compensating diversity of the regional electrical grid can function as a storage network. This is the advantage of grid connection.

The generating capacity which Zarts proposed for the three Berlin Pass windmills (600 kilowatts) would rarely provide more than the college's needs—unless perhaps on a breezy spring day. Any excess of wind-generated electricity would flow back into the rest of the utility grid. Most of the time, wind electricity would provide part of the campus demand, thereby reducing the overall drain on the utility.

The legality of hooking an independent electrical source into a utility's grid has been tested in some areas, and is still under litigation in others. These decisions will have important bearing upon the future of decentralized alternative electricity-generating technologies. In the first case (May 1977) the Public Service Commission of New York, the state's utility-regulating agency, ruled in favor of residents of a Manhattan brownstone. The Commission required Con Edison to interconnect with their two-kilowatt windmill, and to buy surplus power at 2.3 cents per kilowatt-hour. Utilities everywhere have been reluctant to allow independent grid connections. Despite this, all decisions by PSC's have allowed connection, although rate arrangements vary.

But why not let the utilities deal with all this? If wind is so good, we'll get the benefits eventually, right? Well, maybe and maybe not. First, utilities are committed to large-scale facilities to fuel large grids, and this may not be the economic scale for wind machines. Second, the power companies, and all who buy from them, are stuck with some sort of fossil fuel-nuclear mix for some time to come—too much time. Utility-run wind machines will make a token contribution. Rates will continue to climb, as more acres will be ripped up for lower-grade uranium and coal. More U.S. dollars will end up as foreign petrodollars. Air pollution and radioactive wastes will continue to pose unacceptable risks to our environment, and to ourselves.

To the extent that wind provides Williams' electrical needs, we will not be fouling the earth. The power will be produced right here, in the mountains of New England. No one but madmen would have guessed we could grow something up there! The power source will be accessible, not arcane, understandable, not esoteric. And best of all, independent of decisions in which we have no say.

As Amory Lovins says in Soft Energy Paths: Perhaps people really do believe that the kinds of pollution they can't see don't exist. Perhaps people really want to become far more dependent on utilities and giant energy corporations, and to tolerate any degree of autocracy for the sake of being able to flick a convenient switch. My own view, though, is that people are much smarter than that, are well ahead of their governments, and are impatient to have an energy policy that makes sense.

I believe that Williams must and will opt on wind power. But I am an optimist. Many things at this college have a way of staying the same. Four years isn't a very long time, and it's my ticket to the future, right? I mean, my real life comes later, and later maybe never. Maybe now. It's not too short—not too late for anything good—and the progressive faculty remind us of this. A determined coalition of students, faculty, staff and alumni can make this happen. If we don't act, the winds of change will pass us by. It won't be our world anymore.

"Cogeneration might be feasible with incentives"

Evaluation is the focus of the College's energy conservation drive today, according to mechanical engineer John Holden, as the Buildings and Grounds energy chief reviews progress and assesses the feasibility of projects made possible by the release of new federal monies.

A recent energy audit of large buildings showed that "practically every building meets state standards," Holden claimed. Only Chapin Hall and the squash courts exceeded the limits. However, Holden noted that while the state limits "are probably having a significant effect on architectural design," they are "status quo standards, if anything a little too high."

Energy audits have revealed major differences in the costs of heating residential buildings here. Costs per student range from $74 for Sage to $642 at Fort Hoosac. Holden did not know of definitive plans for selling energy-expensive buildings as hinted by Dean Cris Roosenraad in the summer Alumni Review. But he did note that increasing energy costs "certainly will have an impact on the lifestyle at Williams" and could not rule out consolidation of campus housing.

Holden did rule out soon implementing several radical alternatives to the present energy situation at Williams, including those outlined by Donald Weber '79 in the other article on this page. But Holden would not deny that the College might someday find such projects more attractive.

"We're probably a ways away from having the technology for cogeneration," the engineer said. Both cogeneration and wind power are too expensive for the College now, he claimed. "They don't fit our scheme right now," he said, but noted that cogeneration might be feasible with better incentives. "Right now I think you still can buy electricity cheaper than you can make it," he added.

Converting the steam plant from oil to coal to evade OPEC price increases and uncertain supply would cost $750,000 for the technology, and perhaps more for anti-pollution devices, Holden projected. This cost rules out conversion until oil prices reach crisis levels or federal incentives change, he said.

"The federal government will finance up to one-half of any new project," Holden said of more limited energy plans. "That's what we're going to look at next," he added. The College has begun the energy audits required for grant applications. Added insulation and computer use are among the projects whose cost previously has kept them unfeasible.

Oil consumption at the College's steam plant is down this year, the engineer said. At the end of January 1978 the heating plant had burned 624,000 gallons of oil over 4,077 degree-days. (Degree-days are the number of days times daily temperature.) The same time this year saw 594,000 gallons burned over 4,169 degree-days, a 7.2 per cent improvement.

Among the new ideas that Buildings and Grounds has implemented since September was the closing of Griffin Hall through January. Cole Field House has been closed every winter for several years, but the plan was new for Griffin. The closing, which required draining all water pipes in the building, was "fairly successful," according to Holden.

"Education is probably the weakest link in our program," Holden said, commenting on the absence of student integration into energy conservation plans this year. The campus energy conservation committee, which includes student and faculty representation, will be reconvened, he added, and the annual campus energy contest is coming soon. Contests "don't save a lot," the engineer commented, but they do increase awareness. Buildings and Grounds also put up a suggestion box at the mailroom entrance and Holden said rewards might be offered as incentives.

Rothstein, Martineau saw need to address issues in state political races

By Karen Kelsey

"For accessible, energetic and effective leadership, vote for Mike Martineau." "Steve Rothstein wants to be your representative." Sound like typical campaign literature? It is, but not the kind this campus is seeing for the upcoming College Council elections. Using Campaign slogans, these two candidates, running for state offices last fall, graduated from Williams in the Class of '78.

What caused these recent graduates to run for office fresh from college, rather than seeking the more traditional route of gathering experience and years behind them before running? Rothstein, a Political Science major while at Williams, explained that he saw a need to address the serious issues in his home district of Brookline, Ma. "My opponent failed to support a strong ethics code for state legislators," he said. The tax relief issue was also a prime motivation behind his decision "A progressive tax including services for constituents was rejected by my opponent," Rothstein charged.

Martineau, graduating as a Bonuca Economy major and running in his native South Burlington, Vermont said that he thought the level of commitment by a legislator was the crucial issue. "The Vermont House of Representatives meets only 4 or 5 months per year," Martineau explained; "many of the legislators are self-employed or simply regard the job as part-time work." Martineau cited the potential of the job and vowed to be more responsive to his constituents.

Both candidates emphasized that they sought to address concrete issues in their primary campaigns. Rothstein said he focused on the legislative ethics code, tax relief, and responsibility to constituents. Martineau also emphasized the need for property tax relief. He explained that other issues such as land use, economic development, environmental protection and energy, all important to his specific Vermont district, were also the center of his campaign.

In an extremely close primary campaign, Rothstein lost by just 300 votes, taking more than 40 per cent in the three man race. Martineau ran unopposed in the primary and garnered 85 per cent of the vote, "more than any incumbent Democrat," he added proudly. In the general election Martineau won by a sweeping 57 per cent to 43 per cent, to become the first Democratic representative from his district. While Martineau admits enjoying his victory by celebrating with friends and campaign workers until 3 a.m., he has now settled into his job, working on the Committee on Municipal Corporations and Elections.

Rothstein said he had "no regrets" about his campaign and that he "might" run again. This fall he kept busy working as a field coordinator in the Paul Tsongas for Senator campaign.

Both alumni were surprised to find their age an advantage. Rothstein said that because of his age he had both the time and energy to devote himself fully to the job. Other positive aspects of being young are "determinism and idealism" he pointed out. Martineau also said that he found people receptive to him in spite of—and often because of—his relative youth. Age became a disadvantage only when voters questioned his experience.

The two men capitalized on their youth and energy by running "grassroots" style campaigns. "I went to every house," boasts Rothstein. Martineau combined door-to-door techniques with speeches to larger groups, stating "the present representative hasn't reached out to the people."

Martineau stated that while he felt his support was broadly based, it was the moral support given by Spencer-Brooks house, "that turned the tide in his favor."

On the campaign trail Rothstein found that people often vote for unusual reasons. "My grandfather owns a bakery," he explains, "so many senior citizens promised to vote for me because he makes good bagels!"

Bill Couch '79 took these photographs on the Winter Study trip to China. Counter clockwise from right: preschoolers in a kindergarten near Canton, China's omnipresent leaders, The Great Wall, a back alley in a rural community, and a old Chinese gentleman anxious to try out his English.

Impressions, comparisons of China abound—

"Everywhere we went people stared, stopped and watched us go by. It was hard to cope with at first," Denise described the experience as "uncomfortable and, at first, overwhelming."

Misiunas noted that although some of the Chinese knew English, they remained reticent to actually approach the group. "They were more polite, considerate than, say, Russians," he said. "The Russians have an innate boorishness about them—they never leave Americans alone."

The comparison was both natural and appropriate, since Misiunis has spent a great deal of time in Eastern Europe and Russia. A specialist in post-19th century Russian history, Misiunis continued, "I was constantly noting similarities and differences between the Soviet Union and China, some of them quite stark.

"The 'man on the street' seems to be a happier individual than the common man in Russia." Indeed the entire society seems to be a somewhat happier society, although it is certainly "materialistically poor," he remarked.

"The Soviet Union has what you might call an unhealthy society, where a visitor gets the sense that people need to lie to live, and that your tour guides do not have a total belief in what they are telling visitors," Misiunis said. "In China, I didn't sense the guides were deceiving us or that they were thinking something other than what they were telling us. Overall, it struck me that somehow there seems to be a basic healthy quality in Chinese society that is not present in Russian society."

Bill Couch, who has also spent time in Russia, noticed much the same thing: "The Chinese just seemed much more open than the Russians. At one point in China we were next to an anti-aircraft battery and I photographed it. The Russians would never have permitted us near an anti-aircraft base, much less allow us to take pictures of it."

"There are lower salaries in China, and there is not much money in circulation," Misiunis commented about the relation between money and products. "but one gets the sense that if he saves his money, the Chinese person can purchase something. In China there are things to buy in the stores. Things are available if you can save up the money to buy them. Money is worth something, and this is a relatively healthy sign.

"On the contrary, in the Soviet Union, there is a lot of money in circulation, but "it's much harder for people to buy the things they want," he continued. In Russia popular items are very expensive and in short supply. Misiunis calls this a "perverse, unhealthy relationship" Misiunis noted that "the Chinese seem to have a total lack of appreciation of the cultural past of their own nation. Even the guides seemed to have very little appreciation of the grandeur and glory of the Forbidden City. It made me feel very sad that these people could express no feeling for something so grand.

"Rather than express awe, the Chinese guides tried to compare the energy put into building the city with the number of peasants who could have been fed if it had not been built. In contrast, the Russians, as a people, are proud of their past. Compared to the Russians, the Chinese view of history is very impressionistic, very sketchy."

Bill said that while he had the freedom to go where he pleased on the streets in both Moscow & Peking, he sensed a more relaxed attitude in China toward tourists. "The Chinese were really friendly. We were allowed to visit hospitals and see both modern and traditional Chinese techniques, even though the 'modern equipment' left much to be desired from an American standpoint. In Russia, we could not even see a hospital."

In addition, the Chinese passport control was relaxed compared to the Russian system. The Russians searched baggage, had large gates and intimidating guards, so that going through customs can be really frightening. "In China there was no such intimidation," Couch commented.

To a large extent, the group was granted much freedom on the trip. According to Misiunis, the customs officials "didn't open a single suitcase either entering or leaving the country."

The officials asked only three questions when the group entered the country: 1) Did anyone speak Chinese? 2) Did anyone in the group know anyone in China? 3) and did anyone bring any foreign currency into China?

The Government never prohibited visitors from taking pictures or from walking around unattended. Harvey said though, that "if someone wanted to do something different from the printed itinerary, nothing seemed to work out." And when such off-the-schedule visits were allowed, students felt that "the guides and heads of the organizations we visited were keeping an eye on us."

The presence of restrictions on the Chinese themselves was evident in several instances. Harvey asked one girl if she would like to visit the United States. She answered that she would love to, but doubted she would ever have the opportunity. And when people were invited to Chinese homes, their hosts always arranged a meeting place. They feared visiting the hosts.

At one point several students met with a dissident. "From talks with him I got the impression that many Chinese are not totally satisfied with their existence," Phil commented. "They aren't unhappy to the point of rebellion, but they do want to move on and improve their lives."

Couch made a final comment about future interest in China: "I would really like to return in ten years to see just what normalization has done. (which was announced just before the group arrived in China). I want to see if normalization will make the Chinese more materialistic. Will the people become more westernized or more modern with a distinct Chinese culture touched to it? And finally, I'd want to see how China has progressed in that time."

Mission Park: it's not as bad as it first may seem

by Sally Davidow

Mission Park is made up of three houses: Pratt, Dennett and Armstrong, and Mills, an overflow section for all three houses. It holds over 300 students, and is according to some people, a community in itself.

"You don't have to go outside that much if you don't want to," admitted one Mission Park resident. The rooms are fairly soundproof so that you can study in them the dining room is right in the building, and approximately one-sixth of the school population is there. Although many people see Mission Park as somewhat isolated, it is close to the library, the tennis courts, and the infirmary and is certainly no farther from things than Greylock and some of the Row Houses.

The rooms at Mission Park are grouped into suites of four, five, six and seven bedrooms. Each person in the suite has a single and, in addition, the fours, sevens and some of the fives have living rooms. Each suite has its own bathroom (with bathtub), and the sevens have an additional shower.

While the rooms at Mission Park are shaped somewhat oddly (they are markedly lacking in 90 degree angles), they have a great deal of window space and are warm. "People picture the rooms as barren and small," commented one Armstrong house occupant, "but there's a lot you can do with them." It is indisputably easier to hang things on mission walls than on Greylock bricks.

The dining system at Mission is much akin to the one at Baxter. According to one student the food is also comparable to Baxter's, although another student claimed that it was better than that of Baxter Driscoll or Greylock. "The cooks like us, there's a good interaction between cooks and students," he stated. Although lunches are not usually very crowded, there is often a line at dinnertime. "In a way this is better than sit down dinners," commented one student in contrasting Mission with Dodd and the Row Houses. Dinner at Dodd for example is served at 7:30, "which can be a drag if you have something at 7:00. You end up going somewhere else [illegible] often. You can also eat as slowly or as fast as you want," she emphasized, having recently been the victim of Row House waiters who had been in a hurry to clear away plates. Hearty breakfast eaters should also take note of the fact that only Baxter, Mission and Greylock serve full breakfasts.

Students seem to agree that the social calendar is quite active in Mission Park houses. They feel that "the houses are pretty tight. There are always house sponsored parties, and houses sometimes go together on parties." Residents believe that Mission Park is especially good for sophomores—a majority of whom end up there.

One real problem with Mission Park is that it does have a higher vandalism rate than most houses. Because it has a long, open main hallway and much glass space, it is fairly susceptible to vandals. One resident mentioned that all of the signs on the cork boards in the hall were often torn down and strewn all over the floor but felt that most of the damage done was not done by Mission Park people.

On the whole though, Mission Park residents seem happy with their environment.

Mission Park is featured this week in the first of a series of articles on freshman inclusion. (photo by Johnson)

By March 16, all freshmen will be asked to list in order of their preference, the five available housing options. The categories are: Dodd Tower, Mission Park Row Houses, Greylock and the Berkshire Quad. A student may not request for a specific house in any of these categories. Freshmen are also given the option of off campus or co-op housing.

Students may apply for housing alone or in groups numbering four or fewer for any housing situation. As many as seven students may apply together for the Mission Park option.

The housing decisions, which are made at random by a computer, should be announced soon after spring break.

THE RECORD, in an attempt to familiarize freshmen with the various housing arrangements, is running a series of articles each week focusing on a specific housing situation.

The Committee on Student Housing will soon distribute to freshmen pamphlets with many specifics on upperclass housing which should answer any further questions.

John Miller shaped the lives and thoughts of many students

by Brian J. Murphy

John William Miller, Mark Hopkins Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy, emeritus, had an extraordinary impact on Williams students for over three decades. In the words of George Brockway '38, "No one could long sit in one of his classes without being profoundly moved, sometimes profoundly disturbed, frequently profoundly inspired."

Professor Miller died on Christmas Day, 1978, two weeks before his 84th birthday. Chairman of the Philosophy Department for 24 years, he came to Williams in 1924 and retired in 1960. One measure of his popularity is indicated by his receiving two full-immersion dedications: one in 1960, upon his retirement, and one in 1938, after his return from a year's sabbatical. The 1960 yearbook dedication called him "one of the most profoundly respected members of the faculty" and spoke of his "devotion to the life of the mind, to the college, and to his students." The opportunity to study with Professor Miller was said to be an "inspiring experience of association with his mind and personality."

He was also honored by the establishment of the John W. Miller Book Prize which is awarded annually to the College's most outstanding student in philosophy. Funds for the award were provided by donations from Professor Miller's former students.

Without making a conscious effort to do so, Professor Miller was very influential in shaping the lives and thoughts of many students. President John Chandler stated that "Williams graduates continued to visit and write Professor Miller 40 and 50 years after they first encountered the intellectual and moral force of his teaching. He stood in the tradition of truly great teachers and whether talking with a neighborhood child or a distinguished visitor, he was always learning and teaching at the same time."

Professor Miller could best be described as a "dialectical philosopher" said Lawrence Beals, Professor Emeritus of Philosophy and a close friend and colleague of Professor Miller's for over 40 years. Professor Miller was known as a demanding teacher, one who challenged students and made them fully realize their capabilities. He never grew old mentally—he was intellectually vital until his death.

Professor Miller's house was always open to students who would visit alone or in small groups. He would stay up talking about philosophy as long as the students wanted to, sometimes until one or two o'clock in the morning. Professor Miller loved conversations with students and believed he learned a great deal from them. He was known for picking up on a casual comment and developing it into an important thought. He would always return the credit to the person who gave him the original impetus, even though he had expanded on it far more than that person had imagined.

"He wrote all the time—reams and reams" said Professor Beals. However, Professor Miller was a very self-effacing and private person and submitted almost nothing for publication. Mr. Brockway, a publisher, tried for years to persuade Professor Miller to publish some of his essays and papers. Professor Miller finally acquiesced, and The Paradox of Cause and Other Essays was published in October of 1978 by W. W. Norton & Company. The book contains thirteen essays, two of which were previously published in The Journal of Philosophy. The contents of the book span over forty years of Professor Miller's thought. The essays are modestly phrased but contain powerful, new and exciting ideas. Several of the essays deal with the conflict between personal freedom and causal order.

> "...he was the only person who could walk alone and look like a procession."

History is also a recurring theme in this collection. In middle age, Professor Miller developed a strong interest in the philosophy of history. At a time when this subject was rarely taught, he introduced it to the Williams curriculum. He remained interested in this subject for the rest of his life, and it was one of his favorite topics for discussion.

In his own words, Professor Miller was "a very private person." This desire for privacy increased as he grew older, and he would seldom grant interviews, even upon publication of his book. His intellectual interests were self-cultivated to an unusual degree and were inspiring in their extent and breadth. He was a very formal and stately person, always courteous but friendly. In later years, it was said of him that he was the only person who could walk up Spring Street alone and look like a procession. This air of dignity and solemnity belied his open and warm personality.

A spontaneous tribute to Professor Miller occurred last September, at a convocation panel in Jesup Hall. The panel consisted of seven Williams alumni, all past or present college presidents. The presidents, spanning almost thirty years of Williams graduates, all had vivid memories of Professor Miller. The Reverend Michael Scanlan '53, president of the College of Steubenville (Ohio), said "Professor Miller was the one who taught us philosophy . . . he raised the questions about what is life? Where does it start? Where does it end? . . . It's interesting that 25 years later the graduates are saying 'that's what I remember'."

Number of 12-college exchanges is declining

by Cathy Killiper

A glance at statistics on study away programs reveals the number of Williams students participating in Twelve-College Exchange has dropped over the past seven years.

According to Dean McIntire, in 1973-1974, thirty-five students spent time at one of the other eleven colleges, Howard College in D.C., or the California Institute of Technology as opposed to eleven in 1978-1979. There are ten applicants seeking to exchange for all or part of next year.

McIntire believes the decreased interest in the Twelve-College Exchange program stems from many students' preference for a college quite different from Williams. Schools like Wellesley near Boston and those in the five college valley which have an urban air are popular. The search for collegiate diversity is reflected also in the fact that twenty-one men and women are at other U.S. schools outside the Twelve-College Exchange such as N.Y.U. and seventy are studying abroad in 1978-1979.

Although students do look for an environment unlike that of Williams, the Associate Dean pointed out one should not assume that the twelve colleges are too similar to Williams. One basis for the creation of the Twelve-College Exchange program was that all the schools are enough alike to facilitate the acceptance of credit. Thus an exchange student can find academic compatibility among the colleges yet find enough "different aspects to make a challenge."

Students on exchange both from and to Williams have found the experience worthwhile. Rajendra Khadka wanted "a change, to go someplace very different from Williams in terms of size, location, and student body." He liked studying at Wellesley and would "suggest and recommend going away to anyone." Dean Chung found that during his year at Mount Holyoke he was able to take advantage of the many "resources" the five college valley offers. A semester at Smith allowed Leslie Wang to enjoy the five college area too. Bothered by the sexism issues at Williams last year, Wang learned to value "the aspects of a female school." Having returned, she declares time away at Smith helped her to simultaneously "appreciate and tolerate Williams."

Many exchanges currently at Williams also view the program in a positive light. Joanna Kalliches of Smith experienced "sophomore slump" and, like Melissa Easton of Smith, wanted a change of place. Kalliches believes being here has enabled her to "challenge myself when I didn't know anybody and to make a place." Susan Dahling from Mount Holyoke has formed a "new perspective on the social and cultural life outside a women's college and the five-college area." Both Kalliches and Dahling are interested in the American Studies courses not offered at their own schools.

According to Mount Holyoke's Gayane Zartarian, going on exchange can benefit both the school one visits and the home institution. A person may contribute certain ideas while on exchange as well as bring back ideas to the home school. Diane Lecuyer felt that after two years at Amherst, she knew most of the students and "got into a routine." By spending a semester at Williams, she can enjoy "a small school with good academics."

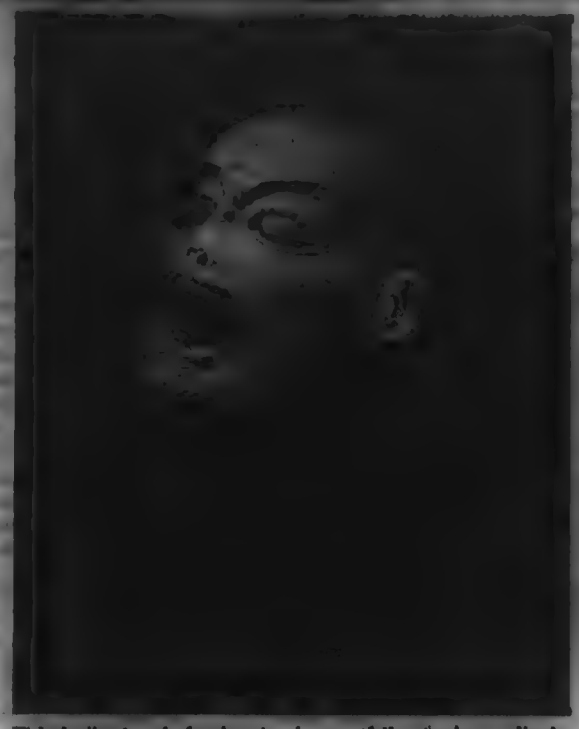
Math art exhibit has nebulous "elegance"

by John Libertine

For some unknown reason, Mathematics seems to have a bad press in this country. Almost everyone finds the field dry and boring, not to mention downright frightening. And while some might agree that it has some abstruse intellectual appeal, mathematics certainly can have no inherent beauty. Right?

Wrong! The current exhibition of mathematical art now on view in Lawrence Hall belies this belief. The exhibit contains a varied assortment of examples of art from that strange, nebulous world of higher mathematics. One would be surprised at just how rich this field is.



The impetus for this collection of artistic esoterica came about from a discussion last year between Franklin Robinson of the Art Dept. and William Oliver of the Math Dept. about the possibilities of art in mathematics. Once the decision was made to have an exhibit, Prof. Victor Hill was selected coordinator of the project, a task he attacked with relish.

According to Hill, there is a difference between what one normally thinks of as beauty and what a mathematician thinks of as beauty. "Only in mathematics and the visual arts do I find the word 'elegant', a term which mathematicians use to describe aesthetic pleasure." Mathematical beauty, says Hill, should consist of conciseness and a sense of surprise; M. C. Escher's works are a fine example of such beauty. Symmetry, and sometimes the lack of symmetry, also play an important role. One of the exhibits is a sunflower, illustrating mathematical beauty found in Nature, and one cannot help but be impressed and awed by the delicate summetries in its surface.

On the surface, the show seems a bit subdued; there are no brilliant flahses of color. It is what Hill terms a "chaste exhibit", using the lack of excessive color to reflect a spare elegance in the works.

Included among the exhibits are such examples of mathematical art as the golden rectangle, the rectangle with the dimensions the ancient Greeks found most pleasing to the eyes; some very elegant graphs of seemingly mundane functions (for example, who would have guessed at first glance that the graph of r equals sin2x is a four-leaved clover?), graphed using the computer by Steven Daniel '79O kaleidocycles, which are great fun to play with; a section on the graph known as the "Witch of Agnesi", proving that women can too do mathematics; and a superegg constructed by Joseph McCann of the Physics Shop. (I won't tell you what a superegg is—go see it, it's a lot of fun.)

All the exhibits have accompanying explanatory notes which help to clarify and answer any questions one might have of the exhibit in question.

Hindu art livens hall

The Hindu ascetic threw back his head in the ecstacy of worship. On the walls of the original 12th century temple the contortions of his body and those of scores of other worshipper-statues would have created ripples of motion in stone, cresting to the sublime form of their god.

The world of ancient Indian religions is far away from Williams College. The frenzy of belief has been replaced by the yawn of cynicism or the "OM" of T.M. The dynamism and impact of the religious art is still very much alive for Professor Milo Beach, well-known scholar of Oriental Art.

Through the efforts of Beach, Joh Coffey and the Williams College Museum of Art, the newest gallery in Lawrence Hall is a (more or less) permanent exhibit of Oriental Art. Its opening in September 1978 represents the world-wide scope of interests and acquisitions that has made the College Museum one of the most outstanding of its size.

The gallery contains many fascinating pieces of sculpture, painting and tapestry, each of which has a story behind it. For example, the gilded Buddah on your right as you enter is Vairocana, the Buddah who sits at the center of the universe. From his divine energy emanated the line of Buddahs who have visited the earth in various forms. Now he sits calmly in Lawrence, giving his energy to the Art Department Chairman or possibly creating new Buddahs?

Brooks-Rogers opens, but Hegyi falters

by Jackson Galloway

The fourth concert of the Music in the Round series proved a sensational opening for the new Brooks-Rogers Auditorium, despite Julius Hegyi's efforts in the opposite direction.

The inspired program began with the Berwald Septet for violin, viola, cello, bass, clarinet, bassoon, and horn. Each part, with one glaring exception, took its place, as the bassoon provided an especially good balancing point between the clarinet and horn. Susan Hohenberg, clarinet, was once again in excellent form, demonstrating her consummate control of the instrument. The hornist, Zsembery, also added greatly to the performance through his steadiness in the sustained passages of quickly repeated notes. The strings were, sadly, a totally different story. From the word go, Hegyi completely overshadowed the viola and bass. Douglas Moore wielded his cello well, but it was a losing battle against blaring pizzicato and an overly biting tone. A violent refusal to blend with the wind instruments also served to single out the violin part to an unnecessary degree. The delightful nature of the work and the enthusiasm of the participants served to overcome this handicap, however.

Apparently the intermission brought Hegyi to his senses, as the casualties from flying rosin were noticeably fewer in the second half of the program. The Brahms Quartet, Opus 60 is probably one of his finest works with its warmth of harmonic color and good balance between the strings and piano.

The entry of the second subject, often a stumbling block for the cellist, proved no problem as the tempo remained steady through the switch from triplets to even quavers. The scherzo places a large burden on the pianist, and Charlotte Hegyi proved more than equal to the task, masterfully avoiding the temptation to pound out the subject and blending well with the violin and cello when the viola led. The cello line of the andante is certainly the most melodic of the Quartet, and Hegyi and Mr. Moore complemented each other well.

Observance, though, of the poco forte marking in the piano score would have produced a fuller, richer tone. The piano reiteration of the theme was marred only by some rough pizzicato on the part of the violin. Hegyi was in his element in the finale as the violin occupied a singular role. Despite the emphasis on the violin, the piano controlled the tempo, setting the pace which the violin deligently followed. The leggerio of the piano provided a good accompaniment to the expressive but restrained strings. Overall, the passages balanced well.

The program could not have ended with a better work. The light, energetic nature of the Francais trio introduced a timely relief from the heaviness of the Brahms. The technique of the performers was almost flawless as first two movements drove forward, interrupted only by short bursts of vibrant pizzicato. Contrasting with the flowing rhythm of the allegretto vivo and vivo, the andante retired into a more serene mood of swaying legato, well rendered con sardino. The enthusiasm of the performers was obvious in their rendition of the finest of the Francaix chamber works.

Band plays Carnival

The ACEC will present Albatross, widely considered by polls, record sales, radio airplay, and concert attendance to be the top rock band in New England, in a Winter Carnival dance-concert this Friday in Greylock from 9:00 p.m. to 1:00 a.m. Admission is $1.50; beer and punch will be served.

Albatross, currently negotiating with major record companies worldwide, has spent seven years rehearsing, polishing, developing an extensive repertoire, perfecting diverse musical techniques, and constructing dazzling harmonies and hard-driving arrangements. Consistently strong live performances have attracted a loyal following of fans, over 5000 of whom receive the periodic Albatross newsletter.

Because of the limited capacity of the Greylock Dining Hall, the ACEC suggests that you plan to arrive promptly. Last year's Winter Carnival dance ("Beatlemania") was packed by 10:00 p.m., and Security closed the doors.

A major concert for Winter Carnival was impossible this year because of a lack of adequate facilities. Chapin Hall cannot be used, and both the Field House and Hockey Rink are used for Carnival events. The ACEC is planning a major Spring Weekend concert.

Albatross will present a dance-concert in Greylock this Friday at 9:00.

We may prefer to ignore it but even sheltered college students feel the wrath of those who accuse us of having pointy heads and failing to prepare for the "real world." Our queries of, "But what is reality?" fall upon deaf ears.

Nowhere is this bias so obvious as in television. Charlie's Angels is hardly a metaphysical inquiry. The television medium has been attacked so frequently but frantically by famous men that many have given in and joined 'em, psychoanalyzing Star Trek or ferreting out Shakespearean metaphors in Happy Days.

Further proof of this anti-intellectual curtain lies in the discovery by this intrepid reporter of a list of rejected TV pilots. A "pilot," as they are called, is a proposal for a television series. Along the lines of the notion-concept-idea progression discussed briefly in Annie Hall, pilots proceed from written proposals to filmed tests to full-fledged series—if they're lucky.

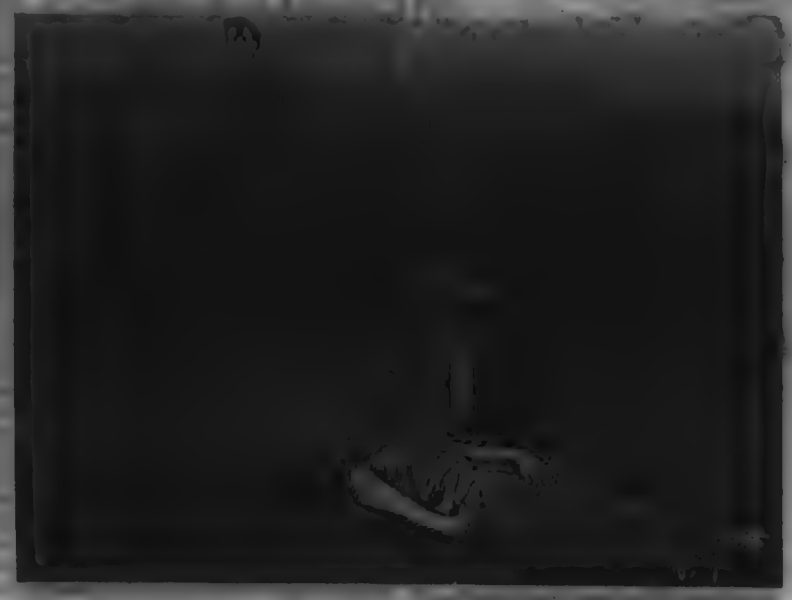
The following series were not lucky enough to make the cut. They show conclusively, however, that TV looks most unkindly upon any literary influences, particularly in series titles.

The rejections begin with several attempts at adapting works of Ernest Hemingway. The first, A Farewell to Farms, tells the heart-warming story of a boy who leaves his rural home for the excitement of college life in a town closely resembling Boston. Its equally unsuccessful sequel was about his further adventures, where the young pont unfortunately does poorly in English 101. The Young Man and the C Sector made it.

For Whom the Shoe Tolls, a story about a college crew coach patterned closely after The Paper Shadow never progressed to the running stage. Another sports show called Kamen in a Range Land hoped to present serious drama with the gripping drama of a New York hockey player who jumps to a WHA team formed in Texas. The most recent sports show rejected was the tense recounting of a Cincinnati baseball player's contract negotiations. The head-first slider's demands for horticultural fringe benefits are refused by the hard-nosed general manager in the first episode of I Never Promised You a Garden, Love.

Other American authors carry equally little weight. Walled-In, a movie about a mudslide near a Concord pond, got nowhere. An action series about a helicopter detective, Mobile Dick, did no better.

Foreign authors fare no better in the ignorant and suspicious community of Holywood. One might think that opportunistic TV executives would welcome a thinly-disguised gossip column about the proven star of Shampoo and Heaven Can Wait. Yet Warren Piece, with its Tolstoyian sub-plots, never made it to the diagonal screen. With all the Animal House spin-offs floating about, one might think that a series about an Animal Fraternity president would be a sure-fire hit. But The Idiot never got off the ground.



Some of the sons-of-sworn due borrowings may have faced legal difficulties from authors reluctant to associate themselves with the pusillanimous patriarchs of television. This may be Ken Kesey's motivation in the case in the made-for-TV movie about a B-1 bomber whose faulty navigational equipment leads it to buzz the University of California at Berkeley. One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest. One would hope, however, that the producers of The Sorrow and the Pity would be kind enough to lend their support to a tragic tale of a pre-med whose exam grades in Organic Chemistry drop a full bracket with each test.

Less certain, if closer to home, is Joseph Heller's reaction to the proposed series recounting the eleven-day road trip of two Williams men, Catch-22.

Very few things are certain in TV, as a matter of fact. No one knows much about the minds of the Hollywood moguls. No one even knows if they have minds. Perhaps someday they will shed their anti-literary bias and give America some classily-monikered programs. Who knows? After all, as the titles just mentioned prove, television is a punny business.

Marta Renzi and Dancers will present workshops and performances Feb. 13-15.

Renzi dancers arrive for series of performances

Marta Renzi and Dancers will be in Williamstown for a two-day residency Feb. 14-15. They will present a series of public workshops and performances at both the Williamstown public schools and Williams College.

Renzi, whose dance and choreography is drawing increasing attention in New York City where she lives and works, is a Williamstown native. She is the daughter of Ralph and Helen Renzi of 125 South Street in Williamstown and studied dance under Joy Anne Dewey, director of dance at Williams, from age five through high school.

The five-member group will open their residency with a lecture-performance of "Wrinkle," a dance choreographed by Renzi, on Wednesday, Feb. 14 at 11:30 a.m. in the Mt. Greylock Regional High School gymnasium. She describes "Wrinkle" as "danger, silliness, falling stars, solitude, heroism and heavy breathing."

The performance and brief question and answer session at the high school will be followed by a dance workshop that afternoon at 2:15 at the Williamstown elementary school. The workshop will focus on technique and improvisation in Renzi's work. Wednesday's portion of the residency will conclude with a similar workshop at Williams College in the upper Lasell Gymnasium at 4 p.m.

On Thursday, Feb. 15, the dancers will present a 2 p.m. performance of "Bandhsee Summer," also choreographed by Renzi, at the Williamstown elementary school. Then at 8 p.m. that evening both "Wrinkle" and "Banshee Summer" will be performed at 8 p.m. in Lasell Gymnasium.

Viewpoint

Campus suffers from sexual inhibitions

by Tracy Dick

Williams is not just a place of academic growth but one of social growth and development. The great majority of social events here are a heterosexual orientation. This fact makes it difficult for gay people to openly express themselves and interact affectionately with people of their own sex. Yet another problem of this predominately heterosexual atmosphere is that people in general are not exposed to homosexuality; therefore, prejudices and fears are more able to manifest and grow.

The GPU was first created to acknowledge openly that there are gay people on campus. The group still provides a place where gay people can talk about their experiences and problems. More importantly, through the GPU WE WISH TO EDUCATE THE CAMPUS.

In the past two years we have invited ministers, politicians, lawyers, and psychologists to speak on a variety of subjects related to homoesxualtiy. These speakers are meant for gay people with confusions about their own identity in and out of society; yet truly they are for anyone who is trying to understand sexuality, in themselves and the people around them.

There is oppression for homosexuals on this campus. It doesn't exist in violence or events immediately tangible. The existence of mental and verbal prejudices, like gay jokes and anti-gay attitudes, cause oppression by igniting a sensitivity and feat into gay people who do not want to be stereotyped or outcasted.

Sexuality in general is a problem at Williams. Visitors who come here say Williams of one of the most beautiful and romantic settings they've ever seen. Yet outward displays of affection between people is almost non-existent. It is not just homosexuals who feel it difficult to be openly affectionate with one another; the entire campus suffers from the same inhibitions and need for secrecy.

The GPU is a group which strives to better the social system, make it more tolerant and conducive for everyone. By forming a group, we do not want to alienate or segregate ourselves—and we are not making a value judgment concerning sexual oritnetations. We are part of humanity fighting for rights we believe to be naturally ours.

The process of coming out and being open about our sexuality is often a moral decision where we expose ourselves in a hope to defy stereotypes. It is also a way of showing that we are proud and accepting of what we are. Our goal is to integrate, not by changing the majority or transforming ourselves in terms of sexual orientations, but to integrate with mutual acceptance and understanding.

Because Williams is small and isolated we as students have greater control over our environment than does society at large. As individuals we can have an impact on the offical policies and in a larger sense, the attitudes which influence our community. The prejudices of our present society are only perpetuated by our own irresponsibilities. The opportunities for contact and intimacy are immense. We should reach out to one another more often and try to understand our own feelings and the feelings of those around us.

members would help to correct the imbalance of representation that currenlty exists. Jon Ballan '79 charged, however, that the new members would only increase the bureaucarcy of the Council, thus impeding its efficiency.

The vote to approve that portion of the constitution fell deadlocked at 12-12. The rules allow the President to vote only when the Council is at such a vote deadlock. In his first vote of the year, Council President Bronson Fargo voted for the addition of the five new members. The Council also voted to recombine the Housing Committee, which had been split in the first draft of the proposed constitution into two separate committees.

In other action, the Council retroactively approved a category change of $530 for the Williams Jazz Ensemble. A misunderstanding between the Jazz Ensemble and the Finance Committee had led the musical group to use funds appropriated for visiting musicians for participation in the Classboro Jazz Festival. This change is subject to the Jazz Ensemble's performance of a free outdoor concert later in the year, and its promise to bring an additional visiting jazz act to campus.

Presidential Race

Geismar

The College Council has been the subject of many derogatory comments throughout the years that I have been here—accused of being inefficient, bumbling, useless, and worse. Much of this has stemmed, I believe, from a misunderstanding by some, council members and the student body alike, regarding the function of the Council.

The College Council is designed to be a representative body, not a governing one. Its success, therefore, is measured by how well it performs this representative function. Elected representatives must be aware of the myriad activities and views of their constituency. I feel that I, through contacts made socially, academically, and athletically, am aware of the diverse opinions and views on campus, and that I could rationally review and bring into focus viable changes in student life.

Council could be a superb mechanism for centralizing small group concerns. The recent changes in the Food Services chit program evidence this, as do past discussions of black-white relations on campus, and the acknowledgement of the sexual preference clause by the administration. There is no other avenue available to all students on an equal basis which permits concerns to be aired and issues raised. Council is perhaps limited in power by strictures in the College charter, or by size and the effectiveness of the representatives. It also has bounds which have not yet been approached. College Council is available to everyone—any individual student or group is allowed to speak at meetings, and is encouraged to use this as a means to express their own views.

It is important that whoever sets the tone for next year's Council has an understanding of how the Council works procedurally, but is not afraid to experiment with more relaxed and thus more productive ways of running meetings and achieving specific ends. I have the experience, and I have the desire to make Council accessible and workable for the entire student body. Vote GEISMAR on Wednesday and Thursday.

Marie

I think that I have the "qualibilities" for the job, I'm willing to put as much time into it as is needed, but I'm not willing to take up other people's time with work that can be done with much less deliberation and with work that others more knowledgeable than council members have already debated and decided upon.

Perhaps I don't have the experience that some of the other candidates have, having only been on council for one semester, last year. However, that may not be the kind of experience that you want. I've got some new ideas from two years of observation and complaining and I think it's time that I try my hand at being the administrator and have a chance to make my own mistakes.

I'm willing to work within the restrictions that the Council exists under, but only if my co-workers are committed to NEW changes. I looked at the report of the Constitutional Review Committee and, well, it scared me. In parts it was an innovative document, but in other sections the suggestions if implemented would add clutter to a council already not as representative as it should be and having difficulty agreeing on and accomplishing its work. I mean—how would you imagine more people on the Council—chaotic or what? And non voting members—what kind of representation and responsibility would that be for those groups! What about additional at large reps.? Who would they represent? Not the off campus students, nor other segments of our community—all they'd do is represent more of their area of campus, so why add more of these. And then the five housing category reps, and the additional committees? I'm not sure if this would add to the confusion or not.

Anyway, if you vote for me I can't promise you anything, 'cause I don't know what's going to happen: but you can promise me concern of what happens to your money and what your government should be.

Trout

My case is simple: we should abolish the College Council. An effective and broad-based student government already exists, independent of the Council, which we can, and should, exploit to the fullest. The Council itself is at best a waste of time and energy, and at worst an obstruction to creative student action.

More than two hundred students currently participate in governing campus affairs through the independent student organizations, the student-faculty and standing committees, and the house governments. From the movies we watch and the house parties we attend to the changes in Winter Study or housing policy, this is the student government which counts. This system maximizes student responsibility and encourages participants to specialize in the area they know best; given the smallness of the college and the time pressures on us all, it is the best possible system for getting individuals involved.

But it is precisely this individual involvement that the existence of the College Council as "the focus of student opinion and power" discourages. The Council delayed and disrupted student action motivated by concern over South Africa; it was the led rather than the leader in the fight to ban discrimination against homosexuals in admissions policy; and now it has voted to split up the Housing Committee. And what positive action does the Council offer to balance these travesties? They've passed a new constitution—the third in as many years—which changes nothing. Rather than make this farce even more cumbrous and time-consuming we should dispense with it altogether.

For a long time I couldn't decide whether to laugh at the empty pomposity of the Council, or to cry over the time and effort it wastes. The responsible thing to do, I suppose, is to speak out against this farce, and that's what I've tried to do this week. We all outgrew the petty games of the College Council when we graduated from high school, let us be done with them.

Walker

No one disputes the College Council's potential to perform more effectively. The Council can do anything this community asks it to just as easily as the council can be ineffective. The College Council's legitimacy and relations with the student body is directly proportional to the responsibility it demonstrates. The responsibility the council demonstrates is relative to the initiative and direction of its leadership.

The leadership of the coming council will have to be aggressive and enthusiastic if it is to reverse the perception the student body presently has. An identity of motivation and concern can be established if the members of the council pledge adequate time and are willing to give of their talents. Our expectations of the Council's ability to guide and set a course for future Williams generations can be uplifted if the Council is spurred toward taking on the duty of realizing specific and concrete goals.

I have made several proposals for the Council to consider this year. First, in an effort to augment our overall insufficient activities budget as funded through the activities tax, I have proposed establishing endowments for organizations in need.

Second, the College Council can be a driving force behind better student-community relations. By taking the example of the Housing Committee to encourage houses to have community associates, the Council too can offer itself and the proposed student assembly as a place for community spokesmen to bring issues of concern over relations directly to students.

These goals are easily attainable and not idle promises.

Orr

Douglas Orr announces his write-in candidacy for the office of College Council President. The reason for a write-in candidacy: I am running on the platform of an alternative structure for the College Council. At this point in time there is no community involvement of which to speak. I do not believe it is a matter of apathy but merely one of accessibility. By the nature of the Council's structure, it is a closed system; "open meetings" do not offer significant participation. A solution to this, which I would hope to see work, is the town meeting system, where community input and participation are a necessity, where most issues would be solved through college wide participation, and some of the issues, such as the budget, would be solved by town meeting elected committees. A write in candidacy is the only means by which support for such a proposal can make a show of strength. In so basing my candidacy, interest and hope in such an alternative is inherent in my election. Hopefully by the fall the title of President will be replaced by the title "Moderator." Vote for Orr and take a part in our community.

Secretarial Race

McNamee

Well, some people think I'm crazy. I have really enjoyed my work on the College Council! It has surprised me in the last year, how easy it is for someone new to the Council to dig his heels in and make a difference—all it takes is a lot of energy and a little creativity. I've worked hard to persuade Williams to administer different board options, all self-scheduled exams and a new "blue chitting" system. It may seem tragic that only the last has (so far!) materialized, but often you have to work a long time for change before it's effected.

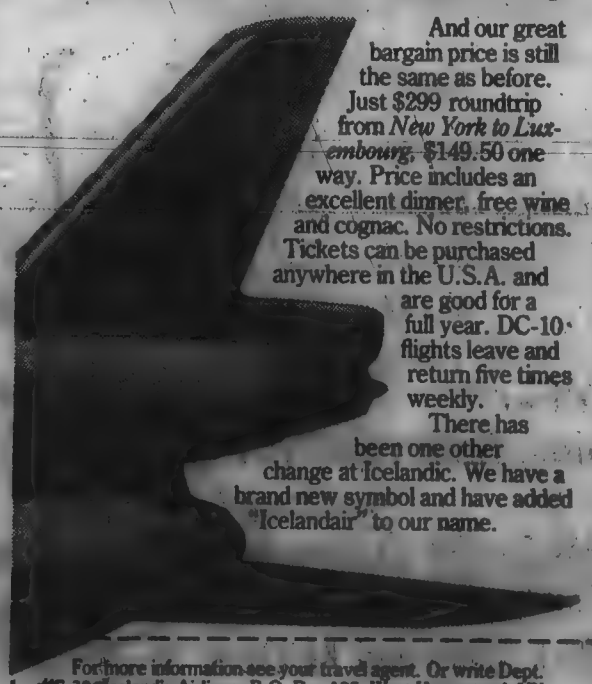
In my work as a CC rep and as a member of various committees (CEP, good services and many others) by far the most important thing to me has been to fairly represent student opinion. I've tried to solicit feelings at all times—sometimes I think people groan when I head for their table at meals! I've been very fortunate in that Gladden has listened to and thought carefully about almost everything, so that I'm pretty optimistic (naive?!) that the rest of the student body is potentially similar.

Often people seem to take things for granted, and it's certainly possible I could come to take being on CC for granted. I'm pretty stubborn, though, and sometimes all-too-anxious to articulate my opinions and new ideas. If the new Constitution is passed, the Secretary will be an extremely important position. Student power will be centralized and the Secretary will be responsible for coordinating all the different facets. Perhaps most importantly, I think the Council should occasionally, informally, meet to "brainstorm". Ideas are needed, creative things that the students care about. Sitting around waiting for these ideas to hit us on the head is not getting us anywhere now.

So what I'm asking for is something pretty selfish—that you vote to let me continue to do something I enjoy tremendously. I think I've done a lot already, and as Secretary I can accomplish even more. Energy and creativity are crucial, and I'll try hard to provide both.

Rowley

I am running for the office of College Council Secretary, a position that deals primarily with communication. Routine administrative tasks aside the most essential function of the Secretary is to reach members of the college community, obtain their reactions to issues, and relay this input to the Council in a useful form. As proposed in the new Constitution, a monthly Student Assembly and an all-College informational newsletter would furnish an excellent structure for the accomplishment of these goals.



This is the first election in which the CC Treasurer and Secretary will be elected by the entire student body and not solely by the Council. This is, I feel, an indication of the changing role of these offices. No longer will the Treasurer and Secretary merely be internal functionaries; rather, they will directly represent the entire campus in the Council. Therefore, in presenting proposals, it is essential that the Secretary be able to strike a balance between his-her own opinions and the opinions of others.

My qualifications for the position of Secretary include serving on the Winter Study Committee, active membership in the Film Society, and head of the Division I section on the Student Course Guide. Through these activities I've gained experience in group decision-making, discussion leadership, and, perhaps most importantly, in conveying input from the larger college community. All these experiences are indeed qualifications for the post; for the Secretary must be able to deal effectively with diverse individuals and interest groups.

If elected, I look forward to fulfilling the duties of the position of Secretary with openness and with enthusiasm.

DRAFT OF A NEW STUDENT BODY CONSTITUTION

Preamble.

In recognition of the student body as a valid collective, we, the students of Williams College, join in the Williams Student Body. In addition to the responsibilities we have to ourselves as individuals, we also realize our responsibilities to the community, to the institution, and to each other by creating and maintaining the Student Body, we are asserting our voice in the College community and our desire to maintain an active role in the workings of the College. Our home is that through the Student Body we can create a sense of community to which everyone belongs and in which everyone participates. The college experience extends beyond the classroom. Our creation of the Williams Student Body is an affirmation of this principle.

I. Government

The government of the Williams Student Body is the College Council. Every Williams student, as a member of the Student Body, is entitled to attend and speak at all Council meetings. The College Council is empowered to consider matters of interest to the Student Body and shall act as the voice of the Student Body in official matters.

II. Functions

The College Council shall serve as the official forum for student opinion and the representative thereof. In order to carry out this function, the Council establishes student committees, and supervises the student membership of all Student-Faculty committees. In protecting the interests of the community, the Council has the right to initiate disciplinary action against any residential house or campus organization, and may recommend to the Dean reconsideration of any disciplinary action he has taken against either of these groups.

The Council receives student activities tax funds from each student to promote the many activities on the campus. In funding these activities, the Council shall establish priorities and approve all budgets before they take effect. The Council is further charged with supervising all-college elections and referenda.

III. Members

Section A. Voting members shall be:

1. One representative from each residential house.
2. One representative elected from each residential housing category, namely, Greylock, Mission Park, the Row Houses, the Berkshire Quad, and Dodd-Tyler.
3. Five representatives elected at-large from the Freshman Class.
4. One representative elected from the Freshman Council.
5. Six representatives elected at-large
6. The Vice-President, Secretary, and Treasurer of the Council, none of whom shall hold any other seat on the Council.

Section B. Non-voting members shall be:

1. A dean of the College.
2. A representative of the Faculty of the College.
3. The President of the Council, who shall not hold any other seat on the Council.
4. Four non-voting student Council members chosen by the Council upon nomination of the Elections Committee as follows:
   a. One exchange student
   b. One student living off-campus
   c. Two minority students

Section C. Each house and the freshman council shall elect an alternate to perform the duties of their representative should that representative be absent from a Council meeting, and each house and the freshman council shall inform the Council Secretary of their choice, that he or she may be allowed to vote.

IV. Officers

Section A.

1. The officers of the Council shall be the President, the Vice-President, the Secretary, and the Treasurer.
2. The President and the Vice-President shall be directly elected concurrently from a field of the entire Junior and Sophomore Classes at the time of the election.
3. The Secretary and the Treasurer shall be directly elected concurrently with the President and the Vice-President at the beginning of the second semester.
4. Candidates for the position of Treasurer must be or have been members of the Finance Committee. When these qualifications cannot be met, nominations will be open to the entire student body.
5. The Council shall fill any vacancy in the above offices by means of a special election to be held two weeks after such vacancy becomes official.
6. The officers-elect shall sit on the Council as non-voting members until the spring recess, at which time they shall assume office.

Section B. Duties of Officers

1. The four officers of the Council form the Officers' Committee. The committee shall:
   a. Set the agenda for meetings according to concerns of the Council.
   b. Meet with and advise the officers of the College and of the Faculty.
   c. Represent the Council and its decisions.
   d. Have any decisions that it makes ratified by the Council at its next meeting.
2. The President shall:
   a. Call meetings of the Council.
   b. Preside at all meetings.
   c. Vote when there is a tie.
3. The Vice-President shall:
   a. Chair the Elections Committee.
   b. Assume the duties of the President, when the President is absent.
4. The Secretary shall:
   a. Record the proceedings of all Council meetings, maintain those records, and distribute them to all Council members and the Dean of the College.
   b. Act as Council Parliamentarian.
   c. Receive, maintain, and make available to Council members all reports of student and Student-Faculty committees.
   d. Assume the duties of the President, when the President and Vice-President are absent.
5. The Treasurer shall:
   a. Chair the Finance Committee.
   b. Report on the budget to the Council and be responsible for the maintenance of the Council's books.
   c. Advise the Finance Committee on the budget proprities established by the Council and work to maintain them.
   d. Assume the duties of the President, when the President, Vice-President, and Secretary are absent.

V. REPRESENTATIVES

Section A. Elections

1. At-large members and housing category representatives shall be elected concurrently with the officers in the beginning of the second semester.
2. House representatives will take office at the beginning of each semester—the elections for this office are supervised by each house.
3. At-large Freshmen members will be elected in October. The Freshman Council will select temporary members to serve until that date.
4. The Freshman Council will select one representative, who shall serve for the school year.

Section B. Duties

1. At-large members will serve on the Information Committee. Housing Category representatives will serve on the Housing Committee, and may hold meetings to coordinate concerns with other representatives from their housing category.
2. House representatives shall:
   a. Speak at house meetings at least once per month and may establish visiting hours for constituent input.
   b. Upon request of the President, call special house meetings to gather input on issues.
   c. Submit to the Secretary at the first meeting of each month a list of constituent concerns. These concerns will be discussed at the second Council meeting of each month.
   d. Attend, or have their alternates attend, every Council meeting or provide a good excuse.
3. The Freshman Council representative shall keep the Council informed of the concerns of the Freshman Council.

VI. Removal of Members

Section A. Consideration of removal of any Council officer, at-large member, housing category representative, non-voting member, or at large freshman representative may be initiated by one of two procedures:

1. Upon motion of any voting member of Council, in which case a two-thirds vote of the Council at a meeting at least two weeks after the motion would be required to remove the member.
2. Upon specific petition of at least 30 per cent of the student body, in which case a two-thirds vote of the entire student body at an election at least two weeks after the presentation of the petition would be required to remove the member.

Section B. Any house which is unrepresented on Council for three consecutive Council meetings without excuse or whose representative fails to perform the duties outlined in Part V will have its representation expelled from the Council to be replaced by another representative from that constituency. Individual houses may develop other criteria at reiss for the expulsion of their representative.

VII. Student Assembly

Section A. There shall be a monthly assembly of the Williams Student Body.

Section B. Each assembly shall concentrate on a well-defined issue with the goal of arriving at some decision or expression of sentiment.

Section C. The Student Assembly shall have legislative powers, provided a quorum of 100 students is in attendance. This power may include the reversal of a previous College Council decision. A Student Assembly decision may be overturned by a student referendum or by a two-thirds vote of the Council.

Section D. The agenda and moderator of the assembly shall be decided upon by the Information Committee. Any student may propose to the Council, possible topics for discussion and decision at future Assemblies.

Section D. Student Assembly meetings shall have the following general form, to be supervised by the Information Committee:

1. Presentation of opposing viewpoints by designated College community members.
2. General discussion and recess.
3. Democratic decision, with all Williams students eligible to vote.

VIII. Committees

Section A. Student-Faculty Committees

1. Student-Faculty committees are established under the joint authority of the Council and the Faculty of the College. While their legislative powers direct them to report to the Faculty, it is the duty of these committees through their student members to consider the opinions of the student body. In this regard, student members have an obligation to seek out student opinion and to keep the Council informed of matters under discussion in their committees. The Council will elect at least one representative to each Student-Faculty Committee from among its members. Other student members may be elected or appointed from the student body in some manner to be determined by Council.
2. Council representatives to Student-Faculty Committees will report to the Council on a regular basis about the proceedings of their committee and will also make available to Council minutes of their committee meetings. On matters of importance, Council representatives will seek the advice of Council before voting.

Section B. Committees of the Council

1. The Council can create or abolish student committees at its discretion, except for standing committees. All committees so created and the standing committees are under the direct jurisdiction of the Council which has the right of veto over any of their actions. The Council has no jurisdiction, however, over the actions of the Honor and Discipline Committee, due to the confidential nature of its proceedings.
2. Standing Committees
   a. Finance Committee—composed of the Treasurer and eight members chosen by Council. At least one member is to be from each class, though seniors may not serve on the committee. The committee will be chosen at the beginning of the second semester and will begin immediately the task of preparing the budget for the next school year. The Council will advise the committee of its budget priorities in the spring, and will consider the budget for final approval in the first month of the fall semester. The Council cannot fund political activities primarily. The Committee is charged with assisting the Council by preparing a budget, with monitoring the expenditures of Student Activity funds as approved by Council, and with establishing procedures for funding, monitoring, and the maintenance of the Council books.

   The Committee will submit funding and monitoring procedures to the Council for approval before they take effect.

   b. Elections Committee—composed of the Vice-President and four non-officer members of the Council. The committee shall screen nominations for Council appointments, supervise elections, referenda, and constitutional amendments, and develop procedures for each of these. The committee's procedures shall elect Council input into these decisions and must be approved by the Council before taking effect. The Committee will publicize all elections and referenda and be responsible for generating student interest in the same.

   c. Information Committee—composed of the Secretary, the six at-large members, and the four non-voting student members of the Council. The committee shall elect its own chairperson, and shall be responsible for:
      1. Investigating issues of concern to the student body especially those requiring immediate action.
      2. Gauging student opinion.
      3. Acting as the liaison group between the Council and non-Council groups considering matters of concern to the Council.
      4. Preparing a monthly newsletter for the Williams community detailing activities of the College Council and its committees.
      5. Organizing and preparing the presentations thereof.

   d. Faculty Meeting Committee—composed of the President (ex-officio), one Council member, one of the four student non-voting Council members, and three students chosen by the Council. The committee shall elect its own chairperson, who shall not be the President. The committee attends Faculty meetings and reports to the Council on the proceedings thereof.

   d. Housing Committee—composed of the five Housing Category representatives the fifteen house presidents, four freshmen selected at-large, one representative of the freshmen council, one transfer student, one student on exchange to the College, one student living off-campus, one student living in option housing, and two chairpeople, chosen by Council to serve for a full year. One of the chairpeople will be chosen in the Spring, the other in the fall. The committee is charged with discussing, adopting, and implementing the Housing policies of the College, and in this regard shall strive for consensus whenever possible. Voting members of the committee shall be the five Housing Category representatives to Council and five non-chairperson committee members, elected by the remainder of the committee members. The committee shall make its decisions only by a consensus of all members or by a majority vote of the voting members. The Committee shall keep the Council informed of its activities.

   f. Student Life Committee—composed of the Student Members of the Committee on Undergraduate Life and five other members chosen by Council. The Council representative to the CUL chairs the committee. The committee shall discuss matters of concern or of potential concern to the CUL and report monthly to the Council on its activities.

   g. Student Education Committee—composed of the student members of the Committee on Educational Policy and five other members chosen by Council. The Council representative to the CEP chairs the committee. The committee shall discuss matters of concern or of potential concern to the CEP and report monthly to the Council on its activities.

Section C. Unless otherwise stated, all committee members shall be chosen so that they may serve from April to April.

IX. Referenda and Constitutional Amendments

Section A. Referenda

1. The Council shall conduct all student referenda through the elections committee.
2. Referenda shall be conducted on a two-thirds vote of the Council or upon specific petition of at least 10 per cent of the student body.
3. Fifty per cent of the student body must vote in a referendum election if the referendum is to be valid.
4. Two weeks publicity through all available channels is required before a referendum can be voted on by the students. The elections committee is responsible for such publicity.

Section B. Constitutional Amendments

1. This constitution can be amended by a positive vote of more than fifty per cent of the students enrolled in the College making up at least a two-thirds majority of those voting in the election.
2. Amendments shall be offered to the student body through the same procedures as referenda except that petitions to amend require twenty per cent of the student body.

Section A. Upon a vote of no-confidence by a majority of the student body, the College Council shall be abolished. Two-thirds of the student body must have voted in the election if the results are to be valid.

Section B. A vote of non-confidence may be initiated upon the specific petition of at least ten per cent of the student body.

Section C. Two weeks notice through all available channels of publicity will be required before such a vote.

Section D. Constitutional Committee

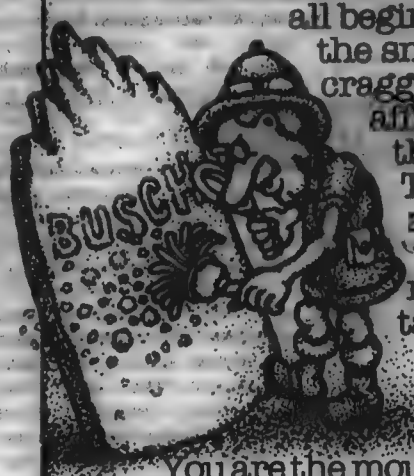
1. In the event of the Council's dissolution, one person from each residential house and four freshmen shall be elected to form a constitutional committee. The freshmen representatives shall be elected at an open meeting of the freshmen class organized by the Freshmen Council.
2. This committee shall draft a new constitution and then call a Student Assembly. The Assembly shall have the power to amend the proposed draft. The rules for such an Assembly shall be determined by the constitutional committee.
3. The draft constitution shall then be put before the entire student body, and if approved by more than fifty per cent of the student body making up at least a two-thirds majority of those voting in the election, will become the new constitution.

Section E. In the interim, present members of the Student Faculty committees shall remain in office. The former College Council shall serve the sole function of Allocating the Student Activities Tax until a new constitution has been approved by the student body.

XI. Adoption

Section A. This constitution will take effect immediately, upon approval by a two-thirds majority of those voting in an election.

Section B. In the first year in which this constitution becomes effective its provisions regarding members and officers apply to those members and officers assuming office after the constitution has taken effect.



Section C. In the first year in which this constitution becomes effective its provisions regarding committees shall apply beginning in April, and its provisions regarding Student Assemblies shall apply at the beginning of the next school year.

As unanimously approved by the College Council,

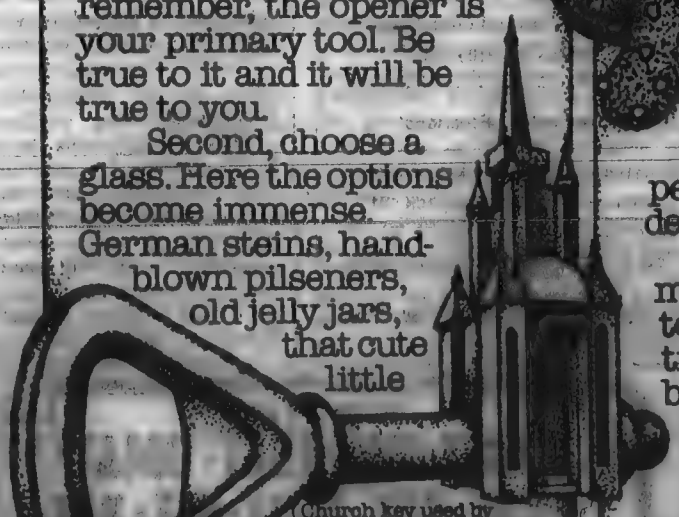
Mountaineering #2.

SELECTING THE PROPER GEAR



The Busch label is where it all begins. Note the snowy, craggy peaks affixed thereto. They are the mountains.

You are the mountaineer. And this is an ad. The subject of which is selecting the proper gear for mountaineering. (It all fits together so nicely, doesn't it?)

First and foremost, you'll need to pop the mountain top. For this task, faithful mountaineers use a church key. Secular mountaineers use a bottle opener. Don't be confused by these antics with semantics. Just remember, the opener is your primary tool. Be true to it and it will be true to you.

Second, choose a glass. Here the options become immense. German steins, hand-blown pilseners, old jelly jars, that cute little

(Church key used by faithful mountaineers.)

Mr. Boffo mug you've had since third grade.

Be adventurous. Experiment. Most mountaineers have a personal preference. You'll develop one too.

Food is next. Proper mountaineering, not to mention proper nutrition, requires a smorgasbord selection of snacks. Some mountaineers have suffered from a potato chip deficiency, a pretzel imbalance or other serious dietary defects. Plan ahead.

Comfort is crucial. If you mountaineer in public, pick a padded bar stool, preferably one that spins (to facilitate admiring the scenery). At home, a comfortable chair or sofa will do. Rule of thumb: if it feels good, and the police don't seem to mind, do it.

Then turn on the tube or spin a tune or crack a good book. The choice is strictly between you and the dominant hemisphere of your brain. Of course, some mountaineers say the smooth, refreshing taste of Busch is entertainment enough. And thank goodness they do, because it's an excellent conclusion.

(Comfort is crucial.)

Don't just reach for a beer. BUSCH® Head for the mountains.

Women ski 3rd, men 5th at Dartmouth Carnival

By Connie Johnson

The Women's Ski Team put together strong performances in all events to claim third place in the Dartmouth Winter Carnival last Friday and Saturday. Middlebury and Dartmouth placed first and second, but Williams finished ahead of UVM, UNH and five other colleges.

Tricia Hellman, a freshman, led the Williams alpine skiers with solid races in both the slalom and the giant slalom. She skied to second place in the slalom behind Linda Cochran of UVM. Julie Ernst and Kathy Lane, both Williams' sophomores, finished 10th and 14th respectively. Fifty women competed. The effort left Williams in third place in the slalom behind Dartmouth, first, and Middlebury, second.

Hellman proved consistent finishing third in the giant slalom. Sara McNealus of Middlebury and Sarah Pendleton of Dartmouth took first and second. Williams freshman Millie Chapell posted a fine 12th place finish, followed by Julie Ernest, 20th, and Wendy Brown, 23rd. Williams placed third in the team standings in the giant slalom, which was won by Middlebury.

Rachel Potter demonstrated her strength and toughness in the five-kilometer cross-country race, placing fourth. Middlebury skiers, led by Alice Tower, finished first, second, and third. Also contributing to the Williams effort were freshmen Brenda Mailman, 15th, and Alexis Hamill, 21st, sophomore Becky Bangs, 22nd, and freshman Jody Ransom, 26th. There were 50 racers in all.

The Men's Ski Team was edged out by the University of New Hampshire to finish fifth in the Dartmouth College Winter Carnival last Friday and Saturday.

The combined results of the four event carnival left the University of Vermont (UVM) in first place. Ten Division I teams, many composed of former or potential U.S. Ski Team members, were in the competition.

Graham leads men

Steve Graham, a freshman, led the Williams alpine skiers in the giant slalom with his 10th place finish. Standing in 8th place after the first of two runs, he lost time on his second when he skidded down the steep "waterfall" section of the race trail. Don Tarinelli, a senior, also placed well, finishing 15th. He was followed by Roger Prevot, a junior, in 21st. Mack Lyons of Dartmouth outskied the rest of the 50-man field for first place.

Senior Andy Mikell, men's alpine captain, was the top Williams competitor in the slalom, finishing 11th. Close behind was Don Tarinelli, 13th, followed by Jas Dembinski, 22nd. Jeff Nichols of Middlebury won.

Jeff Magoon skied a strong cross-country race over the 15-kilometer course, placing 6th. Rick Solie of UVM won the race. Sophomore Dave Richards placed 12th, less than 60 seconds behind Magoon. Dennis Desroches, Williams' third finisher, was 30th.

Sophomore Jeff Hastings jumped to sixth place in the fourth event of the weekend. Two Norweigan recruits, Roger Holden and Kare Herje, both skiing for UVM, tied for first. Senior Tom Dodds and sophomore Rob Manning finished 24th and 27th, respectively.

Squash takes Little Three

The Women's squash team was perfect last Saturday afternoon as it beat both Amherst and Wesleyan 7-0 to claim the First Annual Little Three Squash Championship.

Wesleyan defeated Amherst in the third of three matches 6-1.

The regular line-up of Beckie Chase, Mary Tom Higgs, Marcia Johnston, Leigh Costikyan, Pam Hansen, Kristin Johnson and Barbara Ernst rallied for the seven wins against Wesleyan.

Coach Renzie Lamb, backed by the unanimous consent of the women's squad, decided to take advantage of the Ephwomen's apparent strength by playing only seniors against Amherst. Winning in that match were Johnston, Costikyan, Johanson, Judy Harrison, Hilary Meyers, and Andy Hawkins.

Ephwomen whip Amherst b-ballers, 50-38

by Timothy Clark

In a game that matched up two very young teams (Williams has only one senior and two juniors while Amherst has no seniors and 1 junior) the "more experienced" Ephwomen hoopsters easily prevailed, 50-38 at Amherst's Butova Gum Saturday night.

Utilizing a very effective full-court press the inspired Ephwomen jumped out to a 8-0 lead in this important Little Three contest. Overall it was the tough full-court press that made the difference for Williams. The Ephwomen were shooting below their capabilities, were outrebounded by the taller Lord Jeffettes 21-19 and they committed too many turnovers.

Williams held the lead throughout the game. The Jeffettes came within 2 points after Williams' initial 8 point surge to make the score 11-0, but with co-captains Monica Grady and "Flash" Milne stealing and scoring off the press with apparent ease, Williams took a 29-14 half-time lead. In the second half Amherst failed to come within 10 points of the lead.

Senior guard Milne led the Ephwomen with 14 points while junior guard Grady and super soph Lorene Von Klan contributed 12 and 10 pts. respectively. Frosh Terry Danciewicz also played a fine game scoring 7 pts.

Williams now stands 2-0 in Little Three play and 9-3 overall after an incredible week. In addition to beating Amherst, the Ephwomen knocked off Little Three rival Wesleyan, 64-53, Clark, New England's third-ranked team) 63-62, and Vassar, 49-41.

Raiderettes best women's hockey team

The Red Raiderettes of Colgate University capitalized on two first period goals and then hung on for a 2-1 victory over the women's hockey club on Friday night.

Outshooting a car-lagged Williams team, which had only fifteen minutes to warm up after a four-hour car ride, by 15-3 in the first period, Colgate still could manage only two goals against goalie Blythe Miller.

Williams caught fire in the final two periods, keeping constant pressure in the Colgate end. Despite twenty shots on goal, only Marty Taft managed to ripple the nets, leaving the final score 2-1.

Earlier in the week, the Ephwomen dropped a match to the defensively superior pucksters of Dartmouth College, 4-0.

Goalie Lisa Halperin was kept busy by an onslaught of shots at the purple nets by a seasoned Dartmouth offense. She held scoring to two goals in the first period and two in the third.

Ephs avenge loss

by Jackson Galloway

"Sweet revenge" was the order of the evening last Friday as the Williams Squash team trounced the Cadets of West Point, 6-3.

Last year Army had cancelled its match with Williams only to play Dartmouth on the following day. Their excuse was a bizarre 24 hour flu epidemic which struck down the whole team. The five starting Williams seniors and junior Wally Miller seemed to remember this incident all too well as they put their opponents through the paces. Especially notable was the presence that several showed even playing up two places due to no. 2 and no. 3 players Chip Lindquist's and Milen Bass' injuries.

Sunday saw a disappointing loss to a skilled "Stonybrook squad, 6-3.

O'Connor proposes deflation scheme

Given these assumptions, a solution to the problem of grade inflation emerges: persuade the faculty of a number of leading institutions to regard C+ B- as the appropriate median grade. The proposal is that we come to think of our letter grades somewhat in the following way. Instructors will develop a sense of what reasonably can be expected of students of normal ability, who invest in the course an appropriate amount of their time and energy. This average level of achievement would include a basic familiarity with the course contents and the methods by which the subject is pursued, and some evidence that the student had actually used the methods to make reasonable progress in the subject. Students would be expected to participate fully in course activities. The curiosity and openness of a mind seeking liberal learning would be expected. Instructors would have to give more explicit interpretations, in relation to the announced goals of their courses, of what constitutes an "average, expectable" performance, "appropriate" amounts of time and "average" levels of achievement. In short, the thrust of the proposal is to make it honorable and usual to receive grades in the C range in those fields being tried for the first time, as well as in courses of secondary interest to the student.

Grades in the B range would be given for unusual achievement in some of the parameters mentioned above; grades in the A range would recognize unusual achievement in all of the parameters. Similarly, failure to meet some of these normal expectations would lead to D grades and failure to meet all, to failing grades.

Grade averages for courses will tend to reflect these new interpretations, and so in the long run the grades assigned by individual professors will tend to be distributed more evenly around the lower median. Common sense distinctions between introductory courses and advanced courses for majors will, of course, be made. No mechanical or automatic "curve" need be imposed for all courses. It can be recognized that better and worse classes naturally occur in the same subject. On the other hand, persistent differences between grading patterns in courses at the same level, or between departmetns should be regarded as a threat to the fairness of the system. If instructors make a conscientious effort to peg their grades to the C+ B- median over an extended period, say five years, the differences between individual courses and individual departments will tend to level out. I think we can rely on the good judgment of faculty here. But if experience proves the opposite, I would seek a remedy in the publication of grade averages for courses. Department chairmen have special oversight functions here, particularly in explaining to new members the rationale of grading and the new understanding of the expected median. The mean grade itself would continue to fluctuate from year to year, but anything over B- would be cause for concern.

Some Gains from this Solution

The principal effect of the proposed solution would be to restore meaning and credibility to grades and the GPA. But other gains may be looked for:

1) A clear signal to students that the normal expectation for them is to explore a wide range of subjects without undue anxiety and risk, to find by Junior year their particular strengths in subjects in which they might begin to do work of high B or occasionally, of A quality. It is to be noted, however, that nothing in the proposal prevents students of extraordinary energy and ability from achieving high grades throughout their careers.

2) For students, release from the frustration felt by those students who want to set their own priorities among the various opportunities presented to them in college, but presently fear to give to the ungraded activities the energy they would like to invest in them.

3) For faculty, encouragement to go back to a sounder grading policy and, with it, release from the embarrassments and tensions involved in coping with excessive student anxieties about grades.

Eph wrestlers pin Trinity for a loss

Williams outgrappled the Trinity Game-cocks 30-24 at Lasell Gym, Saturday morning.

Williams won six of the ten matches, two of those with pins. Mike Rosenteiger, 126, started a streak of wins which lasted to the 167 class. Rosenteiger racked up a 20-3 decision. At 134 junior Carl Bigler powered his way to a 12-3 decision. Scott Frost, the outweighing 142 lb sophomore, wasted his man in the first period. His pin came at 1:54. Scott now claims an 11-4 record.

The finest victory of the day was at 150 lbs. when Rich Olson pressed his man in 3:59 minutes. Olson's confidence and strength manifested itself in his impressive pin. At 167 Jeff Kiesel almost gave up a victory through a strategic error, but he was able to control his man down to the end, retaining an 8-7 victory.

Men's basketball team takes Amherst by storm

by Stan Parese

No matter how many basketball games you watch, you see only a few which match last Saturday's 71-62 overtime victory over Amherst for excitement. The Amherst gym was packed to the rafters with a deafeningly boisterous bipartisan crowd, and the action on the court simply couldn't have been more intense than it was.

Both teams switched between man-to-man and zone defenses throughout the game, and worked patient offenses, looking for high percentage shots. To say the game was close is a gross understatement. During regulation time, the lead changed hands eleven times. The longest period either team held a lead was when Amherst led for 9 minutes: from 11:30 to 2:30 remaining in the game, but during that stretch the most they led by was 3 points.

Virtually every shot in the game was a "clutch" shot, as the pressure was on both teams the entire way. In games this close it soon becomes obvious to even the most novice fan that everyone on the court is responsible for the outcome of the game: one bad pass, one lapse on defense, one foolish foul could determine who celebrates and who lays awake feeling as if they cost their team the game.

Senior co-captain Gerry Kelly turned out a stellar performance, personally accounting for 36 of Williams 71 points, scoring 20 points and dealing out 8 assists. Kelly was a dream-come-true for Williams as he conducted a clinic in clutch playing by scoring 11 of his game-high 20 points during the last six minutes of regulation play and the five minutes of overtime.

In a game that was nothing more than a succession of exciting moments strung together, one of the most exciting was freshman guard Al Lewis' two free-throws with 2:15 remaining in regulation time to give Williams the lead 56-55, for the first time since the 11:30 mark. In the remaining 2:15 Amherst took the lead, only to have sophomore Dean Ahlberg sink the first end of a 1-and-1 to tie the game at 57 with only :17 seconds remaining.

Senior co-captain Mattie Spangler (12 points, 9 rebounds), opened the scoring in the overtime period with a turn-around jumper; then Kelly took over and Williams never looked back. Significantly, by the overtime period Amherst had had three starters foul out of the game, and did not appear to have the bench depth to fill the gaps, as the Ephs outscored them 14-5 in the five-minute overtime to win 71-62.

Throughout the game Williams got excellent team rebounding from Spangler, senior Jeff Brinker, junior Bill Lohrer, sophomore Dean Ahlberg (10 points, 7 rebounds), and freshman Jeff Fasulo (10 points, 5 rebounds).

Williams coach Curt Tong was happy with the win, but wary about this Saturday's rematch: "It's an edge to win down here, but next weekend should be more of the same. This game was obviously very close, and they're going to want us badly."

Williams lost to Brandeis last Tuesday 69-66, and their record is now 10-6. If the Ephs win at home this Saturday night they will win the Little Three basketball championship outright. Williams is hungry for the crown, Amherst is hungry for revenge: as per order of the Dean, anyone found in the library on Saturday night will be shot.

Runners finish season in stride

The Winter Track squad closed out its regular season with another solid second in a quadrangular meet at Towne Fieldhouse Saturday. While the Ephs avenged an earlier loss by whipping Fitchburg and also Worcester State, a much-improved Westfield State team came away with top honors. The final tally was Westfield 66, Williams 53, Fitchburg 33 and Worcester 27. The Purple thus finishes with a fine 11-4 record for the winter.

While somewhat of an anticlimax after last week's drubbing of three big rivals, the meet was still a good tune-up for the post-season winter meets and the outdoor season. As coach Dick Farley commented: "Our most important meet was definitely last week and I don't think we were as competitive Saturday as we could have been. We did qualify a couple more for the Easterns though and I think we'll be looking good next week."

One of those who already was assured of a trip to Boston was Greg McAleenan, who opened the meet for Williams with another decisive win in the long jump. Co-captain McAleenan will be competing Saturday in that event along with Micah Taylor. Scott Mayfield also completed preparation for the postseason by winning the pole vault by over a foot. In other field events, Steve Serenska took fourth in the shot, Dee Reeves fourth in the high jump, and Joel Richardson and Andy Krakauer third and fourth in the triple jump.

In the running events, co-captain Tom Schreck and Phil Darrow both grabbed spots on the Eastern squad by going 1-2 in the mile, two seconds under the qualifying time of 4:22. Taylor won the 60 once again in a final tune-up, and Darrow returned to win the 1000. Other placers included co-captain Lee Jackson who grabbed second in the 880, Calvin Schnure, second in the 600, Steve Polasky, second in the two-mile, and Joel Richardson, third in the 440. Vernon Davis, a top Eph contender in the Easterns in the 60 high hurdles, eased his sore leg into fourth to lessen the risk of a more serious injury. The two relay squads both took second to round out the team's scoring.

Williams will send a total of eight individuals to Tufts next Saturday for the Easterns, which will feature much tougher competition than has visited Towne this season. Still, there appears a good chance that the Ephs will return with quite a few points and perhaps a couple of individual championships to show for their efforts.

Williams falls to Westfield while topping Fitchburg and Worcester. They thus closed the season with a solid 11-4 record.

Playoff hopes fade as icemen lose

by John Kresse

Despite fine performances by forward Tinker Connelly and goaltender Mike Moulton, the Williams College hockey team lost 5-4 to Merrimack College in "sudden-death" overtime, last Tuesday night in Williamstown.

The winning goal by Merrimack's Mark Murphy brought an abrupt end to Moulton's excellent goaltending display. Moulton stopped the invading shooters 41 times and allowed just three goals coming off the bench to relieve starting goaltender Brooks Fisher at the start of the second period. Fisher left the game with 15 saves and 2 goals allowed in his first Division II game of the season.

Connelly, playing in his first game since Jan. 27, tallied three goals for the host Ephmen. And, seconds before Murphy's overtime goal, Merrimack goalie Gillen Moffet made his last - 38th - and biggest save of the game on Connelly as Tinker broke in alone.

The visitors led 2-1 after one period, 3-2 after two periods before the Ephs knotted the score on the third and final time with 1 minutes remaining in regulation time.

Brooks Tanner had brightened the ...

Lansing Chapman rink with his first period goal. Matt St. Onge with three assists in the game and freshman Dave Barry in his varsity debut helped out on Tanner's score which eliminated the only two goal lead held by the visitors in the contest.

Saturday night Feb. 10, the Ephmen took a 16-4 drubbing at the hands of Lowell University. Lowell is a team ... defeated the same Merrimack team Williams played 9-3 just last week.

The only bright spot for Williams was the play of freshman right wing Dave Calabro who registered two goals. Jim Rooney and Greg Jacobsen rounded out the Eph scoring.

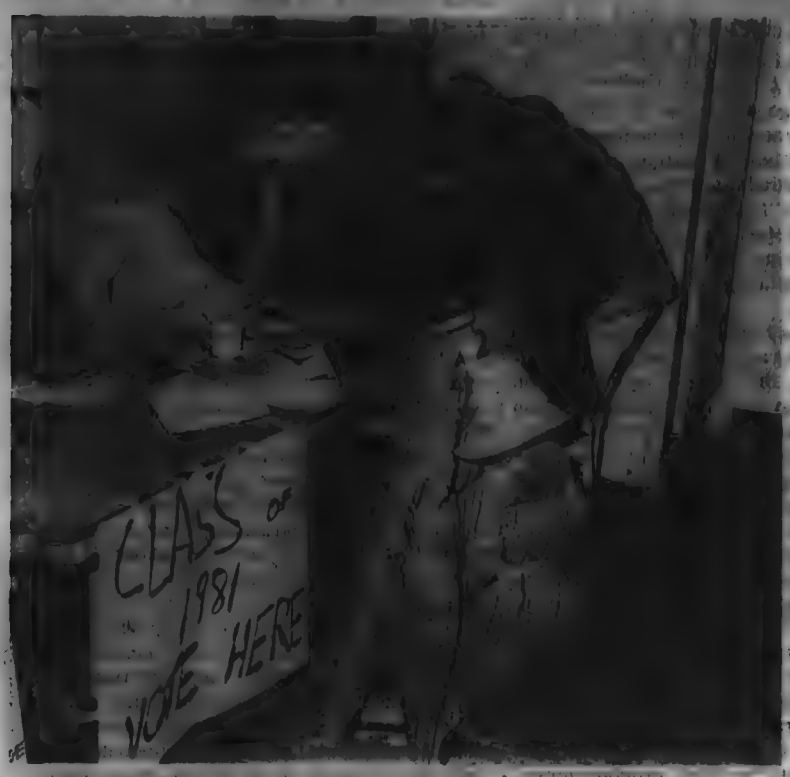
Williams must get back on track immediately in order to land a playoff berth. Hopefully that will happen this week as the Eph skaters seek revenge against North Adams State tonight and Middlebury this Friday of Winter Carnival, both at home. In previous play between these teams, North Adams won 4-3 in overtime to become the Williams Invitational tournament champions and Middlebury triumphed over the Eph puckmen 4-3 to topple Williams from first place in the Division II West.

Williams is now 7-7 in Division II ECAC competition and 9-8 overall.

Female swimmers speed to victory

The women's swim team ended its dual meet season at 7-2 with overwhelming victories against Smith and Mt. Holyoke in a tri-meet last Friday afternoon.

The Ephwomen swept both relays as Linda Reed, Bart Good, ... Vuylsteke and Karen Walker took the 200 medley and Walker teamed up with senior Joanne Monroe, senior co-captain Sue Murphy and freshman Catherine Hartley for a 1:45.3 victory in the 200 freestyle relay. The time in that event shaved another tenth of a second off the college record set two weeks ago against Bowdoin.



Williams swam one-two in five of the remaining eleven races and won three others. Freshmen Vuylsteke and Good figured in three of the squads sweeps. They placed first and second, respectively, in the 100 breastroke, and first and third in the 50-yard race of that stroke. Vuylsteke also took the 50 butterfly, 29.0, just ahead of second-place Joanna Monroe, 29.2. Good copped a second in the 100 individual medley just behind Catherine Hartley.

... won the 50 freestyle while Murphy placed second to her, and then took a second herself behind Karon Walker in the 100 butterfly. Immensely cheered by the appearance of a men's team pep contingent, Walker also copped the 50 freestyle, 25.2. Murphy rounded out her day's work with a close victory in the 200 freestyle.

The Ephwomen's ... season culminates in Springfield this weekend where the team will participate in the New England Swimming and Diving Championships.

Geismar, Walker meet in runoff

by Katie Springer

Seth Geismar '80 and Tyron Walker '80 will meet in a run-off election Wednesday and Thursday for the College Council presidency. Geismar outpolled Walker 386-322 in last week's election, followed by Doug Orr, who received 185 write-in votes.

Elected as vice president was Mark Lanier '80, who ran unopposed. Council treasurer will be Diane DuRivage '80, while Julia McNamee '80 will serve as secretary.

The following students were elected as at-large representatives to the College Council: Priscilla Cohen '82, Jeffrey Lissack '82, Darrell McWhorter '81, Robin Powell '82, Katie Scott '82 and Fred Thys '80.

Run-off elections will be conducted for positions on the Committee on Educational Policy. Carrie Brown '80 and Jeffrey Menzer '82 will compete for the Division I position; Paul Goren '80, Sally Kornbluth '82 and David Schwartz '81 for Division II; John Duffield '80 and Conrad Liles '80 for Division III and Jordan Finegold '81 and Stephen St. Clair '80 for at-large representation.

Holly Nelson will represent the Class of '82 on the Committee on Undergraduate Life. Run-off elections for the Class of '80 will be between David Mesnick and Ann Oberrender, while Denise Harvey and Derek Johnson will compete for the Class of '81 spot. At-large representative will be Lee Stoddard '80.

New members of the Honor and Discipline Committee are Eric Bjornlund '80, Katherine Phillips '80, Margo Greer '82 and Jeffrey Menzer '82. There will be a run-off election between Nancy Gray and David Sorkin for Class of '81 representation.

The proposed new Constitution for the College Council was overwhelmingly accepted by a vote of 765 to 147. Among the major revisions are increased membership in the Council, a monthly meeting of the student body and an Information Committee.

According to Chris Jenkins, chairman of the Elections Committee, 1,064 ballots were completed for a voter turnout of 56 per cent.

The junior class had the largest turnout, with an estimated 80 per cent of the class voting, according to Council member Mike Lissack '79. About 60 per cent of the freshmen class, 33 per cent of the sophomores and 25 per cent of the seniors voted this year, he said.

ACEC loses college funds

by Steve Willard

Recoiling from yet another surprise move by the All College Entertainment Committee, the College Council voted Wednesday to cut off all funds to the A.C.E.C. pending further discussion.

The 13-5 vote came after Treasurer John Simpson revealed that the A.C.E.C., had contracted the band Albatross for a Winter Carnival dance without consulting the Council. Members of the Council were especially angered as this incident was the most recent in a number of ACEC funding problems. After evaluating other possibilities for disciplinary action, the Council voted to retroactively grant the $800 required to fund the dance, but decided to cut off all further A.C.E.C. funds.

Williams Director of Admission Philip Smith reported to the Council on the current status of Williams minority admissions programs. Smith noted that Williams has an active program of minority recruitment and pointed to a large increase in the number of minority applicants this year. He emphasized that the entire Admissions staff at Williams shares responsibility for minority admissions. Minority alumni also assist in the admissions process, he explained.

Smith said he felt, however, that blacks have been "a little more sanguine about their interest in Williams". He noted that only 30 per cent of those black students accepted by Williams actually matriculate. This compares unfavorably with a 50 per cent matriculation figure for all students. Smith also sighted statistics showing that increasingly larger numbers of black students are attending junior colleges and colleges within 50 miles of their home.

Several members of the Black Student Union (B.S.U.) attended the meeting, reporting on the B.S.U.'s work to encourage minority admissions. Members of the Jewish Association also spoke at the meeting, questioning why only 10 per cent of the Williams College population is Jewish. They compared this number to a 20 per cent figure at Amherst. Mr. Smith responded that it was difficult to search for applicants of a certain religious preference, as this distinction is not always reported on Williams admissions forms.

Park dwellers rally for building improvements

by Randy Wang

Clamour for change filled the air of Mission Park Dining Hall as nearly two hundred residents assembled last Sunday night to voice distress with present living conditions. The meeting concluded with suggestions raised for renovating the main hallway and the various recreational areas.

The unprecedented meeting arose from growing concern with widespread vandalism. The three house presidents felt that the attitude of residents themselves twoards the building contributed to the problem. "By changing the environment, we hope to change people's attitudes," said Dave Hansen, president of Dimmitt House.

Scott Blair, president of Armstrong House, agreed: "The root cause of vandalism is general apathy towards the building itself. People choose this place as their third or fourth choice, and they never grow attached to it. It's not a row house, and people don't treat it like one."

The house presidents will take the suggestions made at the meeting, and compile a list of proposals to present to President John Chandler, Charles Jankey, Director of Student Housing, and Assc. Dean Chris Romerstead at another meeting to be held next Sunday at 7 p.m.

Following Blair's introductory remarks at the meeting, George Wilbanks '80 presented a set of architectural drawings prepared by him and George Janson '80 that call for the renovation of main the lobby area. The corridor now resembles the inner-city", said Wilbanks. The plan, which includes carpeting and split level seating, he feels would create a space more conducive for gathering.

Wilbanks and Janson based the design on the Baxter Hall lounge but adapted it to the Mission Park environment. "We want to make the main hallway more usable," said Janson.

Wilbanks then mentioned suggestions voiced by various residents that called for the renovation of the Armstrong Rec Room, and the annex betwween it and the dining hall. Residents nearly all agreed that present atmosphere of the Rec room is unpleasant, resembling a basement or storage area more than a "party room."

The annex, Wilbanks suggested, could be converted into a "Hot Dust Room"—a carpeted, better furnished room on the east side of the dining hall. The annex presently contains a pool table and ping-pong table, but both lack any equipment.

Greg Ayis, presedent of Pratt House, led discussion as the floor opened up to residents. Charlie Gledhill pointed to the lack of any feeling of responsibility as the cause of vandalism. He proposed partitioning the main hallway with doorways. Each house would care for its own section and would develop a sense of pride while decorating the section.

Jordan Finegold agreed and emphasized the need to "get rid of the superhighway effect," in referring to the "unattractive orange linoleum tile."

Ted Tucci later suggested converting several of the small rooms glassed-off from the hallway into offices for student organizations.

Some residents disputed Gledhill's proposal, and saw the need to encourage more inter-house responsibility. All agreed in general though, with a proposal made by Greg Roux to convert Mills House, which is presently used for overflow, into a full-fledged residential house. Roux felt that the overflow system alienates Mills House inhabitants, and breeds an attitude of apathy.

Wilbanks then concluded the meeting with the suggestion of instituting a reward system for people who identified the vandals. Although an unpopular concept among the residents, who dislike the atmosphere it might create, the proposal will be brought up next Sunday night.

CEP to recommend new curriculum packages

by Eric Schmitt

Stricter major requirements in several departments and the creation of a "Critical Languages" course highlight the 1979-80 course curriculum package the Committee on Educational Policy (CEP) will present to the faculty tomorrow.

According to CEP chairman William Moomaw, a two-semester Area Studies course dealing with five "critical languages" will be offered next year if approved by the faculty. Moomaw said that courses in Mandarin Chinese, Japanese, Hebrew, Arabic and Swahili will be conducted on a self-instruction basis, with outside examiners testing students periodically. The course would be open to seniors, juniors and sophomores planning to spend their junior year abroad.

The Committee agreed to support the Political Economy Department's proposed major program additions—one course in international trade and finance and another in the legislative process in government—but voted not to support the department's proposal to raise its required number of major courses from 11 to 13. Thus, if the faculty follows the CEP's recommendations two courses from Poly Ec's preparatory or elective programs would have to be dropped.

"The increased requirements might affect our number of majors in the future," Mac Brown, Poly Ec chairman, said of the proposal, "but it would enrich an already demanding major and attract only those students who really wanted to take the classes."

Both the Critical Language proposal and the Political Economy major increase will be voted upon separately by the faculty.

As part of the main package, the American Civilization department will replace its 301 course, American Lives, and require its majors to take a two-semester sequence course (201-202). Providing more of a common experience for juniors in the major was cited as a primary reason for the

Smith examines Russian life texture

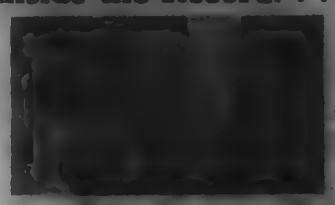
by Peter Struzzi

"I found the Russians to be among the most friendly, generous and warmest people I've ever met," Journalist Hedrick Smith '55 said at last week's lecture, "Russians as People."

While Moscow Bureau Chief for the New York Times, Smith authored The Russians, a bestselling novel of everyday life in the Soviet Union.

The physical separation between Russians and foreigners was the most obvious problem for Smith and his family, who lived in a "ghetto for foreigners." The ghetto was guarded by the KGB who interrogated all visitors entering and leaving the area. Smith noted that since most Russians come into contact only with regular police, their encounters with the KGB could be intimidating and frightening.

In addition to this physical separation was the separation resulting from "our own sense of convenience." Special stores for foreigners to shop in were provided. These stores, better stocked than typical stores in the Soviet Union, were used by most wives of foreigners working in Russia.



Language proved to be a major barrier between journalists and Russians. Although Smith had taken Russian classes at Harvard and tutorials in Washington and Russia, his knowledge of Russian was not complete. He expressed his surprise at "the shocking expectation of many Americans for foreigners to deal in English, rather than their native tongue. If you want to meet people, come to terms with them, relax with them, Smith said you have to know their language."

A final barrier that interfered with Smith's contact with the Russians was their assumption that almost all official foreigners were spies. "They assume this because Russian journalists are doing a great deal of watchdogging for the government" and similar suspicions are harbored for foreign news correspondents.

Smith spoke about breaking barriers with the Russians to get to know them. "There is a romanticism in this incredible people," Smith said. In a police state, when barriers are broken true friendships surface. Russians seek soul mates.

Albatrosses around their necks

The Council's cutting off ACEC funds now is akin to closing the barn door after the horse has been stolen. Both co-chairmen of the committee, Case and Svoboda, fully understood FinCom procedures for requesting money. Without following these procedures, they appropriated student money to bring the band Albatross to Williams for Winter Carnival. The council now has an $800 debt as a result of the flagrant irresponsibility of two elected college officials. The history of the ACEC is no more savoury than this incident would suggest. Why should students tolerate continued abuse and deliberate mismanagement of their moneys? They should not. Case and Svoboda should be removed from their positions of responsibility immediately.

And did not council officials know of ACEC plans several weeks in advance of the concert? What should their role have been in safeguarding the budget? Where were they when we needed them?

posters purged

To the editor:

The community should know that the brief appearance of an obscene and sexist poster on Thursday, February 15, announcing Winter Carnival was not the responsibility of the student organizers of that event. The posters have been eliminated; the perpetrators are known and are being dealt with.

wea culpa

To the editor:

On February 14, we were responsible for the distribution of posters which have offended some people on campus. Although to us they were no more than a practical joke, we did not consider all the possible repercussions of our act.

We sincerely apologize to any and all students and faculty whom we have offended in the course of our practical joke.

"disgusting"

To the editor:

Winter Carnival got off to a bad start for us on Thursday morning, when a concerned professor handed us a copy of a poster about Winter Carnival which he had received in his mailbox. We knew student attitudes here were far from free of sexist thinking, but we had hoped that sensitivity had grown to a point at which such blatant statements would no longer be made in public. We find ourselves offended and enraged, but also depressed, that yet another incident of this sort has occurred.

The poster announces that "Williams College Winter Carnival (subtitled "Orgasm On Ice") is Cuming" (sic), and depicts a couple having intercourse while skating. The woman, bent over, is supposed to be in the throes of ecstasy. The man, evidently blushing at being seen, is commenting, "Just poking fun!"

That the cartoon is in poor taste may be regarded as self-evident, and was so regarded by the professor and members of the (predominantly male) class in which the poster was discussed. However, we would like to call attention to several macho delusions which this cartoon perpetuates:

1.) Sex is an act done to someone—specifically, an active male "puts it to" a passive female. (In this case, the male's sphere of activity is enlarged to include propelling the female across the ice.)

2.) If he "puts it to her" well enough or long enough, she will convulse in orgasms.

3.) He remains in cool, detached control of himself and the situation while she is swept away by her orgasm. (In the cartoon, he is even embarrassed by his involvement in this activity.)

We use the word "delusion" not merely to express our disgust and impatience with these views, but to convey the literal meaning of the word: false belief. There will probably be readers who do not see the untruth of the views of sex (and male-female relations) expressed in this cartoon. There will also be those who maintain that the cartoon is innocent—after all, a male is portrayed as well as the female sex-object. Certainly, we are all entitled to our own views; but we should arrive at them deliberately and responsibly. Thus we ask those people to consider their views and the effects such stereotyped beliefs have on both women and men (for example, the burden that Belief No. 1 above, places on men to "perform" sexually). We ask the rest of us to continue protesting when we hear fellow students, faculty members, and others in the college community make comments based on uncritical acceptance of limiting and rigid societal beliefs about the sexes. As Tracy Dick pointed out last week in her article on sexual expression on the Williams campus, "Because Williams is small and isolated we as students have greater control over our environment than does society at large. As individuals we can have an impact on the official policies and attitudes which influence our community. The prejudices of our present society are only perpetuated by our own irresponsibilities." It is evident that much rooting out of attitudes which devalue human beings remains to be done on this campus.

Sincerely,
Sheryll Berggren '79

P.S. We are aware that the Williams Outing Club was not responsible for this incident, and we sympathize with the embarrassment of Winter Carnival Committee members that the weekend was marred by such an incident.

Pensack peeved

To the editor:

I was appalled, embarrassed, and angry to see the "practical joke" posters that announced Winter Carnival last Thursday. As Chairman of Winter Carnival, I would like to go on record that the posters were neither circulated nor sanctioned by the Outing Club. This immature incident was not in the spirit of Winter Carnival.

If this "joke" had been preregistered with The Record, and the editors continued to sanction it, then I believe the editors are also in a position of responsibility for the action. Perhaps the practical joke contest should end.

Sincerely,
Larry Pensack '79
Chairman, Winter Carnival

Editor's Note—We knew nothing about the "joke", nor would we have ever sanctioned such a disgusting and tasteless act.

A special thanks

To the editor:

The 1979 Winter Carnival is now over; the competitors are home, the slopes are cleared, and most of the students on campus have recovered from their Saturday night binges!

I would like to thank all of the students, faculty, and staff that helped make Carnival a success this year. Indeed, running races in sub-zero temperatures was not an easy task; yet our gatekeepers, timers, scorers, computer and communications workers, skiers, and patrollers did a fantastic job. Everyone deserves to be congratulated. I hope that the excitement, varied experiences, and satisfaction of seeing a well-run Carnival make the investment of time and energy well worth the effort.

I would like to give special thanks to Coach Ralph Townsend, who has been patient and understanding with us all.

Furthermore, I would like to invite everyone who helped with Carnival to a free party in Spencer House on Saturday night at [illegible].

Again, thanks to everyone! Now it's time to unwind!

Sincerely,
Larry Pensack '79
and the Winter Carnival Committee

poor adventure

To the editor:

The article printed by the Record on January 16, 1979 entitled, "Chinese Adventurers Describe Impressions" impressed this "Chinese adventurer" as an adventure in poor journalism. I strongly resent having my words inaccurately paraphrased and then presented as mine. If the author wishes to write his own he may certainly do so, but PLEASE, let him take all the credit.

Beyond their Peaceful Shadows

President Carter had more than his share of foreign-policy problems last week, and it appears as though many of those troubles will surface as domestic issues in the coming months.

The week started out badly with the ominous anti-American developments in Iran and the murder of the U.S. Ambassador to Afghanistan. The President's trip to Mexico seemed to produce mixed results, but one message was abundantly clear: Mexico is not going to be pushed into any quick oil deals with the U.S. The weekend brought about a real crisis situation in the Far East—the Chinese invasion of Vietnam.

The only real good news of the week was Saturday's announcement by the new Iranian Prime Minister Mehdi Bazargan that Iran's government intended to resume oil exports as soon as possible "to all parts of the world, including the United States." In the same interview the Prime Minister stated that he was eager to maintain good relations with the U.S.

What remains to be seen, however, is the extent to which the new government in Iran is actually ruling the entire country. The revolution in Iran was accomplished not so much by partisans who had in mind exactly what they wanted to put in place of the pro-West monarchy as by a collection of diverse groups whose first (and possibly only) goal was to drive out the Shah.

From a pragmatic point of view, the Ayatollah Khomeini (the Shiité Moslem leader who has served as the spiritual sage of the revolution) made a wise choice in appointing Bazargan, rather than having a less progressive Prime Minister. If his remarks on Saturday are any indication, Bazargan appears to be open-minded about technology and trade with the West. This could mean that the dire pronouncement made earlier in the week by U.S. Energy Secretary Schlesinger, that the cutoff of Iranian oil was "prospectively more serious" than the 1973 oil embargo, is too extreme.

The events in Iran gave a measure of added gravity to Carter's Mexico visit. Again, oil was one of the primary topics of concern—Mexico has recently discovered reserves that apparently equal those of the U.S., and which may eventually place Mexico second behind Saudi Arabia in world oil reserves. The Mexcians, however, seem less than eager to begin producing the oil in the very near future. This seems to be for several reasons, including a basic mistrust of American policies.

The Mexican President, Jose Lopez Portillo, explained to President Carter that "Mexico has suddenly found itself the center of American attention—attention that is a surprising mixture of interest, disdain, and fear, much like the recurring vague fears you yourselves inspire in certain areas of our national subconscious."

Obviously, Lopez Portillo is referring to a state of affairs that cannot quickly be changed, even by the warmest expressions of American sentiment. He is referring to the entire history of U.S.-Mexican relations, a history which has often been marked by perceptions of condescension and misuse on the Mexican side. The Mexicans do not intend to be bamboozled out of their oil by their Northern neighbor, meaning that the country cannot regard Mexico as a fairy godmother entrusted with the task of keeping gasoline prices low.

Thus, it appears that these two situations almost certainly will affect the President's domestic policies in the coming months. For example, Federal price controls on domestic petroleum are due to expire in May unless renewed. Such an event could mean an overnight jump of ten cents or more per gallon at the pump. Obviously, a President who is only a few months away from beginning a re-election bid cannot afford to subject the economy—and the American consumer—to such a severe shock.

The Administration is caught in a desperate trade-off between its energy policy on one hand and its anti-inflation measures on the other. It is unfortunate that the President cannot use this opportunity to make a dramatic point about the long-range seriousness of the energy shortage, and after all the "wolf-crying" of recent years (including perhaps Schlesinger's own most recent statement) a dramatic shock is what this country needs on energy. However, even if Iran does begin to creep back to full production throughout the year, the economy will be on such a tightrope regardless that the President will be forced to act very cautiously to avoid setting off a recession—a possibility some economists warned of even before Iran.

The week's other two major events—the shooting in Afghanistan and the Chinese invasion of Vietnam—will probably cause the President a great deal of trouble in two areas. First, SALT: some analysts at the State Department are convinced that the Soviets were uncooperative in attempts to free the Ambassador from his captors by peaceful means. The point is that the murder of the Ambassador may raise added doubts in the minds of some Senators about the Soviets' good faith. If the Russians give military support to their friends in Hanoi against the Chinese, there's no telling how damaging such a move would be to peace.

Furthermore, the President has already run into trouble on his inability to secure a promise from the Chinese not to invade Taiwan. In light of the invasion of Vietnam, that failure may appear to grow in importance, raising new domestic questions regarding the Administration's China policy.

Viewpoint

African history ignored

Black Americans have been consistently denied opportunities to chart and explore their history. Instituting laws against their acquisition of literacy and designing academic curriculums that exclude the African diaspora, have been patent mechanisms for depriving Blacks of their ethnic treasures.

The department of history at Williams recently decided, with the approval of the Committee on Appointment and Promotions to dissolve an assistant professorship tenure track position in African history—effectively terminating the department's developing program in African studies. The decision was presumably based on the tenuous argument of a lack of interest in African history as reflected by low enrollments in the course offerings. The registrar's records will refute any of the department's arguments based on numbers.

The decision to exclude African studies from the Williams College curriculum reveals the lack of commitment of the CAP and the history department to support the Afro-American Studies Program at Williams. The history department did not even extend the courtesy of consulting the Afro-American Studies program on their decision as a course in Africa is one of the requirements for the Afro-American Studies concentration.

The department's effort invested in upholding and reinforcing the ideals of the "Western Tradition" has desensitized it to Africa's historical and political pulse. Presently, the history major is designed such that a student can receive a degree in history without any appreciation of African or Afro-American history while the core requirements of the major focus on Western history. The department should review its scholarship with respect to the levity with which it treats African history.

The Record is published weekly while school is in session by the students of Williams College.

Entered as second class postal matter Nov. 27, 1944 at the post office in North Adams, MA., and reentered at Williamstown, MA., March 3, 1973 under the act of March 3, 1879. Second class postage paid at Williamstown, MA., 01267. Subscription price is $10 per year.

"The Record must decide what kind of paper it is"

There has been a lot of friction between the RECORD and WCFM this year, most of it revolving around publication in the RECORD of allegations of misconduct by a WCFM officer. Peter Stark '80, station treasurer and former production director, agreed to an interview in which he described what he sees as some of the shortcomings of the RECORD. His views do not necessarily represent those of the station.

Williams College, unlike many state schools and even some large private institutions, doesn't have a communications department per se, and because of that you come up with difficulties. In the Record a lot of people were on high school newspapers, so the Record is not an illiterate paper. But there are journalistic mistakes and editorial decisions that are in error. There is a certain sense of responsibility that should be taken in the written media, but I think that a certain percentage of the time Record people work on intuition and a lot of times intuition doesn't work.

The main thing that I object to is inconsistencies in reporting. The Record last year glossed over an important news event on campus. I'm referring to the St. Patrick's Day party, where the Record reported that there had been "a scuffle," but that "security quickly suppressed the incident." Actually, there was a perimeter cordoned off by state police as well as town police, and a swim team member who had been assisting security in removing some of the "non-College visitors" was subsequently jumped and had his nose broken. There was never any follow-up to correct mistaken impressions, no names of any of the organizers were mentioned. There is an inconsistency when we see sketchy details there and overexplicit details in the WCFM incident.

The Record has to decide what kind of a paper it is. If it wants to be a "professional" paper, it should hire some professional people who have had journalistic experience to come in, advise and provide input for editorial decisions. The Record should not be open to all groups on campus—it should have its particular bias, like the bias of the Boston Globe or the New York Times. Similarly, not all people who want to work on the Record should be allowed to, if you want to be a professional paper.

On the other hand, if you want to be a student paper, focusing on student concerns, targeted on a fairly small audience, there has to be some loss of professional quality, because people will be learning as they go along. Because of its small, parochial audience, the Record would have to temper stories in such a way as to not do damage to people.

In the past the deans' office has been able to exert some influence on past editorial boards as to how to cover certain stories, not so much to censor what students should and should not know, but to present certain stories in a less unpleasant light for the outsiders who read the paper. While this may be potentially dangerous to a "free press," I think that if this way in which the deans exert pressure is used only infrequently in extraordinary circles, the interests of the Williams community as a whole may be protected from overzealous reporting.

There's no reason for the Record to become a podium for special groups. The Record went through a period of "issue of the semester," with examples including racism, sexism, divestiture and anti-nuclear activities, where letters and articles were exchanged back and forth beating these issues to death. After these exchanges were drained, it seemed as if the troubles were over, and there was no need for any more concern. Rather than have an intense several weeks of point-counterpoint, one issue could be devoted to this, and then the Record could do features on a continuing basis on different sides and different issues.

I think you should have more interviews—which require more work—rather than just have the writer's own opinion and unnamed sources. News should be presented as news but bias should be limited to the editorial page and features.

In summation, I hope that none of these comments generate antagnoism between WCFM and the Record. I think that I am a believer in a free press and free radio. At the same time, that does not absolve either the Record or WCFM from the responsibility to be sensitive to certain issues which would best be left untouched. Too often it is easy to hide behind the name of the Record or of WCFM as a way of absolving personal responsibility for indiscreet or inaccurate reporting. I think a way of making sure that these problems do not occur in the future is not to have individuals involved working for self-advancement and glory, but to honestly put out a respectable product for the Williams community, assuming a personal ethic of responsibility in the process.

"self-criticism is always tough"

Self-criticism is always tough. It's not the admission of error that makes the exercise painful. The problem is that having enumerated the mistakes of the Record, the shortcomings, the failures, we have shorn ourselves of the excuse of blindness. Admitting our mistakes implies a willingness to correct them, and to correct what I see as the problems with this paper is a terribly

Face it, the Williams Record is a poor excuse for a newspaper. Granted, all but a handful of college papers are, but that does not exonerate us. The Record is boring. It often fails to represent adequately the views of a diverse set of students. Its coverage is parochial, rarely making it off campus. What does get covered is often presented incompletely or inaccurately.

First I want to take up the charge of the Record being boring, not to refute it but to expand it. I know, because I used to do it, that most of the assignments for stories—news, arts and sports—come straight from the Register. A few the editor thinks up alone, but almost never does a reporter come in with a story about something spontaneous and interesting.

Granted, few events on this campus are spontaneous or interesting. Williams works by deliberate planning. Actions behind the curtain rarely get covered. The Record once in a while will carry a story about vandalism in Mission Park, with quotes from Walter O'Brien and a house president or dean. But stories about acts of vandalism, about attempted suicides and rapes never appear. More important, department politics—the machinations and maneuverings on policy and tenure—never make the Record, even though they shape the Williams lifestyle more radically than for lectures or College Council meetings.

Of course there are reasons for this limited coverage. First, broad coverage requires a lot of work. While suicides, rapes and acts of vandalism do occur, and while politics is part of the life of every junior faculty member, there is a concerted attempt at Williams to bury these facts. To break through the crust of evasion and deception that can cover Hopkins Hall to investigative journalists requires persistence and hard work that Record staffers often fail to show.

A second factor impairs the ability of the Record to explore complex issues. The Record is, like the College Council, an established and in many ways ossified, Williams institution. Despite the recent preponderance of women on its staff, it is still governed by the requirements of gentlemanliness that permeate this campus. Dealing with devious people to document what administrators want hidden requires a certain level of deviousness that Record staffers will not acquire.

The Record does not represent the diversity of student interest and opinion that its funding demands. This is not wholly the staff's fault: time and again groups on the fringe of Williams society fail to make their interests and activities known to Record editors. Unfortunately for us, ignorance is no excuse. It is the responsibility of journalists to find out about the things they are supposed to cover. Failing this, a newspaper becomes unrepresentative—or worse, becomes a publicity rag for interest groups with media sense.

This semester the Record has begun an attempt to change the narrowness of its coverage. Editorial decisions about what is news and what not—what groups deserve allocations of space and manpower—has shifted slightly under new management. Editors have begun to solicit articles from alternative groups like the Feminist Alliance and Gay People's Union.

But coverage of events of interest to these groups often fails because Record editors like me don't establish communications links with the groups—things happen that we never hear about. For example, changes in major requirements in the English department get long coverage, while the elimination of an Africanist history position had to be dragged to our attention.

In addition, the Record fails to be sensitive to the feelings of different campus groups. It is not only our record on what we cover but how we present events that keep alternative groups from rushing to the Record with tips. Sexist cartoons blot the Record's image with the Feminist Alliance, and Career Counseling ads, without comment, for interviews with corporate villains like Citibank and Union Carbide alienate the Anti-Apartheid Coalition. The Republican Club once felt the need to print its own newsletter to ensure coverage.

In short, the Record's priorities have established an image as establishment and insensitive. This feeds on itself, as those with valuable views despair of equitable coverage, and staffers fail to find the energy to dig out recalcitrant sources to demonstrate good faith. Staffers have the excuse that efforts have failed, but half-hearted tokenism never wins friends. We have failed to make efforts to reach out to the diverse members of the Williams community, and we deserve criticism for that.

On the other hand, I think I can defend the Record against charges of parochialism. Admittedly, this paper does not cover much national, state, or local news unless it directly involves Williams students. I have taken flak for this, but I cannot see how the Record can compete with the Transcript, the Globe, or the Times, all of which come to the library daily. Williams students can only analyze national politics, to take an example, at secondhand, while Williams politics are part of our lives immediate environment.

Inaccuracy is one of the charges most frequently leveled against the Record, and we are guilty. Journalistic standards here are abominable. In part this is because the Record is a training ground as well as a newspaper. But the training of recruits is haphazard and incomplete. The newspaper office has one good stylebook and a handful of obscure ones, which new writers usually have to find for themselves. The editors here are overworked, but this is partly due to our own pride and laziness: in the short run it is easier to rewrite shoddy copy the way we like it than explain to the reporter what is wrong with it. In the end, the Record ends up with a poorly trained staff and poorly written stories.

This lack of training in the end amplifies itself, because the Record is an island of practical learning in the swamp of liberal arts. There are no journalism courses at Williams, and everything the average staffer here learns she or he must learn from the others here. Only a handful of reporters ever served on a "real" newspaper, and when they appear, these few, like Karen Walker '78, rise high and add a little professionalism to the paper. But the rule here is for poorly trained reporters to rise through the ranks to become poorly trained editors.

Almost no one on the Record staff plans to take up newspaper work as a career. Further, grade pressure here occasionally is intense. Thus Record staffers normally are students first, reporters second. They put more time into papers and readings than into articles, and it shows up in inaccurate reporting and poor style. There is a lack of communication between Record staff as well as between departments that, with inadequate coaching, ruins our staff morale.

All this keeps the Record a very limited newspaper. The answer to this insider, is more work, particularly in follow-through. Inertia has carried the Record into policies that are not necessarily desirable or desired. The paper needs to pause and set a few guidelines to institute coherence and coordination between departments and from issue to issue. The training process needs overhauling. The Record needs a new image with students groups across the campus, political and social spectrum.

But to do all this, and still put out a newspaper, doesn't look likely.

black men because they are afraid of what they will see—the reflection of the white devil and the wounds of the pain inflicted by him on black men. And Haki Madhubuti (Don L. Lee) posits that the history imposed on black people has actually been "white supremacists ideology masked as scholarship," and that white historians generally view non-whites as history-less people. Madhubuti's and Malcolm X's ideas seem to be the precise description of the history department's attitude towards Africans and their history. This attitude recalls the specter of Cecil Rhodes who wrote in his "Confession of Faith," (1877), "I contend that we are the finest races in the world. . . . Just fancy those parts that are at present inhabited by the most despicable species of human beings."

This syndrome of insensitivity to the African diaspora also affects the gamut of the major departments at Williams. I have yet to see the theatre department stage a production depicting a theme on the "Black experience" in America. I invite the religion department to explore Black slaves' interpretation of the Bible and the music department to feel the rhythms of black music. In addition, the political science department can explain what happened to Poli-Sci 215 (Political Participation and Black Americans) and hopefully the economics department can solve the mystery of Econ 218 (Economics of the Black Experience in America).

I suggest that the major departments at Williams reassess the fulfillment of their commitment to provide a diversity of course offerings in the trye spirit of liberal arts. As I am a black student and a concentrator in Afro American studies I am offended by the history from the major. I demand that they demonstrate a permanent commitment towards African studies by re-opening the tenure track position specifically for African history.

History is a form of vision; it confers insight into one's individual and communal identity by charting the evolution of a people. History is also a treasure of metaphors which people draw upon for literary expression as well as for forging weapons of the highest caliber. Depriving people of their history robs them the strength and strategies they need to fight oppression. The academy has denied the existence of Black art, black drama, black music, black dance, black wars, black speech, black song, black exodus, black pain, black dreams—it has hidden the artifacts of black history.

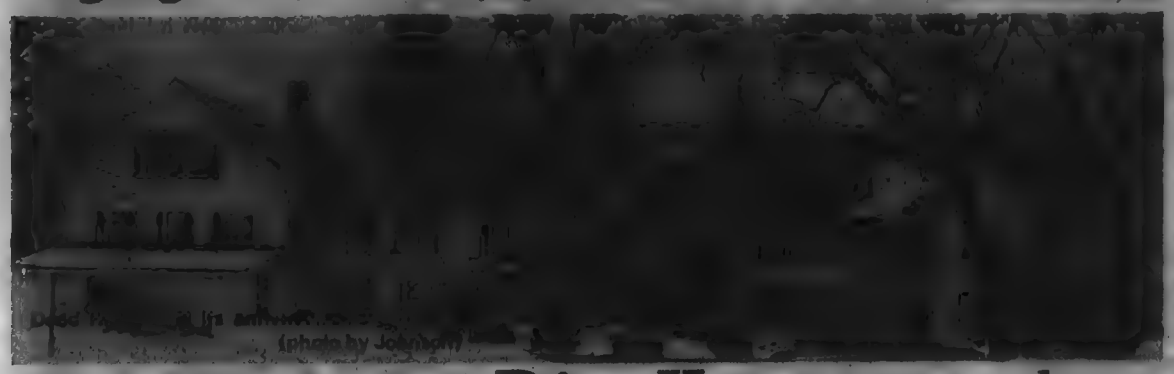
Popular options: Dodd, Tyler offer fine food, lodging

by Sally Davidow

One of the most popular options for freshman housing is the Dodd-Tyler combination. Dodd, with a capacity for about 110 people, and Tyler, which houses about 75 people, are basically row houses—although Dodd is a little bit larger than the average row house.

Dodd consists of the main house, which has 40-50 rooms and four annex houses. Entering freshmen almost invariably end up in one of the annexes—which can work out well if a lot of friends apply together. "Everybody considers the annex to be the worst," said one Dodd annex veteran, "but I don't think it was that bad. If you get into the annex with a bunch of friends it's great." Although applying to Dodd in groups larger than four people can be risky, it can sometimes work out well. This year for example, a group of sophomore girls all got into the annex together.



Dodd is probably best known for its excellent food. Although breakfast is not served there "you can usually sneak in and get some." Lunches are served every day, and dinners every night excepting Sunday. Monday through Thursday nights feature "sit down" dinners with family style service: the tables are set and platters of food are served by student waiters and waitresses. Students help themselves to salad and dessert, and waiters clear away the plates when they are through. Because dinner is served in this manner it is offered only at 6:30, but students who have to be somewhere by 6:30 or 7:00 can eat with the waiters at 6:00.

When asked about Dodd social life one resident stated, "There are always lots of parties. Dodd is known to be the best." Dues are about $15 a semester.

Tyler, according to one of its members, is "one of the best row houses on campus." It has one annex, where sophomores almost invariably live, made up of singles with adjoining bathrooms. Two people share each bathroom. The house itself features mainly singles also, with panelling and fireplaces in many of the rooms. "The living conditions are really nice," stated one resident emphatically.

The main complaint about Tyler is its distance from the rest of the campus. According to one house member this can be both an advantage and a disadvantage. "You're far enough away that you can be alone, but you can always be with people if you want, too.

Tyler also has its own dining room. Breakfast eaters are forced to travel to Baxter or Mission Park, but both lunch and dinner are served at Tyler.

Div. III men, Div. II women choose high level occupations

by Cathy Jackson

In response to various queries like "What are you trying to prove?," I decided to share the results of my Economics 203—The Economic Role of Women-career-aspirations questionnaire which many seniors filled out this fall.

Throughout the course, we found instances of women crowding into occupations labeled as "feminine" (those with a large percentage of female employees) and staying away from the higher-paying, more status-granting occupations into which men venture. Even though I accepted this finding for the general public, I was disturbed upon discovering that a study of the Williams' Class of 1978 confirmed this trend.

Men from that class entered into Architecture, Business, Applied Sciences, while women went into Allied Health, Education, Museum Arts and Sciences. With the questionnaire I gave my class, I tried to see if this phenomenon would again occur in June 1979 and to determine what effects the major, academic ability (as measured by SAT's and Latin Honors), and parents' occupations and educations seem to have had on the career choices of the men and women of my class.

A higher percentage of women than men responded. 80 men and 80 women filled out questionnaires. The assumption here is that those who chose not to fill out the questionnaire were unsure of future plans.

I ranked the career choices into 5 categories, according to my impression of status and future incomes accruing to those careers, with 1 the high category and 5 reserved for those still unsure of next year's plans.

Of the respondents, a higher percentage of men than women indicated caregories 1 and 2 (ie., high-level occupations.) Among the men, those majoring in Division 3 chose the highest level occupations, while for the women, Division 2 majors strove for the highest levels. In all divisions, a greater percentage of men than women chose levels 1 and 2. By comparing major with eventual plans, I tried to see which gender seemed to be planning more towards their careers. The men were more likely to be in a major which contained knowledge helpful to their indicated careers. The men also intended to go into activities related to their eventual career choice sooner than the women.

For math and verbal SAT scores those women with the highest average scores (math and verbal: 2) were found more frequently in level 1. In examining Latin Honors, I found, of those responding, fewer women expecting to achieve such honors. (Keep in mind that the Class of 1979 has fewer women than men. I attributed this to the possibility that with the late jump on career preparation which women seem to get, it is harder to achieve and maintain a high GPA with no clear reward in sight (such as admission to law school.)

With respect to parents' influence on career aspirations, fathers in the highest occupational categories were more likely to have children following in their footsteps. Results supported the theory that a woman with a working mother is more likely to plan to work and that the higher status work the mother does, the higher the career aspirations of the daughter.

For men, the higher the educational level of the mother, the higher are their career aspirations. Marital plans did not inhibit women as far as careers go, although more women than men mentioned long range plans to combine careers and marriage. Some women also took into consideration the interruption in their careers which would occur due to childbearing.

The results indicate that, even at Williams, women are less career-oriented than their male counterparts and less likely to base their major and GPA on a career choice.

Children learn through museum discovery

by Jane Goldfarb

The word "museum" often evokes memories of boring, tiring walks past exhibit after exhibit. The Williamstown Children's Museum however, offers youngsters an opportunity to be involved and to interact with their environment, and to learn through a "process of discovery," according to director Sandy Hanna.

The experience occurs in a number of ways. The Museum is located in Margaret Linley Park, and is open beginning in the spring and continuing through the fall. This past fall children gained a sense of the lifestyle of the Algonquin and Iroquois Indians, native to this region, through storytelling sessions, games in the woods, craftwork, and by dressing up as Indians. In the Museum's three cabins, stuffed animals were displayed, although not in an ordinary fashion. The children first had to find the exhibits before being able to view them. Painted animal tracks led the visitors from the cabin porches, inside and onto tables, in corners, and finally to the animals.

Although the Museum changes the exhibit's theme each season, the Indian program exemplifies the underlying philosophies of the Museum. By actually involving the children in a particular topic, the Museum's workers hope to make learning exciting and interesting to children, and to encourage them to "depend on themselves and their own resources." Ms. Hanna stressed that the context, not only the content, of the Museum's programs develops skills which can be applied to other settings. The creative and explorative projects foster cooperation and self expression, demonstrating the importance of using the senses in learning. At the Museum the children feel that they play an active role in their environment.

In creating a dynamic learning experience, the Children's Museum fulfills its original purpose. Through the impetus of community members the Museum was created in 1973 to provide a "lifetime learning center and an educational resource to the region." A non-profit organization, the Museum received state funds the first year but now must generate finances through program fees and community support.

Although there is a Board of Trustees, the Museum operates primarily on the energies of Ms. Hanna and her three of four co-workers. During the summer, Youth Corps participants, ETA workers, and volunteers help with exhibits and at Camp Rootabaga, a day camp on Hancock Road which emphasizes ecological concepts.

The Museum alters its program during the winter. After-school and weekend workshops and courses include cooking, cross-country skiing, nature skills, crafts, and foreign languages. Classes are held in various places such as the Public Library, the town's schools, and even in Williams College dorms. The mobility allows the involvement of children from surrounding communities. As some programs are given free or for a small charge, The Museum is also available to children from all economic backgrounds.

The Children's Museum does not exist only for children, but provides educational opportunities for the entire community. Anyone may give a course—a challenging experience because of the Museum's stress on the methods of learning. Any Williams College student who wishes to extend their learning experience beyond Sawyer Library is encouraged to call 458-9180 and offer his or her services to the Children's Museum.

Regional Report

compiled by Priscilla Cohen

NEW HAVEN, CONN.—Yale has persuaded Citibank and Manufacturers Hanover, corporations in which the University own stock, to cease loaning money to South Africa. Another bank, Morgan Guaranty Trust Company, has refused to change its lending policies.

The Yale Corporation urged nine banks and 69 companies in which the University invests to comply with six guidelines supporting racial equality in South Africa. 61 of the companies have already agreed to the guidelines.

Yale will not threaten those companies which do not follow the guidelines with divestment. "By divesting too soon, we lose the power to influence the companies," David Storrs, director of funds, loan and asset administration, told the DAILY NEWS.

The five most popular majors this year at Yale are, in order, history, English, economics, psychology and the combined economics and political science major.

The DAILY NEWS noted that this strong interest in the Humanities is not found on many campuses. At Harvard, the number of English majors has dropped by 50 per cent since 1960.

"We live in a decade which is hedonistic and career oriented, and few people are very interested in the past. At Yale we have managed to hold the line against this national trend," Director of Undergraduate Studies in History Paul Bushkovitch told the newspaper.

Yale Art Gallery has been loaned indefinitely 16 nineteenth-century French paintings, mostly Impressionist, from the collection of Paul Mellon.

AMHERST, MASS.—A report to be soon released may find Amherst guilty of wage discrimination against female staff and faculty members.

An unidentified source told the STUDENT that the report, finished last May, "finds Amherst deficient in several areas."

BRUNSWICK, ME.—Students at Bowdoin face a $500 tuition hike for the 1979-80 academic year.

70 is the new faculty retirement age at Bowdoin.

Divestment at Bowdoin seems unlikely in the near future. Bowdoin's South African Advisory Committee explains that they believe change can better be achieved by working within the companies.

"If we were to divest I suppose we would feel morally superior for awhile. But the economic effect would be nil. Our own small investment would have no financial impact," one member of the advisory group told the ORIENT.

Company renders Figaro with gusto

by Jackson Calloway

Those fortunate enough to get hold of tickets for the Canadian Opera Company's production of The Marriage of Figaro should consider themselves lucky. The high quality of the production in all its facets belied the tenuous nature of the company.

This was especially true of the set design which in its deceptive simplicity provided a background more than complementary to the costumes and music.

The demands made on a touring orchestra are manifold as each instrumentalist assumes responsibility for producing a sound usually assigned to many. From the Sinfonia, it was obvious that Mr. McCoppin had successfully molded such a sound. Each musician had firm control of his line, and the overall effect was a fullness that added a great deal to the performance. A further tribute to the ability of this group was the perfect synchronization of the faster, lighter sections without any loss in richness of texture.

Ingmar Korjust rendered a Figaro full of confidence and gusto. His solid baritone propelled by an unobscuring vibrato rarely failed to meet the challenge of the music. His performance of the scene in which he sends Cherubino off to the army was simply superb. Susanna was equally well cast. Her light, straightforward tone complemented the masculine strength of Figaro's. A single example of this fine blend was in the Finale of the second act.

The more mellow, mature voice of the Countess established an interesting balance with that of Susanna, firmly basing their characters in the music and action. Ms. Reshik was at her finest in the Countess's aria of the third act, demonstrating a masterful control of melody and purasing.

Cherubino provides the perfect vehicle for most of the comic action in the opera, and the extraordinary energy and talent of Ms. Gudgeon really made the character come alive. From his delightful flirtations with every female on stage to his encounters with the Count and Figaro, Cherubino never failed to please in his difficult role.

The keener edge on the Count's voice provided an interesting relief from the more rounded Figaro. In his own right, Mr. Quilico sang the role of the Count in a manner well suited to the demanding, aristocratic nature of the character. The power of his fiery bursts of temper were well sung despite a few small problems with his lower range.

The overall effect of the performance was more than could have been anticipated. The grueling pace of a traveling company seemed to have no effects whatsoever, as the presentation was new and fresh, filled with an enthusiasm and energy rarely heard or seen.

Small problems don't weaken Macbeth

by Bill Pursche

Despite some minor shortcomings, Williamstheatre's production of Macbeth is quite successful. Director Gregory Boyd takes Shakespeare's story out of an historical "time-context", an approach that is good for both practical and dramatic reasons.

On the barest level, Macbeth is the story of a Scottish general who meets three seemingly supernatural witches who tell him that he will become king. The play follows Macbeth as he ponders whether he should wait for fate to fulfill the prophect or whether he should act himself to insure it. Spurred on by Lady Macbeth, he kills the King and later has his friend Banquo murdered as well. Each successive murder seems to strengthen Macbeth outwardly while at the same time destroying him internally; he is beset by visions and becomes the tyrant that some had said he would be. At his death, wrote Dr. Johnson, "every reader rejoices."

The mood that Boyd creates is somewhat different from that which the text invites, and this is perhaps the major shortcoming of the production. In the beginning of Shakespeare's Macbeth, we see a resolute Lady Macbeth ready to murder Duncan from the very first; it is Macbeth who tries to dissuade her and who falters after the murder. Later, the strong wills are reversed; Macbeth becomes endowed with some inner strength, almost without a consicence, while Lady Macbeth weakens to the point of deranged sleepwalking. In Boyd's production, this exchange of roles strengths is not so clear. We do see a transformation in Lady Macbeth, played by Cecilia Rubino. Her first speech ("Glamis thou wart, and Cawdor, and shalt be-What thou art promised") is overacted rather than expressive of some latent madness, but after this Rubino settles down into her role extremely well. Later we see her fully integrated into the character of Lady Macbeth in the sleepwalking scene, where she convincingly displays the level of obsession that overcomes her after the murders.

We do not see any such transformation on Macbeth's part, however. Macbeth, played by John Lloyd, seems bent on his plans to take over the throne from the very beginning. There is little, if any, vacillation or soul-searching: when he tells Lady Macbeth that "We will proceed no further in this business - He hath honored me of late" he seems to go on and talk himself out of his doubts rather than let Lady Macbeth convince him. Macbeth is an amazingly complex character, always caught between extremes. He is brave, yet cowardly; resolute, yet doubtful; strong, yet weak. In Boyd's production the strong, resolute, almost murderous side of Macbeth is stressed.

Lack of a character transformation does not mean that Lloyd is not convincing as a Macbeth; quite the opposite is true. He pulls off many of the most difficult speeches quite well, and the scenes with Lady Macbeth are almost flawless. Shakespeare is attempting to present a murderer as a protagonist-hero, and to do this he must set up a special kind of foil. The Lloyd-Rubino interactions bring out this development, the acting in these scenes is clear and forceful.

Some of the other characters are not as convincing as the Macbeths. Macduff, played by Colin Neenan, seems to be reading; he also does not strike us as the figure of goodness and moral strength who is supposed to free the world from Macbeth.

There were a number of bright spots in the acting. Andy Miller, as Banquo, is perfect. He is the most natural of all the cast; his lines are delivered as if they were his own. He clearly fulfills the witches' prophesy that he is "Lesser than Macbeth, and greater."

Stephen Bowers plays Ross, another complicated character. Ross at first, seems to be a total opportunist; but Boyd has Ross appear in places where we might not expect him to be, adding yet another complexity to the play. Bowers does a nice job of making these appearances seem natural instead of contrived (although we never do get an explanation for some of them). Jennifer White gives a hearty and convincing portrayal in her brief appearance as Lady Macduff. Macduff has acquired a daughter in this production, and Lady Macduff's dialogue with her children is touching and is one of the best scenes in the play.

The portrayal of the three witches—Nicholas Fersen, Susan von Moschzisker, Lisa Lufkin—is perfect: Boyd communicates a gruesome trio who possess supernatural powers but who are not without a semi-comic element. Some nice little incongruities—Fersen's dusting off a chair before someone sits on it, followed by one of the wtiches being anointed with blood make the witches the most colorful of all the characters. Hecate appears not as a character but as an entity that possesses one of the witches, and a remarkable effort by Lufkin as the possessed witch keeps this scene from reminding us too much of The Exorcist.

However, a few of the scenes do not work at all. There seems to be some question on Boyd's part as to just what the limits of the comic element in the play should be. For example, the Porter's gestures are funny while his speech is inarticulate, and the sunglasses that Macbeth wears are a needless and intrusive addition.

Peter Gould has designed a simple set composed mainly of trees that is used continuously throughout the play. It is generally effective in that it does not require extensive changes, but its presence does seem a bit out of place in the interior scenes.

Arakawa blurs profundity, confusion

by Melle Rockefeller

The line between the deeply intellectual and the entirely bogus is rarely visible. Like most extremes, they come full circle in confusion and irony.

Arakawa, the Japanese-born printmaker of rising popularity, meanders across the line with commitment to neither. His exhibit in Lawrence Hall is both troubling and exciting because of that blur. Profundity of theme, such as "the Signified or If" lies closely with arbitrary images in words and geometrics to leave an unsettling impression of unexplored depth. Can the human mind really be free enough to absorb the ambiguity of "It disappeared or disappearance became it just as previously the signified had disappeared into It" overlaid with cylindrical shapes, or is the work a giant leg-pull?

Through his use of unchained words as images and as the seeds of ideas, Arakawa is examining "the conflict between sensate knowledge and contextual understanding." The representation of word and form together is not new in conceptual art. But it assumes that the interstices between medium and meaning will reveal something, be it beautiful or ugly, deep or casual. And that is the problem with Arakawa's work; I can find no bottom line of message to take away and ponder.

The exhibit, organized by Craig Dennis of the Studio Art Department, Nate Bekemeier and Stephen Eiseman, is an important one for Williams College. If the show is accepted as an exploration of the boundaries of art (without necessary meaning) it is a monumental step toward creating a vibrant dialectic between image, the usual medium of art, and words, the usual medium of evaluation. The lack of meaning becomes unimportant beside the pursuit of new means.

Arakawa's technical virtuosity is beyond question. Most of the prints are silkscreens on mylar with touches of embossing, color printing, and photographic elements. According to John Coffey of the College Museum of Art, Arakawa's works will be rising explosively in popularity and value. The possible acquisition of one print will be a valuable addition to the College's collection.

Griffin Concert to present art songs

Griffin Hall Concerts will present a program of English, French, German, and American art songs by soprano Judith Reichert and pianist Victor Hill at Weston Language Center on Sunday, February 23, at 8 p.m. Admission is free.

The program opens with four songs to English texts composed by Haydn during the time he spent in London. The flowering of French song in the late Romantic period will be represented by works of Chausson, Hahn, and Satie; although these composers had less prominence than Debussy and Ravel, their music reflects the flavor and charm of French impressionism. Their German counterpart is the early songs of Richard Strauss, seven of which will conclude the program. Between these two groups, Reichert will present five works of Samuel Barber, set to poems in English by Stephens, Joyce, Agee, and Yeats.

The Quad Pooh came in second . . .

Pooh sculpture creativity limited

On Saturday morning in the midst of Winter Carnival week-end four hearty souls strove forth in the early morning in quest of snow sculptures. Twenty-four hours earlier there had been no signs of any sculptures, only three piles of chunky ice in front of Dodd, the Freshman Quad and Morgan. These three houses were so determined to win the contest that they hired a private contractor to pile up the "snow" which Buildings and Grounds would not touch.

From meager beginnings the members of Gar-Wood struggled through the night to create a monster never seen before even by Pooh or Piglet . . . a Woozle. So far only Wood House has been able to successfully capture in snow one possible form of this creature. This burst of creativity turned what could have been a boring sculpture into a first prize winner.

The Quad came in a very close second. Winnie with Piglet was well executed, but not very imaginative. Third and fourth places were also close battles, but far behind first and second. Morgan won a third place with its Kanga and Roo, while Dodd's Winnie took fourth.

Applications are now available in the Financial Aid Office for those seniors interested in any of the graduate fellowships offered by Williams.

CLARK—two variable (usually $900) grants, for one year, unspecified field.

HUTCHINSON—one or more $3,000 grants, for each of two years, preference in creative work in music, writing or painting, then philosophy or science majors.

LANSING—variable grant, for work in Classics.

The Faculty Committee on Graduate Fellowships would appreciate your calling this matter to the attention of seniors majoring in your Department.

APPLICATION DEADLINE March 1.

Women's Arts Festival

Women artists, dancers, musicians, poets, photographers and craftsmakers are invited to participate in the Second Annual Women's Arts Festival on April 20, 21 and 22. Women students who would like to contribute to the festival should contact Nancy Shapero, S.U. 3002, 597-6722. Women from the community should contact Lauren Iossa, S.U. 1739, 597-6310. Deadline for applications is March 11, 1979.

CUL to continue cooperative living experiment

By Dan Morris

The Committee on Undergraduate Living's (CUL) experiment in co-operative living will continue next year, again using Lambert and Goodrich houses.

Director of Student Housing Charles Jankey explained that although co-op living is "a good alternative," the cost of renovating other houses is at present too great to consider expanding the program. Jankey said that the price of putting in kitchens, equipping houses for the handicapped, and meeting various other building code regulations severely limits the possibilities for the experiment. The College does not have sufficient funds to renovate student houses or alter faculty houses for co-op living, he pointed out, while noting that row houses could not continue to exist if their satellites were taken over for co-op living.

. . . but Dodd opted for a perfect Pooh. (Photos by Gast)

Jankey said he was "very happy" with the first year of the program, though he remarked it "had not been a happy situation for all people." "It's hard to know whether you can get people to live together in harmony in this type of situation," he commented.

The CUL outlined the two goals of co-operative living when it proposed the experiment last year: "to satisfy some of the demand for alternative housing within the stock of College facilities in order to strengthen the status of Williams as a residential college," and "to offer students an opportunity to assume responsibility for planning and cooking meals and for minor maintenance of their residence." Approximately 40 students applied for the program last year; 17 were accepted.

Chairman of the Housing Committee Roger Prevot '80 called this year's experiment "very successful." He predicted an increasing demand for the housing alternative, noting that this year "the people who did it said they loved it." Prevot explained that although he understood the problems of emerging the program, "someone's got to sacrifice." Co-op living is an ideal solution for Williams, he concluded, as it keeps the college residential yet gives students the experience of off campus living.

Groups of up to seven students can apply together to live in co-op houses. Each group will be given a ranking on the following basis: for each senior in the group two points will be given, one point for each junior, and the average will be taken to determine ranking. Groups will be chosen on the basis of their ranking. Sophomores are not allowed to apply. Students living in co-op houses are not asked, yet keep their house affiliation.

Prevot emphasized that all students interested in applying for either co-op or off campus living must attend the meeting at 8:30 on February 26th in Jesup. Applications, which can be obtained at the Office of Student Housing at Buildings and Grounds, will be due at the meeting.

Reminder—

Deadline for inter-house transfers March 2. Application available at Office of Student Housing.

Pasachoff seeks eclipse

A scientific expedition, led by Professor Jay M. Pasachoff, left yesterday for Brandon, Manitoba, to observe Monday's total eclipse of the sun. In Williamstown, only a 65 per cent partial eclipse will be visible.

The expedition, which includes four Williams students, Judy Beck '81, Rick Boyce '81, John Duffield '80, and Peter Miller '80, students from UMass, Smith, and Amherst, and additional technicians, hopes to measure several prominent colors, or lines, in the light from the corona. By studying this light, called the coronal spectrum, the group hopes to gain a better understanding of the structure of the corona, particularly its density and temperature.

The eclipse, which will cut across the Northwestern U.S., mainly through Oregon, Washington, and Montana, before swinging into central Canada, will last about three hours. From Williamstown, the moon will appear to start moving across the face of the sun at about 11:00 in the morning. The maximum partial eclipse will be visible at about 12:15, as Williams is too far south to lie on the path of the total eclipse.

At Brandon, 100 miles west of Winnepeg, the Williams group will have just under three minutes of totality to make all of the desired observations. Until totality, the time during which the sun's bright disc is totally obscured, special filters will be required to protect the group's cameras and other equipment from the intense sunlight. At the moment totality begins, the filters must be quickly removed so that the observations of the faint corona can be made. Time is the critical factor, with only 170 seconds available to gather as much data as possible, so quick and careful action will be of the utmost importance. To insure that all go smoothly, the group will spend a week in Brandon prior to the eclipse, setting up their equipment and practicing the steps that will have to be executed during totality.

Professor Pasachoff regularly leads expeditions to view eclipses about the world. At the last eclipse in October 1977, Pasachoff and several Williams students were aboard cruise ships in the Pacific Ocean specially chartered to observe the events. In 1973, Pasachoff took a group to the wilds of Kenya to observe an eclipse with a near maximum duration of totality. He plans to travel to Africa again for next February's eclipse.

In Williamstown, special arrangements are being made for those who would like to get a look at the partial eclipse. Dr. Ann Dinger and Astronomy assistants will be in the physics building between 11:00 and 1:00 demonstrating different ways to observe the sun.

Smith

"There is a duality of life, an underneath to Russians," Smith said. "Before coming to the Soviet Union, I thought of them as atheists, collectivists, robots, cold and stoic," Smith remembered. But that is only part of the Russian character we see on the surface."

In discussing religion, Smith said "the fact that religion goes on this long after the Revolution is surprising. It is also rather surprising to see young people involved in religion," an institution frequently attacked by the press. "Soviet life in public is so dull, so spartan," Smith commented, "people are attracted to the icons, to the beauty and pageantry of the churches."

"One thinks of the Russians as programmed, precise, but they are the greatest rule-breakers," Smith said, "everything is sold under the table." More than a black market, Smith labels it a "counter-economy." Housing rationing in Moscow was cited as one area people get around regulations. The only way a person can obtain housing in Moscow is through family, a job (only if you graduate at the top of the class) or attending college.

After the presentation, Smith responded to questions from the audience. Smith said that he believes Salt II will be signed, but that there is less chance that the Senate will pass it. "There is a real fear by Senators who have traditionally supported the President that Carter isn't tough enough in representing the U.S. in other countries."

Smith was particularly concerned about the U.S. position in the tensions rising over the China-Vietnam border. "The U.S. is not making a clear stand on the China-Vietnam border," Smith said. "While we have criticized the Vietnamese for their invasion of Cambodia, Carter must also criticize the Chinese forces there so the Soviet Union doesn't feel the U.S. is only criticizing pro-Soviet forces."

"I think the Russians suffer from an enormous inferiority complex to U.S. technology and western culture," Smith added.

WAAC Protests

The Williams Anti-Apartheid Coalition (WAAC) held a protest meeting in Hopkins Hall last Monday night. After reading a statement to the assembled Committee on Shareholder Responsibility, the Coalition members discussed with them how their proposals might be implemented.

The WAAC expressed concern about the Committee's low profile on campus. "We are concerned that the Committee has not lived up to its responsibility to promote discussion of Shareholder questions in the college community," the statement read. "In the initial committee report of last spring, this was listed as one of several responsibilities of the Advisory Committee on Shareholder Responsibility (ACSR). We would hope that toward this end, the Committee would soon release a public statement outlining its activities and goals for the spring."

The WAAC requested that all future meetings of the Committee be open to the public. They also asked that the Committee advertise that their information on college investment is available to the college community.

Curriculum changes change. Am Civ's major requirement will also include either "Womenhood in Reform: 19th Century Experience" (401) or "From Camelot to Watergate: American Society in Crisis" (403).

Dropping its requirement that majors take certain courses from historical periods, the English Department also added three new requirements: Middle Ages to the Age of Enlightenment (301), the Age of Enlightenment to Early Modern Period (302) and a literary criticism course. The department retained its author and genre requirements and will continue to require a minimum of nine courses from its majors.

The Biology department announced that Genetics (Biology 203) will become a part of its major requirement.

If approved, all major changes become effective with the Class of 1981.

Three departments restructured their respective introductory programs.

Three introductory seminars, aimed at specific student interests rather than an overview-reasoning approach, will replace History 101. Students will choose from "The Roots of America," "Europe in the Crucible: Wars, Collapses, and Revival, 1914 to Present," and "The Expansion of Europe (Crusades to Colonialism)" to satisfy the existing History 101 requirement.

The Sociology department revamped its introductory program in a similar topical seminar format, replacing Sociology 101 with seminars "Alienation in Mass Society," "Society in the 21st Century," and "The Social Impact of Industrialization."

The Mathematics department revised its calculus program, eliminating Math 109 and 110, forming a 107-108 sequential course, and creating two new courses, Introduction to Higher Mathematics (202) and Multivariable Calculus and Linear Algebra (203).

Mark Welch ('80) is in the process of pinning his Amherst opponent as an interested disinterested observer looks on. Mark also beat his foe from Wesleyan in the Little Three tri-meet held at Lasell last Saturday. Scott Frost, at 142, repeated that feat in his weight class. The rest of the team didn't fare as well, sadly, and lost the team effort by close margins to both Wesleyan and Amherst. Most members of the team look forward to competing in the New England championships to be held this Saturday at Bowdoin, Maine.

Men's squash team drops close match

by Jackson Galloway

The strain of playing four matches in six days took its toll last Wednesday as the Ephmen dropped a hard-fought match to Trinity, 4-5. Two days earlier, the varsity had resoundingly defeated Dartmouth 8-3, following successive matches with Army and Stonybrook.

Winning for Williams were captain Martin Goldberg at number 1, Peter Thomsen at number 4, Wally Miller at the 5 spot, and Kennon Miller at number 7. In all four of these victories, Trinity won only one game and that only in the overset. In the other five matches, it seemed that Lady Luck deserted the Ephmen as all except one went five games and few of the many crucial tiebreakers fell to Williams. Mitchell Kass in his first match since Jan. 27, put up a hard fight in his four game loss. The more rested JV squad avenged the varsity as they won 5-4 over the Trinity JV.

Two days proved to be enough R&R as the varsity dealt a stunning blow to the Alumni on Saturday, destroying them 5-2.

Runners camp out and rest up during 1977 24-hour relay.

24-hour relay is approaching

The eighth Annual Williams Roadrunners 24-Hour Charity Relay has been scheduled for March 10-11. Since its inception in 1970 the relay has become an institution at Williams. Athletic Director Bob Peck, who is in charge of organizing the relay this year, expects ten to fifteen teams and more than 300 runners to take part in this year's event. In addition a number of musical groups will provide entertainment during the night.

For those unfamiliar with the relay, it involves teams made up of students, faculty, and local residents. Each team has ten or more runners who take turns running a mile apiece for the entire twenty-four hours. In addition to these hard core types, teams generally recruit less athletically inclined individuals to run guest miles. This gives everyone a chance to share in the fun of running around Towne Fieldhouse in the middle of the night.

Once a team forms, its members generally stick together for years. Teams in the past have been organized around freshman entries, upper class houses, and sports teams such as the crew and the ski teams. This year it looks as though the Chemistry department may even organize a team.

Probably the most important aspect of the relay is that each year it raises [illegible] dollars for local charities like the ABC program and the Williamstown Boys' Club. Last year the money received through pledges was down but this year, with the help of the Chaplain's office, organizers expect to greatly increase the amount of money received. As Coach Peck puts it, "this is one of the few chances that Williams gets to really do something for the community."

Eph raquetwomen have 2-1 weekend

Women's squash team left the snow and cold of New England last weekend and traveled south in search of warmth and wins. They got some of both, and returned with a strong 2-1 record after three matches in two days of competition.

On Friday evening the women rallied with the University of Pennsylvania squad, on their own home courts, and gained control of almost all matches as Williams won, 5-2. With barely enough time to catch their breath, the Williams women re-entered the courts and took on the Franklin & Marshall team. With a little less trouble, Williams easily took that match 7-0.

Saturday brought with it the only disappointment of the weekend, as the Ephwomen lost to the No. 1 team in the nation—Princeton—7-0.

Ephs are Little Three swim champs

The Ephswimmers clinched their eighth straight Little Three Swimming Championship at Wesleyan last Saturday. Coach Samuelson's natators let no one down as they demolished the Cardinals 70-41.

Wesleyan discovered early on that they were in for a long day when the opening medley relay of Dave Amlicke, Jay Thoman, Jim Goff, and Keith Berryhill "blew doors," with especially good legs by the last two members.

With momentum ever increasing, the duo of Gordon Cliff and Mark Johnson dominated the 1000 by taking first and second respectively. Freshman Mike Regan and Senior John Adams followed the act with an easy 1-2 finish in the 200 free. Andy Cole, though, turned in the most outstanding performance by slashing seven full seconds off his previous time recording of 2:03.7.

Six swimmers, including Cole, shaved their bodies for this, their last meet of the year. The other hairless types were Steve Alpert, Ned Chasteney, Steve Serardi, Jay Hellmuth, and Jerry Treiman.

Benefiting either from a reduction in water resistance, or an increase in sensitivity, this group as a whole swam extremely well. In addition to a fine 200 free, Cole came back like a gangbuster to turn in a quick 55.0 in the 100 free, a full three second improvement over his best time.

Steve Seradi "went bananas" as he sizzled to a :24.1 (third place) in the 50 free and blazed to a :52.2 in the 100. Jay Hellmuth turned in a 2:53 in the 200 breaststroke, ripping seven seconds off his previous best time.

Ned Chasteney also swam well as he went 1:06.0 in the breaststroke leg of the second medley relay, and returned to cop third in the 200 breaststroke. Middle distance freestyler Jerry Treiman turned in excellent times of 2:13.3 and 1:01.0 respectively in the 200 and 100 free; Steve Alpert slashed 1.2 seconds off his previous best in the 50 free with a :27.7, and equalled his best in the 100 free.

Needless to say, after the competition of the 200 free, the conclusion of the meet became academic. Williams dominated the 200 I.M. as Don Cameron and Brian McDermott sped to a 1-2 finish.

In the last event, the 400 freestyle relay, the team of Jerry Treiman, Andy Cole, Jay Hellmuth, and Steve Alpert finished second. The divers, Bill Kelly and Greg Roux, though unchallenged by Wesleyan, performed well, securing 16 points for the Ephs.

The Ephmen finished their dual meet season with a 5-4 record, and look forward to sending seven swimmers and two divers to the New England Championships March 1-3 at Springfield College.

Ephs win Little Three

by Stan Parese

Nothin' to it but t' do it. The Williams College basketball team won the Little Three championship outright on Saturday by rolling over Amherst 71-62. The win raised the team's Little Three record to 3-0, and its overall record to 12-6.

Both the delirious Williams fans and both of Amherst's fans saw their teams play relatively conservative games. Both teams' styles were deliberate; no secret plays, or presses. The Ephs ran a hustling 3-2 zone defense and a strong forward offense against Amherst's sticky man to man defense. The difference between the two teams was performance off the boards. Williams opened an early lead 13-7, scoring 8 of their 13 points after offensive rebounds. And this was an omen of things to come as the Ephs repeatedly got second and third shots at the hoop during the game.

The Man in the middle for Williams was senior Matt Spangler (20 points, 10 rebounds). From the start of the game it was clear that he, fellow senior Jeff Brinker, and junior Bill Lohrer, had claimed ownership of the boards and surrounding territory, and were not about to tolerate trespassers.

But while the front court men did a fine job, it was clearly a team victory for Williams, as the Ephs showed off their patented offensive attack in which every player is a definite scoring threat. Both Andy Straka and Dean Ahlberg hit for 12 points, while senior co-captain Gerry Kelly and forward Jeff Brinker chipped in 8 apiece, and Bill Lohrer added another 7.

Twelve minutes into the game Williams led by 10, and Amherst was able to mount no serious threat until midway through the second half when they cut the Eph's lead to 5, 47-42. But the pressure was short lived as Spangler, Kelly, and Ahlberg countered with three unanswered hopps to jack the lead back to 11, and the Ephs never looked back, winning by a final score of 71-62.

For co-captains Gerry Kelly and Matt Spangler, it was an especially sweet win: their first Little Three championship in four years of Varsity play. Said an emotional Spangler after the game, "Yeeeuuooo!!"

The Ephs, now having won ten of their last twelve outings, have matured into a powerful, well balanced team. They crushed heavily favored W.P.I. last Tuesday night 87-74, in another impressive showing of solid team play.

Women b-ballers annihilate Amherst

by Timothy Clark

Coach Sue Hamblin's women b-ballers completely out-classed the Lady Jeffs from Amherst for the second time this season as they posted a 63-34 victory last Saturday night. The Amherst women, though taller, were no match for the well-coached Williams squad. The Ephwomen were far superior in every aspect of the game from passing to boxing out on rebounds to playing defense.

The destruction began early with Williams jumping out to commanding leads of up to 27 points in the first half. The Ephwomen seemed on their way to hitting the 100 pt. mark. Their play was so overwhelmingly superior that many of the spectators who filled the gym left at half time with the score 42-17.

The devastating Ephwomen cruised to victory in the second half as Coach Hamblin tried out a new 1-3-1 defense and some different combinations of players. The scoring attack of Williams was balanced and indicated their unselfish team play. Senior co-captain Leslie "Flash" Milne, who always seems to shine in Little Three competition, led with 15 points. Terry Dancewicz, Laurene Von Klan and Ann Dancewicz dominated the boards and accumulated 14, 12, and 10 points respectively. Cathy Holshouer scored 10 points for Amherst.

Williams now stands an incredible 11-3 overall with a perfect 3-0 league record. The Ephwomen play Wesleyan at home this Saturday. A victory will give them the Little Three title and tune them up for the NIAC tournament.

Women's hockey victorious

The Williams Women's hockey team turned its season around dramatically last week with two victories over teams that had already tied or beaten them earlier in the year.

Middlebury came to Williams last Saturday, looking to repeat an earlier 7-2 (it wasn't that close) drubbing of the Ephwomen, and spoil our carnival on our home ice. The Middlebury coaches were smug; the players relaxed and laughing. They had no idea of what was to happen in the next two hours.

What happened was that Williams beat the Panitherettes in sudden-death overtime, by a score of 3-2. This was the first time Williams had ever defeated Middlebury in women's hockey, and the game was as tense and exciting as the score would indicate—as the crowd of perhaps 225 would attest.

Both teams appeared nervous in the first period, playing conservatively, if not overcautiously. Finally, however, Middlebury broke the ice and went on top, 1-0. In the second period, the Panthers scored again. When Kathy Kraft was called for tripping at 14:13, things really looked bad for Williams. But Sarah Behrer scored a short-handed goal on a breakaway seconds later, and the score stood 2-1.

All hell seemed to break loose in the third period, as both teams rushed the puck and had numerous scoring chances. Time was running out, but Julia Weyerhauser scored on a mix-up in front of the Middlebury goal, and the period ended, 2-2.

The overtime was classic. Middlebury had a breakaway off the opening faceoff, but Williams goalie Lisa Halperin made the save of the day, and the Panthers were thwarted. Only 12 seconds later Weyerhauser again scored for Williams, sealing the win.

In New Englands . . .

Women swimmers place 6th

There was all of beard shaving and tattooes, but the 12 woman Williams contingent proved neither to shock a field of 500 swimmers by finishing sixth in overall team scoring at the New England Championships in Springfield last weekend.

U.Maine overpowered the 16 team competition with 677 points. Springfield, Southern Connecticut, UNH and Boston University all followed in order, fewer than 100 points ahead of Williams. The Ephwomen scored 345 points, more than twice their total last year, and beat perennially strong squads from UConn, Central Conn, WPI, Boston College and URI.

The key to the Ephsw' women's success was their five top-six place relays, four of which smashed existing college records by wide margins. Thursday night the 400 freestyle relay team of Nina Murphy, Laurie Vuylsteke, Catherine Hartley and Karon Walker chopped 23 seconds off last year's 8:38.7 standard with an amazing 8:15.7 third place finish. Friday's two fourth place relays, the 400 medley and the 200 freestyle, also clipped seconds off Williams marks. Linda Reed, Vuylsteke, Hartley and Murphy swam a 4:16.3 400 and Joanna Monroe, Barb Good, Murphy and Walker brought the freestyle relay down to 1:44.0.

Saturday's 200 medley relay of Reed, Vuylsteke, Walker and Murphy took a fifth before the sixth place 400 free relay shaved five seconds off the previous college mark. The team of Walker, Hartley, Murphy and Good swam home in a college mark 3:48.5.

Co-captain of the team Karon Walker became the New England champion in the 100 butterfly as she took more than a second off her own college record in that event with a 1:00.0. A youthful freshman from UConn capitalized on Walker's aging joints, in the sprints, however, just touching her out by .09 seconds in the 50 free and fingernailing her out by .004 seconds in the 50 butterfly. Walker's two second place times, 25.13 in the free and 26.97 in the fly, were both new college records.

Freshman Catherine Hartley swam an outstanding 200 butterfly race, cutting three seconds off her own college mark in that event as she finished second in 2:16.5. Hartley also took two fifths in the 50 and 100 butterfly. Her times in all three events and her 9th place 2:20.4 200 individual medley qualified her for the nationals in Reno next month.

Another frosh, Laurie Vuylsteke, qualified for the nationals in two events and set her own share of college records. Vuylsteke took an eighth in the 100 breaststroke with a 1:12.31, a college mark, a seventh in the 100 I.M. with a 1:04.24, and a sixth in her record-breaking 2:36.8 200 breaststroke. Barb Good, the college's only entry in the 400 I.M., (in which she took 14th), finished seventh in the 200 breast with her own personal best time of 2:38.3.

Soph Linda Reed picked up fifth place points with her record 2:22.4 200 backstroke. She also placed in the 50 and 100 yard events of that stroke.

Tony Plansky: a tribute to the mentor of hundreds of athletes

Pete Farwell '73 was Coach Plansky's asst. coach for cross-country last fall. An accomplished marathoner, himself, Farwell captained his College corss-country team. He ran both track and cross-country his four years here.

by Pete Farwell '73

Tony Plansky, beloved mentor of hundreds of Williams athletes over the years, passed away February 10 at the age of 78. Coach Plansky came to Williams in 1931 as assistant to Doc Seeley, becoming head track and cross country coach in 1936. Since that time Tony has been a well-known fixture on campus, and his teams were just as well known in New England.

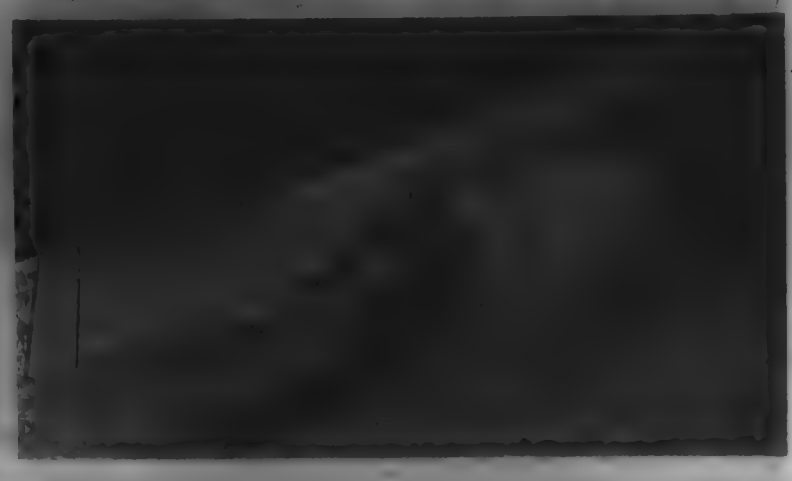
During Coach's career his track squads won nine Little Three titles before he 'retired' in 1966, but he continued to coach cross country through this past fall. Remarkably his success improved with age: since 1970 Williams has a record of 87-19-1 including undefeated seasons in '70, '75, and '77, finishing 3rd in the Eastern Intercollegiates each year. Most important to Coach were the unprecedented nine straight Little Three titles, bringing his total to 19.

We on his squads knew all this, but it was only by rumor that we learned of Tony's unparalleled athletic prowess during his youth, for he chose to relate anecdotes about the runners he had coached rather than his own feats. But for the record, Coach Plansky was called "the greatest college athlete of all time" by football coaching greats Lou Little and Benny Friedman, as well as being named South Boston's Greatest Athlete and being voted to membership in the Helms Track and Field Hall of Fame in 1967.

Tony was a standout in every sport at Georgetown University, gaining early fame in the decathlon event, in which he won the national and Penn Relays titles three times each from 1924-28. In 1928 a mix-up kept him from a berth on the Olympic track team.

After three years as fullback at Georgetown Tony joined the New York Giants pro football club, leading the NFL in scoring in 1929 when he was all-pro along with Red Grange. His feats during that season included scoring all the points in a 21-0 win over Green Bay, kicking a 60 yard field goal, and drop-kicking a 35 yard field goal with three seconds left to beat the Chicago Bears 22-21.

When injuries cut short his football career Plansky played semi-pro baseball despite no collegiate experience. His first year he hit a league leading .376 at Scranton, then played with Buffalo of the International League with a brief stint on the Philadelphia National League club. He continued to play the summer Cape Cod League until 1939, being the oldest and most popular player.



In addition, Tony was one of the campus's best at tennis and golf. He continued to shoot near par on the Taconic Golf Course links in 70's. And a season or two of boxing demonstrated his strength and agility in the ring as well; a football teammate claimed Plansky could have been heavyweight champ, if only he were meaner!

But for those of us who had the good fortune to train under Coach Plansky, and myself who had the additional privilege of assisting him in coaching during his last season, Tony was a giant among men for other reasons. 'Coach' was the epitome of what we at Williams want a coach to be. He accepted victory and defeat with identical equanimity. Once our team's eleven meet win streak was in jeopardy, and when I exultantly informed him of the 27-26 win he offhandedly remarked, "Oh, I thought we'd lost." We knew that inside he cared, and it was this care that always took a personal form. Everyone was welcomed on his teams and received equal attention. Many was the day that Coach would wait in the stands for the last lab student to arrive for a workout at 5:30. Everything was flexible, geared to what the individual wanted to get from sport and from academics, or just from the camaraderie of the team and its coach. 'Senator', 'Knuckles', and 'Young America', we all had a nickname, made more special by Coach's South Boston accent. Once adapted to his loose training system (which at first baffled high school hotshots) we thrived. Just as we delighted in his humor, story-telling, and perpetual admonishments for us to "keep the peckin' order" in races. His driving was no less renowned; it occasionally left us with heart in throat, though laughing afterwards. A nervous freshman would be told to 'go down to the snack bar for a couple hotdogs' to cure queasiness, or a mysteriously poor performance would be explained by "Oh, he's in love."

The inner energy of Coach Plansky always charged the air. Even as he lay stoic in death I half-expected him to glance over, wink, and ask, "How are ya, ya liar!" followed by, "How do you feel—confident?" And I do, for I hope to always live by the qualities that Tony ingrained in us, by osmosis as it were. Competition is important to challenge oneself, for growth, and to vitalize every aspect of existence, but just as crucial are academics, socializing, and living as a genuine person. For life is a sport, and in it, while excellence is good, a certain goodness is indeed excellent. Coach Plansky will always be at the forefront of any such 'peckin' order', particularly in our hearts.

Both the Men's and Women's ski teams came up with one of their finest performances of the Carnival season at the races held last weekend at Berlin Mountain. Freshman Trish Hellman won both the Giant Slalom and the Slalom by convincing margins in leading the women to a third place finish, behind Middlebury and UVM. The men, with freshman phenom Steve "Cracker" Granum at the fore with a second place finish in the Giant Slalom, came in fourth out of ten teams. Also contributing greatly to the Ephmen's effort was cross-country captain Jeff Wagoon. He placed a fine third behind two Middlebury maniacs. (Photo by Graf)

The inflated grade: subtle but pervasive effects

Ed.'s note: This is the first of a two-part series on grade inflation.

by Peter Fischer

Professor William DeWitt, learning that the Record wished to interview him for an article on grade inflation began by remarking, "Just the other day we (the biology faculty) were laughing at some old grade sheets." He subsequently produced one of these grade sheets, which was undated, but which he placed at roughly 1970. Labelled "Biology 302 Gifts," because, DeWitt says, "I thought I was being generous," it listed three grades in the 'A' range, eleven in the B range (including six B-'s) and four in the C range. Average: B.

"I don't give those kinds of grades now," says DeWitt, and neither, it seems, do very many other professors. In the past ten years, the average College GPA has risen almost 14 per cent, matching a national trend of similar proportions. A survey of 135 colleges conducted in 1978 found that between 1965 to 1975, these institutions had experienced grade inflation of well over 12 per cent.

But higher grades is only one side of the grade inflation problem. The other, and in some ways more troubling side is that grades are clustering tightly around a new high median. Dean O'Connor, in an article appearing two weeks ago in the Record and for which he is seeking a national publisher, indicated that approximately 85 per cent of all grades are now "bunched closely" in the narrow range around the median.

The problems engendered by grade inflation are manifold, and in many cases obvious. For one thing, they make grades a dubious measure of achievement. "Grade inflation cheapens the academic product," said O'Conner in his article. "One might think that the greater number of students receiving top grades means greater public recognition of students' academic achievement. But the reverse is true. The effect is to trivialize the achievements of all students, whatever their ACTUAL accomplishments."

Other effects, however may be more subtle. Associate Provost and political science professor David Booth, for example, is worried that grading disparities between departments caused by different levels of inflation may be having unintended effects on student course choices.

"I can't document this," said Booth, "but most of the students I've talked to believe that they are discouraged by low grades from taking further courses in a subject. It takes a lot of character for a student to continue working in a department that he or she is getting poor grades in."

Data from the registrar appear to bear out this contention. Average class GPA's invariably rise from freshmen to senior year with a usual difference between the two classes of

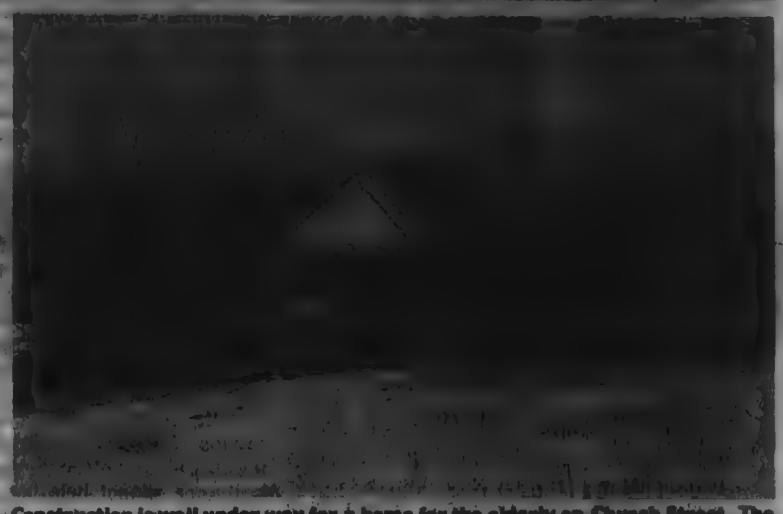
CC takes tighter grip on SAT funds

The College Council voted Wednesday night to place a statement in the student handbook specifying that "only the Council may authorize contracts that obligate S.A.T. funds." The statement allows Council to specifically authorize individuals to sign contracts, while holding those without this delegated authority personally responsible for such contracts.

The Council's action came as a response to the All College Entertainment Committee's (A.C.E.C.) recent contracting of the band Albatross without the Council's approval. Treasurer John Simpson explained that the handbook statement is designed to "make people who commit SAT funds without College Council approval personally responsible for their actions."



President of the ACEC John Svoboda admitted that "any malfeasance can be attributed to me, although I have a hard time understanding why it is a transgression." Svoboda explained that he had assumed that the money allocated to the ACEC could be spent without Council's approval. "It's our money, our loss," Svoboda reasoned.

Many of the Council's members disagreed with Svoboda on this point. Secretary Mike Lissack pointed out that "at no point in time until the check is actually written is the money no longer ours (the Councils)." President Bronson Fargo also reminded Svoboda that this had all been made "very clear" to him when the A.C.E.C. came before the Council last fall to request funding. As John Simpson put it, "I don't see how they possibly could have misunderstood."

The Council finally decided to disband the A.C.E.C. this spring and replace it with a new organization, the Concert Board. This board will be a part of a larger organization, the Student Activities Board, which will meet weekly to coordinate campus entertainment and social events. The Concert Board will be responsible for the production of two major concerts and a variety of other campus events during the school year.

The proposal for the Student Activities Board stated its goal as "the creation of lines of communication between the committees, organizations, and residential houses that sponsor 'all-college activities so that there is something happening every weekend, and there aren't an abundance of competing activities on a certain weekend."

In other action, the Council granted $330 to the Asian Cultural Society. The Council also made public the results of the all-college election voter turnout. The results were: Class of 1982, 62.88 per cent, Class of 1981, 56.00 per cent, Class of 1980, 55.60 per cent, and Class of 1979, 41.88 per cent.

Construction is well under way for a home for the elderly on Church Street. The project, supported by The Williamstown Elderly Housing Cooperation, will house sixty of the town's elderly residents. The six acres of land on which the home is being built was formerly owned by the college, but was sold for the project. The home will open in November. (photo by Ross)

Geismar inches in

By a margin of just 20 votes, Beth Geismar '80 defeated Byron Walker '80 in last week's run-off election for the College Council presidency.

Approximately 56 per cent of the student body voted, with a final count of 546-526 in Geismar's favor. This compares with a 56 per cent turnout in the original election, in which Geismar outpolled Walker 386-322.

In run-off elections for the Committee on Educational Policy, Carrie Brown '80 was named Division I representative, while John Duffield '80 will represent Division III. The Division II position will be filled by Paul Goren '80, pending College Council approval.

According to Chris Jenkins, chairman of the Elections Committee, Goren did not receive 50 per cent of the student vote, which is required for an election to be valid. Jenkins explained that this was due to the closeness of the original race, which necessitated three candidates participating in the run-off election.

In other elections, Ann Oberender was chosen to represent the Class of 1980 on the Committee on Undergraduate Life, while Denise Harvey will represent the Class of 1981. Elected to the Honor and Discipline Committee was David Sorkin '81.

College mourns YoYo

by Ann Fischer

Twelve and a half years ago, a very special dog adopted Williamstown; his name was Yo-Yo. Early last week, Yo-Yo died peacefully in his sleep in the home of his current "owners," the Scherr family of South Street.

Charles Tucker '67, Yo-Yo's original "owner," admits that no one could ever rightly claim to own Yo-Yo, for he was a free spirit. When Charles graduated, the Scherrs began to supply Yo-Yo's necessities and to rescue him from his brushes with the law, but Mrs. Scherr emphasizes that it was Yo-Yo who adopted her family.

Yo-Yo

Yo-Yo has been a compulsive eater since his early days at the Garfield fraternity house. Tucker recalls that while the other frat dogs ate in the kitchen, Yo-Yo preferred the choicer pickings available in the dining room. Never one to refuse a hand-out, Yo-Yo's recent haunt was the college snack bar, where he had title to one of the benches.

Witnesses claim to have seen Yo-Yo eat up to twelve hot-dogs at one sitting. His appreciation for good food has forever endeared him to the snack bar ladies. Mrs. Scherr explains that Yo-Yo was troubled the past year by an arthritic condition which often forced her to come carry him home after one of his rounds of overindulgence.

Like the well-rounded student, Yo-Yo did not live for food alone. In his more active days, he frequently sat in on classes—some of his favorites were environmental economics, astronomy observing labs, and all of Mr. Fuqua's classics courses. Yo-Yo was never a "grind," however, and will always be remembered by sports fans. He was a

Adviser applications drop sharply

by Eric Schmitt

Despite a sharp decline in junior adviser applications this year, Junior Adviser Selection Committee chairman Bronson Fargo '79 said students still perceive the junior adviser as a prestigious position.

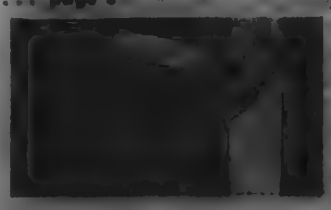
Only 100 sophomores applied for the 51 JA positions, a 41 per cent drop from last year's 170 applications.

Fargo attributed the decline in part to a Committee On Undergraduate Living (CUL) study conducted last year. "Last spring," Fargo said, "the CUL discussed the JA system, and just the fact that it looked at the JA system in respect to its role model, tarnished the JA image slightly. Nothing bad was said but students considering either spending their junior year abroad or becoming a JA were given that little extra to think about."

The JA selection process is a complicated set of procedures, shrouded with secrecy. A candidate must submit three applications: a personal essay, describing why she-he would make a good JA, a supporting essay from the applicant's former JA (or another JA who knows the applicant well), and a peer recommendation.

Each applicant's package then proceeds through three rounds of committee deliberation. In the first round all three essays are read aloud to the committee. The candidate is discussed and members vote to hold (approve), reject or abstain.

Regardless of the first round vote, every candidate is brought back for the second round. The first round's function of familiarizing the committee with all the candidates leads to the second round's discussion in which each committee member summarizes four candidates. After discussion, every member must vote either hold or reject; there are no abstentions on the second vote.



To qualify for the final round a candidate must have received a two-thirds hold vote from the committee in the second vote. At its final meeting this year the committee will select by ballot vote 25 females and 25 male JA's.

The entire process lasts roughly four weeks, from the middle of February to just before Spring Break, when the selections are announced.

Twenty eight people comprise this year's selection committee. The members include junior advisers from last year, at-large representatives picked by the College Council's election committee, and current junior advisers.

Administrators to examine Park complaints

by Randy Wood

President John Chandler vowed to "take seriously" proposals for renovation presented by Mission Park residents at a meeting last Sunday night. Energy czar John Holden of Buildings and Grounds also promised to examine specific complaints regarding heating and lighting.

The second in as many weeks, the meeting arose from "growing dismay with vandalism," said Scott Blair, president of Armstrong House. He explained that the struggle to solve that problem revealed the need to change the physical appearance of the building and to "improve attitudes."

He suggested first converting Mills House overflow into a residential house. Although it would contain fewer residents than other Park houses, Blair felt that the benefits would outweigh the disadvantages.

Vandalism stems from the alienation of the Mills residents from their social houses, explained Dave Hansen, president of Dennett House. There is no peer pressure to take responsibility for the building's maintenance because there is no sense of cohesion, he said.

The conversion would require the creation of an additional common or social area. George Wilbanks presented a set of architectural drawings done by various students as tentative plans. These included converting the lobby into a lounge, classrooms along the main hall into student offices, a snack bar, and lounges, and adding partial carpeting and acoustical ceiling panels to dampen the noise.

Residents also want to refurbish the Armstrong Rec and game rooms into areas suitable for a wider range of activities such as cocktail parties and dancing.

Director of Student Housing Charles Jankey and Holden heard suggestions for conserving energy, particularly in the dining main halls. Holden agreed to tour the dormitory with the three house managers to deal with specific complaints.

Jankey praised the students for demonstrating "the first real expression of concern in several years" with Mission Park. Chandler concurred, noting that students accepted and eventually liked Graylock, which initially received much criticism. He agreed that problems with Mission Park are "more durable physical problems."

Both Dean Daniel O'Connor and Assc. Dean Cris Rossmeisel also attended the meeting to hear the residents' proposals.

Commentary:

China in Vietnam

by Todd Tucker

Nobody is where he belongs in Southeast Asia. Vietnamese troops are in Kampuchea (Cambodia), Chinese soldiers are in Vietnam, and Soviet forces are being massed menacingly along the Sino-Soviet border. The stakes are high in this Gargantuan incidence of chain-like aggression. The entire region borders on a full-scale conflagration which, if consummated, could engender U.S. military involvement.

Before I present my own evaluation of the situation, I feel it only fair to issue a warning. Virtually all of my information comes from The New York Times. While this publication is one of the world's most respected, there is ample reason to doubt the accuracy of its reports. Perhaps it is mere fate that each and every time the Times reports on something about which I am personally knowledgeable we disagree. I invest little credence in notions of fate.

On page A-10 of Monday, February 19th's newspaper there was a photo depicting anti-war demonstrations in Stockholm. Those pictured were carrying a poster which read, "Kina Ut Ar Vietnam." The Times had this translated as, "China threatens world peace." Anyone with even a rudimentary knowledge of Swedish can recognize this as a blatant misrepresentation of the facts. The protester's sign actually means, "China out of Vietnam." There is a substantial difference between the real situation and the one reported by the Times, both in tone and impact.

It seems unlikely that this was an "honest" mistake. Even a reader completely unfamiliar with Swedish could see the word Vietnam. Any translation would, logically, contain that word. My conclusion, one which comes hard after an education stressing the freedom and truthfulness of the American press, is that the Times' misrepresentation was deliberate. The false translation provokes more fear and consternation than does the real message. On the brink of another world war! This conjures images of American soldiers back in Asia, of nuclear weapons held at the ready. A whole plethora of evils lies around the corner because of the Chinese. The reasons for this lie are simple: the Times—or somebody there—desired to manipulate the public opinion into an anti-Chinese stance and saw this as an efficacious way of doing so. Perhaps the Pentagon (fear means more military bucks) "suggested" that lies should be disseminated.

Whatever its causes, the effects of this realization are plain. We must all recognize that the "reality" imparted to us is not accurate, impartial, or even necessarily true. Our mediated reality must be seen as an agreed upon and accepted collective fantasy. Since we have no other information upon which to base our judgments, we must rest content with the wonderful semi-fictions provided for us by the news media.

China's decision to invade Vietnam was precipitated by Vietnam's expansionist drive into Cambodia. In the past two years, Vietnam has shown a desire to become a regional power, dominating its neighbors Cambodia and Laos. The Khmer Rouge, in pursuit of its own brand of radical isolationism, resisted all attempts at overlordism.

The Vietnamese invasion, which may have been "suggested" by Soviet advisers, alarmed China. Vietnam had been stepping up its persecution of ethnic Chinese living in northern Vietnam. The Chinese forecasted the development of a hostile group of nations along its southern flank. Peking's fears echoed the dying words of Otto von Bismarck: encirclement. China is in the position of being surrounded by nations friendly towards its most hated enemy, the USSR.

The Chinese decision to invade Vietnam was designed primarily to alleviate the pressure on Cambodia, where a large scale guerilla war is being fought, and to impress upon the Vietnamese the evils of imperialism. The timing of the invasion, coming as it does on the heels of Teng's United States visit, tends further to alienate the Russians. Moscow fears of a Sino-American anti-Soviet alliance cannot help but be exacerbated by the recent turn of events.

All parties involved, and probably many who are not, are scared. Russia will most likely invade China, as a show of its own might. China, it now seems, will remain in Vietnam until it can inflict enough damage to dissuade, or at least postpone, Vietnam's imperialist policies. Meanwhile, the United States is being forced to walk a tightrope. It must be careful not to alienate any of the parties involved. Advocacy of restraint and disengagement coming from a position of neutrality seems to be the logical policy.

It is impossible to say what will develop in Southeast Asia. The roots of the present conflict can, however, be traced to Soviet hegemonism—witness the control it exerts in Hanoi—and Vietnamese expansionism. The Chinese reacted out of fear, either justified or imagined. Only if these forces can be checked can stability be returned to the region.

CC and the ACEC

by Chuck Hirsch '80

I'll bet many of you, upon reading this week's issue of The Record, are puzzled. Last week you read that the College Council cut off all funds to the All College Entertainment Committee (ACEC) for signing a Winter Carnival band without following the Council's strict guidelines for contracting groups and spending Student Activity Tax (SAT) money. In that same issue, the Record's editors called for the immediate removal of the Co-chairmen of the ACEC for "deliberate mismanagement" of these SAT monies. This week you read that the ACEC was allocated an extra $12,500 by the CC for another concert this spring to be organized again by this group's controversial co-chairmen. WHAT'S GOING ON???

First some background. Our SAT money, over $100,000's worth, is distributed by the College Council at the beginning of each school year. Student groups and individuals are eligible for funding, contingent upon certain procedures they must agree to follow in their budgeting and spending practices. The Finance Committee of the College Council has gone to great lengths this year to devise a system by which it can oversee the way all SAT money is spent. A complex "voucher" system coupled with the assignment of Fin Comm "monitors" to all student groups form the basis for this complicated checking procedure.

This year, ACEC was allocated $11,800 by the Council, over 10 per cent of the total SAT. When that much money is being handled, the leaders of the group must accept certain responsibilities. At the start of each school year, student group leaders are made painstakingly aware of the aforementioned FinCom procedures. On top of this, the CC Executive Committee (President, Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer) this year met with one of the Chairmen of the ACEC and made sure that these procedures were crystal clear—or so they thought.

Almost three weeks ago, however, ACEC contracted the band Albatross for Winter Carnival weekend without consulting any member of the FinCom or the College Council. The Council was informed of this at our Feb. 14th meeting and at that time voted 13-3 to cut off all future funds to ACEC pending discussion with the ACEC Chairmen at the Feb. 21st meeting of the Council.

At the Feb. 21st meeting the Council wanted to find out the reasons behind such gross negligence of student money. ACEC simply stated that they had been operating under a "misinterpretation" of the funding rules. They were under the impression, suddenly, that once the money had been allocated, it was THEIR money to do with as they pleased. As long as they did not overextend themselves beyond their $11,800 total, ACEC believed that they could do whatever they wanted to do. As Albatross was within their budget, why should they be held responsible to the Council?

The answer to this was simple. The money was NEVER theirs to spend as they wished. They are a committee of the CC using SAT money, and have no right to spend that money without first consulting the College Council or the Finance Committee of the Council.

Before ACEC had spoken that night, the Council had passed a proposal to create a Student Activities Board which would co-ordinate campus events such as lectures, parties, concerts, etc. The new SAB called for the replacement of the present ACEC structure with a college Concert Board.

No more problems then, right? Wrong.

The word "gall" doesn't seem quite harsh enough. The Chairmen of ACEC then had the utter AUDACITY to stand before the council, after giving what seemed to be a perfectly unacceptable excuse for mismanaging funds, and request $12,500 for a spring concert. In light of the dissolution of ACEC, the chairmen themselves were kind enough to volunteer their organizational services for this concert. WHAT? ACEC only had $4,000 in its own budget. CC's Buffer Fund could not cover a tremendous loss on this concert.

We were assured however, by the Co-Chairmen that they had a lead on a "hot" (that means sell-out capacity, e.g. Southside Johnny) band which had sold "millions" of albums.

At that point the meeting became ridiculous. ACEC, a committee of the council was before the council requesting more than ACEC and the council could afford together—and they refused to tell us the name of the band for which we were to take such a risk.

Council members were now trying to find out more of the details of the concert. It would be held in the Hockey rink and 2,000 people would be expected. The Chairmen expect close to 70 per cent of our own campus to turn out for this event. We voted that the Chairmen should tell us the name of the band so we could accurately judge the financial feasibility of this concert, and they still refused.

After reading all of this, you're probably all amazed that we did indeed vote to give the money to the Co-Chairmen. Why? The answer stems from the fact that we are a representative body. The majority of the College Council seemed to put monetary indiscretions aside to consider the real possibilities of a good Spring concert. As one member put it, "I feel like I should vote against this because what the two chairmen did was wrong, but I went to my house and they really wanted a concert. I've got to vote yes."

I voted against the concert and certainly hope the council will wise up in the future. Granted, we are "out in the Sticks", but we must realize that we CAN turn down a concert if we feel it is too much of a risk. As representatives we must exercise our better judgment at times, and this was certainly one of them.

The Record's editorial was straight to the point last week. The Co-chairmen should have been removed.

No one should ever take such liberties with student money again. I guess it had to happen once so that we'll all beware of its happening again in the future. In the meantime, ACEC and its Chairmen have nothing to cost. They "bite the dust" over spring break. Next year's student body, however, has a large sum of money to lose from this affair. Let's all hope that the concert lives up to its dramatically portrayed potential, so we can all learn our lesson this year without having to take it out on next year's student body.

Co-op housing: a threat to established houses

by Staff Editorial

Co-operative housing is a threat. It threatens to seduce away members of established residence houses. It threatens to bring pressure to bear for change in the Williams social scene. It threatens to usurp the inspiration for inventive living at Williams and to draw students out of the pampered dependency that cooks and matrons provide.

Nobody claims that co-op housing is close to carrying out any of these threats. If it continues as at present, it never will. Today co-op living is an "experiment," and like WOOLF and coed living for freshmen, it promises to stay that way: a peripheral element of campus life tightly controlled and limited in scope. Cumulatively these experiments may bring pressure on the Committee on Undergraduate Life to enact some substantive changes in the Williams lifestyle. But alone each faces administration stonewalling sufficient to quiet its advocates.

Meanwhile, this year's handling of co-op housing has raised questions about the ability of existing administrative bodies—notably the Housing Committee—to implement changes independently. Co-op was proposed by the College administration, and the Housing Committee has been slow to respond to growing demand for cooperative living.

The advance publicity for co-op and off-campus options over the past weeks illustrates this. The Housing Committee has presented what amounts to a list of demands to those seeking housing alternatives. It failed to explain either the purpose or the mechanics of co-op housing, and it failed to describe the application process beyond stating where applications are available and when the "mandatory meeting" for submitting them would take place.

Demand for co-op last year was high: more than twice as many applicants were turned down as accepted. Yet this year co-op remains in three Lambert and Lambert are good co-op houses, but they are neither the best nor the only ones. If demand remains high—and Housing Committee members expect that it will—the pressure to convert suitable small houses to co-op will be such that only a determined combination of Row House presidents will be able to resist expansion of the system next year.

The excuses put forward recently for not expanding the option are pathetically weak. The argument that converting houses for accessibility by the handicapped is not cost-effective is transparent but common, since only a handful of buildings on campus are accessible and Lambert and Goodrich are not. It can apply only to faculty houses.

The argument that the cost of equipping a kitchen is prohibitive sounds good but it falls down when confronted with the fact that the major appliances—stoves and refrigerators—are already present in houses like Woodbridge, Doughty and Susie Hopkins. The greatest outlay by Buildings and Grounds would be to equip these kitchens with cookware and small appliances. In most cases the cost of this will be more than offset by the matron fees that every co-op student pays but never receives services for.

Because of insufficient publicity there are many ambiguities in this year's application process. Last spring student complaints forced the Housing Committee to consider co-op applications before off-campus applications so that students determined to get out of the residential house system but willing to compromise with it would not be closed out by the applications process. The Housing Committee has developed a plan to streamline this by allowing students to apply for co-op and off-campus housing at the same time. But since both kinds of application need to be handed in at the same meeting, chances for students taking advantage of the double option look poor.

Another little-publicized but important feature of the co-op application process is the weighting factor. Under this factor each junior is worth only half a senior. Such weighting will tend to close juniors out of co-op housing and keep the option a privilege for disenchanted seniors. The idea that sophomores should get to know what they'll be missing by being exposed to residential house living is valid. But to close juniors out of coop will prevent the system from challenging the flaws in the residential house system and forcing changes.

That is where the threat of co-op living comes in. It is a challenge not to the strengths of the residential house system, but to its weaknesses. Co-op offers an alternative to students who are dissatisfied with the inability of house officers to answer demands for alternative social activities such as non-alcoholic parties and massive bashes. Despairing of ever changing the system, students who move into co-op housing are those who nevertheless do not reject the concept of a residential house system. In two years the house presidents have taught these students. Although the direction may be changing, imaginative social events are almost nonexistent. And rather than accommodate the pressure for change within houses or in the co-op system the members of the Housing Committee stonewall.

So long as the Housing Committee is composed of students dedicated to the status quo, innovation in housing will be extremely difficult. This is not a criticism of the presidents but rather a political fact. For example, Fort Hoosac House faces dissolution if either of its two small houses are taken away. No president wants to give away what are often the most desirable rooms in the house. Thus political pressure keeps the Housing Committee from expanding co-op.

Only after the house presidents face up to the hard decision that co-op housing demands and implement needed changes in the "experiment" can the option challenge the residential house system—to the benefit of College living all around.

Outlook

"A sense of the house as a home develops"

by John Young

Co-op housing is new at Williams this year. It has been run as an experiment, with seventeen students participating: seven in Lambert House, ten in Goodrich House. Compared with other on-campus students, co-op members take more responsibility for meeting their household needs. They shop for and cook their own food, wash dishes, and are required to keep their building clean.

Members of Goodrich House agree that co-op housing has provided many advantages over the usual dormitory system. Although each individual has his or her own impressions about co-op living, there is general agreement in several areas. We find that perhaps the most valuable aspect of co-op living is that cooperation, sharing in work as well as in play, brings people closer together.

Sharing household work requires a real commitment to co-op living; to contribute a fair share of effort, and to make a special attempt, where required, to get along with other members. A sense of the house as a home develops quickly. Some feel that manual chores are a healthy contrast to academic pressure. The opportunity to choose one's food and meal schedule more freely is seen as important. Finally, our living situation seems to be conducive to frequent discussions of 'academic' topics outside the context of courses, and of world, national and local issues.

The college has what is perhaps a valid interest in having diverse groups of students living together. Co-op housing brings diverse people closer together than in a dorm. While co-ops tend to concentrate people of the same chosen lifestyle, diversity of lifestyles is presumably not the same as diversity of people.

We have found that co-op living has led to a greater respect for and understanding of individual sensibilities than existed in our respective dorms. Too many times, the present housing system results in strong pressure to conform to the norm of the house or in alienation from that norm; co-op living has nurtured individuality. We believe that expansion of co-op living would increase overall campus diversity.

We would like some substantiation of Mr. Jankey's statements concerning co-op housing, as related in the last Record. In particular, he should explain what is costly about conversion to co-op housing, and to what houses alterations would be necessary. Also, his remark that co-op living has "not been a happy situation for all people" needs explanation or withdrawal.

The physical requirements for a cooperative house are mostly the same as for a dormitory. A house accommodating seven to ten people seems to work best. Adequate kitchen facilities are essential.

Williams owns a number of buildings that could be suitable co-op houses. Some are used now as regular student housing, some are faculty housing, which has moderate turnover. There are many options available.

The Committee on Undergraduate Life has approved the continuation of co-op housing next year. Last year, there were over fifty applicants for co-op. Nearly forty were turned down. We urge interested students to press for expansion to accommodate more students preferring this option.

There seems to be a large demand for cooperative housing next year. We urge at least doubling the number of co-op houses to four. Students should decide how much housing will be used for co-ops. We hope interested students will press for their goals.

John Young '79 is a member of the Goodrich co-op group. He is a veteran of co-op housing, and the problems and benefits that it confers on participants. He wrote this article co-operatively with other members of his house.

on Tucker's comment

Todd Tucker's critique of the Ad Hoc Working Group on the Curriculum's preliminary report (Record, February 13) touches a host of interesting and important questions. Among the most basic questions are those broached by his thoughts on the role of student freedom in the general education experience.

To begin with, when considering this issue I think it is important to keep in mind the scale of the proposed requirements. As they stand now, the recommendations of the Ad Hoc Group would not entail an overwhelming infringement of student freedom. The current Williams curriculum offers the student virtually uninhibited rein to plan her or his non-major program; (only the division three requirement seems to force large numbers of people to elect courses that they would not otherwise take.) Into this basically unstructured context, the committee is proposing the insertion of three required courses. One of these, the upper level "science and human values" offering, the student would select from a range of designated options spanning the three divisions, retaining thereby a kind of freedom within compulsion. The addition of a language requirement, especially of the two semester "exposure" variety would of course significantly exacerbate this burden. But even five required courses for general education (out of a total of thirty-six selections during a Williams education) is only a striking figure because of its contrast with the nearly free elective system currently in operation.

A second point to be kept in mind when considering the severity of the proposed requirements concerns their timing. As I see it, the restrictions imposed by what the committee has recommended would be most felt precisely when student freedom seems to have least meaning. The point of our proposal; the two semester great works course, is planned for a stage in students' careers when freedom is used largely to experiment among unfamiliar subjects. In my experience, such a process involves a considerable degree of arbitrariness, and I wonder in light of that how much would be lost if the college were to organize and coordinate student exploration of new subjects for one-fourth of the freshman year. (Indeed, it can be argued that the loss of student freedom entailed by a great works course would frequently be compensated during the upperclass years by a heightened ability to exercise one's remaining freedom in an informed fashion. The committee conceives its proposed freshman course (at least partially) as a series of suggestions for students, glimpses at materials drawn from a variety of historical, cultural and disciplinary contexts. We hope that that kind of exposure will open up paths fruitfully to be explored with one's non-major electives which might go completely untested under the current system of more initial freedom.

This conception of the way requirements could function (to inject a greater coherence and variety into the general education experience) suggests my basic disagreement with Mr. Tucker. His complaint, after all, is less with the severity or timing of requirements than the idea of requiring courses in itself. Mr. Tucker seems to think that freedom to choose courses encourages a healthy pluralism of student educational experience. He criticizes the committee's proposals accordingly, noting in particular that the great works course, as a uniform requirement, would be a step in the direction of "standardization and conformity." But the committee has recommended the great works course specifically to combat a narrowing and provincial brand of standardization and conformity. We feel that, especially as practical economic concerns come increasingly to inform student course choices, the college must take steps to ensure a minimal diversity within each student's educational program. Unfettered course selection can so easily leave out of account the kind of unfamiliar subjects that would most challenge the assumptions underlying one's value judgements. That, I strike me, is the real danger. Our great works requirement would guarantee that every student confronts perspectives which are not modern, not western and not male. It will no doubt appear too little to some critics, inviting accusations of tokenism and "cocktail party" superficiality. But I would stress again the nature of the course as a suggestive introduction, one which should inspire many students later in their careers to explore aspects of its diversity in greater detail. Requirements can be liberating, and it is in a spirit of liberation, I think, that our proposals are intended.

Prevot foresees "sacrifices"

Roger Prevot '80, chairman of the Housing Committee admitted "that necessarily some sacrifices will have to be made" by residential houses if pressure from students and the Committee on Undergraduate Life continues for expanding the cooperative housing system at Williams.

The houses used for co-op next year, Lambert and Goodrich, will be the same as those used this year, Prevot said, because the Housing Committee was unable to convince Buildings and Grounds to pay to convert faculty housing for the accessibility by the handicapped, as required by new federal law. The committee also "was unable to find housing that satisfied the demands of co-op housing without damaging the residential house system," Prevot said.

If demand for buildings for co-op housing remains high, Prevot said, then the Housing Committee may be forced either to bring pressure on Buildings and Grounds or to take a house from one of the residential units. The committee chairman named Susie Hopkins, Woodbridge or another Dodd House annex as potential co-op houses.

Prevot defended the Housing Committee's decision to run co-op and off-campus applications together. While he admitted that allowing students to apply for co-op and off-campus worked well last year, he claimed that running the two separately "slowed down the whole inclusion process." This year students will have the option of applying for both types of alternative housing, and co-op applications will be run first. Those who succeed in the co-op selection will be dropped from the off-campus pool.

Prevot also described the weighting procedure for co-op and off-campus applications. Under the process, each application will be assigned a random rating. Those with low numbers will receive first priority in selection. At the same time, juniors will be given only half the weight of seniors. The two factors of random ratings and class weightings will determine which groups are chosen for co-op options.

The Housing Committee feels that "seniors should have the experience" of co-op living, and that the class weighting system is justified by the limited number of spaces available in co-op houses, according to Prevot. He argued that weightings will not close juniors out of co-op housing.

The housing chairman criticized a report by the CUL on co-op housing for lack of thoroughness. While the CUL praised the co-op system, Prevot said, it did little more, merely suggesting that the Housing Committee keep both the Lambert-style, large group option and the option combining small groups for cooperation in Goodrich houses.

Greylock's landscaped quad is a "self-contained environment."

AFS students see college life

You may have noticed an increase in the amount of Spanish, German, and even Norwegian being spoken on campus, as twenty-eight foreign students descended on the college, from countries ranging from Denmark to Australia, and from South Africa to Japan.

The American Field Service began as an ambulance corps during the World War, and has since gone on to become an exchange program. In the past three decades, it has sent thousands of high school age students to live in different countries, in the belief that only through individuals can international understanding be built. Those who came to the college have been living as part of American families and attending high school in the Albany area.

The weekend gave them the opportunity to get together and to see what American colleges are really like. Over the weekend they saw all aspects of college life—dorms, parties, sports events, and yes, even a few classes. They stayed with college students, many, although not all of whom had been AFS students themselves.

The students get together occasionally, but it was the first time that many of them had been to a college. Because of the relative difficulty of most foreign school systems (a girl from England said, "Your first year of college is like our last two years of high school"), most of the exchange students are older than high school students here, and they enjoyed the chance to be with people their own age.

Wednesday evening began with an exciting introduction to Baxter food, which they all compared favorably to the meals at their high schools. After dinner they got together for a party and then went to the Log. They enjoyed the atmosphere, which was quite different from what they expected. "It was not what I thought of as a bar," one student said, "but it was very nice." The next morning, although they were given the option of attending classes, most of the students slept in. As one boy said, "We get to see more than enough American classes at school."

Saturday afternoon provided an excellent chance to see the town, although students who have been staying in Albany and Schenectady found it hard to believe that they were, indeed, seeing the whole town. There was a run on $8.00 jeans at the Co-op. American styles of dress are one thing they have all picked up very quickly.

Students attended the track meet and the wrestling match. One South American girl, seeing wrestling for the first time, said diplomatically, "It's very interesting, but I don't understand at all." One of the most popular activities was ice skating. It was the first time for many of them, but despite a few bruises, the general concensus was that it was worth it.

The parties that night began with something different—a talent show, in which everyone participated, and which included a Colombian dance and a Greek belly dance, as well as many skits.

By Sunday morning everyone was exhausted, but they had all had a good time. They commented that American college is very different from the universities in their own countries, where liberal arts usually don't exist. When asked about their feelings about America and their stay here, they answered positively, although there were some complaints about the lack of public transportation and the cold.

Greylock offers attractive features

by John Rindlaub

Upperclass housing options at Williams range from the distant row houses to congested Mission Park. While still not utopian, the Greylock Quad combines many conveniences of other housing alternatives into one of the most attractive packages.

Unsurpassed in rational design and elegance, the red-brick and grey-concrete Bryant, Hopkins, Carter, and Gladden Houses are welcome sights to book-weary students. The landscaped quad of trees, bushes and grassy areas seems a self-contained environment reminiscent of the Freshman Quad. It is ideal for buffoonery of all kinds; in the spring it is transformed into a sea of frisbees, balls, dogs, and students. Step out into the North field and there is a private driving range, or in winter, a cross-country ski area.

Greylock succeeds in creating luxurious, modern surroundings. The spacious dining hall with its high ceilings is furnished with wooden tables and chairs on wooden and slate floors, contrasting with the claustophobic sterility of Mission Park's cafeteria. Because it is separated from the houses, you won't have to deal with the smell of Friday's tuna bumstead lingering in your room Sunday morning.

Each Greylock house has from 60 to 120 members on its four, five or six floors. The houses are self-sufficient units, complete with laundry room, T.V. room, basement for ping-pong, fussball, and parties, a large living room with fireplace and piano, and a kitchenette for late night culinary [illegible]

The room and suite arrangements are initially confusing; visitors have been known to have trouble finding their friend's residence. Applicants are guaranteed a single upon acceptance; depending on the number of roommates desired, suites consist of a double (2 singles) with an adjoining living room, or four singles with a larger living room. These suites of four vary considerably in shape within and among the houses. For juniors and seniors, larger singles are available.

The regular singles are not overly capacious, but they have a feeling of Scandinavian logic in design and function that is absent in Mission Park. Rectangular, with walls of brick and white plasterboard, they look great with hanging plants and dark cork bulletin boards. And the egg carton ceilings will send decorative imaginations running wild. The high, wide bay windows of each room and living room offer panoramic views of the mountains and an ideal lookout on the quad.

There is a degree of house unity, encouraged by their physical separation, that creates a unique [illegible] area in each house. The suites all have adjoining living rooms and hallways, allowing for casual social activity when the dividing doors are open. Doors may be closed, and the sound proofing between suites is enough to shield all but the loudest [illegible]

Similarly, each house has its own separate dining area (the Carter and Gladden House sections are not distinct), reducing noise and a feeling of being one in a mass of millions.

While the dining is undeniably cafeteria-style, Greylock's salad bar has improved. Food is always served with a smile and guest meals, complete with white tablecloth and candlelight, are especially elegant. Unlike the row houses, diversity in seating is an option at each meal. The dining arrangement creates a more Baxter-like community, achieving house identity without house isolation.

Not the least of Greylock's advantages is its location. Baxter, Weston, and Bronfman are all within easy walking distance. Most convenient of all is the proximity of the Williams Inn where Greylockers often congregate for a swim, sauna, or drink. Nearby Greylock parking means no more 10-minute walks to the car to avoid a fifteen minute walk to Spring Street. The AMT is right next door, and the Clark Art Institute just down the road.

Setear's Notes

by John K. Setear; Whip Inflaters Now

Pusillanimous.

That is the only way to characterize the current administration's behavior on this easily-resolveable "issue" of grade inflation. The caitiff calculations on the part of those insipid incompetents who purloin their pay by "encouraging meaningful, relevant dialogue" have obviously led them to conclude in a cowardly fashion that no creative (if mildly conflagrative) solution will be adopted to remedy instantly the situation.

They are not angels, these craven miscreants who refuse to face the harsh reality of the tin-towered world which lurks outside the confines of Berkshire County, so I shall rush in where these poltroonish purveyors of intellectual polychlorinated biphenyls fear to tread without fear of being labelled "fool." Or at least of being newly labelled as such.

To wit, ergo, viz., and any other Greek Gods of Humor, I dedicate a seven-point program to immediately make grade inflation a non-issue. (I have chosen this number of points in order that Woodrow Wilson's dismally ineffective proclamation of peace proposals shall not have its place in history books usurped by my humble suggestions.) There are, of course those who will attempt to vilify my verbalizations with sycophantic suggestions that less drastic measures—they will surely somewhere mutter the word "Draconian," it being a sufficiently frequently-used yet etymologically-obscure phrase as to strike fear into the hearts of the public—be employed instead. They are of course wrong.

We have had enough of the petulant peevishness of intolerably isolated incompetents. We are dealing here with the real world, and even Jimmy Carter has given up on human rights as a viable concept.

Point 1: Rather than the ridiculously ineffective proposal of some sort of mamby-pamby "Great Works" course, make Organic Chemistry and Econometrics the required Freshman courses.

POINT 2: Give every newly-hired professor tenure. This will allow these purveyors of prolific profundity to dispense dismal grades without fear that the Student Evaluations will torpedo their now-tenuous try for tenure.

POINT 3: Enact mandatory Internationally Needed Summer Internship Programs for Intelligent Dilettantes (Insipid) for the top 10 per cent of the class, in order that they may spend their summers in such countries as Iran, Cambodia, and Albania, places which obviously require the technocratic talents of our best and brightest. (Note: I am indebted for the kernel of this thought to Mr. Todd Tucker, who originally suggested that such a program might be enacted for certain students accepted simultaneously at Harvard and Stanford Business Schools.)

POINT 4: Change Winter Study from "Pass-Fail" to "Fail-Fail" Miserably."

POINT 5: Disband the Psychology and American Civilization departments.

POINT 6: Make all rooms mandatorily co-ed; have the College sponsor Road Trips to Smith, Dartmouth, Mt. Holyoke, and Yale; and not only stop putting saltpeter in the tea, but claim that all the cold water used in the washing machines prohibits providing same for use in [illegible]

POINT 7: As the title suggests, I recommend public punishment in the form of freely-dispensed flagellation and flogging for those who make the Dean's List. The Deans themselves will have the honor of beatifying those who bring bathos to aforesaid List, thus leaving the Trustees have a clear conscience with respect not only to their actions concerning College stock but to the salaries dispensed to the Deans.

Well, there it is. Okay, C.E.P. and C.A.S., and C.E.S. and all the rest of you New Deal-type administrative facades for fashionable tops of brownbagging boors bent on graduate school, it's time to get tough. I know you can do it.

Lots for it.

Regional Report

AMHERST, MASS.—Women at Amherst voiced these major concerns at a meeting last week: (1) "the need for more women in all areas of the college, (2) the problems generated by all-male fraternities, (3) male-female interactions at Amherst."

Many women complained about the difficulty of becoming good friends with a man without an implied sexual involvement. "Fraternity parties accentuate this problem because the assumption is that if a woman is at a fraternity tap, she is looking for a boyfriend and-or sex," reported the Students.

The controversy as to whether the Third World Coalition will gain full editorial control over a page in the STUDENT continues. STUDENT editors and Third World representatives agreed to issue a joint communique and participate in a panel discussion. Concerned with the implications of this issue, President John Ward led an all-college meeting on February 13 to discuss the racial climate at Amherst.

President Ward is considering a proposal by the College Council that would establish a Resident Counselor Program in all dorms. This Program would replace the Resident Advisor Program now existing in freshman and mixed dorms.

The Council's decision was based on their feeling that the peer counseling program "could be visibly available to students seeking help but unable to turn to friends or unwilling to seek professional assistance." A STUDENT editorial urged Ward to approve the plan.

BRUNSWICK, ME.—Several students demanded a constitutional monarchy to replace the present student government at Bowdoin.

"Under the monarchical system the inefficiencies which have plagued the Board will be alleviated. The monarch will be able to deal with the needs of the student body more effectively," said Peter Steinbrueck '79 in his petition to the Executive Board.

The Executive Board decided to delay action on the proposal for a week.

"Being a Bowdoin student should not confer a grant of immunity from responsibility for one's criminal acts," Cumberland County district attorney Henry Berry told the PORTLAND PRESS HERALD last week. Berry criticized the College for its policy on stolen goods.

The issue came to light after a Security raid into several fraternities during Christmas vacation. Student complaints prompted investigation into Security action. Among one of the findings was the policy "which reportedly allows students found with stolen goods in their room to escape the consequences that a high school dropout might face in a similar situation."

The College denied that it ignores Maine laws, but agreed to meet with Berry to discuss the issue.

MIDDLETOWN, CT.—The administration and the Wesleyan Student Assembly are discussing the possibility of increasing students' role in the tenure process.

At present, students fill a purely advisory position in tenure decisions. Many suggest that student input could be upgraded through the use of the student departmental major committees.

Bounced checks, amounting to $500 last semester, has caused the local Drugstore in Middletown to no longer accept checks. The Pharmacist said "It seems to be part of a general trend toward irresponsibility on the part of the student body."

NEW HAVEN, CONN.—"Money problems are concretely damaging the quality of education at Yale," according to a February 12 editorial in the NEWS.

The University has allocated meager funds to maintain buildings. Already, several repairs are long overdue.

No capital improvements in the budget will take place next year.

The Chemistry Department faces several problems. Due to cutbacks, Yale decided to close the Sterling Library, despite many student complaints. Last year, plans for a $400,000 chemistry lab renovation were abandoned

Selfishness major library problem

Sawyer Library has a chronic problem—the disappearance of books. According to College Librarian Lawrence E. Wikander it's a problem common to almost all college libraries and which so far has defied solution.

He characterizes the problem as the selfishness of students in hoarding what should be a common resource. Missing books are either stolen or "removed for the convenience of a reader," and Wikander says the latter problem is far more serious. Some students are simply thoughtless he says. They carelessly reshelve a book in the wrong place, or leave without checking it out, perhaps rationalizing that they'll only have the book overnight. Wikander says others are devious—knowingly shelving a book incorrectly (especially reference books or bound periodicals) so only they can retrieve it. Statistics seem to prove that it's done on purpose. The incidence is much higher just before papers are due.

Book sharing is legal but unfair

Some students seem not to realize that their activity is unethical. Wikander says it's not unusual for a group of four or six to arrange to share a book, each one checking it out in turn. Although they haven't broken any rules, they have prevented others from using the material.

Certain kinds of books, particularly those used in art, history and political science classes, seem to disappear more readily than others. According to Wikander, faculty members often plead with students to share the material, and instructors have been known to disallow citation of certain books in papers when students in the class report that the books are missing.

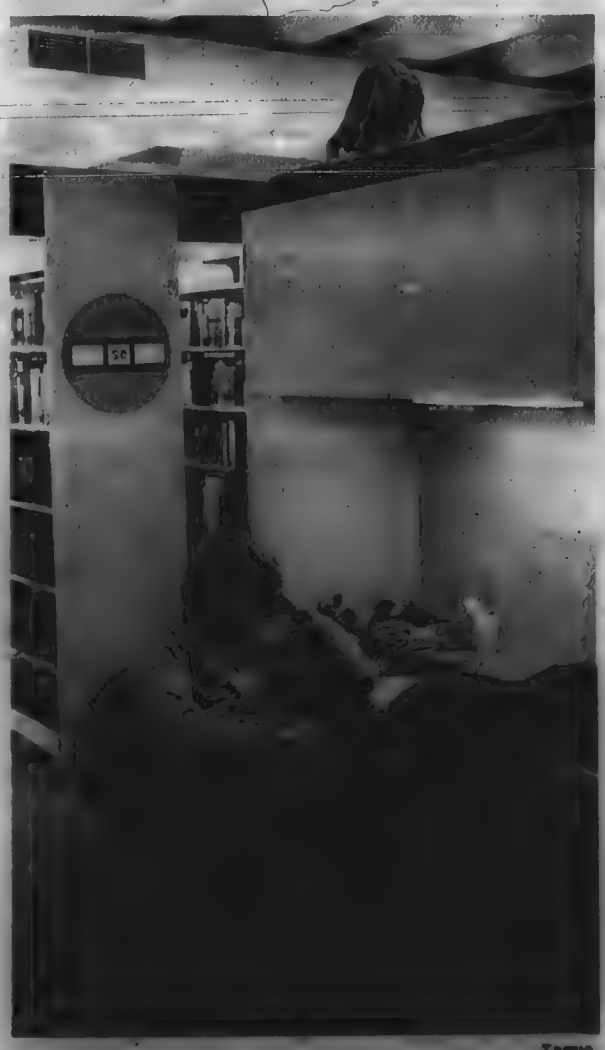
Wikander says he prefers to deal with the problem as a question of morals and ethics. He says barriers to prevent theft or disappearance only create an adversary relationship between students and the library. Besides, says Wikander, they don't work.

Mechanical monitors create new problems

Electronic devices can usually be deactivated, or they break down. And Wikander says they would only solve the problem of books being taken from the library. Electronic bugs can also encourage mutilation. A student who knows a bug is planted somewhere in the book may just tear out the pages he needs, leaving the device to guard the shattered remains.

Wikander points out that one aspect of the library's design may contribute to the situation. Since the state rates the building as a "schoolhouse" which must provide exits for 2500 "children" in three minutes, there are a lot of doors—too many for monitoring.

The outside door of the reserve room will soon be modified with an alarm so patrons will, unless there's an emergency, leave by the main door. That will mean passing by the check-out desk. Wikander feels that the psychology of having to pass by the main desk may persuade students to take the extra minute or so to check out their books.



In 1976, fines were increased in the reserve room (the only department which charges fines), and in 1977 the grace period for free return was eliminated. "The books still are not returned," says Wikander in his latest annual report. "We know who has the books, and we tell the instructor, but the books come back when the student is good and ready—when he no longer needs the book and his classmates have been deprived of it. Certainly we charge fines; they are not paid. We send the charges to the Business Office to be placed on bills, but parents accept calmly charges of $50-$140 for library fines.

"Library routines assume that readers who remove a book from its proper place will, through the circulation desk, notify their fellow readers," says Wikander. "Students must recognize that they're sharing a resource. The more unselfishly they share it, the more it will be available for everyone."

Tague

In good weather Sawyer Library offers outdoor study space.

Tague

More than 400 students use Sawyer's facilities daily. Some choose those double-decker carrels.

Sawyer "works beautifully"

Sawyer Library, which is almost four years old now, "works beautifully," says College Librarian Lawrence E. Wikander.

The library is noted for its variety of innovative study spaces, ranging from traditional desks and chairs to unusual double-decker carrels. With working capacity of 500,000 volumes, library facilities at Williams have come a long way since 1846 when President Mark Hopkins said the library—which was then in Lawrence Hall and held 35,000 volumes—"will hold all the books the Institution will ever be likely to want."

While most activity centers around the main library building, there are several satellite libraries for students and faculty with specific interests. Books on chemistry, biology and geology can be found in their respective buildings. Many psychology and mathematics materials are shelved in the Bronfman Science Center. Both the Center for Development Economics and the Center for Environmental Studies maintain small libraries. But all the books in the satellite libraries are catalogued in Sawyer, so a comprehensive look at what's available throughout the campus is in one place.

According to Wikander, Sawyer was designed to meet some of the problems students saw with the old Stetson Library, "the forbidding quality of large reading rooms" and the noise that went with stone floors and the nearby faculty offices. "These are no longer problems," he says. "We still have noise, but now it's student-generated."

Library is social hub of campus

Lawrence E. Wikander, college librarian, says the major problem at Sawyer Library is caused by students who, for one reason or another, make materials unavailable to others. The techniques vary from outright theft to just misshelving a book so others can't find it. Sophomore Janet Diehl has also found many students use the library for its social benefits.

By Janet Diehl '81

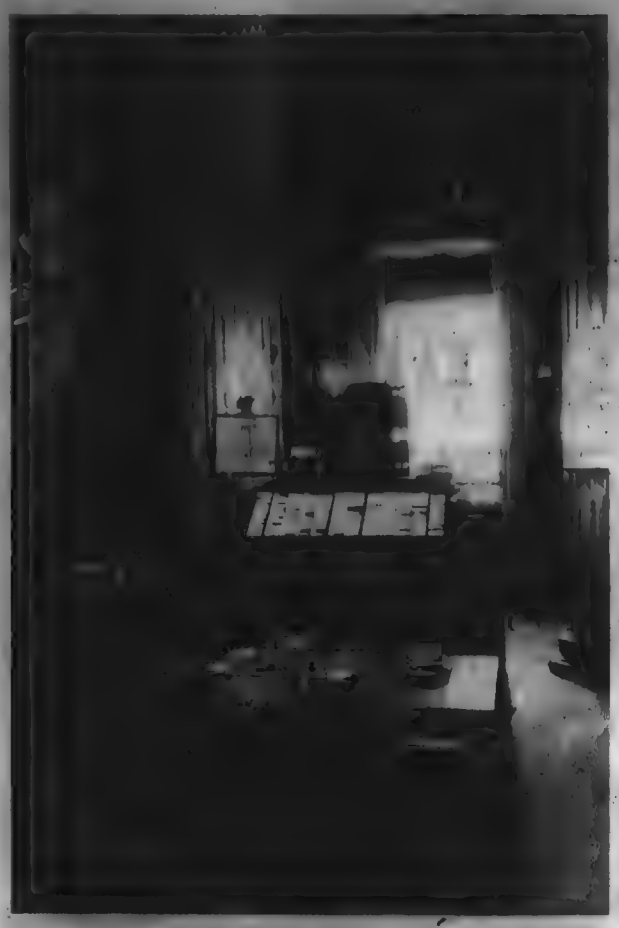
Williams freshmen quickly learn that "the social scene" here is the library.

"It's true," said one sophomore. "All you used to do freshman fall was go to the library—'the libes'—and go down to the reserve room or up to the third floor and walk around and talk for three hours. Everyone else was doing it—you felt like a social outcast if you sat there and studied."

Even now, although the glamour of the library has worn off after one set of exams and freshmen have found other places to meet people, a common student description of Sawyer library is "social."

It's an aspect, of course, that has its good and bad points. Relief from boredom and companionship during painful late nights of paper-writing are attractions most of the semester. But during exam period, most students agree, socializing in the library can make it difficult to study there.

This seems to be the major student complaint about Sawyer, overshadowing in many students' eyes concerns that students take books without checking them out. "I don't think that taking books is much of a problem," said one senior. "I do it, but I always bring them back. It's just such a pain to check them out—well, I guess it's as easy as they could make it, but it's easier just to take them."



Another sophomore said she takes books and magazines out only when she has to, "which means the night before a paper's due." She explained: "I had to write a 10-page research paper one night and all I had read was one book. I needed more sources and the upstairs part of the library was closing so I just stuck two volumes of Newsweek in my pack, went back to my room, wrote the paper all night and put the magazines back on the shelf the next morning after I handed the paper in.

"Of course, if you're smart and don't put it all off 'til the last minute, you don't have to do that," she added. "But I'm not smart."

"I don't feel like I'm stealing when I take books like that," she continued. "When you've got a paper due the next day, the moral implication of putting a book in your pack and walking out the door is the last thing on your mind."

This issue is of even less concern to the many students who don't use library resources, but do their own work there because it's a better study environment than their rooms. Their only real complaint is noise.

Several students said that they use the smaller libraries—chemistry, physics, Bronfman—for "serious studying," and Sawyer when they can afford to relax a bit. "I still like Sawyer a lot, but it'll never be like freshman year again," said one sophomore woman. "I remember the girl who lived next to me freshman year was in despair because the guy she had a crush on studied in his room, not in Sawyer. She'd say, 'How can I ever get to talk to him if he doesn't go to the library!'"

Innovative in its time, Lawrence Library was a far cry from Sawyer's modern interior.

Williamstown's public library serves other parts of community

The Williamstown Public Library may not be anywhere near the size of the Sawyer Library, but over the past 105 years it has established a solid role in the community.

With its $44,000 per year budget (including $2,000 from the dog tax!), the public library serves townspeople and college students alike. According to Annette R. Jenks, who has been librarian for 20 years, her modest budget goes a lot further by not trying to duplicate services available at Sawyer Library.

"We don't buy half the reference books we would otherwise," says Mrs. Jenks. "We concentrate on current material, such as best-sellers, that would be appropriate for a community of this type. Since the book budget is only $8,000—and that covers periodicals, paperbacks and audio-visual materials—we have to be very selective."

Established in 1874, where Phillips General Store on Water Street is now, the town library moved to its Main Street location in 1940. The structure dates back to 1815 when it was built as a private home.

The town library reaches out to the community through a branch located in the White Oaks section of Williamstown. It's not elaborate—occupying the front porch of the branch librarian. But it offers easy access to reading material for people who live some distance from the main library. And so things don't get stale, the local library has the services of the Western Regional Library System's bookmobile, which Mrs. Jenks says is like having an extra room for the library.

A special group of readers served by the public library is children. In 1974 a new reading room was added for them and youngsters can be found on both sides of the children's checkout desk. About 18 sixth-graders help staff the room, checking books in and out as well as decorating the room for special occasions. "We think it's important that children feel comfortable in a library and we try to encourage that feeling," says Mrs. Jenks.

Clark Art's library vast public resource

Most people think of Renoirs when they think of the Clark Art Institute. But, in fact, there are more books than paintings at the Clark.

In the mid 1950s when Robert Sterling Clark and his wife Francine planned the building that now houses their collection they stated their desire "to provide ... facilities for study and research in the fine arts." Although the library was not part of the original building, it was included in plans for expansion of the Institute's programs in the mid-sixties.

Two major purchases, the library of Dutch art historian W. R. Juynboll and that of the art dealers the Duveen Brothers, as well as Mr. Clark's own library, form the nucleus of the collection. The emphasis is on post-medieval European sculpture, painting and drawing. The Clark concentrates on its specialties, taking steps to avoid duplication of the Williams collection. "We check carefully," says Marie Wikander, assistant librarian. "Most duplicates are those that both libraries really need."

The books are shelved on open stacks and, because some of them are very valuable, security is tight. Readers are asked to sign in and out at the door. But, says Librarian Michael Rinehart, "the slightly forbidding aspect of the building and the apparently complicated entrance procedures shouldn't put any one off. The books are here to be read, and the staff is here to help." The library is open weekdays from 9:00 to 5:00.

The Williams College-Clark Art Institute Graduate Program in the History of Art began in 1972 as a joint venture of the two institutions. The library at the Clark is an integral part of that program. The relationship with the College is both formal and personal. The library is funded by the Institute, the graduate program by the College. The director of the graduate program has offices at both institutions. The two Boards of Trustees have overlapping members.

And the two library staffs are in constant communication. Cards for the art holdings of Sawyer Library are included in the Clark's files. The staffs confer before making purchases. As Mrs. Wikander, wife of College Librarian Larry Wikander, notes, "There's a very direct working relationship between the two libraries. Often the front seat of our car serves as transfer point for books from one library to the other."

Williamsiana preserves past

By Martha Riley Johnson
Library Assistant, Williamsiana

A person curious about Williams College history should turn immediately to the Williamsiana collection. But not many people do.

Hardly a new development, the collection existed prior to 1911 when "Williamsiana," a bibliography of Williams College, was issued by the college librarian. The collection was begun by such persons as Fisher Howe, Williams 1872, who feared that original sources dealing with Williams would disappear and started collecting items like broadside catalogues, 1795-1820, and Commencement programs, 1795-1846, at his own expense.

With the appearance of "Williamsiana," other alumni, officers and friends of the college realized that without documents the page of history can be quite blank. They began scrutinizing dusty storerooms, rummaging through attics, and even frequenting auctions and booksellers.

College records which survive from the first hundred years of the college are relatively few but significant; among them are the Trustees' minutes from 1785, treasurer's records back to the founding, faculty minutes from the 1820's and Society of Alumni (the first in the nation) minutes from their beginnings in 1821. Fleshing out this spare skeleton of fact from the early days are the records of student organizations, manuscript collections, photographs and printed matter relating to the college which has been gathered and donated by alumni and friends.

The Williamsiana collection occupies a suite of rooms on the first floor west wing of Stetson Hall. The reading room is open weekdays and materials are non-circulating as is the case in most archives. Nearby are stack storage areas, a new manuscript vault, and a workroom, all protected with fire and security systems.

This is not a dusty corner of the college but a place of study for students, faculty, alumni and visiting scholars. More than 100 letters a year arrive from family and researchers concerning famous and not-so-famous Williams people.

Today's students are invited to not only check out the collection but to help expand it by donating articles, college letters, photographs, reunion books and professional papers in the coming years.

Chapin Library is treasury of original documents

By Marcus Smith

The Chapin Library of Rare Books, on the second floor of Stetson Hall, is among the most comprehensive collections of special volumes in the country. According to Custodian Robert L. Volz, Chapin ranks only behind the "big ones"—the Library of Congress, the New York Public Library, Harvard, Princeton, Yale, Indiana, Texas, and several private collections such as the Pierpont-Morgan, Huntington, and Newberry—in its number and range of rarities.

"We can show marvelous illuminated manuscripts or twentieth-century American literature. We can do it for England in the sixteenth century and England in the nineteenth," says Volz. "It's hard to find a library with so many rare books in so many fields."

The major areas include: Incunabula (books printed before 1501), English Literature, Americana, Bibles and liturgical books, the history of science, and graphic arts.

A catalogue lists the holdings, but a good deal of the pleasure to be derived from the deceptively compact Chapin Library comes from ferreting out, with the help of Volz and his staff, what interests you. Those with modern tastes can read an enthusiastic letter by T. S. Eliot regarding The Waste Land prior to its publication, or perhaps browse through the manuscripts of Williams alumnus Charles Webb's novel, The Graduate.

Any library has information about Washington crossing the Delaware. But only at Chapin can you uncover an order for the boats he used to cross the river.

People with interests in colonial America can also find a copy of the Constitution with George Mason's arguments for a bill of rights handwritten on the back. The Chapin also holds the first Bible printed in America, a first folio of the works of Shakespeare, and originals of the first two books printed in Oxford (1478 & 1479). The list goes on and on.

The library offers the opportunity to use, as source material, original, often ancient, documents. "It's a different feeling than just using a reprint or reference book," says Volz. "Students can better sense a connection between the old and the new. It's a trip back in time."

The monetary value of the library is staggering. Volz estimates that the 12,000 books given to Williams by Alfred Clark Chapin, class of 1869 and successful N.Y. attorney, are now worth over $15 million compared to Chapin's investment of $875,000. Chapin developed the collection between 1915 and 1929. The original books now represent only about half of the collection, as other alumni and friends have added to the Chapin Library over the last fifty years.

The library has attracted the scholarly and once, the greedy. In 1940 a twenty-dollar-a-week shoe salesman from Hudson Falls, N.Y., gained access to the Shakespeare first folio by introducing himself, through a bogus letter from the president of Middlebury College, as a professor doing research. He walked out of Chapin with the folio, a book worth approximately $50,000. When the book was recovered a few months later, with the help of the FBI, the greatest property crime in Williamstown up to that time had been solved.

Today the Chapin Library is still growing. "Since the construction of Sawyer Library, we have extra space," explains Volz. "Chapin collections had filled every available nook and cranny."

Volz is clearly proud of the fact that the Chapin Library is an active part of Williams, not just an impressive but little-used museum. Poet Ben Jonson once said, "Literature should both delight and teach." That's part of the opportunity offered by the Chapin collection.

Chapin's resources provide opportunities for original research.

Jokesters steal clothes, rooms, and chickens

On a sunny afternoon late in January, X walked innocently into a bathroom in Prospect House. His intent: to shower. He disrobed and stepped under the water.

Ten minutes later, tragedy struck.

Participants in the Record's First Annual Practical Joke Contest removed all of X's clothes, accessories and personal effects from the bathroom and locked his room. When X emerged from the shower, a quick inspection revealed an almost—but not quite—hopeless situation.

"Luckily, they left behind a hand towel," X told the Record. "Otherwise, I would have had to use shaving cream."

The jokesters, who themselves recorded the incident on film for posterity's sake, were one of seven groups who more or less submitted their anecdotes to the Record contest over January and February.

Another group in Prospect perpetrated one of the contest's first known jokes: A number of house members travelled to New York during the third week of January to see a Broadway show. One woman returned late that night to find her room—previously on the second floor—completely transplanted to the first floor, down to the memo board on her door. Where she had been before was now the sophomore who had lived below her. The experience, she said, was "mind-boggling."

Then there was the unidentified jokesters' Food Service menu, which replaced those of Ross Keller for the first week of February all over campus. The issue of the Record which carried a reproduction of the masterpiece didn't recognize it as a classic in the realm of the practical joke.

In the same issue in which it updated the results of the contest thus far, the Record also reported on two other jokes. An ad placed in a Sunday edition of the Boston Globe placed the "large rural estate" we know as Williams up for sale. At the same time, a spirited contingent of the women's swim team attempted to embarrass its male counterparts with a carefully rehearsed cheerleading routine (culminating in their spelling out "Ephmen" on their middle extremities) and peppy leopard-highlighted outfits. The men's team retaliated with an entry of its own.

Seven swimmers appeared just in time for the second half of the Williams-Smith-Holyoke tri-swimming meet at Smith dressed either as buxom women or in bathrobes with purple cones on their heads. They led some carefully rehearsed cheers of their own, much to the delight of the Smith women in attendance, who hadn't known what to think of Williams men until that time.

Another practical joke victim, once again from Prospect House (where peculiar people congregate, we guess . . .) was shocked one day to find that her rubber chicken had been chicknapped. She received a ransom note (see below) from the PLA—the Poultry Liberation Army—demanding that she perform several actions of good faith if she wishes to see her bird again. Tension mounted as the chicken denounced her former owner as a "chicken-exploiting capitalist" and joined ranks with its captors. The PLA finally returned the bird bound and gagged because "it talked too much." "We still don't know who did this horrible thing," the victims reportedly said.

The stimulus of a practical joke contest served not only to jog the humor and creativity of some students, but the memories of others who recalled jokes which they had at one time been involved in or victimized by:

To the editor:

I noticed in your January 9th issue that you are sponsoring "a Practical Jokes" contest and I can recall one that my roommates pulled on me Freshman Year in 1923.

We lived in Berkshire Hall—"Put" Livingston (now our Class President) and "Bill" Hastings (present whereabouts unknown). Put was an artist and dabbled in paints, etc. Bill was a gun buff and had several revolvers and rifles.

One evening in the Spring as the three of us were studying, Bill and Put got into an intense argument. Telling them that I couldn't study with all the loud talk going on, I left the room and went downstairs to the bathroom, leaving the door to the hall ajar. Coming back up the stairs, I could still hear Bill and Put in a heated and loud discussion (putting it mildly).

Bill yelled to Put, "If you come one step closer I'll shoot you!" Put yelled back to Bill, "You wouldn't dare—you yellow bellied —". With that, a gun went off and I rushed into the room where Put was lying on the floor clutching his chest, which was covered with red. I was scared to death that a murder had been committed, but what really happened—

After I had left the room, Bill and Put made up and decided to pull a stunt on me. Put ruined a good white shirt by dabbing red ink on the front to look like blood and Bill got a gun out and shot it out the open window. Needless to say I was taken in by the prank but subsequently recovered.

Very truly yours,
Charles C. Wise '78

In fact, rumor has it, the staff of the Record rather than publish its annual joke issue of the paper, brought out in April its own version of the Williams College Bulletin. The courses, course descriptions, history of the college and general statements of rules and regulations were completely faked. Amherst, it said, "was founded by a drunkard who had been kicked out of Williamstown and who went south to find a place where he wouldn't be hindered in the operation of his stills." Apparently there were those who signed up for their classes on the basis of this document, which is reportedly preserved either in Sawyer somewhere (somewhere far away, no doubt) or in Williamsiana.

Two juniors, Greg Roux and Byron Walker, who roomed together as freshmen, recounted the culmination of their own private practical joke war. "We moved rooms around and made sound effect tapes for appropriate situations," Roux said. "But the crowning joke occurred over spring vacation this year. I was in Florida at the time and Byron mailed every single thing home, including the sheets off the bed."

Jeff Erikson, '78, recalled a joke that two swimmers once pulled on coach emeritus Robert B. Muir when he was head of the Williams swimming program. "They went to a butcher and bought a goose, a plucked one, but one that still had the neck and head," Erikson recounted. "Then, when Coach Muir was called upon to start a meet for a high school team, they waited for the first gunshot and threw the thing into the water."

The winners and prizes will be announced next week.

Orlando Marcellus Fernald, former Secretary of the Faculty and Lawrence Professor of Greek Language and Literature, hasn't been seen much on the Williams campus since he retired in 1902 because of his death. Like many old-timers, however, he returned for Winter Carnival.

I spotted him in front of Fernald House, leaning on his Volkswagen Rabbit. I noticed that he looked distraught, but before inquiring into the cause, I politely mentioned that he was looking very chipper for his age (a spry 138).

I'll let the good professor tell the story. After all, anyone who was eulogized as "the most modest and self-abnegating of men" should have the opportunity to speak on his own behalf.

"I was standing here, son, admiring how well the school has maintained my house since my widow sold it back in '10. Of course, I was a wee bit surprised to walk up to the door and discover that an entire academic department had moved in. It war barely large enough for Mary and me and the kids. Well, if it had to be a department, it might as well be economics, and not some new-fangled discipline like psychology.

"But look what they've done to the grounds," he continued. "I had a beautiful backyard, with crocuses and hardly any crabgrass. And now? A concrete bunker with pianos! And next door, an enormous brick with windows. The neighborhood sure is going to the dogs.

"However, the most intriguing, nay, bewildering moment of this nostalgic trip was my confrontation with a young lady who was passing by, arms filled with books, headed for the big brick. She wore a shirt emblazoned with the motto "Smith College Centennial: A Hundred Years of Women on Top." I found this quite mystifying, but felt I could safely assume she was visiting Williams for the weekend.

"I asked her where her boyfriend was, and began to reminisce over the old days, when the Record would print the names of all the boys by fraternity and list their dates for the big weekend. I lamented that this custom seems to have passed.

"The young woman, however, did not seem to share my grief, in fact, she was turning as red as her—What do you call it nowadays?"

"T-shirt?" I suggested.

"Precisely. In any event, I was informed (with a vengeance, I might add parenthetically) that Williams was now co-educational. She muttered something about 'Winter Carnival is Coming,' a cartoon, and dealing with the perpetrators.

"She also branded me with an apparently vicious epithet. I really would like to know exactly what 'sexist' means. Son, sex is not a subject to be discussed in public at a gentleman's school."

"Why, in my day we would engage in good, clean activities with girls. For example, you would be amazed at how much fun we had ice skating."

Reactions to Women's Studies vary

Sarah Wilson and Lee MacKinnon

Women's studies at Williams continues to be regarded as "frosting on the cake" rather than as a legitimate field of study needed to compensate for the male bias of existing courses. Currently it is left up to the integrity of individual professors to include women in the course material, for the College provides no pressure or support for a more far-reaching and permanent change in curricula.

Members of the Feminist Alliance have spent the past two weeks soliciting responses from faculty, trying to determine their opinions on the institution of more courses dealing with women. Reactions have varied; lobbyists have met with as many blank stares as promises of enthusiastic support. Limited successes include Dean Oakley's proposal to add a college catalogue listing of courses related to women's studies. However, there is little evidence that larger curricular changes are forthcoming.

The educational policies at Williams have failed to keep up with the national growth in women's studies. As of 1976, more than 270 women's studies programs had been organized on college campuses, while 15,000 courses had been developed by teachers at 1500 different institutions. As Williams approaches a fifty-fifty sex ratio in the student body, its failures to recognize the female half of the world becomes more apparent. It has a responsibility to examine the contributions women have made to various disciplines and to challenge the factors which have so long obscured these achievements.

The increasing number of these topics, independent study, and student-initiated courses on or about women at Williams reflects a rising concern on the part of female students to pursue their own heritage in an academic manner. Independent study projects range from the legal status of women in contemporary America to the philosophy of Simone Weil. A student-initiated course on contemporary feminist thought has met with high interest from women and men, students and faculty, feminists and non-feminists alike.

The rising interest on the part of students for women's studies is currently being met by only a small number of professors. This interest must also be accompanied by a re-examination of the responsibilities and goals of a liberal arts institution. Until Williams acknowledges student interest in women's studies and implements concrete reform, we can only interpret inaction as a refusal to recognize the contributions women have made to society as a legitimate subject of study.

Jewish Lecture Series

Nissan Degani, currently a visiting fellow at Harvard from the Ministry of Education in Israel, will present a 3-lecture series at Williams College on March 4th and 5th.

He will discuss: "Zionism: Ideals and Reality," "Israel and World Jewry: Problems in their Relationship," and "Current Issues in Israel."

The first lecture will take place during brunch in the Baxter Reserve Room at 10:30 Sunday morning. The following two will take place in the Kuskin Room in the back of the Thompson Memorial Chapel on Sunday night at 7:30 pm and Monday night at 8:00 pm.

The series is co-sponsored by The Williams College Jewish Association, The Political Science Department and The Lecture Committee. Students, faculty, and their friends are welcome.

On Thursday and Friday, March 2nd and 3rd, WILLIAMSTHEATRE presents Pedro Calderon de la Barca's dramatic masterpiece of Spain's Golden Age, LIFE IS A DREAM. This 17th century play has been adapted from a translation by Edwin Honig, and directed by Jon Stolzberg. Peter A. Meyers has composed a musical score and will perform it on piano and electronic synthesizers. Curtain time in the Studio theatre is 8:30 pm, and free tickets are available one hour before each performance at the Greylock entrance to the AMT. Seating is limited and latecomers cannot be admitted. (photo by Gast)

The NMB becomes the BMC

The newly-completed music facility at Williams College has been formally named the Bernhard Music Center, after Arnold Bernhard, a 1925 Williams graduate and one of the nation's leading investment authorities.

Bernhard, founder of the Value Line services to investors, was awarded an honorary degree by Williams last year. After his graduation from Williams he worked for a brief period as a newspaper reporter; but by 1931 he had settled on his career in investment advising. In 1936, Bernhard founded the Value Line Investment Survey, which has grown to become one of the nation's most relied-upon investment services. During his almost 45 years with Value Line, Bernhard also expanded his business to include a broad range of investment funds and information services.

Williams College President John W. Chandler says that "as an undergraduate Arnold Bernhard was active in musical organizations, and he has retained a life-long involvement in the arts. The Bernhard Music Center will stand as a durable tribute to his generosity and service to Williams and to his belief in the arts as an important part of liberal learning."

A major contribution to the $2.1 million construction project was a bequest in the estates of Mrs. Belvidere Brooks, widow of a 1910 Williams graduate, and her brother Alan Rogers, a member of the Class of 1909. The Trustees have named the major performing space in the new building the Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

A second performance room in the Bernhard Music Center is named the Presser Choral Hall. Kenneth C. Roberts, Jr., professor of music and chairman of the music department, says the Presser Foundation of Bryn Mawr, Pa., has been, for many years, a benefactor of music at Williams. The foundation has given many scholarships for the study of music to Williams students and made a major contribution to construction.

Roberts says there will also be a plaque installed in the building to express gratitude to the Kresge Foundation of Troy, Mich., which gave a $350,000 grant to Williams to help with construction costs.

Two classrooms and a seminar room in the Music Center have been dedicated to former members of the Williams faculty. They are Robert G. Barrow, professor of music from 1939-1977 and the first chairman of the Music Department; Charles L. Seltford, a member of the Class of 18[illegible] and Director of Music at Williams from 1923-1939; and Sumner Salter, Director of Music from 1905-1923.

The artist's room is named in honor of Joaquin Nin-Culmell, founder of the Berkshire Symphony and Professor of Music at Williams from 1940-1956.

Several practice rooms in the lower level of Chapin Hall, says Shainman, are dedicated to "deceased Williams alumni who were always associated with music either through their careers or their continuing interests." One room honors Waldo Selden Pratt of the Class of 1878, who was America's first internationally known musicologist. John Tasker Howard, a 1913 graduate, who was Curator of the Americana Collection of the New York Public Library and author of "Our American Music," is honored as well as Hubbard Hutchison of the Class of 1917, music critic of the New York Times and donor of a graduate fellowship awarded each year by Williams. A fourth room is dedicated to H. Danforth Starr, a 1927 graduate, who was the impetus behind a concert fund at Williams. A room dedication also honors Edward M. Ripin of the Class of 1952.

A major teaching resource in the Bernhard Music Center is a record collection presented to the Music Department by Dr. Robert J. Mayer of the Class of 1965 in memory of his father Dr. Eugene L. Mayer.

The audio facility in the new building which was planned by Douglas B. Moore, Associate Professor of Music at Williams, honors Williamstown resident Robert C. Sprague, founder of the Sprague Electric Company.

Plaques will also be installed to acknowledge gifts from Paul Kohnstamm, of the Class of 1944 and Robert B. Miller of the Class of 1928. Kohnstamm donated funds in honor of his wife and Miller in memory of three of his classmates.

Irwin Shainman, Professor of Music and chairman of the new building's dedication committee, says the numerous dedications give the Bernhard Music Center a sense of the history of music at Williams. "When we consider that Williams was formerly a conservative, small, male liberal arts college with all that used to imply," he says, "we are proud of the fact that so many of our alumni, our friends and former faculty have worked so hard to keep the tradition of music alive on the campus. It is that kind of person we honor in this building."

Music center construction has humorous history

by Susan Hobbs

Murphy's law asserts "if anything can possibly go wrong, it will". Take, for example, the construction of the Bernhard music center. Murphy struck out on any major problems, but enough minor mishaps occurred to fulfill his expectations.

The music department originally projected a fall opening date, but had to move the opening to January 1 once construction on the building had started. But the date was overly optimistic. The four recitals scheduled for January had to be cancelled since the recital-hall was still unfinished. By January 3, the music department was able to move into its offices, which were still lacking windows and heat. The department held the first class in the new building on Monday, February 5, and the first concert the following Friday.

There was no single reason for the delayed opening, just a number of small incidents which added up. Murphy would insist that they are inevitable.

One of the funnier anecdotes concerns the bright red chairs of the Brooks-Rogers recital hall. The Michigan manufacturer sent one chair to an acoustician in California for testing. Once it passed inspection, the rest of the shipment was to be sent to Williamstown for installation. When the chairs still hadn't arrived after some time, Buildings and Grounds began a search. The chairs were discovered snowbound in Chicago, and apparently headed towards California.

Meanwhile, the men who were to install the chairs were having trouble finding the college, believing Williamstown to be a suburb of Boston. The chairs were finally installed February 5, and none the worse for wear.

Other delaying factors included the temporary loss of half a shipment of wood panelling for the recital hall, the problems with the quality of vinyl wallpaper, and the late arrival of shelving for the library.

The shelving was to be installed by December 1 but wasn't actually put in until February 15. In the interim, all library materials were stored in the activities room and the visiting artists' room, where they created numerous traffic problems.

Even the BMC's windows could not escape Murphy's grasp. The building required special windows of a good acoustic nature and the best manufacturer happened to be in California. The windows were to arrive at Logan airport in a palletized container. Somehow, they went to Kennedy airport instead. No one was [illegible]

By the time the windows did arrive in Williamstown, it was too cold to caulk them. The condensation on the inside froze, leaving ice on the inside of many windows.

Still to arrive are lights for the recital hall (shipped February 7 from New Jersey), and the choral hall chairs. The blue wool fabric for the chairs was sent from Cambridge to New York for fireproofing. While en route back to Cambridge, United Parcel mislocated the fabric. It still hasn't been found.

Not everything was late. Eight pianos were ordered 2½ years ago, and for the past year and a half they have been in the Thompson Chapel waiting for the new music building to be completed.

The floors had their own difficulties. Five days are required to lay down the brown or grey floors, which are made from a poured, seamless epoxy. Ignoring the barriers, some people were determined to take their own tours. Remnants of waffle footprints still remain.

Douglas Moore, Associate Professor of Music, remarked that there is "still some fine tuning to be done". For example, the sound system for the recital hall still needs to be installed, and there are a few leaks here and there. A number of locks require fixing, since many lack crucial parts.

Department chairman Kenneth Roberts attributed the many delays to the fact that there are 27 contracting firms besides the general contractor, and there is "only so much that a general contractor can do". With all the separate firms, it is hard to get immediately delivery of every item.

All this is not to say that the music department is displeased. "The department is ecstatic", Moore avowed. "We're deliriously happy", said Roberts. "Our forethought is working out." Roberts specifically mentioned the wide corridors and big elevator which made moving easy. The soundproofing is also excellent, he noted.

Another important feature is the special humidity control which is good both for the instruments and for people's health. And the fact that everything is all in one building pleases everyone. "It's nice to have your office in the same building as you have choir rehearsal", acknowledged Roberts.

Functional design contrasts with Chapin

by Melle Rockefeller

Williams College is well prepared for World War Three. Bunker style architecture, initiated by Sawyer Library, has reached its apogee in the new Bernhard Music Center.

The building is no more than a receding rectangle located between two brick mammoths. The architects, the Cambridge Seven, wisely chose to downplay its importance at the end of Baxter Lawn by setting it below the level of the hill. But, as far as the exterior goes, that was the only wise decision.

Rather than pulling the Center into its western neighbor, Chapin Hall, by the use of bricks and equal proportions, the architects used cheaper poured concrete and drew brick-y striations. Perhaps the concrete was to echo the Chapin columns of stone which were meant to be marble. Architecture is no less a place for honesty than academics.

The fenestration is more like that of a castle than an artistic center. The great front window that spans two stories, is a dark, cold void that reflects light instead of allowing vision in. The porticullis is a multilowered deck between the body of the building and Chapin.

The building suffers most from its siting. The grey concrete walls fold back toward Lehman in an attempt to keep the Lawn open, but what it forms is a rough-hewn quadrangle, barricaded by the blank wall of Sawyer and the flat upper story of Bernhard. Fernald sits in the middle of that desolate plain like a wonderful Victorian joke.

Faculty reacts to problem of grade inflation at Williams about three-quarters of a point on the Williams twelve point scale.

No one is quite sure how serious this problem is, although the department chairmen interviewed for this article were sensitive to the impact of grading and work load policies (the two are not always related, but usually are) on student enrollment. Said DeWitt, who chairs the biology department, "If I decided that Biology 101 would be graded back on the old standards, no one would take biology and students would be screaming."

Moreover, there is no question but that grading disparities do exist between departments here and O'Conner said that he knows of and is concerned about them. He declined to go into more detail, however.

O'Conner sees still a third impact of grade inflation. Like many professors, O'Conner has noticed more and more students feeling excessively burdened by the work load at Williams. He feels that there is a "direct connection between the artificially high grades and the student feeling of academic pressure." While the relationship is difficult to document, O'Conner is not the only faculty member to have intuited it. Professor H. Ganse Little, chairman of the religion department, agreed, and like O'Conner, he is hopeful that a grade cut will make a dent in the increasing student grade anxiety he has seen.

But when discussing the relationship of grade inflation to grade anxiety, one runs into sticky cause and effect problems, since many professors named student grade anxiety as a pressure they felt for boosting grades. Part II of this article will look at the issue in more detail.

For any of these, and conceivably other reasons, the faculty appear to have almost unanimously embraced O'Conner's suggestion in his article that grading standards should be lower. The feedback he has received has been "overwhelmingly positive," says O'Conner, and interviews with many faculty confirm this.

Part of the difficulty with dealing with the grade inflation problem is that it seems to have almost sneaked up on the academic community. In an article accompanying the 1976 college grade inflation survey, Professor Arvo E. Juola of Michigan State wrote: "Prior to 1974, grade inflation was but a trend which appeared to have no preconceived plan or rationale. Many colleges with high inflation rates were not even aware of the phenomenon."

Locally, when one asks Williams professors why they grade higher today than they did, say, ten years ago, one often meets with long, thoughtful pauses. Answers are not easy to find. Dean O'Conner, for example, admitted that he was "as bad as anybody else" about giving high grades. When asked why he was giving higher grades than he used to, he hesitated for several moments, then replied, "That's the toughest question to answer. It's embarrassing. I really don't know how to get into that."

The faculty members do eventually come up with answers, and the one that is conspicuously absent from them is that students are doing better work. Grade inflation is a genuine inflation. More often they will say that they are trying to stay in line with overall higher college grading standards.

Explained Professor DeWitt: "Clearly the subject (biology) hasn't changed. Tests are very similar, students are working as much as they used to, and as a group are as smart as they used to be. I think the grading on tests is reasonably hardnosed. But when it comes to sitting down and making up final grades, you jack them up. You don't want to screw your students so you make allowances at the end to get the grades up to college standards." DeWitt noted additionally that the lowest grades are the ones jacked up the most, which accounts in part for the sharply decreased grade spread.

In many cases, the new college standards are communicated by students who no longer view grades in the same light that they used to. According to Professor Sherron Knopp of the English department, "The greatest pressure to my mind (for boosting grades) is the student expectation that if he or she does acceptably, then it's a grade of B." Other professors have noted, too, that increasingly students do not look upon a C as average work.

Yet while the present grading standard is dictating grades to a great extent now, explanations of why the standard rose are speculative. One often cited factor, the impact of heightened professional school and job market competition, while undoubtedly having had an effect, seems unlikely by itself to have caused the change. According to Professor James Skinner in the chemistry department, who is also the pre-medical advisor, the grade distribution in such heavily pre-med subscribed courses as freshmen and organic chemistry, where presumably inflation pressures would be as high as anywhere, have not changed significantly in the last five years.

Another possible contributing factor is the institution of student course evaluations in 1973, but again, while it may have fanned the flames a little, it is not likely a major impetus to grade rises, even for junior faculty whose promotion decisions may be affected by what they say. For one thing, grade inflation began well before student evaluations began. For another, there is, according to Booth, a "reassuringly small" correlation between grades given by instructors and student estimations of their teaching strength. Finally, the junior faculty interviewed for this article said that their grading practices were dictated primarily by what they considered college standards to be and not by anticipated evaluations. On the other hand, there are, according to O'Conner, indications of a correlation between age and grading; younger faculty do tend to give higher grades.

Still another possibility is that changing educational attitudes have pushed grades up. According to Booth, one can take essentially two attitudes toward grades; that they are intended 1) to sort students out, which is how O'Conner viewed them in his article, or 2) to motivate students to study a subject more. An example of the latter, Booth says, is a Keller plan course in which a certain grade is given for a specified amount of achievement. In one freakish instance, standards in a Keller plan course were set so low that by the end of the semester, 22 students had achieved A+'s. While such cases are certainly the exception and not the rule, Booth suggests that any tendency of faculty to take the latter view of grading is likely to raise average GPA's.

If so, he notes, then dealing with the grade inflation problem becomes all the more difficult. Enforcing a grade spread, Booth says, would mean "enforcing a pedagogical view and that gets into problems of academic freedom."

Farewell to Yo-Yo

regular at house softball games in his fraternity days, playing somewhere between second base and shortstop.

Yo-Yo was also an avid hockey and basketball fan, but lately those cold, dark nights kept him at home.

Yo-Yo has been the subject of numerous local news stories and was recognized in an issue of the Alumni Review. The 1972 CUL dedication to Y-Yo cited his close resemblance to that year's seniors: if he cared about something, he really cared; but if he didn't care, he really didn't give a damn. Just last spring, Security Officer "Hap" Milne gave Yo-Yo the coveted "Phi Beta Happa" award, with plaque and diploma, for those special people who deserve to get something. One of Yo-Yo's closest friends, Milne writes in his memory:

"Yes, we will miss him. Yes, we will tell stories of his escapades. Yes, we will embellish his adventures. Yes, Yo-Yo was Williams. Yes, Yo-Yo is Williams." A stone will soon be placed in front of the snack bar to perpetuate the memory of a fat Beagle mutt who showed so many people that there is a life outside of the stacks.

Arts Briefs

Music between the wars

Stephen and Laura Dankner will present an informal concert, "Music Between the Wars," Sunday, March 4, at 3:00 at the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute in Williamstown. Narrated by Irwin Shainman, the concert is in conjunction with the Clark's movie series "Between the Wars."

The Dankners will perform vocal and piano works by such diverse composers as Charles Ives, George Gershwin, Darius Milhaud, Jerome Kern, Irving Berlin, Noel Coward, Poulenc, and Cole Porter. Irwin Shainman will briefly discuss the works and their relationship to the times in which they were written. Todd Greenwald will assist the Dankners in a rousing rendition of Ives' World War I song "He Is There."

Stephen Dankner received a D.M.A. from the Juilliard School and is Associate Professor of Music at Williams College. Vocalist Laura Dankner holds graduate degrees in music and library science. Professor of Music at Williams, Irwin Shainman is well known in the community both as a musician and for his involvement with the Williamstown Theatre Festival.

Pompidou slide show

Michele Cone, art critic, lecturer and author, will give a slide presentation on the Pompidou Center at 7:30 on February 28 in the Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall.

The Pompidou Center, also known as the "Centre Beaubourg," is a unique new cultural center which has put France years ahead of other countries in terms of popular appeal of the museum.

Michele Cone, who has given numerous lectures on the Pompidou Center, graduated the youngest in her class at Bryn Mawr. She has been awarded a fellowship with the Institute of French Studies at New York University.

Four years ago she published The Roots and Routes of Art in the Twentieth Century, on the origins of modern art and its evolution. In 1977, she went on a lecture tour organized by the Alliance Francaise.

Fifth Round

Music in the Round will present its fifth concert of the current series on Friday, March 2, at 8:30 p.m. in the Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall. Works by Schumann, Britten, Mozart, and Gordon Binkerd make up the program. Admission is free with Williams ID.

Julius and Lisa Hegyi, violins; Susan St. Amour and Lucy Joseph, violas; and Douglas Moore, cello, will play Mozart's magnificent Quintet in G minor, K. 516. Randall Ellis, oboe, will join the group in Benjamin Britten's Phantasy Quartet, a one-movement work written for Leon Goossens, the great oboist from the United Kingdom.

For Gordon Binkerd's Portrait Interieur, Jane Bucci, soprano, will join Hegyi and Moore.

Charlotte Hegyi, piano, and her husband will perfrom Schumann's Sonata in A minor, Op. 105

Bernhard building not exactly titillating

Of course, the cliche about books and covers applies equally well to new music buildings. Despite the unappealing cover, the building's interior is well thought-out and functional. The most startling event (to borrow the planner's lingo) is the transition in scale and feeling in the entrance lobby. The exterior walls of concrete are continued inside, which ought to be a warning about upcoming pretensions. But the rosy Brick, which was missing on the facade, appears on the floor to warm up the bleakness. Natural wood is used wherever possible to create a human resonance. The staircase, which is often a tool used to liven up space, creates intriguing upward angles.

Upstairs, the main comments made about the class- and practice-rooms is that they work and are soundproof. Supergraphics, dubious anywhere, leave no room for confusion about room numbers. The Brooks-Rogers Recital Hall, the main upstairs space, is lined with acoustical panels and borrowed imagery from every music hall down to Alvar Aalto. Red has become the color de rigeur for seats of entertainment; the Recital Hall makes no exception.

It would be easy to write off the interior spaces as no more than pleasantly functional. But the architects have created fascinating ambiguities with interior-exterior dialogue. Two girders that cross in an X, show the upper skylights as cutaway holes from the building's structure in an architectural pun. Voids created from solids are still structurally solid. The terrace space between Chapin and the Music Center is another example. On first walking down the corridor on the upper floor, the space seems to flow from outdoors into the heart of the building. Only a thin, moveable glass wall expresses the break from corridor to terrace. This is in direct contrast to the uppermost floor (confusingly called the second floor, although it is the third from the ground) of offices, which contains no windows.

The Bernhard Music Center represents the latest in the Williams tradition of controversial, yet smoothly functioning buildings with hidden architectural depth.

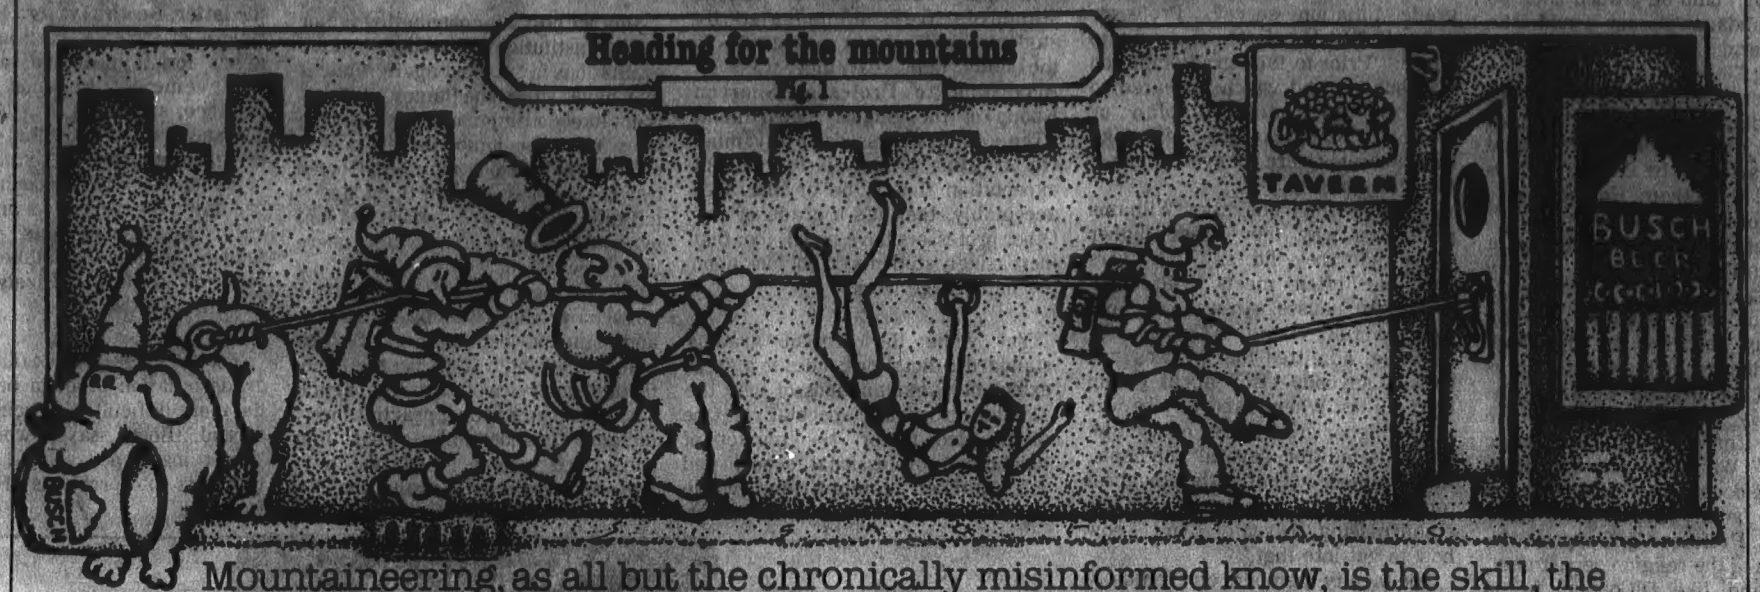
Energy Contest

The Conservation Club's first of three energy saving contests begins Thursday, March 1.

At the end of the two-week contest $50 will be awarded to the house showing the greatest reduction in energy consumption as compared to the same time span last year.

Each dormitory will be assigned a building representative who will be responsible for reporting to Building and Grounds any situations of room overheating, overlighting or faucet leaks.



Five years ago, Dartmouth initiated an extensive conservation program that has since saved $1.5 million in energy costs.

The club will also sponsor contests between April 2 and April 30, and May 1 and May 15.

Any questions or suggestions should be directed to Grant Parker, 6721, or Pete Didisheim, 2917.

Mountaineering #3.

METHODOLOGY

Heading for the mountains
Fig. 1

Mountaineering, as all but the chronically misinformed know, is the skill, the science and the art of drinking Busch Beer. It begins by heading for the mountains (i.e., a quick jaunt to your favorite package emporium or wateringhole) and ends by downing the mountains (i.e., slow slaking swallows of the brew that is Busch).

¶ However, between those two points lies a vast area of personal peccadilloes sometimes called technique and sometimes called methodology (depending on your major). Hence, this ad. ¶ Sipping vs. chugging. Both have their merits, of course. But generally speaking, except for cases of extreme thirst or a leaking glass, sipping is the more prudent practice for serious, sustained mountaineering. ¶ Next, the proper position. Some swear by sitting; others by standing. Suffice it to say that the most successful mountaineers are flexible, so you'll find both sitters and standers. (Except on New Year's Eve, when it's almost impossible to find a sitter.) ¶ Which brings us to additives. Occasionally a neophyte will sprinkle salt in his Busch; others mix in tomato juice; and a few on the radical fringe will even add egg. While these manipulations can't be prohibited (this is, after all, a free country), they are frowned upon. Please be advised that purity is a virtue, and the natural refreshment of Busch is best uncompromised.

¶ Finally, there's the issue of containers. Good taste dictates a glass be used. But bad planning sometimes prevents that. If you find yourself forced to drink from the can, you should minimize this breach of etiquette. Be formal. Simply let your little finger stick out stiffly (see Fig. 4). Happy Mountaineering!

Don't just reach for a beer. BUSCH® Head for the mountains.

Response to WOOLF

To the editor:

According to the Outlook article on WOOLF by Paul Goren and Ted Wolf in the Feb. 6 issue of the Record, Dean Stevens is opposed to the idea of pre-Freshman Days WOOLF trips for the following reasons: "(He) is opposed to the trip out of consideration for fairness to all members of the incoming freshman class. He believes that all new students should start together on the Williams campus with the same initial experience. A pre-Freshman Days trip in which only a small proportion of the class participated might confer advantages of friendship and familiarity on the group."

If this is truly Dean Stevens' attitude, then I have several questions for him based on my experience. First, in my freshman entry lived three guys who had all attended the same prep school and knew each other before coming to Williams, where they, in fact, became suitemates. Meanwhile, I came from a distant region, not knowing a single one of my classmates before Freshman Days. A relatively tight social group in my entry quickly formed, largely about these three guys. This occurred, naturally, I believe, because of the tendency of people to fill as expediently as possible the social vacuum that our sudden injection into Williams precipitates. But being on the periphery of this social group, it took me a long time to determine my social relationships and the nature of my friendships, and just to understand how this situation had naturally come about. These now ex-entrymates are all friends and all good guys, but I ask you, Dean Stevens, what efforts were made to insure that all of us in Sage A had the same initial Williams experience, and that the personal advantages of friendship and familiarity in our entry were minimal?

Second, I was a WOOLF leader last fall. In the group that Chris Ross and I led were four freshmen, from four different entries. The trip spanned Freshman Days and was essentially a pre-Freshman Day's trip. As I look back, I do not see that any substantial advantage of friendship or familiarity was gained by the freshman involved. If they had been on campus, they would have met other, probably more, people. I certainly do not see them clinging to each other much the way people within the same entry often seem to do. I must admit that I do enjoy seeing them from time to time, though I'm not particularly close to any one of them. If any undesirable advantage or disadvantage was involved, these freshmen were probably disadvantaged by what they missed over Freshman Days—though I feel they didn't miss much, or anything they havn't had a chance to see since classes began—or by the rush in which they had to enter the first day of classes, having been away till Wednesday noon.

What I think I did see were four people who had a chance to relax in a strange, new environment, who had the opportunity to hear a lot about Williams and about just going to school in general, through casual conversation. I think I saw four people whose initial experience at (or near) Williams was a positive one, as is not always the case, and who were undeniably eager to get started at Williams as they hiked down the shoulder of the Dome that Wednesday morning. And I think that things would have been even better if the trip had not coincided with Freshman Days, but had been held a couple of days earlier. Nobody would have had to rush around that last half a day before classes. And above all, the freshmen involved on our trip, and the others conducted at the same time, would have been able to share the broader perspective on Williams, which I believe they gained from the trip, with the other freshman they would have had contact with over Freshman Days, their entrymates, who were also busy developing their first impressions, for better of for worse, of Williams. Dean Stevens, is there undesirable disadvantage or unfairness involved in a situation like this?

A priori judgement

To the editor:

A two-time WOOLF leader, I have distinctly different impressions of my hikes. The first was a pre-Freshman Days two-night excursion on which people were mentally relaxed and unworried, inquisitive and open to new experiences. I was so amazed when we camped on Pine Cobble the second night—to think that I hadn't known anyone in the group two days before.

The second trio, a one-nighter after Convocation this fall, was different. Not to say it wasn't a good experience, it just wasn't as vivid. Folks naturally had school on their minds. The trip was too short, not only in time, but in mind.

The fault of the Deans Office's policy on WOOLF is that it is based on an a priori judgment—that early WOOLF trips would prove socially divisive—which is wholly unsupported in the real world. Having part of the freshman class arrive a few days early and getting to know the surrounding hills, a couple of upperclassmen, perhaps a faculty member, and several fellow freshman, is beneficial not only for those directly involved, but also for the rest of the school. WOOLFers know people from other entries, and this helps develop new ties among different entries, thus complementing part of the JAs' roles. Social development pursues a more natural course: groups do not always meet en masse in preordinaed groups.

WOOLF cannot be as refreshing a "pause for breath" if it comes at a time (during or just after Freshman Days) when new students are understandably psychologically immersed in the on-campus scene. Only if WOOLF occurs before Freshman Days can its full benefits be realized.

To think that there is one "Williams experience" is absurd; to try and impose such uniformity on the freshman class is contemptible. The spontaneous should be allowed, indeed encouraged, unless there is damned good reason for suppressing it. Neither the CUL nor Dean Stevens have given good reasons for stifling what have been the best WOOLF trips. Instead, they have followed the time-honored recipe for mediocrity: when in doubt, follow the rules.

No joke

To the editors:

This Thursday Williams was covered with posters celebrating Winter Carnival and dehumanizing Williams' students. As a person I was saddened by the poster's depiction of sex as violent and impersonal. As a feminist I was angered by the artists clear sexism: there can be no equality between the sexes so long as a woman's body and female sexuality are "just (for) poking fun" as the picture displays and one of its captions proclaims. I am sure that the people who put up these posters thought that it was nothing more than a good joke. It is however a joke which reinforces negative stereotypes and cruel prejudices. I believe that we have a responsibility to enlighten others not to drag them further from the truth. I would say to those who put up the posters a good joke is not one which lessens us as people.

I am proud to know that Williams College as a whole did not find this joke funny. By Thursday afternoon every poster was torn down. Much as I am saddened by the insensitivity of those who put up the posters I am very heartened by the college's reaction. It is difficult to become conscious of the feelings of those around us, and hard to admit the biases and sexism in ourselves, but it is necessary for us to do so. It was wonderful to see that we have come so far over the last year.

Announces candidacy

To the editor:

In a year which demanded change more than anything else, we voted ourselves the choice between Byron Walker and Beth Geismar. Last week's run-off election showed that we have nothing new on our hands. The ideas of the candidates were unoriginal, the platforms conservative, and the campaign tactics disgraceful. The plethora of garbage filling our S.U. boxes showed that these candidates were no different than any other politician in Washington.

Beth, billed as "not a politician", and "her friends" knew their politics well enough to aim their efforts at the freshman class, the largest and most easily swayed voting block. She kindly offered to remove "Freshman Restrictions" (off-campus 95s) which, unfortunately, do not exist. How her participation in crew will enhance her abilities as President is hard to see, until one realizes that roughly seventy students are currently involved with crew, and many more have been in the past. Her campaign was appropriately summed up in the poster "Support J.A.'s—Vote for Beth Geismar", which is the kind of logical fallacy that gets people elected.

Byron, perhaps a new face in college politics, hardly offered any new ideas. His campaign ploys were as predictable as his proposals. He danced around from freshman entry to entry under the facade of Purple Key concern over admissions, starting his campaign early. Freshman do not know many upperclassmen, especially such concerned ones. He also began the offensive S.U. stuffing, with honest and humble endorsements, before the first election.

Never before have I sincerely chosen between the lesser of two evils. If the elections were any indication of future performances, we are in for another year like the one we just endured. Many of us will turn apathetic at the prospect, but I hope more will not. With this concern in mind, I announce my candidacy for the February, 1980 election.

The Chinese invasion of Vietnam continued as major battles appeared to have begun at Lang Son and Lao Cai, north of Hanoi. Chinese troops have now advanced sixteen miles into Vietnam in their attempt to force Vietnam to end its invasion of Cambodia. The fighting has become a battleground for Sino-Soviet hostilities, as the Soviets have supplied Vietnam with planes.

The Islamic revolutionary government of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini in Iran ordered the execution of four of the Shah's generals without informing Prime Minister Bazargan. The Bazargan government tried to establish its authority with the completion of a cabinet. However, the disunity in Iran was reflected in a rally held by the Poeple's Fedayeen, attended by 70,000 people demanding a Marxist government. Oil sales from Iran may be resumed soon, it was announced.

Rhodesia's transitional government dispatched jets against guerrilla bases in Zambia and Mozambique in retaliation for the downing of an airliner earlier this month. The government of Prime Minister Ian Smith announced that the purpose of the strikes was to foil disruption of the election scheduled for April. Guerrilla leaders Joshua Nkoma and Robert Mugabe have vowed to upset the elections in which the country is to elect its first black government.

The prospects for success of President Carter's anti-inflation program looked grim as it was announced on Friday that the Consumer Price Index rose 0.9 per cent in January. Food prices were up 1.4 per cent, led by beef, and the costs of transportation rose 1.1 per cent. Also, George Meany, A.F.L.-C.I.O. head, announced that major labor union's would challenge Carter's "voluntary" wage-price guidelines in court.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee agreed that the United States would support Taiwan in the event of any Chinese attack. An amendment to legislation providing for unofficial relations between the U.S. and Taiwan states that the U.S. will continue to be concerned with Taiwan's defense after the mutual defense treaty is abrogated at the end of the year. The U.S. will continue to supply Taiwan with defensive arms.

Cleveland voters will decide today two issues which are crucial to the city's future solvency. Two referenda are on the ballot: one would raise the municipal income tax rate from one to one-and-one-half per cent; the other would permit the sale of the debt-ridden Municipal Electric Light Plant. The city's beleaguered mayor, Dennis Kucinich, favors approval of the first referendum and defeat of the second.

New Orleans policemen resumed contract negotiations with city officials but are still striking. Scheduled Mardi Gras parades have been moved from downtown New Orleans to the suburbs, causing merchants to sue the police for $30 million to cover losses. Sanitation workers are supporting the strike and are not collecting trash. The negotiations center on wages and providing amnesty for the striking policemen.

The Nixon Administration tried to eliminate "anti-Administration content" from public broadcasting, according to documents obtained by The New York Times. From 1969 to 1974, the Nixon Administration worked to control the board of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting and to widen the division between the "liberal" national network and local public stations. These aims were partially realized, but Nixon was not satisfied with public broadcasting, since "it never did anything for him."

Governor Edward J. King said last week that if he had a chance to change anything he did in his first six weeks in office, he would have taken greater care in scrutinizing applicants for high-level state jobs. King's comments came on the heels of an F.B.I. report that Thomas DiSilva, King's choice to be an associate commissioner of the Metropolitan District Commission, has close links to organized crime. The M.D.C. is a State agency providing services to the Boston area, including some 500 police. King in the same interview renewed his commitment to the 21-year-old drinking age, regardless of the ages in states bordering on Massachusetts.

In Boston, the U.S. Court of Appeals ruled that the Federal Government may begin selling oil-drilling leases on the Georges Bank, one of the world's richest fishing grounds. The Court also said that Interior Secretary Cecil Andrus has "a solemn responsibility to see that the great life systems of the ocean are not unreasonably jeopardized." The Court warned that it would halt the sale if the Secretary failed in his duty.

Not much more is known about the state of the conflict in Indochina a week after the first Chinese troops headed into Vietnam. However, it is time to begin to speculate on the various goals China is seeking to achieve in the most recent Asian war.

The war is still what is called a "limited war," which is one of the difficulties involved in trying to accurately determine its extent or the objectives of the Chinese. For example, few air craft have so far been employed by either side, and it is much easier for U.S. intelligence sources to pick up ground-to-air instructions than to determine battle plans on the ground. Thus, the truth of many war reports is frustratingly difficult to establish.

It now appears that the Chinese have committed about a quarter of a million of their troops to the Vietnam conflict, and that the Chinese have pushed their way to points twelve miles south of the border. Although some analysts were predicting a week ago that the Chinese would withdraw after several days, it now appears that this will not be the case. A Peking official stated that China's "overall pull-out won't come today or tomorrow" and that China intends to teach "a bit more lessons" to Vietnam. Meanwhile, Vietnamese officials say that they are prepared to continue the war for years if necessary.

The Soviet Union appears at this point to be unwilling to go the full route in protecting their allies, the Vietnamese; it is quite unlikely that the Soviets would employ nuclear weapons against the Chinese or launch a major attack across the border.

However, it is expected that the Russians will continue to supply increasing amounts of military hardware to Vietnam. The Soviets may also be able to force the Vietnamese to allow them to operate Cam Ranh Bay base, a $145 million strategic base built by the Americans in what was then South Vietnam. Although they have been allies for over two years, Hanoi has repeatedly resisted giving the Russians the base. Now they may have no choice.

Such a move by the Soviets might play right into Peking's long-range plans for building a closer relationship with the West. The current conflict has demonstrated the fact that the Soviet-Vietnamese alliance is the most powerful one in Southeast Asia, and any strengthening of the bond might prompt the U.S., Japan, and South Korea into including China in a new, offsetting alliance. It seemed as though Teng, when he was in the U.S. last month, was very much interested in such an alliance against what he called the "polar bear"—meaning the Russians.

The Russians themselves expressed concern about what they saw as the American provision of a platform from which Teng could criticize the Soviet Union. Although the short-run effect of the war may be to cool Sino-American relations, Teng may have correctly foreseen the long-run advantages to such a possible alliance when and if the Russians establish their Cam Ranh Bay base.

It does not appear, though, that even the short-run consequences of the war for U.S.-Chinese relations will amount to much. The Carter Administration has indicated that plans to open the U.S. Embassy in Peking on March 1 will go ahead.

Present at that opening will be U.S. Treasury Secretary Michael Blumenthal, who is in China to lay the groundwork for economic and trade negotiations. "I expect to have fruitful discussions," Blumenthal said. Obviously, the Administration is not prepared to sacrifice the possibility of billion-dollar deals with the Chinese over the war, a strategy which plays right into Teng's hands.

Also, nothing ever rallies up a nation like a good war. Already, the Chinese are reporting acts of heroism on the part of the troops, and the war may prove to bring the Chinese even more behind Teng's leadership.

Thus, the Chinese may benefit from this war more than by simply showing Hanoi they cannot push Cambodia around. And the Russians and Carter may play right into Teng's hands.

Pucksters capture Little Three crown

by John Kreese

The men's hockey team dealt the boys from Amherst a 5-3 loss last Saturday night and captured yet another Little Three sports crown for Williams this year. The visiting Epha had defeated Wesleyan earlier this season in Middletown for their other Little Three victory.

Amherst initiated the scoring early in the first period with a tip-in goal on the power play. But Williams countered with their highest scoring first period of the season, four goals.

Jim Rooney, the Eph's leading goal-getter this season with 17, pushed a rebound home on a power play tally started by Tinker Connelly's slap-shot. Then freshman Dave Casarro's slapper from the right wing put the visitors ahead to stay—his fourth goal in the last five games.

Matt St. Onge finished Amherst off as he garnered two more goals for Williams. The first score came on another power play from Tom Resor and Connelly and his second occurred when he rushed the puck down the right side, cut-back toward the slot, then fired a wrist shot to beat the Lord Jeff's goaltender to the short side. The Ephmen ended their scoring with a third period slap shot goal from thirty-five feet out by Tom Resor.

Earlier last week Williams playoff hopes were dashed when they lost to Hamilton 5-3 in a game that saw the host Ephmen fight back from a 5-1 deficit at the start of the last period and come within inches of tying the contest in the closing minutes.

In that game Tinker Connelly registered his second hat trick of the season. The sophomore forward's previous three goal performance had come in another back-breaking loss, 5-4 to Merrimack in overtime on Feb. 6.

The Amherst victory was the first for the Ephs since their 5-2 trouncing of UConn Jan. 30. Moreover, Williams hasn't won at home since Jan. 13, a thrilling 4-3 defeat of Holy Cross.

With their last game of the season this Wednesday night here at 7:30 against UMass and a chance for Coach Bill McCormick's skaters to even their overall record (now 10-11) fan support could well make the difference.

Birdlets claim overtime win

The Women's Hockey team dropped a tough 1-0 contest in double overtime to Wesleyan last Friday night. This was the second meeting between the two teams this year, Wesleyan having previously crushed the Ephwomen in Middletown by a score of 8-0.

Much as the Ephs had surprised a confident Middlebury squad the week before, so too did they give the Cardinals a real scare. Whereas Wesleyan's earlier victory was a story of total domination over Williams, this time the Ephwomen were able to control play much of the time, and the loss was simply due, it seemed, to fate alone. Each team had many scoring opportunities, both in regulation time and in the first overtime period. While Wesleyan was perhaps a more balanced squad, Williams' skaters were able to nullify any advantage through hustle and scrappiness, especially in and around the crease. Laurie Soper, Jeanne Dugan, Kathy Kraft, Jane Goldfarb, Claudia DiFalco and Bonnie Foster (defensemen all) could be seen constantly "muscling" Cardinal forwards off the puck and out of the play. The backchecking of centers Taft, Webber and Kelsey was also instrumental in checking the potent Wesleyan offensive machine.

Of course, ultimately, Wesleyan was able to get some shots off, but Lisa Halperin handled them with ease. Eventually one team had to get lucky, and finally Wes poked home a goal at 3:01 of the second sudden-death overtime period.

Williams had lost this game, but had shown so much improvement and composure that Wesleyan, after that first triumph three weeks ago, may have felt lucky to leave with a victory.

Squashers pulverize Lord Jeffs, 8-1

by Jackson Galloway

In its final match of the year, the men's squash team pulverized Amherst's Lord Jeffs on their own courts last Saturday, 8-1.

Captain Martin Goldberg, urged on by a substantial family gallery, led the Ephmen, defeating his opponent 15-7, 15-14, 15-6. At the number two spot, senior Jon Saunders overcame a first game loss to down his opponent in four games. In his second match following his return Mitchell Reiss (3) also won in four. Both Peter Thomsen and Wally Miller at numbers 4 and 5 demolished their Amherst opponents in decisive three game victories.

Junior Mark Ianier, senior Will Ballew, and freshman wonder Kennon Miller also chalked up four game victories for Williams. In a pressure packed match, senior Bill Whitney rallied to win the last two games of his five game contest. The only sad note of the outing was the heartbreaking loss of Doug Gernett at the number nine position after battling back to a four all tie in the fifth game overset.

Coach Sean Sloane characterized the destruction of Amherst as, "Sweat. The team played with good control and composure in what is probably one of the most emotion packed matches of the year. Our victory establishes a new precedent for Williams antletics. We're the first team to win a Little Three championship for five years in a row. In that time, we've only lost two individual matches to Amherst."

Captain Martin Goldberg added, "This is our best team win of the year, and it was especially good for the seniors. I think the big reason for our success was that we were better coached. Sean has done a super job all season long, and he has really kept us going. This Amherst team is probably the best we've had to play in several years, and they actually stood a chance of beating us, but we adjusted more quickly to the hot courts and simply outplayed them. A whole lot of credit ought to go to Peter who played a really skilled opponent and beat him straight games. A win over Amherst is always great, but when we beat them in their home courts it's especially satisfying."

With the regular season over, the varsity looks to the nationals at West Point. With the added victories over Fordham earlier in the week and Amherst on Saturday, the varsity should be ranked eighth in the nation on the basis of dual match records and a possible seventh should Army upset Trinity.

Ski teams finish carnival season at Middlebury

Men take fourth

The Men's Ski team drew on strong performances from both the alpine and nordic squads to place fourth at the Eastern Collegiate Ski Championships, held during the Middlebury College Winter Carnival in Middlebury, Vt. As expected, the University of Vermont (UVM) won the four events last Friday and Saturday. Elven Division I teams competed.

Cross-country racer Jeff Magoon, a Senior, skied his finest race of the season, a second place, on the 15-kilometer track. He finished less than 14 seconds behind winner Jim Renkert of Middlebury, and only 2.5 seconds ahead of the next competitor. Also skiing for Williams were sophomore Dave Richards, with a solid 13th, Bob Compton, 32nd, and Paul Tratnyek, 38th. Fifty men competed.

Ski jumper Jeff Hastings, a sophomore, flew 57.5 meters on his farthest jump, finishing fourth. Three Norwegian recruits from UVM, led by Roger Holden, swept the top places. Senior Tom Dodds was 22nd, and sophomore Tob Manning, a newcomer to the event, 30th.

In the slalom, senior Don Tarinelli posted a ninth place, to lead the Williams alpine skiers in that event. Tarinelli was followed by senior Jas Dembinski, who pulled together two strong runs for his best carnival-race performance of the season, 11th, and freshman Steve Graham, 14th. Graham was Williams' top giant slalom finisher, tying for 11th. Tarinelli placed 19th, senior Andy Mikell, 24th, and junior Roger Prevot 25th. Out of the field of 66, Chris Mikell of UVM emerged the winner in both alpine races.

The carnival races, the last competition of the regular season, were the qualifying races for the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) Division I Championships, to be held at Steamboat Springs, Colorado in March. Seven members of the Williams team have qualified: Jeff Magoon, Dave Richards, Jeff Hastings, Andy Mikell, Don Tarinelli, Jas Dembinski, and Steve Graham.

Also, four Williams skiers were named to the All-East team Saturday night: Mikell, Graham, Magoon, and Hastings.

Hellman leads women

The Women's Ski Team finished the college carnival race season with several fine individual performances and an overall fifth place at the Middlebury College Winter Carnival. Middlebury won the carnival, held Thursday through Saturday. There were 10 Division I teams competing.

Tricia Hellman proved herself—as she has all season—consistently strong in both the giant slalom and the slalom, finishing second and fourth respectively. Also contributing to the Williams effort were Julie Ernst, 10th in the slalom and 26th in the giant slalom, Wendy Brown, 18th in the slalom and 34th in the giant slalom, Kathy Lane, 23rd and 34th, and Millie Chapell, 31st in the giant slalom. 57 women competed.

In the nordic division, senior Rachel Potter turned in one of her best finishes of the season on the fast 7.5 kilometer track, a fourth. Freshman Brenda Mailman posted a 12th, her top result this year. Grouped together in 20th, 21st, and 22nd were freshmen Jody Ransom and Alexis Hamill, and sophomore Becky Bangs.

Middlebury also held a fourth-event, a Thursday night relay. The Williams team of Potter, Hamill, Mailman, and Bangs placed sixth out of 10.

Four Williams women have qualified for the National Championships: Tricia Hellman, Julie Ernst, Wendy Brown, and Rachel Potter.

Victories lift b-ball to 14-6

by Stan Paresse

The men's basketball team won two games last week, squeaking by R.P.I. 53-50 on Tuesday night, and then burying Drew University 74-51 on Saturday. The wins lift the team's record to 14-6.

The game against Drew was not quite as close as the R.P.I. thriller. Usually if a team scores 36 points in the first half of a game, they can't expect to go into their locker room leading by 23. But such was the case for Williams on Saturday night, as a combination of solid defense on the part of Williams, and putrid shooting and ball handling on the part of Drew, resulted in an Eph halftime lead of 36-13. Drew was held scoreless for the first five minutes of the game, and after eight minutes Williams led by the score of 16-2.

In a second half that was played with all of the finesse of a stock car race, Drew tried repeatedly to employ a zone trap press to cut the Williams lead, but the Ephs simply raced past the press time and time again. The least Williams led by was 20 points (38-18), and the most was 30 (50-20).

Andy Straka led all scorers with 17 points; Dean Ahlberg added 10; and Sterling Kinsale, Jeff Brinker, and Bob Lutz each had 8. Through the course of the game eleven Eph players broke into the scoring column. Both coaches substituted freely during most of the second half.

In the R.P.I. game on Tuesday, it took some clutch foul shooting in the final minute of play from seniors Jeff Brinker and Jerry Kelly to carry the Ephs from a 50-49 deficit, to the win.

In that game, Kelly led Williams with 14 points, while Brinker chipped in 11. Dean Ahlberg and Al Lewis also scored double figures; hitting for 10 points apiece.

Saturday's win was the final home game for Eph seniors Gerry Kelly, Matt Spangler, Jeff Brinker, and Sterling Kinsale. Lasell fans showed their appreciation to this year's Little Three champion team by offering a two minute standing ovation at the game's end.
